5. Judas, a Jew of Damascus (Ac 9¹¹).—His house was in the Straight Street, and Saul of Tarsus lodged there after his conversion.

6. Judas Barsabbas, one of two deputies—Silas being the other—who were chosen by the rulers of the Church at Jerusalem to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, and report to the believers there the Council's decision on the question on what terms the Gentiles should be admitted into the Christian Church (Ac 15²²⁻³²). Judas and Silas are described as 'chief men among the brethren' (v.²²) and 'prophets' (v.³²). Since they bore the same patronymic, Judas may have been a brother of Joseph Barsabbas (Ac 1²³). 7. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³⁰). DAVID SMITH.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.—One of the Twelve, son of Simon Iscariot (Jn 6⁷¹ 13³⁶ RV). Iscariot (more correctly Iscariot) means 'the man of Kerioth.' Kerioth was a town in the south of Judaea, and Judas was the only one of the Twelve who was not a Galilean. He had an aptitude for business, and acted as treasurer of the Apostolic-band (Jn 12⁶ 13²⁹).

Judas turned traitor, and sold the Lord to the high priests for thirty pieces of silver, the price of a slave (Ex 21²); and this dire treachery constitutes one of the hardest problems of the Gospel history. It seems to present an inevitable dilemma: either Jesus did not know what would happen, thus failing in foresight and discernment; or, as St. John expressly declares (6⁶⁴), He did know, and yet not only admitted Judas to the Apostolate, but appointed him to an office which, by exciting his cupidity, facilitated his crime. A solution of the problem has been sought by making out in various ways that Judas was not really a criminal.

(1) In early days it was held by the Cainites, a Gnostic sect, that Judas had attained a higher degree of spiritual enlightenment than his fellows, and compassed the death of Jesus because he knew that it would break the power of the evil spirits, the rulers of this world. (2) Another ancient theory is that he was indeed a covetous man and sold the Master for greed of the pieces of silver, but never thought that He would be slain. He anticipated that He would, as on previous occasions, extricate Himself from the hands of His enemies; and when he saw Him condemned, he was overwhelmed with remorse. He reckoned, thought Paulus in more recent times, on the multitude rising and rescuing their hero from the rulers. (3) He shared the general wonderment of the disciples at the Lord's procrastination in coming forward as the King of Israel and claiming the throne of David, and thought to force His hand and precipitate the desired consummation. 'His hope was,' says De Quincey, 'that Christ would no longer vacillate; he would be forced into giving the signal to the populace of Jerusalem, who would then rise unanimously.' Cf. Rosegger, NRI, Eng. tr. p. 263. (4) His faith in his Master's Messiah-ship, thought Neander, was wavering. If He were really the Messiah, nothing could harm Him; if He were not, He would perish, and it would be right that He should.

Such attempts to justify Judas must be dismissed. They are contrary to the Gospel narrative, which represents the Betrayal as a horrible, indeed diabolical, crime (cf. Jn 6⁷⁰, Lk 22³⁻⁴). If the Lord chose Judas with clear foreknowledge of the issue, then, dark as the mystery may be, it accords with the providential ordering of human affairs, being in fact an instance of an ancient and abiding problem, the 'irreconcilable antinomy' of Divine foreknowledge and human free will. It is no whit a greater mystery that Jesus should have chosen Judas with clear prescience of the issue, than that God should have made Saul king, knowing what the end would be.

Of course Judas was not chosen because he would turn traitor, but because at the outset he had in him the possibility of better things; and this is the tragedy of his career, that he obeyed his baser impulses and surrendered to their domination. Covetousness was his besetting sin, and he attached himself to Jesus because, like the rest of the disciples, he expected a rich reward when his Master was seated on the throne of David. His discipleship was a process of disillusionment. He saw his worldly dream fading, and, when the toils closed about his Master, he decided to make the best of the situation. Since he could not have a place by the throne, he would at least have the thirty shekels.

His resolution lasted long enough to carry through the crime. He made his bargain with the high priests (Mt 26¹⁴⁻¹⁶—Mk 14¹⁰⁻¹¹—Lk 22³⁻⁶), evidently on the Wednesday afternoon, when Jesus, after the Great Indictment (Mt 23), was occupied with the Greeks who had come craving an interview (Jn 12²⁰⁻²²); and promised to watch for an opportunity to betray Him into their hands. He found it next evening when he was dismissed from the Upper Room (Jn 13³⁷⁻³⁹). He knew that after the Supper Jesus would repair to Gethsemane, and thither he conducted the rulers with their band of soldiers. He thought, no doubt, that his work was now done, but he had yet to crown his ignominy. A difficulty arose. It lay with the soldiers to make the arrest, and, seeing not one man but twelve, they knew not which to take; and Judas had to come to their assistance. He gave them a token: 'The one whom I shall kiss is he'; and, advancing to Jesus, he greeted Him with customary reverence and kissed Him effusively (Mt 26⁴⁷⁻⁵⁰—Mk 14⁴³⁻⁴⁶—Lk 22⁴⁷⁻⁴⁹).

It must have been a terrible ordeal for Judas, and in that hour his better nature reasserted itself. He realized the enormity of what he had done; and he followed his Master and, in an agony of remorse, watched the tragedy of His trial and condemnation by the Sanhedrin. It maddened him; and as the high priests were leaving the Hall of Hewn Stone, the Sanhedrin's meeting-place, he accosted them, clutching the accursed shekels in his wild hands. 'I have sinned,' he cried, 'in that I betrayed innocent blood.' He thought even now to annul the bargain, but they spurned him and passed to the Sanctuary. He followed, and, ere they could close the entrance, hurled the coins after them into the Holy Place; then rushed away and hanged himself (Mt 27³⁻⁵).

Such is St. Matthew's account. The tragedy was so appalling that legends grew apace in the primitive Church, and St. Luke has preserved one of these in a parenthesis in St. Peter's speech at the election of Matthias (Ac 1¹⁸⁻¹⁹). One is glad to think that St. Matthew's is the actual history. Judas sinned terribly, but he terribly repented, and one wishes that, instead of destroying his miserable life, he had rather fled to the Cross and sought mercy at the feet of his gracious Lord. There was mercy in the heart of Jesus even for Judas.

Was Judas present at the Eucharist in the Upper Room? St. John alone mentions his departure; and since he does not record the institution of the Supper, it is open to question whether the traitor 'went out' after it or before it. From Lk 22:1-21 it has been argued that he was present, but St. Luke's arrangement is different from that of St. Matthew and St. Mark, who put the institution after the announcement of the Betrayal (Mt 26:21-25 = Mk 14:18-20). According to St. John's account, Judas seems to have gone out immediately after the announcement, the institution following 13th, and ch. 14 being the Communion Address.

DAVID SMITH.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF.—This short epistle is an earnest warning and appeal, couched in vivid and picturesque language, addressed to a church or a circle of churches which have become suddenly exposed to a mischievous attack of false teaching.

1. Contents.—(1) Text.—For its length Jude offers an unusual number of textual problems, the two most important of which are in v.1 and vv.22,23. Though the RV is probably right in translating 'Lord' in v.1, many ancient authorities read 'Jesus.' Also, the position of 'once' is doubtful, some placing it in the following clause. In vv.22,23 editors differ as to whether there are two clauses or three. The RV, following the Sinaitic, has three; and Weymouth also, who, however, follows A in his 'resultant' text based on a consensus of editorial opinion. But there is much in favour of a two-clause sentence beginning with either 'have mercy' or 'refute.'

(2) Outline.—

(i.) Salutation, vv.1-2. The letter opens most appropriately with the prayer that mercy, peace, and love may increase among the readers, who are guarded by the love of God unto the day when Jesus Christ will appear.

(ii.) Occasion of the Epistle, vv.3-4. With affectionate greeting Jude informs his readers that he was engaged upon an epistle setting forth the salvation held by all Christians—Jews and Gentiles—when he was surprised by news which showed him that their primary need was warning and exhortation; for the one gospel which has been entrusted to the keeping of the 'saints' had been endangered in their case by a surreptitious invasion of false teachers, who turned the gospel of grace into a plea for lust, thereby practically denying the lordship of Jesus Christ. It had long been foretold that the Church would be faced by this crisis through these persons. (This was a common expectation in the Apostolic age; see 2 Th 2¹, 1 Ti 4¹, 2 Ti 3:16-4², 2 P 3¹, Mt 24:11.)

(iii.) Warnings from history, vv.5-7. Versed as they are in Scripture, they should take warning from the judgments of God under the Old Covenant. His people were destroyed for apostasy, though they had lately been saved from Egypt. Even angels were visited with eternal punishment for breaking bounds, and for fornication like that for which afterwards the cities of the plain perished. These are all awful examples of the doom that awaits those guilty of apostasy and sensuality.

(iv.) Description of the invaders, vv.8-16. Boasting of their own knowledge through visions, these false teachers abandon themselves to sensuality, deny retribution, and scoff at the power of a spiritual world. Yet even Michael the archangel, when contending with Satan for the body of Moses, did not venture to dispute his function as Accuser, but left him and his blasphemies to a higher tribunal. But these persons, professing a knowledge of the spiritual realm of which they are really ignorant, have no other knowledge than that of sensual passion like the beasts, and are on their way to ruin. Septicidal like Cain, greedy inciters to lust like Balaam, rebellious like Korah, they are plunging into destruction. Would-be shepherds, they sacrilegiously pollute the love-feasts; delusive prophets, hopelessly dead in sin, shameless in their apostasy, theirs is the doom foretold by Enoch on the godless. They murmur against their fate, which they have brought upon themselves by lewdness and they bluster, though on occasion they cringe for their own advantage.

(v.) The conduct of the Christian in this crisis, vv.17-23. The Church need not be surprised by this attack, since it was foretold by the Apostles as a sign of the end, but should resist the disintegrating influence of these essentially unspiritual persons. The unity of the Church is to be preserved by mutual edification in Divine truth, by prayer through the indwelling Spirit, by keeping within the range of Divine love, and by watching for the day when Christ will come in mercy as Judge. Waverers must be mercifully dealt with; even the sensual are not past hope, though the work of rescue is very dangerous.

(vi.) Doxology, vv.24-25. God alone, who can guard the waverer from stumbling, and can remove the stains of sin and perfect our salvation through Jesus Christ, is worthy of all glory.

2. Situation of the readers.—The recipients of Jude may have belonged to one church or to a circle of churches in one district. They were evidently Gentiles, and of some standing (vv.1, 4). The Epistle affords very little evidence for the locality of the readers, but Syria or the Hellenistic cities of Palestine seem to suit the conditions. Syria would be a likely field for a distortion of the Pauline gospel of grace (v.4). Also, if Jude was the brother of James of Jerusalem, whose influences extended throughout Palestine and probably Syria (Gal 2⁹, 12), the address in v.1 is explained. Syria was a breeding-ground for those tendencies which developed into the Gnostic systems of the 2nd century. Even as early as 1 Cor. ideas similar to these were troubling the Church (1 Co 5:10 11:17), and when the Apocalypse was written the churches of Asia were distressed by the Nicolaitans and those who, like Balaam, led the Israelites into idolatrous fornication (Rev 2:14, 15). In 3 Jn. there is further evidence of insubordination to Apostolic authority. New esoteric doctrine, fornication, and the assumption of prophetic power within the Church for the sake of personal aggrandizement, are features common to all. Jude differs in not mentioning idolatry. Possibly magic played no inconsiderable part in the practice of these libertines. We know that it met the gospel early in its progress (Ac 8:24 13:12 19:19). There is, however, no trace in Jude of a highly elaborated speculative system like those of the 2nd cent. Gnosticism. These persons deny the gospel by their lives,—a practical rather than an intellectual revolt against the truth. The inference from vv.5-7 is that these errorists would not refuse to acknowledge the OT as a source of instruction; being in this also unlike Gnostics of the 2nd century. The phenomenon, as it is found in Jude, is quite explicable in the last quarter of the 1st century.

3. Authorship.—The author of this Epistle is very susceptible to literary influence, especially that of Paul. Compare Jude 1 with 1 Th 14, 2 Th 2¹; Jude 10, 11 with 1 Co 2¹; Jude 20, 21 with Ro 5:8³, Col 2⁷; Jude 21, 22 with Ro 16:25-27, Col 1²; and with the Pastoral Epistles frequently, e.g., 1 Ti 13, 17 5⁴ 6⁵, 2 Ti 3⁶, 5, 13 4¹¹. His relation to 2 Peter is so close that one probably borrowed from the other, though there is great diversity of opinion as to which. See PETER [SECOND EP. OF]. 4. (e.) Bigg suggests 'that the errors denounced in both Epistles took their origin from Corinth, that the disorder was spreading, that St. Peter took alarm and wrote his Second Epistle, sending a copy to St. Jude with a warning of the urgency of the danger, and that St. Jude at once issued a similar letter to the churches in which he was personally interested.' Jude is also unique in the NT in his use of apocryphal writings—the Assumption of Moses in v.9, and the Book of Enoch in vv.14, 15—almost in the same way as Scripture.

The Jude who writes cannot be the Apostle Judas (Lk 6:16, Ac 1:13), nor does he ever assume Apostolic authority. James (v.1) must be the head of the Jerusalem Church, and the brother of our Lord. Jude probably called himself 'servant' and not 'brother' of Jesus Christ (Mt 13:54, Mk 6:3), because he felt that his unbelief in Jesus in the days of His flesh did not make that term a title of honour, and he may have come to understand the truth that faith, not blood, constitutes true kinship with Christ. The difficulty of accounting for the choice of such a pseudonym, and the absence from the letter of any substantial improbability against the traditional view, make it reasonable to hold that Jude the brother of our Lord was the author. He may have written it between A.D. 75 and 80, probably before 81, for Hegesippus (170) states that Jude's grandsons were small farmers in Palestine, and were brought before Domitian (81-96) and contemptuously dismissed.

4. External testimony.—In the age of the Apostolic Fathers the only witness to Jude is the Didache, and that is so faint as to count for little. By the beginning of the 3rd cent. it was well known in the west, being included in the Muratorian Fragment (c. 200), commented upon by Clement of Alexandria, and accepted by Origen and by Tertullian. Eusebius places it among the 'disputed' books, saying that it had little early recognition. It is absent from the Peshitta version. The quotations from apocryphal writings hindered its acceptance, but the early silence, on the assumption of its genuineness, is to be accounted for chiefly by its brevity and its comparative unimportance. R. A. FALCONER.

JUDGES.—An examination of Ex 18 shows that the Hebrew word for 'judge' means originally to pronounce the oracle; thus, when we read of Moses sitting to 'judge the people' (v. 12), a reference to vv. 18, 19 shows that what is meant is the giving of Divine decisions: '... the people come unto me to inquire of God: when they have a matter they come unto me; and I judge between a man and his neighbour, and I make them know the statutes of God, and his laws' (cf. vv. 19, 20). In the next place, the same chapter shows the word in process of receiving a wider application; owing to the increasing number of those who come to seek counsel, only specially difficult cases are dealt with by Moses, while the ordinary ones are deputed to the heads of the families, etc., to settle (vv. 25, 26). A 'judge' was therefore originally a priest who pronounced oracles; then the elders of the people became judges. But at an early period the functions of the 'judges,' at any rate the more important of them, were exercised by a chief, chosen from among the elders probably on account of superior skill in warfare,—an hereditary succession would, however, naturally tend to arise—who was to all intents and purposes a king. So the probability is that those who are known as the 'judges' in popular parlance were in reality kings in the ordinary sense of the word. In connexion with this it is interesting to note that in somewhat later times than those of the 'judges' one of the main duties of the king was to judge, see e.g. 2 S 15: 1-6, '... there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. Absalom said moreover, Oh that I were made judge in the land. ... And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment' (cf., further, 1 K 3: 2 K 15: 15); moreover, 'judge' and 'king' seem to be used synonymously in Am 2: 1, Hos 7: 7, Ps 2: 10. The offer of the kingship (hereditary) to the 'judge' Gideon (Jg 8: 22) fully bears out what has been said. The fact probably is that the Deuteronomic legislators, on theocratic grounds, called those rulers 'judges' who were actually kings in the same sense as Saul was; fundamentally there was no difference between the two, but nominally a difference was implied.

JUDGES (Book of).—1. Name.—The Heb. title Shophetim ('Judges') is parallel to Melakhim ('Kings'); both are abbreviations, the full title requiring in each case the prefixing of 'the Book of'; this full title is found for Judges in the Syriac Version, for Kings in, e.g., 2 Ch 20: 34 (where 'of Israel' is added) 24: 27. Just as the title 'Kings' denotes that the book contains an account of the doings of the various kings who ruled over Israel and Judah, so the title 'Judges' is given to the book because it describes the exploits of the different champions who were the chieftains of various sections of Israelites from the time of the entry into Canaan up to the time of Samuel. It may well be questioned whether the title of this book was originally 'Judges,' for it is difficult to see where the difference lies, fundamentally, between the 'judges' on the one hand, and Joshua and Saul on the other; in the case of each the main and central duty is to act as leader against the foes of certain tribes. The title 'judge' is not applied to three of these chieftains, namely, Ehud, Barak, and Gideon, and 'seems not to have been found in the oldest of the author's sources' (Moore, Judges, p. xii.). In the three divisions of which the Hebrew Canon is made up, the Book of Judges comes in the first section of the second division, being reckoned among the 'Former Prophets' (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Sam., 1 and 2 Kings), the second section of the division comprising the prophetic books proper. In the LXX the Book of Ruth is sometimes, in some MSS, included in that of Judges, other MSS treat the Pentateuch and Jos., Jg., Ruth as one whole. [For the meaning of the word 'judges' see preceding article.]

2. Contents.—The book opens with an account of the victories gained by Judah and Simeon; Caleb appears as the leader of the tribe of Judah, though he is not spoken of as one of the judges. There follows then an enumeration of the districts which the Israelites were unable to conquer; the reason for this is revealed by the messenger of Jahweh; it is because they had not obeyed the voice of Jahweh, but had made covenants with the people of the land, and had refrained from breaking down their altars. The people thereupon lift up their voices and weep (whence the name of the place, Bochim), and sacrifice to Jahweh. The narrative then abruptly breaks off. This section (1-25) serves as a kind of introduction to the book, and certainly cannot have belonged originally to it; 'the whole character of Jg 1-25 gives evidence that it was not composed for the place, but is an extract from an older history of the Israelite occupation of Canaan' (Moore, p. 4). As this introduction must be cut away as not belonging to our book, a similar course must be followed with chs. 17-21; these form an appendix which does not belong to the book. It will be best to deal with the contents of these five chapters before coming to the book itself. The chapters contain two distinct narratives, and are, in their original form, very ancient; in each narrative there occurs twice the redactional note, 'In those days there was no king in Israel' (17: 18 19: 21), showing that the period of the Judges is implied. Chs. 17, 18 tell the story of the Ephraimite Micah, who made an ephod and teraphim for himself, and got a Levite to be a 'father and a priest' to him; but he is persuaded by 600 Danites to go with them and be their priest; they then conquer Laish and found a sanctuary there, in which a graven image (which had been taken from Micah) is set up. The narrative, therefore, purports to give an account of the origin of the sanctuary of Dan, and it seems more than probable that two traditions of this have been interwoven in these two chapters. In chs. 19-21 the story is told of how a concubine of a certain Levite left him and returned to her father; the Levite goes after her and brings her back. On their return they remain for a night in Gibeah, which belonged to the Benjamites; here the men of the city so maltreat the concubine that she is left dead on the threshold of the house in which her lord is staying; the Levite takes up the dead body, brings it home, and, after having cut it up, sends the pieces by the hands of messengers throughout the borders of Israel, as a call to avenge the outrage. Thereupon the Israelites assemble, and resolve to punish the Benjamites; as a result, the entire tribe, with the exception of six hundred men who manage to escape to the wilderness, is annihilated. Although six hundred men have survived, it appears inevitable that the tribe of Benjamin must die out, for the Israelites had sworn not to let their daughters marry Benjamites; this causes great distress in Israel. However, the threatened disaster of the loss of a tribe is averted through the Israelites procuring four hundred maidens from Jabesh in Gilead, the remaining two hundred required being carried off by the Benjamites during the annual feast at Shiloh. The children of Israel then depart every man to his home. The narrative appropriately ends with the words, 'Every man did that which was right in his own eyes.' Although these chapters have been very considerably worked over by later hands, it is probable that they have some basis in fact; it is difficult to account for their existence at all on any other hypothesis, for in themselves they are quite purposeless; there cannot originally have been any object in writing such a gruesome tale, other than that of recording something that actually happened.

The Book of Judges itself is comprised in 2^d-16th; and here it is to be noticed, first of all, that a certain artificiality is observable in the structure; the exploits of twelve men are recounted, and the idea seems to be that each represents one of the twelve tribes of Israel, thus: Judah is represented by Othniel, Benjamin by Ehud, the two halves of the tribe of Manasseh by Gideon (West) and Jair (East), Issachar by Tola, Zebulun by Elon, Naphtali by Barak, Ephraim by Abdon, Gad by Jephthah, and Dan by Samson; besides these ten there are Shamgar and Ibzan, two unimportant Judges, but against them there are the two tribes Reuben and Simeon, who, however, soon disappear; while the tribe of Levi, as always, occupies an exceptional position. This general correspondence of twelve judges to the twelve tribes strikes one the more as artificial in that some of the judges play a very humble part, and seem to have been brought in to make up the number twelve rather than for anything else. The following is an outline of the contents of these chapters:—

There is, first of all, an introduction (2^d-3^d) which contains a brief but comprehensive résumé of the period about to be dealt with; as long as Joshua was alive, it says, the children of Israel remained faithful to Jahweh; but after his death, and after the generation that knew him had passed away, the people forsook Jahweh, the God of their fathers, and served Baal and Ashtaroth; the consequence was that they were oppressed by the surrounding nations. 2^d-19 sound what is the theme of the whole book: the nation distressed, a judge raised up who delivers them from their oppressors, relapse into idolatry. The introduction closes with a list of the nations which have been left in the Promised Land with the express purpose of 'proving' the Israelites. [For the historical value of this Introduction, see § 5.] Of the twelve Judges dealt with, seven are of quite subordinate importance, little more than a bare mention of them being recorded; they are: Othniel (3^d-11), who delivers the children of Israel from Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia; he is mentioned incidentally in 1st as marrying the daughter of Caleb; Shamgar (3rd), of whom nothing more is said than that he killed six hundred Philistines; Tola (10th 2); Jair (10th 3); Ibzan (12th 1-10); Elon (12th 12); and Abdon (12th 15). Of real importance are the accounts which are given of the other five judges. (1) Ehud, who delivers Israel from Eglon, king of Moab (3rd 2-30). (2) Barak, who is, however, rather the instrument of Deborah; chs. 4, 5 give accounts, in prose and poetry respectively, of the Israelite victory over Sisera. (3) Gideon. Of the last there are likewise two accounts (6-8th and 8th 2-21), with a later addition (8th 22-25); some introductory words (6th 1-10) tell of the Midianite oppression; 6th 11-24 describe the call of Gideon, of which a second account is given in 6th 25-32; the invasion of the Midianites and Gideon's preparations to resist them (6th 33-35) follows; and in 6th 36 the story of the sign of the fleece is told. Ch. 7 gives a detailed account of Gideon's victory over the Midianites, and 8th contains an appendix which tells of Ephraim's dissatisfaction with Gideon for not summoning them to repel the Midianites, and the skilful way in which Gideon pacifies them. In Jg 8th 22 comes the second account of Gideon's victory, the result of which is the offer to him of the kingship and his refusal thereof (8th 22-28); 8th 29-35 forms a transition to the story of Gideon's son, Abimelech (see below). (4) The history of Jephthah is prefaced by 10th 7-18, which tells of the Ammonite oppression; Jephthah's exploits are recounted in 11th-12th; a biographical note (11th 2) introduces the hero, and a long passage (11th 29) follows, describing how the conflict with the Ammonites arose; it is a question concerning the ownership of the lands between the Jabkok and the Arnon, which are claimed by the Ammonites, but which the Israelites maintain have been in their possession for three hundred years. As no agreement is arrived at, war breaks out. A section, which is of great interest archaeologically (11th 30-40), tells then of a vow which Jephthah made to Jahweh, to the effect that if he returned victorious from the impending struggle with the Ammonites, he would offer up in sacrifice the first person whom he met on his return coming out of his dwelling. He is victorious, and the first to meet him was, as according to the custom of the times he must have expected (see Jg 5th 28, 1 S 18th 7, Ps 68th 1), his daughter—the words in v. 39, 'and she had not known man,' are significant in this connexion;—his vow he then proceeds to fulfil. The next passage (12th 1-8), which tells of a battle between Jephthah and the Ephraimites, in which the latter are worsted, reminds one forcibly of 8th 1-3, and the two passages are clearly related in some way. (5) Lastly, the history of Samson and his doings is recorded, chs. 13-16; these chapters contain three distinct stories, but they form a self-contained whole. The first story (ch. 13) tells of the wonderful experiences of the parents of the hero prior to his birth; how an angel foretold that he was to be born, and that he was to be a Nazirite; and how the angel ascended in a flame from the altar on which Manoah had offered a sacrifice to Jahweh; vv. 24-28 record his birth and his growth to manhood, the spirit of Jahweh being upon him. The fourteenth chapter gives an account of Samson's courtship and marriage with the Philistine woman of Timnah; vv. 14 his first meeting with her, and his desire that his parents should go down to Timnah to secure her for him, they at first demur, but ultimately they accompany him thither. His exploit with the lion, his riddle during the wedding-feast, the craft of his wife in obtaining the answer to the riddle from him, and the way in which he paid the forfeit to the wedding guests for having found out the answer to the riddle,—all this is told in the remainder of the chapter (vv. 5-20). Further exploits are recounted in ch. 15: Samson's burning of the Philistines' fields by sending into them foxes with burning torches tied to their tails (vv. 1-8); the Philistines attack Judah in consequence, but the men of Judah bind Samson with the purpose of delivering him up; he, however, breaks his bonds, and kills a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass (vv. 11-17); the remaining verses describe the miracle of the origin of the spring in En-hakkore (vv. 18-20). In ch. 16 there is a continuation of Samson's adventures: his carrying off the gates of Gaza (vv. 1-3); his relationship with Delilah and her treachery, resulting in his final capture by the Philistines (vv. 4-22); their rejoicing (vv. 23-25); the destruction of the house, and death of Samson (vv. 26-30); his burial (v. 31).

The section dealing with Abimelech (ch. 9), though certainly belonging to the Gideon chapters (6-8) stands on a somewhat different basis, inasmuch as Abimelech is not reckoned among the judges (see following section): Abimelech is made king of Shechem (vv. 1-6); Jotham his brother, delivers his parable from Mt. Gerizim, and then flees (v. 7-21); the quarrel between Abimelech and the Shechemites (vv. 22-28); Gual raises a revolt among the Shechemites (vv. 29-33); Abimelech quells the revolt (vv. 34-41); Shechem is captured and destroyed (vv. 42-45); its tower burned (vv. 46-49); Abimelech's attack on Thebez, and his death (vv. 50-57). Lastly, there is the short section 10th 16-18, which, like 11-28, partakes of the nature of Introduction, and is of late date.

3. Arrangement and Sources.—The question of the sources of our book is a difficult and complicated one; the different hypotheses put forward are sometimes of a very contradictory character, and proportionately bewildering. It seems, indeed, not possible to assign, with any approach to certainty, the exact source of every passage in the book; but there are certain indications which compel us to see that the book is compiled from sources of varying character and of different ages; so that, although we shall not attempt to specify a source for every passage—believing this to be impossible with the book as we now have it—yet it will be possible to point out, broadly, the main sources from which it is compiled.

(1) It may be taken for granted that the exploits of tribal heroes would be commemorated by their descendants, and that the narrative of these exploits would be composed very soon, probably immediately in some cases, after the occurrences. So ingrained is this custom, that even as late as the Middle Ages we find it still in vogue in Europe, the 'Troubadours' being the counterpart of the singers of far earlier ages. It is therefore clear that there must have existed among the various Israelite tribes a body of traditional matter regarding the deeds of tribal heroes which originally floated about orally within the circumscribed area of each particular tribe. Moreover, it is also well known that these early traditions were mostly sung—or, to speak more correctly, recited—in a primitive form of poetry. The earliest sources, therefore, of our book must have been something of this character.

(2) It is, however, quite certain that some intermediate stages were gone through before the immediate antecedents of our present book became existent. In the first place, there must have taken place at some time or other a collection of these ancient records which belonged originally to different tribes; one may confidently assume that a collection of this kind would have been put together from written materials; these materials would naturally have been of varying value, so that the collector would have felt himself perfectly justified in discriminating between what he had before him; some records he would retain, others he would discard; and if he found two accounts of some tradition which he considered important, he would incorporate both. In this way there would have arisen the immediate antecedent to the Book of Judges in its original form. The 'Song of Deborah' may be taken as an illustration of what has been said. At some early period there was a confederacy among some of the tribes of Israel, formed for the purpose of combating the Canaanites; the confederates are victorious; the different tribes who took part in the battle return home, and (presumably) each tribe preserves its own account of what happened; for generations these different accounts are handed down orally; ultimately some are lost, others are written down; two are finally preserved and incorporated into a collection of tribal traditions, i.e. in their original form they were the immediate antecedents of our present accounts in Jg 4th and 5th.

(3) We may assume, then, as reasonably certain, the existence of a body of traditional matter which had been compiled from different sources; this compilation represents our Book of Judges in its original form; it is aptly termed by many scholars the pre-Deuteronomic collection of the histories of the Judges. This name is given because the book in its present form shows that an editor or redactor took the collection of narratives and fitted them into a framework, adding introductory and concluding remarks; and the additions of this editor 'exhibit a phraseology and colouring different from that of the rest of the book,' being imbued strongly with the spirit of the Deuteronomist (Driver). It is possible, lastly, that some still later redactional elements are to be discerned (Cornill). Speaking generally, then, the various parts of the book may be assigned as follows: 1st–2nd, though added by a later compiler, contains fragments, probably themselves from different sources, of some early accounts of the first warlike encounters between Israelite tribes and Canaanites. In the introduction, 2nd–3rd, to the central part of the book, the hand of the Deuteronomic compiler is observable, but part of it belongs to the pre-Deuteronomic form of the book. The main portion, 3rd–16, is for the most part ancient; where the hand of the Deuteronomist is most obvious is at the beginning and end of each narrative; the words, 'And the children of Israel did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord . . . ' at the beginning, and ' . . . cried unto the Lord, . . . and the land had rest' so and so many years, at the end, occur with monotonous regularity. 'It is evident that in this part of the book a series of independent narratives has been taken by the compiler and arranged by him in a framework, designed for the purpose of stating the chronology of the period, and exhibiting a theory of the occasion and nature of the work which the Judges generally were called to undertake' (Driver). The third division of the book, chs. 17–21, is ancient; 'in the narratives themselves there is no trace of a Deuteronomic redaction' (Moore); but they come from different sources, chs. 17. 18 being the oldest portions.

4. Text.—A glance at the apparatus criticus of any good edition of the Massoretic text, such as Kittel's, shows at once that, generally speaking, the Hebrew text has come down to us in a good state; 'it is better preserved than that of any other of the historical books' (Moore). A number of errors there certainly are; but these can in a good many cases be rectified by the versions, and above all by the Greek version. The only part of the book which contains serious textual defects is the Song of Deborah, and here there are some passages which defy emendation. In the Greek there are two independent translations, one of which is a faithful reproduction of the Massoretic text, and is therefore not of much use to the textual critic.

5. Historical value.—There are few subjects in the Bible which offer to the student of history a more fascinating field of study than that of the historical value of the Book of Judges. It will be clear, from what has been said in § 3, that to gauge its historical value the component parts of the book must be dealt with separately; it is also necessary to differentiate, wherever necessary, between the historical kernel of a passage and the matter which has been superimposed by later editors; this is not always easy, and nothing would be more unwise than to claim infallibility in a proceeding of this kind. At the same time, it is impossible to go into very much detail here, and only conclusions can be given. 1st–2nd is, as a whole, a valuable source of information concerning the history of the conquest and settlement of some of the Israelite tribes west of the Jordan; for the period of which it treats it is one of the most valuable records we possess.

2nd–3rd, which forms the introduction to the main body of the book, is, with the exception of isolated notes such as 2nd 3rd, of very little historical value; when, every time the people are oppressed, the calamity is stated to be due to apostasy from Jahweh, one cannot help feeling that the statement is altogether out of harmony with the spirit of the book itself; this theory is too characteristic of the 'Deuteronomic' spirit to be reckoned as belonging to the period of the Judges.

3rd–11, the story of Othniel, shows too clearly the hand of the 'Deuteronomic' redactor for it to be regarded as authentic history; whether Othniel is an historical person or not, the mention of the king of Mesopotamia in the passage, as having so far conquered Canaan as to subjugate the Israelite tribes in the south, is sufficient justification for questioning the historicity of the section.

On the other hand, the story of Ehud, 3rd–30, is a piece of genuine old history; signs of redactional work are, indeed, not wanting at the beginning and end, but the central facts of the story, such as the Moabite oppression and the conquest of Jericho, the realistic description of the assassination of Eglon, and the defeat of the Moabites, all bear the stamp of genuineness. In the same way, the brief references to the 'minor' Judges: Shamgar (3rd 11), Tola (10th 1–2), Jair (10th 3–4), Ibzan (12th 1–10), Elon (12th 11–12), and Abdon (12th 13–15)—are historical notes of value; their interpretation is another matter. It is possible that these names are the names of clans and not of individuals; some of them certainly occur as the names of clans in later books.

The 'judgeship' of Deborah and Barak is the most important historical section in the book; of the two accounts of the period, chs. 4 and 5, the latter ranks by far the higher; it is the most important source in existence for the history of Israel; 'by the vividness of every touch, and especially by the elevation and intensity of feeling which pervades it, it makes the impression of having been written by one who had witnessed the great events which it commemorates' (Moore); whether this was so or not, there can be no doubt of its high historical value; apart from the manifest overworking of the Deuteronomic redactor, it gives a wonderful insight into the conditions of the times.

Chs. 6-8, which combine two accounts of the history of Gideon, have a strong historical basis; they contain much ancient matter, but even in their original forms there were assuredly some portions which cannot be regarded as historical, e.g. 6^{30a}.

Ch. 9, the story of Abimelech, is one of the oldest portions of the book, and contains for the most part genuine history; it gives an instructive glimpse of the relations between Canaanites and Israelites now brought side by side; 'the Canaanite town Shechem, subject to Jerubbaal of Ophrah; his half-Canaanite son Abimelech, who naturally belongs to his mother's people, the successful appeal to blood, which is "thicker than water," by which he becomes king of Shechem, ruling over the neighbouring Israelites also; the interloper Gaal, and his kinsmen, who settle in Shechem and instigate insurrection against Abimelech by skillfully appealing to the pride of the Shechemite aristocracy—all help us better than anything else in the book to realize the situation in this period' (Moore).

The section 10¹⁻¹⁸ contains a few historical notes, but is mostly Deuteronomic. The Jephthah story (11¹⁻¹²⁷), again, contains a great deal that is of high value historically; the narrative does not all come from one source, and the Deuteronomist's hand is, as usual, to be discerned here and there, but that it contains 'genuine historical traits' (Kuenen) is universally acknowledged.

Chs. 13-16, which recount the adventures of Samson, must be regarded as having a character of their own; if these adventures have any basis in fact, they have been so overlaid with legendary matter that it would be precarious to pronounce with any degree of certainty any part of them in their present form to be historical.

Chs. 17, 18 are among the most valuable, historically, in the book; they give a most instructive picture of the social and religious state of the people during the period of the Judges, and bear every mark of truthfulness.

Chs. 19-21. Of these chapters, 19 is not unlike the rest of the book in character; it is distinctly 'old-world,' and must be pronounced as, in the main, genuinely historical; 21¹⁰⁻²⁴ has likewise a truly antique ring, but the remainder of this section is devoid of historical reality.

JUDGING (Ethical).—The subject of ethical judging meets us frequently in the NT. 1. It is the right and duty of a moral being to judge of the goodness or badness of actions and qualities; and Christianity, by exalting the moral standard and quickening the conscience, makes ethical judgments more obligatory than before. In cases where our judgments are impersonal there is no difficulty as to the exercise of this right. As possessed of a conscience, a man is called upon to view the world in the discriminating light of the moral law (Ro 2^{14a}, 2 Co 4⁷). As possessed of a Christian conscience, a Christian man must test everything by the law of Christ (Ph 1¹⁰ RVm, 1 Th 5²¹). 'He that is spiritual judgeth all things' (1 Co 2¹⁵).

2. So far all is clear. But when we pass to the sphere of judgments regarding persons, the case is not so simple. It might seem at first almost as if in the NT all judgment of persons were forbidden. There is our Lord's emphatic 'Judge not' (Mt 7¹). There is St. Paul's demand, 'Why dost thou judge thy brother?' (Ro 14¹⁰), his injunction, 'Let us not therefore judge one another' (v. 13), his bold claim that he that is spiritual is judged of no man (1 Co 2¹⁵). There is the assertion of St. James that the man who judges his brother is making himself a judge of the law (Ja 4¹¹), i.e. the royal law of love (cf. 2⁸). But it is impossible to judge of actions and qualities without passing on to judge the persons who perform them or in whom they inhere. If an action is sinful, the person who commits it is sinful; indeed, the moral quality of an action springs from its association with a moral personality. In condemning anything as wrong, we necessarily condemn the person who has been guilty of it. And when we look more closely at the teaching of the NT, we find that it is not judgment of others that is forbidden, but unfair judgment—a judgment that is biased or superficial or narrow or censorious and untouched with charity. 'Judge not,' said Jesus, 'that ye be not judged'; and the context shows that His meaning was, 'Do not judge others without first judging yourself.' 'Let us not judge one another,' says St. Paul; but it is in the course of a plea for liberty in non-essentials and charity in all things. 'He that is spiritual,' he says again, 'is judged of no man'; but his meaning is that the natural man is incompetent to judge the spiritual man in regard to spiritual things. And when St. James couples judging our brother with speaking against him, and represents both as infringements of the royal law, it seems evident that he refers to a kind of judging that is not charitable or even just, but is inspired by malice or springs from a carping habit. Ethical judgment of personal worth was a function freely exercised by Jesus Christ (e.g. Mt 16²³ 23^{10a}, Mk 10²¹, Lk 13²⁷, Jn 14⁶⁷), and it is the privilege and duty of a Christian man. But if our judgments are to be pure reflexions of the mind of Christ, and not the verdicts of ignorance, prejudice, or selfishness, the following NT rules must be observed. We must (1) let our judgments begin with ourselves (Mt 7^{3a}, Ro 2¹); (2) not judge by appearances (Jn 7²⁴; cf. 8¹⁴); (3) respect the liberty of our brother's conscience (Ro 14, 1 Co 10²⁹); (4) not seek to usurp the office of the final Judge (1 Co 4⁴, Ro 14¹⁰); (5) beware of the censorious spirit (Ja 4¹¹).

J. C. LAMBERT.

JUDGMENT.—Biblical eschatology centres about the Judgment to which all humanity is to be subjected at the end of this 'age.' As the introduction to the Messianic Age, it was expected to occur at a definite time in the future, and would take place in the heavens, to which all humanity, whether living or dead, would be raised from Sheol. The judge was sometimes said to be God (He 12²³), sometimes His representative, the Christ, assisted by the angels (Ro 2¹⁶, Mt 13³⁴⁻³⁵ 47-48 47-50 24³¹⁻⁴²; cf. Eth. Enoch 48). In Lk 22²⁹, 1 Co 6², Christians are also said to be judges. At the Judgment, sentences would be pronounced determining the eternal states of individuals, both men and angels. Those who had done wrong would be doomed to punishment, and those who had accepted Jesus as Christ, either explicitly, as in the case of the Christians, or implicitly, as in the case of Abraham, would be acquitted and admitted to heaven. The question as to the basis of this acquittal gave rise to the great discussion between St. Paul and the Jewish Christians, and was developed in the doctrine of justification by faith.

By its very nature the thought of judgment is eschatological, and can be traced from the conception of the Day of Jehovah of the ancient Hebrews. While the Scripture writers sometimes conceived of disease and misery as the result of sin, such suffering was not identified by them with the penalties inflicted at the Judgment. These were strictly eschatological, and included non-participation in the resurrection of the body, and suffering in hell. (See ABYSS, DAY OF THE LORD, BOOK OF LIFE, GEHENNA.)

For 'judgment' in the sense of justice see art. JUSTICE. SHAILEY MATHEWS.

JUDGMENT-HALL.—See PRÆTORIUM.

JUDGMENT-SEAT.—The usual word employed for this in the NT is bēma (Mt 27¹⁹, Jn 19¹³, Ac 18¹² 18¹⁷ 25⁶ 19, 17, Ro 14¹⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁰), properly a 'tribune.' In the NT the word is used of the official seat (tribunal) of the Roman judge. The word kritērion used in Ja 2⁸ occurs also in 1 Co 6², where it is translated in RVm by 'tribunal.' See, further, art. GABBATHA.

JUDITH.—1. A wife of Esau, daughter of Beerli the Hittite (Gn 26³⁴; cf. 36²). 2. Daughter of Merari, of the tribe of Simeon (8¹ [cf. Nu 1⁹] 9²); widow of Manasses of the same tribe. For the book of which she is the heroine see art. APOCRYPHA, § 9.

JOEL.—1. Es 9³⁴ = Uel, Ezr 10³⁴. 2. 1 Es 9³⁵ = Joel, Ezr 10³⁴.

JULIA.—A Christian greeted by St Paul in Ro 16¹⁴, perhaps a 'dependent of the Court,' and wife or sister of Philologus (Lightfoot, Philipp. p. 177).

A. J. MACLEAN.

JULIUS.—For the voyage to Rome St. Paul was committed with other prisoners to the charge of a centurion named Julius, 'of the Augustan band' or cohort (Ac 27¹). Julius showed much kindness to the Apostle, and evidently treated him as a man of importance, though he did not take his advice on a matter of navigation (27⁹. 9. 11. 21. 23. 25¹⁴). Sir Wm. Ramsay suggests (St. Paul, p. 323) that, as Julius rather than the captain or 'sailing master' (not 'owner') had supreme command (27¹¹), the ship must have been a Government vessel. He and his soldiers were probably frumentarii or peregrini, having a camp at Rome and engaged in the commissariat of distant legions, and in bringing political prisoners. In 28¹⁸ some MSS (not the best) say that the prisoners were delivered to the captain of the guard in Rome. This, if a gloss, is at least probably true; the captain of the peregrini would be meant. (See also art. BAND.)

A. J. MACLEAN.

JUNIAS or JUNIA.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁷, but it is uncertain which form is to be taken, i.e. whether a man or a woman is intended. As Junias and Andronicus (wh. see) were 'of note among the apostles' (the last word being used in its widest sense), the former view is more probable. Junias (short for Juniaus) was a 'kinsman' of St. Paul, i.e. a Jew.

A. J. MACLEAN.

JUNIPER (brothem) is undoubtedly the Arab. ratam, a species of rodum very common in desert places in Palestine and Sinai. This broom (Ketamus retem) is in many such places the only possible shade; it sometimes attains a height of 7 to 8 feet (1 K 19⁹). The root is still burned to furnish charcoal (Ps 120⁷). In Job 30⁴ mention is made of the roots being cut up for food. As they are bitter and nauseous and contain very little nourishment, this vividly pictures the severity of the famine in the wilderness. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

JUPITER.—This god is not really referred to in the Bible. The Roman god Iuppiter ('Father of Light' or 'of the sky') was recognized by the Romans as corresponding in attributes to the Greek god Zeus, and hence in modern times the term 'Zeus' in the Bible (2 Mac 6²) has been loosely translated 'Jupiter.' The name Zeus is itself cognate with the first part of the word Jupiter, and suggests the ruler of the firmament, who gives light and sends rain, thunder, and other natural phenomena from the sky. He was conceived as having usurped the authority of his father Kronos and become the chief and ruler of all the other gods. As such he was worshipped all over the Greek world in the widest sense of that term. The case of Ac 14¹². 13 is further complicated, because there it is not even the Greek Zeus who is referred to, but the native supreme god of the Lycaonians, who was recognized by the author of Acts to correspond, as their chief god, to the Greek Zeus. All that we know of this god is that his temple at Lystra was without the city wall (Ac 14¹³), and that Barnabas, as the big silent man, was taken for him. In Ac 19³⁸ the phrase 'from Jupiter' simply means 'from the sky' (cf. what is said above).

JUSHAB-HESED.—A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3²⁰).

JUSTICE (I.).—Justice, as an attribute of God, is referred to in AV in Job 37²³, Ps 89¹⁴ (RV 'righteousness'), and Jer 50⁷. In all cases the Heb. is tsedeq or tseddaqh, the word generally represented by 'righteousness' (see art.). The Divine justice is that side of the Divine righteousness which exhibits it as absolute fairness. In one passage this justice, in operation, is represented by mishpat (Job 36¹⁷). The thought of the Divine justice is sometimes expressed by the latter word, tr. in EV 'judgment': Dt 32⁴, Ps 89¹⁴ 97², Is 30¹⁸. It is implied in Abraham's question (Gn 18²⁵): 'Shall not the judge of all the earth do right,' rather 'do justice?' (Heb. mishpat). In Dn 4³⁷ 'His ways are judgment,' the original is din. In Ac 28⁴ RV has 'Justice' instead of 'vengeance.' As the capital J is intended to indicate, the writer must have had in his mind the goddess of Justice of Greek poetry, Dike, the virgin daughter of Zeus, who sat by his side. But the people of Malta were largely Semites, not Hellenes. What was their equivalent? A positive answer cannot be given, but it may be noted that Babylonian mythology represented 'justice and rectitude' as the children of Shamash the sun-god, 'the judge of heaven and earth,' and that the Phoenicians had in their pantheon a Divine being named tsedeq.

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

JUSTICE (II.).—1. The administration of justice in early Israel.—(a) The earliest form of the administration of justice was that exercised by the head of the family. He was not only the final authority to whom the members of a family appealed when questions of right and wrong had to be decided, and to whose sentence they had to submit, but he also had the power of pronouncing even the death penalty (see Gn 38²⁴). On the other hand, the rights of each member of the family were jealously safeguarded by all the rest; if harm or injury of any kind were sustained by any member, all the members were bound to avenge him; in the case of death the law of blood-revenge laid upon all the duty of taking vengeance by slaying a member of the murderer's family, preferably, but not necessarily, the murderer himself.

(b) The next stage was that in which justice was administered by the 'elders' of a clan or tribe (see Nu 11¹⁶). A number of families, united by ties of kinship, became, by the formation of a clan, a unity as closely connected as the family itself. In this stage of the organization of society the procedure in deciding questions of right and wrong was doubtless much the same as that which obtains even up to the present day among the Bedouin Arabs. When a quarrel arises between two members of the tribe, the matter is brought before the acknowledged head, the sheik. He seeks to make peace between them; having heard both sides, he declares who is right and who is wrong, and settles the form of satisfaction which the latter should make; but his judgment has no binding force, no power other than that of moral suasion; influence is brought to bear by the members of the family of the one declared to be in the wrong, urging him to submit,—the earlier régime thus coming into play, in a modified way; but if he is not to be prevailed upon, the issue is decided by the sword. In Ex 18¹³⁻²² we have what purports to be the original institution of the administration of justice by the elders of clans, Moses himself acting in the capacity of a kind of court of appeal (v. 20); it is, of course, quite possible that, so far as Israel was concerned, this account is historically true, but the institution must have been much older than the time of Moses, and in following Jethro's guidance, Moses was probably only re-instituting a régime which had long existed among his nomad forefathers. It is a more developed form of tribal justice that we read of in Dt 21¹⁸⁻²¹; here the father of a rebellious son, finding his authority set at nought, appeals to the 'elders of the city'; in the case of being found guilty the death-sentence is pronounced against the son, and the sentence is carried out by representatives of the community. The passage is an important one, for it evidently contains echoes of very early usage, the mention of the mother may imply a distant reminiscence of the matriarchate; and the fact that the head of the family exercises his power recalls the earlier régime already referred to, while the present institution of the administration of justice by elders is also borne witness to. See, further, JUDGES.

Another point of importance which must be briefly alluded to is the 'judgment of God.' In the case of questions arising in which the difficulty of finding a solution appeared insuperable, recourse was had to the judgment of God (see Ex 22⁸⁻⁹); the 'judges' referred to here (RV has 'God' in the text, but 'judges' in the mg.) were those who were qualified to seek a decision from God. See, in this connexion, Dt 21¹⁻⁹.

(c) In the monarchical period a further development takes place; the older system, whereby justice was administered by the elders of the cities, is indeed still seen to be in vogue (cf. 1 K 21⁸⁻¹³); but two other powers had now arisen, and both tended to diminish the power and moral influence of the elders of the cities, so far as their judicial functions were concerned.

(i) The king.—It is probable that at first he decided appeals only, but in course of time all important matters—so far as this was possible—were apparently brought before him (see 1 S 8²⁰, 2 S 14¹⁶, 15²⁻⁴, 1 K 3⁹, 2 K 15⁹); according to 1 K 7⁷, Solomon had a covered place constructed, which was called the 'porch of judgment,' and which was in close proximity to his own palace. But though the king was supreme judge in the land, it would obviously soon have become impossible for him to attend to all the more important causes even; the number of these, as well as other calls upon his time, necessitated the appointment of representatives who should administer justice in the king's name. The appointment of these must have further curtailed the powers of the earlier representatives of justice, already referred to. One of the worst results, however, of this was that the motives of administering justice became different; in the old days, when the sheik, or the city elder, was called upon to decide an issue, he did it rather in the capacity of a friend who desired peace between two other friends than as a strictly legal official; his interest in the disputants, as being both of his own kin, or at all events both members of the same community to which he belonged, impelled him to do his utmost to make peace. It was otherwise when a stranger had to decide between two men of whom he knew nothing; he had no personal interest in them, nor would it have been his main endeavour to try to secure a lasting peace between the two, as had been the case in earlier days among the sheiks and city elders; the tie of kinship was absent. The result was that personal interest of another kind asserted itself, and, as there is abundant evidence to show, the administration of justice was guided rather by the prospect of gain than in the interests of equity. It is an ever-recurring burden in the Prophetic writings that justice is thwarted through bribery: 'Every one loveth gifts and followeth after rewards' (Is 1²³; see, further, 57²⁰⁻²³, Mic 3¹¹⁻⁷³, Ezk 18²² etc., and cf. the picture of the ideal judge in Is 11³⁻⁴). A very aggravated instance of the miscarriage of justice is recorded in 1 K 21; but such cases were undoubtedly rare exceptions; so far as Israel and Judah were concerned, it was not from the central authority that the perversion of justice proceeded, but rather from the king's representatives, the 'princes' (sarim), who misused their authority for nefarious ends.

(ii) The priesthood.—Even before the Exile the administration of justice was to a large extent centred in the hands of the Levitical priesthood; nothing could illustrate this more pointedly than Dt 19¹⁵⁻²¹, where the outlines of a regular, formulated, judicial system seem to be referred to, in which the final authority is vested in the priesthood. What must have contributed to this more than anything else was the fact that from early times such matters as seemed to the elders of the city to defy a satisfactory solution were, as we have already seen, submitted to the judgment of God; the intermediaries between God and men were the priests, who carried the matter into the Divine presence, received the Divine answer, and announced that answer to those who came for judgment (see Ex 22⁸⁻⁹, and esp. Dt 33⁸⁻⁹. 'And of Levi he said, Thy Thummim and thy Urim are with thy godly one. . . .'). It is easy to see how, under these circumstances, the authority of the priesthood, in all matters, tended constantly to increase (see, further, Dt 17⁸⁻¹³, 19¹⁵⁻²¹).

But in spite of the rise of these two new factors—the king and the priesthood—it must be borne in mind that the elders of the cities still continued to carry out their judicial functions.

Regarding what would correspond to the modern idea of a law court, we have no data to go upon so far as the earliest period is concerned; but it may be taken for granted that, among the nomads, those who had a quarrel would repair to the tent of the sheik, in which an informal court would be held. From the time of the settlement in Canaan, however, and onwards, when city life had developed, there is plenty of information on the subject. The open space in the immediate vicinity of the city gate was the usual place for assemblies of the people, and it was here that the more formal 'courts of law' were held (see Am 5¹²⁻¹⁵, Dt 21¹⁹⁻²², 25⁷, Zec 8¹⁶; the 'porch of judgment' of king Solomon [1 K 7⁷], already referred to, was of course exceptional).

2. Post-exilic period.—At the time of Ezra we find that the administration of justice by the elders of the city, which had continued throughout the period of the monarchy, is still in vogue (see Ezr 7²⁵ 10⁴); they presided over the local courts in the smaller provincial towns. These smaller courts consisted of seven members; in the larger towns the corresponding courts consisted of twenty-three members. In the event of these lower courts not being able to come to a decision regarding any matter brought before them, the case was carried to the superior court at Jerusalem, the Sanhedrin (wh. see). The procedure in these courts was of the simplest character: the injured person brought his complaint before the judges, previous notice having been given, and publicly gave his version of the matter; the accused then in his turn defended himself;—judging from Job 31²⁸ a written statement was sometimes read out;—the testimony of two witnesses at least was required to substantiate an accusation; according to the Talmud, these witnesses had to be males and of age, but the testimony of a slave was not regarded as valid. Before witnesses gave their testimony they were adjured to speak the truth, and the whole truth. False witnesses—and these were evidently not unknown—had to suffer the same punishment as the victim of their false testimony would have had to undergo, or had undergone. If no witnesses were forthcoming, the truth of a matter had, so far as possible, to be obtained by the cross-questioning and acumen of the judges.

3. In the NT.—The administration of justice under the Roman régime comes before us in connexion with St. Paul (Ac 24 ff.). According to Roman law, when a Roman citizen was accused of anything, the magistrate could fix any time that suited him for the trial; however long the trial might be postponed, the accused was nevertheless imprisoned for the whole time. But there were different kinds of imprisonment recognized by Roman law, and it lay within the magistrate's power to decide which kind the prisoner should suffer. These different grades of custody were: the public gaol, where the prisoner was bound in chains (cf. Ac 12⁶ 21³³); in the custody of a soldier, who was responsible for the prisoner, and to whom the prisoner was chained; and an altogether milder form, according to which the accused was in custody only so far that he was under the supervision of a magistrate, who stood surety for him; it was only those of high rank to whom this indulgence was accorded. In the case of St. Paul it was the second of these which was put in force.

As regards appeals to the Emperor (Ac 25^{11, 12}), the following conditions applied when one claimed this right. In the Roman provinces the supreme criminal jurisdiction was exercised by the governor of the province, whether proconsul, proprætor, or procurator; no appeal was permitted to provincials from a governor's judgment; but Roman citizens had the right of appealing to the tribunes, who had the power of ordering the case to be transferred to the ordinary tribunals at Rome. But from the time of Augustus the power of the tribunes was centred in the person of the Emperor; and with him alone, therefore, lay the power of hearing appeals. The form of such an appeal was the simple pronouncement of the word 'Appello'; there was no need to make a written appeal, the mere utterance of the word in court suspended all further proceedings there.

JUSTIFICATION, JUSTIFY.—

Verb and noun originate in Christian Latin (the Vulgate); Lat. analogy affords some excuse for the Romanist reading of 'justify' as 'make just,' by which sanctification is included under justification. Neither the Heb. nor the Greek original allows of any other definition of 'justify' than 'count just'; it is a term of ethical relationship, not ethical quality, and signifies the footing on which one is set towards another, not the character imparted to one. The Heb. verb (abstract noun wanting) deviates from the above sense only in the late Heb. of Dn 12² (rendered in EV 'turn . . . to righteousness'). The Greek equivalent had a wide range of meaning—denoting (1) to set right, correct a wrong thing done; (2) to deem right, claim, approve, consent to anything; (3) to do right by any one, either in vindication or in punishment (so 'justify' in Scottish law = 'execute').

The usage of the LXX and NT, applying the word to persons, comes under (3) above, but only as taken in bonam partem; in other words, justification in Biblical speech implies the vindication or clearing from charge of the justified person, never his chastisement. Justification is essentially the act of a judge (whether in the official or the ethical sense), effected on just grounds and in foro (Dei, conscientia, or reipublica, as the case may be). It must be borne in mind that the character of Father and the office of Judge in God consist together in NT thought. We have to distinguish (1) the general use of the word as a term of moral judgment, in which there is no difference between OT and NT writers; (2) its specific Pauline use, esp. characteristic of Rom. and Galatians.

1. In common parlance, one is 'justified' when pronounced just on trial, when cleared of blame or aspersion. So God is 'justified,' where His character or doings have borne the appearance of injustice and have been, or might be, arraigned before the human conscience; see Job 8⁴, Ps 51⁴ (Ro 3⁴) 97⁷, Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 7^{29, 30}, also 1 Ti 3¹⁶. Similarly God's servants may be 'justified' against the misjudgments and wrongful accusations of the world (Ps 37⁷; cf. Ex 23⁷, Job 23¹¹ and 42⁷⁻⁹, Ps 7⁸⁻¹⁰ 35¹⁹⁻²⁴ 43¹ 97⁸⁻¹²; and in the NT, Mt 13¹², Ro 2⁷⁻¹³, 1 P 2²³; cf. 1 Ti 3¹⁶, Rev 11¹⁸). Even the wicked may be, relatively, 'justified' by comparison with the more wicked (Jer 3¹⁴, Ezk 16¹⁶; cf. Mt 12¹¹).

But OT thought on this subject arrived at a moral impasse, a contradiction that seemingly admitted of no escape. In the days of judgment on the nation Israel felt that she was 'more righteous' than the heathen oppressors (Hab 1¹³) and that, at a certain point, she had 'received of J's hand double for all her sins' (Jer 10²⁴, Is 40²); and J's covenant pledged Him to her reinstatement (Is 54¹⁻¹²). In this situation, towards the end of the Exile, the Second Isaiah writes, 'My justifier is at hand! . . . my lord J' will help me . . . who is he that counts me wicked?' (Is 50⁸; cf. Ro 8³¹⁻³⁴). For the people of J' a grand vindication is coming; more than this, 'J's righteous servant'—either the ideal Israel collectively, or some single representative in whom its character and sufferings are ideally embodied—is to 'justify many' in 'bearing their iniquities,' this vicarious office accounting for the shameful death inflicted on him (Is 53); his meek obedience to J's will in the endurance of humiliation and anguish will redound to the benefit of sinful humanity (cf. 53¹¹, with 52¹³). While the spiritual Israel is thus represented as perfected through sufferings and made the instrument of J's grace towards mankind, the deepened consciousness of individual sin prompted such expressions as those of Jer 17⁹, Ps 51¹ 130³ 143² (Ro 3²³), and raised the problem of Job 25⁴, 'How can a man be righteous with God?' Mic 6⁸⁻⁹ reveals with perfect clearness the way of justification by merit; Mic 7¹⁻⁶ shows how completely it was missed; and Mic 7¹⁸⁻²⁰ points to the one direction in which hope lay,—the covenant grace of J'. 'The seed of Israel' is to be 'justified in J' and 'saved with an everlasting salvation' (Is 45⁷, 22-26); the actual Israel is radically vicious and stands self-condemned (59¹², 64⁶, etc.). Such is the final verdict of prophecy.

Under the legal régime dominating 'Judaism' from the age of Ezra onwards, the principle of which was expressed by Paul in Gal 3¹² ('He that doeth those things shall live in them'), this problem took another and most acute form. The personal favour of God, and the attainment by Israel of the Messianic salvation for herself and the world, were staked on the exact fulfilment of the Mosaic Law, and circumcision was accepted as the seal, stamped upon the body of every male Jew, of the covenant based on this understanding (see Gal 5³). Ro 7⁷⁻²⁵ shows how utterly this theory had failed for the individual, and Ro 9³⁰⁻¹⁰ asserts its national failure.

2. St. Paul's doctrine of Justification is explained negatively by his recoil from the Judaism just described. In the cross of Christ there had been revealed to him, after his abortive struggles, God's way of justifying men (Ro 7²⁴ 8⁴). This was in reality the old way, trodden by Abraham (Ro 4), 'witnessed to by the law and the prophets'—by the Mosaic sacrifices and the Isaianic promises. Paul takes up again the threads that dropped from the hands of the later Isaiah. He sees in 'Jesus Christ and him crucified' the mysterious figure of Is 53—an identification already made by John the Baptist and by the Lord Himself; cf. Ro 5¹³⁻²¹ with Is 53¹. Upon this view the death of the Messiah on Calvary, which so terribly affronted Saul the Pharisee, is perfectly explained; 'the scandal of the cross' is changed to glory (1 Co 1²³⁻³¹, Gal 2²⁰, 3¹³ 6¹⁴, 2 Co 5²¹). The 'sacrifice for sin' made in the death of Jesus vindicates and reinstates mankind before God. 'Justification' is, in Pauline language, synonymous with 'reconciliation' (atonement)—see Ro 3²⁶, 5¹¹ and 10²¹, esp. 2 Co 5¹⁸, where God is said to be 'reconciling the world to himself' in 'not imputing to them their trespasses'; the same act which is a reconciliation as it concerns the disposition and attitude of the parties affected, is a justification as it concerns their ethical footing, their relations in the order of moral law. The ground of the Christian justification lies in the grace, concurrent with the righteousness, of God the Father, which offers a pardon wholly gratuitous as regards the offender's deserts (Ro 3²³, 4⁴, 5^{6, 8, 9}, 6²³, etc., He 2⁹). The means is the vicarious expiatory death of Jesus Christ, ordained by God for this very end (Ro 3²⁴, 4²⁵, 5⁹, 2 Co 5^{14, 18}; cf. Mt 20²⁸ 26²⁸, He 9¹², 10¹⁰, 1 P 2²⁴ 3¹⁸, 1 Jn 1⁷ 4^{10, 14}, Rev 1⁸ etc.). The sole condition is faith, with baptism for its outward sign, repentance being of course implicit in both (Ro 6⁴, Gal 3²⁶; Ro 6^{2, 3}, 1 Co 6¹¹, Ac 20²¹ 22¹⁶ 26¹⁸ etc.); i.e. the trustful acceptance by the sin-convicted man of God's grace meeting him in Christ (Ro 4²⁵, Gal 2²⁰, etc.); the clause 'through faith in Jesus Christ' of Ro 3²² is the subjective counterpart (man meeting God) of the objective expression 'through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus' (God meeting man) in v. 24.

There underlies this whole doctrine the assumption of the solidarity of mankind with Jesus Christ: He did not interfere from the outside, to make Himself a substitute for man—the ethical objection to Paulinism based on this presumption is irrelevant—but 'offered himself unblemished to God' from within humanity, being 'the one man' willing and able to perform 'the one justificatory act,' to render 'the obedience' which availed 'for all men unto a life-giving justification' (Ro 5^{15, 21}). Hence Paul is careful to refer the justification of mankind to the 'grace of the one man Jesus Christ,' in whom the race recognizes its highest self, side by side with the 'grace of God' conveyed by Him and lodged in Him, the Son of God (Ro 5¹⁵). All great boons are won and achievements realized by individual leaders, 'captains of salvation' for their fellows. Moreover, the propitiatory 'offering' was not the mere negative satisfaction of repentance, a vicarious apology on Christ's part for the rest of us; it was rendered by His positive 'obedience unto death, yea the death of the cross,' by His meek acceptance of the penalties of transgression falling on Him the undeserving, by His voluntary submission to the law that binds death to sin and that 'numbered' Him 'with the transgressors,' since He had cast in His lot with them (Is 53¹², Lk 22²⁷; cf. Gal. 4⁵, Ro 8²⁻⁴); this is what was meant by saying that He 'became sin—became a curse—for us, that we might become a righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5²¹, Gal 3¹³). Our Representative was 'delivered up' to the execution of Calvary 'because of our trespasses'; He 'was raised' from the dead, released from the prison-house, 'because of our justification' effected by His sacrifice (Ro 4²⁵)—or, as the latter clause is often understood, 'raised to effect our individual justification.' Fundamentally then, justification is the sentence of acquittal passed by God upon the race of mankind in accepting Christ's expiation made on its behalf, the reinstatement of the world in the Divine grace which embraces 'all men' in its scope (Ro 5¹⁸): experimentally, it takes effect in those who hear the good news and believe; by these the universal amnesty is personally enjoyed (Ro 1¹⁷ 3²² 5¹, 1 Co 6¹¹ etc.).

Justification is realized in (a) 'the forgiveness of sins,' and (b) 'adoption' into the family of God, whereof 'the Spirit of God's Son,' poured into the heart, is the witness and seal (Ro 8¹⁴, 2 Co 1², Gal 4⁶, Eph 1¹³).

That personal justification, according to St. Paul's idea, embraces sonship along with pardon is evident from the comparison of Gal 3²⁶, and 4⁷ with 2 Co 5¹⁹⁻²¹ and Eph 1⁷; on the one hand 'adoption' and 'the promise of the Spirit,' on the other hand 'forgiveness' or the 'non-imputation of trespasses,' are immediately derived from 'redemption in Christ's blood' and the 'reconciling of the world to God'; they are alike conditioned upon faith in Jesus. The two are the negative and positive parts of man's restoration to right relationship with God.

St. James' teaching on Justification in 2¹⁴⁻²⁶ of his Ep., is concerned only with its condition—with the nature of justifying faith. He insists that this is a practical faith such as shows itself alive and genuine by its 'works,' and not the theoretical belief in God which a 'demon' may have as truly as a saint. On this point Paul and James were in substance agreed (see 1 Th 1⁵, 2 Th 1¹¹, Gal 5⁶); the 'works of faith' which James demands, and the 'works of the law' which Paul rejects, are quite different things. The opposition between the two writers is at the bottom merely verbal, and was probably unconscious on the part of both. G. G. FINDLAY.

JUSTUS.—This surname is given to three people in NT. 1. Joseph Barsabbas (Ac 1²³). 2. Titus or Titius, host of St. Paul at Corinth (Ac 18⁷ RV; the MSS vary between these two forms, and some omit the first name altogether), apparently a Roman citizen who was a 'proselyte of the gate' (as he would later have been called), and converted to Christianity by the Apostle (Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 256). 3. A Jew named Jesus or Joshua who was with St. Paul in his first Roman imprisonment (Col 4¹¹). A. J. MACLEAN.

JUTAH or JUTTAH (in Jos 15⁴⁶ AV has Juttah, which is read in 21¹⁸ by both AV and RV).—A town of Judah (Jos 15⁴⁶) given to the priests as a city of refuge for the manslayer (Jos 21¹⁴). It has been left out of the catalogue of cities of refuge in 1 Ch 6⁵⁹, but QPB adds note: 'Insert, Juttah with her pasture grounds.' It has been suggested that Juttah was the residence of Zacharias and Elisabeth, and the birthplace of John the Baptist (Lk 1³⁹ 'a city of Judah'). Juttah is probably the modern village of Yutta, standing high on a ridge 16 miles from Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis).

K

KABZEEL.—A town in the extreme south of Judah, on the border of Edom (Jos 15²¹, 2 S 23²⁰); called in Neh 11²⁸ Jekabzeel. Its site has not been identified.

KADESH or KADESH-BARNEA was a place of note in olden time (Gn 14⁷ 16¹⁴). This it could not have been without a supply of water. The Israelites may therefore have expected to find water here, and finding none—a peculiarly exasperating experience—were naturally embittered. The flow of the spring, by whatever means it had been obstructed, was restored by Moses, under Divine direction (Nu 20²), and for a long time it was the centre of the tribal encampments (Nu 20¹, Dt 1⁴⁶). It was the scene of Korah's rebellion (Nu 16), and of Miriam's death (20¹). The spies were sent hence (Nu 32⁵, Dt 1²⁰), and returned hither (Nu 13²⁶). Before moving from here, the embassy was despatched to the king of Edom (Nu 20¹⁴, Jg 11¹⁸).

Kadesh-barnea lay on the south boundary of the Amorite highlands (Dt 1¹⁹), 'in the uttermost border' of Edom (Nu 20⁶). The conquest of Joshua reached thus far (10⁴): it was therefore on the line, running from the Ascent of Akabbim to the Brook of Egypt, which marked the southern frontier of Canaan (Nu 34⁴, Jos 15⁵). In Gn 20¹ it is placed east of Gerar; and in Ezk 47¹⁹ 48²⁸ between Tamar and the Brook of Egypt. All this points definitely to the place discovered by the Rev. J. Rowlands in 1842. The ancient name persists in the modern 'Ain Qadts, 'holy spring.' An abundant stream rises at the foot of a limestone cliff. Caught by the wells and pools made for its reception, it creates in its brief course, ere it is absorbed by the desert, a stretch of greenery and beauty amid the waste. From the high grazing grounds far and near, the flocks and herds come hither for the watering. The place was visited again by Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, whose book, Kadesh Barnea (1884), contains a full account of the spring and its surroundings. It lies in the territory of the 'Azāzine Arabs, about 50 miles south of Beersheba, to the south-west of Naqb e-Safāh—a pass opening towards Palestine from Wādy e-Fiqra, which may be the Ascent of Akabbim—and east of Wādy Jerūr. The name 'En-mishpat, 'Fountain of Judgment' (Gn 14⁷), was doubtless due to the custom of coming here for the authoritative settlement of disputes (Driver, Genesis, ad loc.).

For Kadesh on the Orontes see TAHTIM-HODSHI.

KADMIEL.—The name of a Levitical family which returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁴⁰ = Neh 7²⁸; cf. 1 Es 5²⁸). In Ezr 3⁸ (cf. 1 Es 5²⁸), in connexion with the laying of the foundation of the Temple, as well as in Neh 9¹⁷ (the day of humiliation) and 10⁹ (the sealing of the covenant), Kadmiel appears to be an individual. The name occurs further in Neh 12²⁴.

KADMONITES.—One of the nations whose land was promised to Abram's seed (Gn 15¹⁹). Their habitat was probably in the region of the Dead Sea. The fact that Kedemah is said to be a son of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁶) renders it likely that they were Ishmaelite Arabs. Ewald, however, regarded Qadmoni as equivalent to Be'ne Qadhem ('Sons of the East')—which seems to have been a general name applied to the Keturahite tribes (see Gn 25⁴⁻⁶).

W. M. NESBIT.

KAIN.—1. A city in the uplands of Judah (Jos 15²⁷), probably to be identified with the modern Khirbet Yakin, on a hill S.W. of Hebron, with tombs, cisterns, and other traces of an ancient town. A neighbouring sanctuary is pointed out as the tomb of Cain. 2. A clan name—the Kenites (wh. see), Nu 24²² (RV), Jg 4¹¹ (RVm).

W. EWING.

KALLAI.—The head of a priestly family (Neh 12²⁰).

KAMON (AV Camon).—The burial-place of Jair (Jg 10⁴). The site has not been recovered. It was probably east of the Jordan; possibly identical with the Kamūn of Polybius (v. lxx. 12).

KANAH.—1. A 'brook' or wady in the borders of Ephraim (Jos 16¹⁷) which has been identified (doubtfully) with Wady Kanah near Shechem (Nablus). 2. A town in the northern boundary of Asher (Jos 19²⁸), possibly to be identified with the modern Kana, a short distance S.E. of Tyre. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

KAPH.—See CAPH.

KAREAH ('bald').—Father of Johanan, No. 1.

KARIATHIARIUS.—1 Es 5¹⁹ for Kiriath-jearim (wh. see).

KARKA.—An unknown place in the S. of Judah (Jos 15³).

KARKOR.—A place apparently in Gilead (Jg 8¹⁰). The site is unknown.

KARTAH.—A city of Zebulun (Jos 21³⁴); not mentioned in the parallel passage, 1 Ch 6⁷⁷. The site is unknown. It might be for Kattath by a clerical error.

KARTAN.—A city of Naphtali (Jos 21³²). The parallel passage, 1 Ch 6⁷⁸, has Kiriathaim.

KEDAR.—The name of a nomadic people, living to the east of Palestine, whom P (Gn 25¹⁸) regards as a division of the Ishmaelites. Jeremiah (40²⁸) counts them among the 'sons of the East', and in 29¹⁷ refers to them as symbolic of the East, as he does to Cuthim in Cyprus as symbolic of the West. In Isaiah (21¹⁷) they are said to produce skilful archers, to live in villages (42²⁴), and (60⁷) to be devoted to sheep-breeding. The latter passage also associates them with the Nebaioth. Jeremiah alludes also (49²⁹) to their nomadic life, to their sheep, camels, tents, and curtains. Ezekiel (27²²) couples them with 'Arab,' and speaks of their trade with Tyre in lambs, rams, and goats. In Ps 120⁵ Kedar is used as the type of barbarous unteeling people, and in Ca 1⁶ their tents are used as a symbol of blackness. The Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (b.c. 668-626), in his account of his Arabian campaign (cf. KIB ii. 223), mentions the Kedarites in connexion with the Arabi

(the 'Arab' of Ezekiel) and the Nebaioth, and speaks of the booty, in asses, camels, and sheep, which he took. It is evident that they were Bedouin, living in black tents such as one sees in the southern and eastern parts of Palestine to-day, who were rich in such possessions as pertain to nomads, and also skilful in war.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

KEDEMAH.—A son of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁸ = 1 Ch 1²⁴). The clan of which he is the eponymous head has not been identified. See also KADMONITES.

KEDEMOTH.—A place apparently on the upper course of the Arnon, assigned to Reuben (Jos 13¹⁴), and a Levitical city (21³⁷ = 1 Ch 6⁷⁹). From the 'wilderness of Kedemoth' messengers were sent by Moses to Sihon (Dt 2²⁶). The site may be the ruin Umm er-Rasds, N.E. of Dibon.

KEDESH.—1. A city in the south of Judah (Jos 15²²) whose site is uncertain. It is probably to be distinguished from Kadesh-barnea. 2. A city in Issachar (1 Ch 6⁷²), where, however, Kedesh is not improbably a textual error for Kishion of the parallel passage (Jos 21²⁸). 3. See next article.

KEDESH-NAPHTALI (Jg 4⁶; called also 'Kedesh' Jos 12²² 19³⁷, Jg 4⁹⁻¹¹, 2 K 15²⁹; and 'Kedesh in Galilee' in Jos 20⁷ 21³², 1 Ch 6⁷⁸).—Evidently, from the name meaning 'holy,' a sacred site from ancient times; a city of refuge (Jos 20⁷) and a Levitical city (21³²). It was the home of Barak (Jg 4⁶). It was captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15²⁹) in the reign of Pekah.

The site is the village of Kedes, one of the most picturesque spots in Galilee; to the E. of the village the ground is strewn with ancient remains. There are several fine sarcophagi and the ruins of a large building, possibly once a Roman temple.

KEHELATHAH (Nu 33²²⁻²³).—One of the 'stations' of the children of Israel (Nu 33²²⁻²³). Nothing is known about its position.

KEILAH.—A city of Judah in the Shephelah, named with Nezib and Achziv (Jos 15⁴⁴). David delivered it from the marauding Philistines, and it became his residence for a time. Becoming aware of the treachery of its inhabitants, he left it (1 S 23¹²⁻¹³). It was re-occupied after the Exile (Neh 3¹⁷, 1 Ch 4¹²). It is commonly identified with Khirbet Ktā, about 7 miles E. of Beit Jibrin. It lies very high, however, for a city in the Shephelah, being over 1500 ft. above the level of the sea.

W. EWING.

KELAIAH.—A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²³), called in 1 Es 9²³ Colius. In Ezr. the gloss is added 'which is Kelita' (in 1 Es. 'who was called Calitas'). Kelita appears in Neh 8⁷ as one of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the Law (cf. 1 Es 9¹⁸ Calitas), and his name occurs amongst the signatories to the covenant (Neh 10¹⁹). It does not follow, however, that because Kelafah was also called Kelita he is to be identified with this Kelita.

KELITA.—See KELAIAH.

KEMUEL.—1. The son of Nahor and father of Aram. Gn 22²¹ (contrast 10²², where Aram is son of Shem). 2. The prince of the tribe of Ephraim, one of the twelve commissioners for the dividing of the land (Nu 34²⁴). 3. The father of Hishababai, the ruler of the Levites (1 Ch 27¹⁷).

KENAN.—Son of Enoch and father of Mahalalel (Gn 5¹⁸ [AV Cainan; but Avm, like RV, Kenan], 1 Ch 1³). The name Kenan is simply a variation of Cain.

KENATH.—A city lying to the E. of the Jordan, taken by Nobah, whose name for a time it bore (Nu 32⁴⁴). Geshur and Aram re-conquered it (1 Ch 2²²). It is usually identified with Kanawāt, fully 16 miles N. of Bozrah, on the W. slope of Jebel ed-Druze. It occupies a commanding position on either bank of the Wady Kanawāt, which here forms a picturesque waterfall

There are tall, graceful columns, and massive walls, together with other impressive remains of buildings from Greco-Roman times. The modern village, lower down the slope, is now occupied by Druzes. Baedeker (Pal. 3, 207), stating no reason, Moore (Judges, 222), for reasons that do not appear adequate, and others reject the identification. To speak of Qana-wdt as 'in the remote north-east' (Moore), conveys a wrong impression. It is only some 50 miles N.E. of Jerash, which in turn is near the S. boundary of Gilead. No other identification seems possible. W. EWING.

KENAZ.—See KENIZZITES.

KENITES.—A nomadic tribe, closely connected with the Amalekites (wh. see), and probably indeed a branch of them, but having friendly relations with Israel, and ultimately, it seems, at least in the main, absorbed in Judah. Hobab, Moses' father-in-law (Jg 1⁸ 4¹ RVm), who had been invited by Moses—and had doubtless accepted the invitation—to be a guide to Israel in the wilderness (Nu 10²⁹⁻³²), was a Kenite; and his descendants came up from Jericho with the tribe of Judah into the S. part of their territory (Arad is about 17 miles S. of Hebron), though afterwards, true to their Bedouin instincts, they roamed beyond the border and rejoined their kinsmen, the Amalekites, in the N. of the Sinaitic Peninsula (Jg 1⁶; read in this verse, with MSS of LXX, 'the Amalekite' for 'the people'—three letters have dropped out in the Heb.). When Saul, many years later, attacked the Amalekites, he bade the Kenites separate themselves from them, on the ground that they had shown kindness to Israel at the time of the Exodus (1 S 15⁶—alluding doubtless to Hobab's guidance, Nu 10²⁹⁻³²). In Jg 4¹¹ Heber the Kenite is mentioned as having separated himself from the main body of the tribe, and wandered northwards as far as the neighbourhood of Kedesh (near the Waters of Merom). From 1 S 27¹⁰ 30²⁹ we learn that in the time of David there was a district in the S. of Judah inhabited by Kenites; it is possible also that Kinah, in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15²¹), and Kain in the hill-country (v. 11), were Kenite settlements. The Rechabites, with whom the nomadic life had become a religious institution (Jer 35), were Kenites (1 Ch 2⁵⁶). In Gn 15¹⁹ the Kenites are mentioned among the ten nations whose land was to be taken possession of by Israel; the reference is doubtless to the absorption of the Kenites in Judah. In Nu 24¹⁶ Balaam, with a play on the resemblance of the name to the Heb. kēn, 'nest', declares that though their 'nest' is among the rocky crags (namely, in the S. of Judah), they would in the end be carried away captive by the Assyrians ('Kain' in v. 2 is the proper name of the tribe of which 'Kenite' is the gentile adj.; cf. Jg 4¹¹ RVm. Observe here that the oracle on the Kenites follows closely upon that on the Amalekites).

The word kāin means in Heb. a 'spear' (2 S 21¹⁶), and in Arab. an 'iron-smith'; in Aram. also the word corresponding to 'Kenite' denotes a 'metal-worker'; it has hence been conjectured (Sayce) that the 'Kenites' were a nomad tribe of smiths. There is, however, no support for this conjecture beyond the resemblance in the words. S. R. DRIVER.

KENIZZITES.—A clan named from an eponymous ancestor, Kenaz. According to J (Jos 15¹⁷, Jg 1¹³), Caleb and Othniel were descended from him. (The inference, sometimes made, that Kenaz was a brother of Caleb, arose from a misunderstanding of these passages.) R in Jos 14⁶ 14 definitely calls Caleb a Kenizzite, as P does in Nu 32¹². R also (Gn 15¹⁹⁻²¹) counts the Kenizzites among the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine. P in Gn 36¹² enrols Kenaz among the 'dukes' of Edom, while a Priestly supplementer counts him both as a 'duke' and as a grandson of Esau (Gn 36¹¹⁻¹⁹). The Chronicler names Kenaz as a grandson of Esau (1 Ch 1³⁶), and also as a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4¹¹⁻¹³). The probable meaning of all these passages is that the Kenizzites overspread a part of Edom and southern Judah before the Israelitish conquest and continued to abide there, a part of them being absorbed by the Edomites, and a part by the tribe of Judah. This latter portion embraced the clans of Caleb and Othniel. GEORGE A. BARTON.

KEREN-HAPPUCH

KENOSIS.—This word means 'emptying,' and as a substantive it does not occur in the NT. But the corresponding verb 'he emptied himself' is found in Ph 2⁷. This passage is very important as a definite statement that the Incarnation implies limitations, and at the same time that these limitations were undertaken as a voluntary act of love. 2 Co 8⁹ is a similar statement. The questions involved are not, however, to be solved by the interpretation of isolated texts, but, so far as they can be solved, by our knowledge of the Incarnate Life as a whole. The question which has been most discussed in recent years relates to the human consciousness and knowledge of Christ, and asks how it is possible for the limitations of human knowledge to coexist with Divine omniscience.

The word kenosis, and the ideas which it suggests, were not emphasized by early theologians, and the word was used as little more than a synonym for the Incarnation, regarded as a Divine act of voluntary condescension. The speculations which occupied the Church during the first five centuries were caused by questions as to the nature and Person of Christ, which arose inevitably when it had been realized that He was both human and Divine; but while they established the reality of His human consciousness, they did not deal, except incidentally, with the conditions under which it was exercised. The passages which speak of our Lord's human knowledge were discussed exegetically, and the general tendency of most early and almost all mediæval theology was to explain them in a more or less docetic sense. From the 16th cent. onwards there has been a greater tendency to revert to the facts of the Gospel narrative, consequently a greater insistence on the truth of our Lord's manhood, and more discussion as to the extent to which the Son, in becoming incarnate, ceased to exercise Divine power, especially in the sphere of human knowledge. The question is obviously one that should be treated with great reserve, and rather by an examination of the whole picture of the human life of Christ presented to us in the NT than by a priori reasoning. The language of the NT appears to warrant the conclusion that the Incarnation was not a mere addition of a manhood to the Godhead, but that 'the Son of God, in assuming human nature, really lived in it under properly human conditions, and ceased from the exercise of those Divine functions, including the Divine omniscience, which would have been incompatible with a truly human experience.' It has even been held that the Son in becoming incarnate ceased to live the life of the Godhead altogether, or to exercise His cosmic functions. But for this there is no support in the NT and Col 1¹⁷ and He 1³ more than suggest the contrary. J. H. MAUDE

KERAS (1 Es 5²⁹)—Ezr 2⁴ and Neh 7⁷ Keros.

KERCHIEFS (from the Fr. couvrechef, a covering for the head) are mentioned only in Ezk 13¹⁸⁻²¹, a somewhat obscure passage having reference to certain forms of divination or sorcery, which required the head to be covered. They evidently varied in length with the height of the wearer (v. 18), and perhaps resembled the long veils worn by the female captives from Lachish represented on an Assyrian sculpture, see DRESS, § 5 (b).

KERE or QERE.—See TEXT of OT.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (lit. 'horn of antimony').—The youngest daughter born to Job in his second estate of prosperity (Job 42¹⁴). The name is indicative of beautiful eyes, from the dye made of antimony, used to tinge the eyelashes (2 K 9³⁰, Jer 4³⁰).

KERIOTH.—A city of Moab, named in Jer 48³⁴. 4, Am 2², and in line 13 of the Moabite Stone. It has been identified with Ar, the capital city of Moab, as that has been with Rabbah—both identifications being precarious. More is to be said for Kerieth being the same as Kir-heres of Is 16¹¹ and of Jer 48³¹. The latter is a stronghold to this day, and fits in with the suggestion of the passages above that Kerieth was a capital city of Moab, and the seat of the worship of Chemosh.

W. F. COBB.

KERIOTH-HEZRON (Jos 15²⁵).—See HAZOR, No. 3.

KEROS.—Name of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁴ = Neh 7⁷); in 1 Es 5³⁸ Keras.

KESITAH is given in RVm as the Heb. word rendered 'piece of money' in the three passages Gn 33¹⁹, Jos 24²², and Job 42¹. No clue has yet been found to the weight, and therefore the value, of the kesitah; but that it was an ingot of precious metal of a recognized value is more probable than the tradition represented by several ancient versions, which render it by 'lamb.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KETAB (1 Es 5³⁰).—Head of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel. There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezr. and Neh.

KETHIBH.—See TEXT OF OT.

KETTLE.—1. 2¹⁴ only. See HOUSE, § 9.

KETURAH.—Abraham's wife (Gn 25¹⁻⁴), or concubine (1 Ch 1³¹; cf. Gn 25⁹), after the death of Sarah; named only by J and the Chronicler in the passages referred to; said to be the ancestress of sixteen tribes, several of which are distinctly Arabian—Midian, Sheba, Dedan. Some Arabic writers mention an Arabian tribe near Mecca called Qatārā. The old Israelites evidently regarded some Arabs as distant relatives (see artt. ABRAHAM, ESAU, HAGAR). The name Qetārāh = 'incense,' is a perfume-name like Keziah (Job 42¹).

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

KEY.—See HOUSE, § 6. Of the passages where this word is used in a figurative sense the most important are Is 22²² (cf. Rev 3⁷), where the key is the symbol of authority and rule; Lk 11⁵² 'the key of knowledge'; and the crux interpretum, Mt 16¹⁹, for which see POWER OF THE KEYS.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KEZIAH ('caesia').—The name of the second daughter born to Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42¹⁴).

KIBROTH-HATTA'AVAH ('graves of lust,' Nu 11³⁴ 33¹⁵, Dt 9²²).—The march from Taberah (Nu 11³) is not mentioned in Nu 23, but Kibroth-hatta'avah was one day's journey from the wilderness of Sinai. It is placed by tradition to the N. of Naqb el-Hawa ('mountain path of the wind'), which leads to the plain below the traditional Sinai.

W. EWING.

KIBZAIM.—See JOKMEAM.

KID.—See GOAT, and (for Ex 23¹⁹) MAGIC, p. 569b.

KIDNAPPING.—See CRIMES, etc. § 7.

KIDNEYS.—1. Literal.—(1) The choice portions of animals sacrificed to J^h included the kidneys (Ex 29¹³, 22, Lv 3⁴, 10, 15, 4⁹, 7⁴, 8¹⁵, 25, 9¹⁰, 19; cf. Is 34⁶). The term is even transferred (if the text is correct) to choice wheat (Dt 32¹⁴). (2) Limited to poetry is the use of this term in regard to human beings, and the rendering is always 'reins' (see below). They are 'possessed' (RVm 'formed') by J^h (Ps 139¹³), and are, metaphorically, wounded by J^h's arrows (Job 16¹³; cf. 19²⁷, La 3¹³). (3) AVm of Lv 15² 22¹ is incorrect: there is no mention of reins; and in Is 11⁴ the word so rendered means 'loins.'

2. Figurative.—Here the EV rendering is always reins (Lat. renes, pl.; the Gr. equivalent being nephroi, whence 'nephritis,' etc.). The avoidance of the word 'kidneys' is desirable, because we do not regard them as the seat of emotion. But the Biblical writers did so regard them. It was as natural for them to say 'This gladdens my reins' as it is natural—and incorrect—for us to say 'This gladdens my heart.' And, in fact, in the passages now cited the terms 'reins' and 'heart' are often parallel: Ps 7⁹ 16⁷ 26² 73¹, Pr 23¹⁵, Jer 11²⁰ 12² 17¹⁰ 20¹³, Wis 1⁶, 1 Mac 2²⁴, Rev 2²³.

H. F. B. COMPTON.

KIDRON.—A place fortified by Cendebeus (1 Mac 15³⁹, 41), and the point to which he was pursued after his defeat by the sons of Simon the Maccabee (16⁹). It may be the modern Katrah near Yebna, and is possibly identical with 'Gederoth of Jos 15⁴, 2 Ch 28¹⁸.

KIDRON (AV Cedron), THE BROOK (nachal, 'torrent valley,' 'wady,' 2 S 15²³, 1 K 2³⁷, 2 Ch 33¹⁴, Neh 2¹³ etc.; Gr. chirimarros, Jn 18¹).—The name of a valley, nearly 3 miles in length, which bounds the plateau of Jerusalem on the East. It is always dry except during and immediately after heavy rain; it is the same valley that is referred to as the Valley of Jehoshaphat (wh. see). It commences about 1½ miles N. of the N.W. corner of the city walls, as a wide, open, shallow valley. At first it runs S.E., receiving tributaries from the W. and N., but where it is now crossed by the modern carriage road to the Mt. of Olives, it turns South. Near this spot (as well as higher up) there are a number of ancient tombs; among them on the W. side of the valley are the so-called 'Tombs of the Kings,' and on the East the reputed tomb of 'Simon the Just,' much venerated by the Jews. The whole of this first open section of the valley is to-day known as Wady el-Joz; ('Valley of the Nuts'); it is full of fertile soil, and in a great part of its extent is sown with corn or planted with olives or almonds. As the valley approaches the East wall of the city it rapidly deepens, and rocky scarps appear on each side; it now receives the name Wady Sitti Miriam, i.e. 'Valley of the Lady Mary.' Opposite the Temple area the bottom of the valley, now 40 feet below the present surface, is about 400 feet below the Temple platform. S. of this it continues to narrow and deepen, running between the village of Silwadn (see SLOAM) on the E. and the hill Ophel on the West. Here lies the 'Virgin's Fount,' ancient Gihon (wh. see), whose waters to-day rise deep under the surface, though once they ran down the valley itself. A little farther on the valley again expands into a considerable open area, where vegetables are now cultivated, and which perhaps was once the 'King's Garden' (wh. see). The Tyropæon Valley, known now as el-Wād, joins the Kidron Valley from the N., and farther on the Wady er-Rababi traditionally Hinnom (wh. see), runs in from the West. The area again narrows at Hir Eyyab, the ancient En-rogel (wh. see), and the valley continues a long winding course under the name of Wady en-Nār ('Valley of Fire') till it reaches the Dead Sea.

There is no doubt whatever that this is the Kidron of the OT and NT. It is interesting that the custom of burying Israelites there, which is observed to-day (see JEHOSHAPHAT [VALLEY OF]), is referred to in 2 K 23⁴, 6, 12, and 2 Ch 34⁸. It is probable that the place of the 'graves of the common people' (Jer 26²³) was also here, and it has been suggested, from a comparison with Jer 31⁴⁰, with less plausibility, that this may have been the scene of Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones (Ezk 37). The 'fields of Kidron' (2 K 23⁴), though generally identified with the open part of the valley when it is joined by the Tyropæon Valley, are more likely to have been the open upper reaches of the valley referred to above as Wady el-Joz, which were on the way to Bethel.

The Valley of the Kidron is mentioned first and last in the Bible at two momentous historical crises,—when David crossed it (2 S 15²³) amid the lamentations of his people as he fled before Absalom, and when Jesus 'went forth with His disciples over the brook Kidron' (Jn 18) for His great and terrible agony before His crucifixion.

KILAN.—Sixty-seven sons of Kilan and Azetas returned with Zerub. (1 Es 5¹⁵); in the lists of Ezr 2 and Neh 7 the names are omitted.

KIN (NEXT OF), KINSMAN, AVENGER OF BLOOD, GOEL.—1. 'Next of kin' is the nearest equivalent in modern jurisprudence of the Heb. gō'el, itself the participle of a verb originally signifying to claim (vindicare), then to buy back. The duties devolving on the goel belonged to the domain both of civil and of criminal law. If a Hebrew, for example, were reduced to selling a part, or the whole, of his property, it was the duty of his next of kin to purchase the property, if it was in his power to do so. The classical instance of the exercise of this 'right of redemption' is the case of the prophet Jeremiah, who purchased the property of his cousin Hanamel in Anathoth, on being asked to do so in virtue of his relationship (Jer 32^{6ff.}). Similarly, should a sale have actually taken place, the right of redemption fell to 'his kinsman that is next to him' (Lv 25²⁵). The case of Naomi and 'the parcel of land' belonging to her deceased husband was complicated by the presence of Ruth, who went with the property, for Ru 4⁸ must read 'thou must buy also Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead. The true goel accordingly transferred his rights to Boaz, who came next to him in the degree of relationship. In all these cases the underlying idea is that the land is the inalienable property of the clan or 'family' (Ru 2¹) in the wider sense.

The duties of the goel, however, extended not merely to the property but also to the person of a relative. Should the latter have been compelled by misfortune to sell himself as a slave, it fell to his next of kin to redeem him. Hence arose an extensive use of the verb and its participle in a figurative sense, by which J' is represented as a goel (EV redeemer), and Israel as His redeemed (so esp. in Is 41¹⁴ 43¹⁴ and oft.).

2. The most serious of all the duties incumbent on the goel, in earlier times more particularly, was that of avenging the murder of a relative. In this capacity he was known as the avenger of blood (gō'el had-dām). The practice of blood-revenge is one of the most widely spread customs of human society, and is by no means confined to the Semitic races, although it is still found in full vigour among the modern Arabs. By the Bedouin of the Sinaitic peninsula, for instance, the hereditary vendetta is kept up to the fifth generation (see the interesting details given in Lord Cromer's Report on Egypt, 1906, 13 ff.).

In primitive times, therefore, if a Hebrew was slain, it was the sacred duty of his next of kin to avenge his blood by procuring the death of his slayer. This, it must be emphasized, was in no sense a matter of private vengeance. It was the affair of the whole clan, and even tribe, of the murdered man (2 S 14⁷), the former, as it were, delegating its rights to the nearest relatives. Hebrew legislation sought to limit the application, and generally to regulate the exercise, of this principle of a life for a life. Thus the Book of the Covenant removes from its application the case of accidental homicide (Ex 21¹²; cf. Dt 19¹⁻¹³, Nu 35⁹⁻³⁰), while the legislation of Dt. further restricts the sphere of the vendetta to the actual criminal (Dt 24¹⁶). In the older legislation the local high places appear as asylums for the manslayer, until his case should be proved to be one of wilful murder, when he was handed over to the relatives of the man he had slain (Ex 21¹² 14). With the abolition of the local sanctuaries by the reforms of Josiah it was necessary to appoint certain special sanctuaries, which are known as cities of refuge (see REFUGE [CITIES OF]).

An interesting feature of the regulations concerning blood-revenge among the Hebrews is the almost total absence (cf. Ex 21¹⁰) of any legal provision for compounding with the relatives of the murdered man by means of a money payment, the poine of the Greeks (see Butcher and Lang's tr. of the Odyssey, 408 ff.) and the wergerd of Saxon and Old English law.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KINAH.—A town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15²²). The site is unknown. Cf. KENITES.

KINDNESS.—The pattern of all kindness is set before us in the Bible in the behaviour of God to our race. He gives the sunshine and the rain, and fruitful seasons and glad hearts, food and all the good they have to the just and the unjust alike (Mt 5⁴⁵ 7¹¹, Ac 14¹⁷). Put the exceeding wealth of His grace is shown unto us in kindness toward us in Christ Jesus (Eph 2⁷). God's glory no man can look upon and live. It is a light that no man can approach unto. It is inconceivably great, incomprehensibly grand, unimaginably exalted above the grasp of man's mind. But the kindness of God is God's glory stooping to man's need. It is God's power brought within man's reach. It is God's mercy and God's love and God's grace flowing through time and through eternity, as broad as the race, as deep as man's need, as long as man's immortality. The Bible reveals it. Jesus incarnated it. In His life the kindness of God found its supreme manifestation (Tit 3⁷). All the children of God are to be like the Father in this regard (Mt 5⁴⁸, Ro 12¹⁰, Col 3¹²⁻¹⁴). The philanthropy of God (Tit 3⁴) is to be reproduced in the philanthropy of men (2 P 1⁷).

D. A. HAYES.

KING.—1. Etymology and use of the term.—The Heb. name for 'king' (melek) is connected with an Assy. root meaning 'advise,' 'counsel,' 'rule,' and it seems to have first signified 'the wise man,' the 'counsellor,' and then 'the ruler.' The root occurs in the names of several Semitic deities, e.g. Molech, the tribal god of the Ammonites, and the Phoen. Melkarth. In the days of Abraham we find the title 'king' applied to the rulers of the city-states of Palestine, e.g. Sodom, Gomorrah, etc. (Gn 14²). We also find references to kings in all the countries bordering on Canaan—Syria, Moab, Ammon, Egypt, etc., and in later times Assyria, Babylonia and Persia. In the NT the title 'king' is applied to the vassal-king Herod (Mt 2¹, Lk 1⁵) and to Agrippa (Ac 25¹³). In the Psalms and the Prophets God Himself is constantly designated 'King of Israel' or 'my King' (e.g. Is 43¹⁵ 44⁵, Ps 10¹⁶ 24⁷. 9. 8. 10 44⁴ 74¹² 84³ etc.), and the Messianic advent of the true King of the Kingdom of God is predicted (Zec 9⁹, Is 32¹ etc.). In the NT Christ is represented as the fulfilment of this prophecy and as the true King of God's Kingdom (cf. Jn 18³⁶ 37, 1 Ti 6¹⁸, Rev 17¹⁴).

2. The office of king in Israel.—(1) Institution. The settlement of the people of Israel in Canaan, and the change from a nomadic to an agricultural life, laid the incumers open to ever fresh attacks from new adventurers. Thus in the time of the judges we find Israel ever liable to hostile invasion. In order to preserve the nation from extermination, it became necessary that a closer connexion and a more intimate bond of union should exist between the different tribes. The judges in the period subsequent to the settlement seem, with the possible exception of Gideon (Jg 8²), to have been little more than local or tribal heroes, carrying on guerilla warfare against their neighbours. The successes of the warlike Philistines made it clear to patriotic minds that the tribes must be more closely connected, and that a permanent leader in war was a necessity. Accordingly Saul the Benjamite was anointed by Samuel (1 S 10¹), and appointed by popular acclamation (10¹⁹ 11¹⁴). The exploits of Saul and his sons against the Ammonites (11¹⁶), against the Amalekites (15⁷), and against the Philistines (14¹⁸) showed the value of the kingly office; and when Saul and his sons fell on Mt. Gilboa, it was not long till David the outlaw chief of Judah was invited to fill his place.

KING

(2) The duties of the king are partly indicated by the history of the rise of the kingship. The king was (a) leader in war. He acted as general, and in person led the troops to battle (cf. Saul on Mt. Gilboa, 1 S 31²; Ahab at Ramoth-gilead, 1 K 22^{28f.}). By and by a standing army grew up, and fortresses were placed on the frontiers (cf. 1 K 12^{21f.}, 2 Ch 17²). (b) Besides being leader of the army in war, the king was the supreme judge (cf. 2 S 14¹⁵, 1 K 3¹⁶). Before the institution of the monarchy judicial functions were exercised by the heads of the various houses—the elders. These elders were gradually replaced by officials appointed by the king (2 Ch 19¹¹), and the final appeal was to the king himself, who in Am 2⁹ is called 'the judge.' (c) Further, according to the usual Semitic conception, the king was also the chief person from a religious point of view. This idea has been lost sight of by later Jewish writers, but there is little doubt that in early times the king regarded himself as the supreme religious director, the chief priest. Thus Saul sacrifices in Samuel's absence (1 S 13⁹⁻¹¹ 14^{22f.}), so also David (2 S 6¹³, 17 24²⁵); while both David and Solomon seem to appoint and dismiss the chief priest at pleasure (cf. 2 S 8¹⁷, 1 K 2²⁶, 27 28), and both bless the people (2 S 6¹⁸, 1 K 8¹⁴). Jeroboam sacrifices in person before the altar in Bethel (1 K 12²² 23), and Ahab orders a special altar to be made, and offers in person on it (2 K 16¹⁷). In later times, however, the priestly functions of the kings were less frequently exercised, priests being appointed, who are usually regarded as royal officials and numbered among other civil servants (2 S 20²³).

(3) The kingship hereditary. It was a fixed idea in ancient Israel that the office of the kingship passed from father to son, as the judgeship passed from Gideon to his sons (Jg 9⁷), or from Samuel to his sons (1 S 8¹). Although Saul was chosen by the people and David invited by the elders of Judah to be king, yet Saul himself regarded it as the natural thing that Jonathan should succeed him (1 S 20^{30f.}). Adonijah assumed that, as David's son, he had a right to the throne (1 K 2¹³), and even the succession of his younger half-brother Solomon was secured without any popular election. It is impossible to speak of an elective monarchy in Israel. The succession in Judah remained all along in the house of David, and in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes father always succeeded son, unless violence and revolution destroyed the royal house and brought a new adventurer to the throne.

(4) Power of the king. While the monarchy in Israel differed considerably from other Oriental despotisms, it could not be called a limited monarchy in our sense of the term. The king's power was limited by the fact that, to begin with, the royal house differed little from other chief houses of the nation. Saul, even after his election, resided on his ancestral estate, and came forth only as necessity called him (cf. 1 S 11^{4f.}). On the one hand, law and ancient custom exercised considerable restraint on the kings; while, on the other hand, acts of despotic violence were allowed to pass unquestioned. A powerful ruler like David or Solomon was able to do much that would have been impossible for a weakling like Rehoboam. Solomon was practically an Oriental despot, who ground down the people by taxation and forced labour. David had the power to compass the death of Uriah and take his wife, but public opinion, as expressed by the prophets, exerted a considerable influence on the kings (cf. Nathan and David, Elijah and Ahab). The idea was never lost sight of that the office was instituted for the good of the nation, and that it ought to be a help, not a burden, to the people at large. Law and ancient custom were, in the people's minds, placed before the kingly authority. Naboth can refuse to sell his vineyard to Ahab, and the king is unable to compel him, or to appropriate it till Naboth has been regularly condemned before a judicial tribunal (1 K 21^{1f.}). Thus the king himself was under law (cf. Dt. 17¹⁴⁻²⁰), and he does not seem to have had the power to promulgate new enactments. Josiah bases his reform not on a new law, but on the newly found Book of the Law (2 K 23¹⁻³), to which he and the elders swear allegiance.

(5) Royal income. The early kings, Saul and David, do not seem to have subjected the people to heavy taxation. Saul's primitive court would be supported by his ancestral estate and by the booty taken from the enemy, perhaps along with presents, more or less compulsory, from his friends or subjects (1 S 10²⁷ 16²⁰). The census taken by David (2 S 24¹) was probably intended as a basis for taxation, as was also Solomon's division of the land into twelve districts (1 K 4⁷). Ezekiel (45⁷, 48²) speaks of crown lands, and such seem to have been held by David (1 Ch 27^{28f.}). The kings in the days of Amos laid claim to the first cutting of grass for the royal horses (Am 7¹). Caravans passing from Egypt to Damascus paid toll (1 K 10¹⁶), and in the days of Solomon foreign trade by sea seems to have been a royal monopoly (1 K 10¹⁹). It is not quite certain whether anything of the nature of a land tax or property tax existed, though something of this kind may be referred to in the reward promised by Saul to the slayer of Goliath (1 S 17²⁹); and it may have been the tenth mentioned in 1 S 8¹⁵ 17. Special taxes seem to have been imposed to meet special emergencies (cf. 2 K 23³⁶), and the kings of Judah made free use of the Temple treasures.

(6) Royal officials have the general title 'princes' (sārīm). These included (a) the commander-in-chief, 'the captain of the host,' who in the absence of the king commanded the army (e.g. Joab, 2 S 12²⁷). (b) The prefect of the royal bodyguard, the leader of the 'mighty men of valour' of AV (in David's time the Cherethites and Pelethites, 2 S 8¹⁸ 20²³). (c) The 'recorder,' lit. 'one who calls to remembrance.' His functions are nowhere defined, but he seems to have held an influential position, and was probably the chief minister, the Grand Vizier of modern times (cf. 2 S 8¹⁸, 2 K 18²⁶). (d) The 'scribe' (sōphēr) frequently mentioned along with the 'recorder' seems to have attended to the royal correspondence, and to have been the Chancellor or rather Secretary of State (2 K 18¹⁸, 37, 2 Ch 34⁶). (e) The officer who was 'over the tribute' (2 S 20²⁴) seems to have superintended the forced labour and the collecting of the taxes. (f) The governor of the royal household, the royal steward or High Chamberlain, seems to have held an important position in the days of the later monarchy (Is 36³, 22²¹). Mention is also made of several minor officials, such as the 'king's servant' (2 K 22¹²), the 'king's friend' (1 K 4⁶), the 'king's counsellor' (1 Ch 27²³), the 'head of the wardrobe' (2 K 22¹⁴), the head of the eunuchs (AV 'officers,' 1 S 8¹⁵), the 'governor of the city' (1 K 22²⁸). We hear much from the prophets of the oppression and injustice practised by these officials on the poor of the land (cf. Am 2⁶, 7, Is 5⁴, Jer 5²⁸, Mic 3¹ etc.).

W. F. BOYD.

KINGDOM OF GOD (or HEAVEN).—The Biblical writers assume that the Creator of the heavens and the earth must needs be also the everlasting Ruler of the same. The universe is God's dominion, and every creature therein is subject to His power. And so the Hebrew poets conceive God as immanent in all natural phenomena. Wind and storm, fire and earthquake, lightnings and torrents of waters are but so many signs of the activity of the Almighty Ruler of the world (Ps 18¹⁻¹⁸ 68⁷⁻¹⁸ 104). The same heavenly Power is also the supreme Sovereign of men and nations. 'The kingdom is Jehovah's, and he is the ruler over the nations' (Ps 22⁸). 'Jehovah is king over all the earth' (Zec 14⁹). 'He sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers. . . He bringeth princes to nothing' (Is 40²²). This general idea of God's dominion over all things receives various forms of statement from the various Biblical writers, and the entire presentation constitutes a most important portion of the revelation of God and of Christ. But the Biblical doctrine has its OT and NT setting.

1. In the Old Testament.—Apart from that general concept of God as Maker and Governor of the whole world, the OT writers emphasize the Divine care for individuals, families, tribes, and nations of men. It is God's rule over those creatures who exist in His own image and likeness that calls for our special study, and this great truth is manifest from various points of view. (1) From Am 9⁷ we learn that Jehovah is the supreme Ruler of all the peoples: Syrians, Philistines, Ethiopians, as well as the tribes of Israel, were led by Him and settled in their separate lands. So He gave all the nations their inheritance (Dt 32⁸). But one most conspicuous feature of the OT revelation is God's selection of Abraham and his posterity to be made a blessing to all the families of the earth. When this peculiar family had become a numerous people in the land of Egypt, God led them marvelously out of that house of bondage and adopted them to be 'a people for his own possession above all peoples upon the face of the earth' (Dt 7⁶), and 'a kingdom of priests and a holy nation' (Ex 19⁶). The subsequent facts of the history of this chosen people reveal a noteworthy aspect of the Kingdom of God among men. (2) Along with this idea of the election and special guidance of this people there was gradually developed a lofty doctrine of the Person and power of the God of Israel. Out of the unique and sublime monolatry, which worshipped Jehovah as greatest of all the gods (Ex 15¹¹ 18¹¹), there issued the still higher and broader monotheism of the great prophets, who denied the real existence of any other God or Saviour besides the Holy One of Israel. He was conceived as seated on a lofty throne, surrounded with holy seraphs and the innumerable hosts of heaven. For naturally the highest embodiment of personal power and glory and dominion known among men, namely, that of a splendid royalty, was employed as the best figure of the glory of the heavenly King; and so we have the impressive apocalyptic portraiture of Jehovah sitting upon His throne, high and lifted up (Is 6¹⁻³, Ezk 1²⁶⁻²⁸, 1 K 22¹⁹). The mighty Monarch of earth and heaven was enthroned in inexpressible majesty and glory, and no power above or below the heavens could compare with Him. (3) This concept of the heavenly King became also enlarged so as to include the idea of a righteous Judge of all the earth. This idea appears conspicuously in the vision of Dn 7¹², where the Eternal is seen upon His throne of fiery flames, with ten thousand times ten thousand ministering before Him. His execution of judgment is as a stream of fire which issues from His presence and devours His adversaries. Zeph 3⁸ also represents Him as 'gathering the nations and assembling the kingdoms,' in order to pour out upon them the fire of His fierce anger. And so in prophecy, in psalm, and in historical narrative we find numerous declarations of Jehovah about His entering into judgment with the nations and also with His own people. The unmistakable doctrine of all these Scriptures is that God is the supreme Judge and Ruler of the world. His overthrow of mighty cities and kingdoms, like Nineveh and Babylon, is a way of His 'executing judgment in the earth,' and the prophets call such a national catastrophe a 'day of Jehovah.' (4) The Messianic prophecies throw further light on the OT doctrine of the Kingdom of God. From the times of David and Solomon onwards the highest ideal of 'the Anointed of Jehovah' was that of a powerful and righteous king of Israel. The name of David became a synonym of the ideal king and shepherd of the Chosen People (Hos 3³, Jer 30⁹, Ezk 34²³ 37²⁴). These ideals became the growing Messianic hope of Israel. According to Is 9⁶⁻⁷, the child of wonderful names is to sit 'upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it in judgment and in righteousness for ever.' In Ps 2 we have a dramatic picture of Jehovah establishing His Son as King upon Zion, and in Ps 110 the conquering hero, to whom Jehovah says, 'Sit thou at my right hand until I make thy enemies thy footstool,' unites in Himself the threefold office of king, priest, and judge. (5) In all these and in other Messianic scriptures we should notice that the Anointed of Jehovah is an exalted associate of the Most High. He executes judgment in the earth, but he himself possesses no wisdom or power to act apart from Jehovah. We also note the fact that God's dominion over the earth is entirely compatible with divers forms of human administration. Ambitious potentates may usurp authority, and think to change times and seasons, but sooner or later they come to nought. Though Nebuchadrezzar, Cyrus, or Alexander wield for a time the sceptre of the world, it is still true 'that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will' (Dn 4³⁷). 'He removeth kings and setteth up kings' (Dn 2²¹). When Israel desired a king like other nations, Samuel charged them with rejecting God as their King (1 S 8⁷); but such rejection, of God and the anointing of Saul for their king did not remove Jehovah from actual dominion over them; and the prophet himself admonished all Israel to fear and obey Jehovah lest He should consume both them and their king (1 S 12¹⁶⁻²³). And when, according to the apocalyptic imagery of Dn 7¹³⁻¹⁴, the 'one like unto a son of man' receives the kingdom from 'the Ancient of days,' it is not to be supposed that the Most High Himself is for a moment to abdicate His throne in the heavens, or cease to rule over all the kingdoms of men. (6) It is not given us to determine how fully or how clearly any OT prophet or psalmist conceived the real nature of the future Messianic Kingdom. It is not usually given to the prophets of great oracles to know the time and manner of the fulfilment, and such ideals as those of Mic 4¹⁻⁵ and Is 11¹⁻¹⁰ may have been variously understood. The advent of the Messianic Son of David, expected among the seed of Abraham, would naturally be conceived as introducing a new era in the history of the people of God. He would not rule apart from Jehovah, or exercise a different authority; for the Kingdom of Messiah would also be the Kingdom of God. But it would naturally be expected that the Messiah would introduce new powers, new agencies, and new enlightenment for a blessing to all the families of the earth. According to Is 65¹⁷ 66²², the new era was conceived as the creation of a new heavens and a new earth, but the prophetic language and its context do not justify the opinion that the dawn of the new era must needs be ushered in along with physical changes in the earth and the heavens, or involve any physical change in the natural constitution of man on the earth.

2. In the New Testament.—In presenting the NT doctrine of the Kingdom of God we should notice (1) the prevalent expectation of the Messiah at the time Jesus was born. There was no exact uniformity of belief or of expectation. Some enthusiasts looked for a warlike chieftain, gifted with an ability of leadership, to cast off the Roman yoke and restore the kingdom of Israel to some such splendour as it had in the days of Solomon. Others seem to have entertained a more spiritual view, as Zacharias, Simeon, and Anna (Lk 1⁶⁷⁻⁷⁹ 2²⁶⁻³⁸), and to have united the general hope of the redemption of Jerusalem with the blessed thought of confirming the ancient covenants of promise, obtaining remission of sins, personal consolation, and a life of holiness. Between these two extremes there were probably various other forms of expectation, but the more popular one was that of a temporal prince. John the Baptist shared somewhat in this current belief, and seems to have been disappointed in the failure of Jesus to fulfil his concept of the Messianic hope (Mt 11³⁻⁴). Nevertheless, John's ministry and preaching evinced much spiritual penetration, and his baptism of repentance was a Divinely appointed preparation for the Kingdom of heaven which he declared was close at hand.

(2) The chief source of the NT doctrine is the teaching of Jesus Christ Himself. His preaching and that of His first disciples announced the Kingdom of heaven as at hand (Mt 4¹⁷, Mk 1¹⁵). Such a proclamation could have meant to the hearers only that the reign of the Messiah, of whom the prophets had spoken, was about to begin. The real nature of this Kingdom, however, is to be learned only by a careful study of the various sayings of Jesus upon the subject. (a) It should first be observed that our Lord gave no sanction to the current Jewish expectation of a temporal prince, who would fight for dominion and exercise worldly forms of power. He did not directly oppose the prevalent belief, so as to provoke opposition, but sought rather to inculcate a more spiritual and heavenly conception of the Kingdom. His views were evidently different from those of John, for while He extolled him as His immediate forerunner, 'much more than a prophet,' and 'greatest among them that are born of women,' He declared that any one who 'is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt 11¹¹). With all his greatness John was but a Jewish prophet, and never passed beyond the necessary limitations of the pre-Messianic age. (b) The spiritual and heavenly character of the Kingdom is indicated, and indeed emphasized, by the phrase 'kingdom of heaven.' This accords with the statement that the Kingdom is not of this world (Jn 18³⁶), and cometh not with observation (Lk 17²⁰). It belongs, therefore, to the unseen and the spiritual. It is the special boon of the 'poor in spirit,' 'persecuted for righteousness' sake, and whose righteousness shall 'exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees' (Mt 5^{3, 10, 20}). The great ones in this Kingdom are such as become like little children (Mt 18³), and as to rulership and authority, the greatest is he who acts as the minister and bond-servant of all (Mk 10^{43, 44}).

It may be noticed that the phrase 'kingdom of heaven' (or 'of the heavens') is peculiar to the Gospel of Matthew, in which it occurs about thirty times. In 2 Ti 4¹⁸ we read of 'his heavenly kingdom,' but elsewhere the term employed is 'kingdom of God.' There is no good reason to doubt that Jesus Himself made use of all these expressions, and we should not look to find any recondite or peculiar significance in any one of them. The phrase 'kingdom of God' occurs also four times in Mt., and often in the other Gospels and in the Acts and Epistles. We may also compare, for illustration and suggestion, 'my Father's kingdom' (Mt 26²⁹), 'my heavenly Father' (Mt 15¹³), and observe in the parallel texts of Mt 26²⁹, Mk 14³⁶, Lk 22²⁹, the interchangeable use of 'my Father's kingdom,' 'my kingdom,' and 'the kingdom of God.' All these designations indicate that the Kingdom is heavenly in its origin and nature.

(c) The parables of Jesus are especially important for learning the nature and mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven. They show in many ways that the heavenly Kingdom has to do with the spiritual nature and possibilities of man, and is, in fact, the dominion of Jesus Christ over the hearts of men. They show also that the Kingdom has its necessary collective and communal relations, for the same ethical principles which are to govern an individual life have also their manifold application to the life of a community and of all organized societies of men. Several of our Lord's parables indicate a judicial transfer of the Kingdom of heaven from the Jews to the Gentiles (Mt 21⁴³ 22¹⁻¹⁴, Lk 14¹⁶⁻²⁴). The parable of the Two Sons warned the Jewish priests and elders that publicans and harlots might go into the Kingdom of God before them (Mt 21²⁸⁻³²). From all this it is evident that the Kingdom of heaven includes the dispensation of heavenly grace and redemption which was inaugurated and is now continuously carried forward by the Lord Jesus. It is essentially spiritual, and its holy mysteries of regeneration and the righteousness of faith can be only spiritually discerned. (d) The important petitions in the Lord's prayer, 'Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth,' are of great value in determining the nature of the Kingdom. This prayer assumes by its very terms a moral and spiritual relationship and the ideal of a moral order in the universe of God. As the word 'kingdom' implies an organized community, so the will of God implies in those who do it a conformity to God in spiritual nature and action. The coming Kingdom is not a material worldly establishment, but it has its foundations in the unseen and eternal, and its power and growth will become manifest among men and nations according as the will of God is done on earth as it is in heaven. The performance of all that the will of God requires in moral beings may vary in degrees of perfect observance in heaven and in earth; we naturally predicate of heavenly things a measure of perfection far above that of earthly things. But the members of the Kingdom of God, whether on earth or in heaven, have this in common, that they all do the will of the heavenly Father. (e) So far as the Gospel of John supplies additional teachings of Jesus concerning the Kingdom of God, it is in essential harmony with what we find in the Synoptics, but it has its own peculiar methods of statement. We read in 3^{3, 5}, 'Except a man be born from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' The Kingdom, then, is not a spectacle of worldly vision, but has to do first of all with the inner life of man. It accords with this, that in 8²³ and 18³⁶, Jesus says, 'I am from above; I am not of this world: My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews.' To one of Pilate's questions Jesus answered, 'I am a king: to this end have I been born, and to this end am I come into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice' (18³⁷). So Christ's Kingdom comes not forth out of the world, but is of heavenly origin. It makes no display of military forces or carnal weapons for establishing its dominion in the world. It is especially remarkable in being a Kingdom of truth. This conception is peculiarly Johannine, for in the first Epistle also Jesus Christ is set forth as the embodiment and revelation of the truth of God (1 Jn 3^{18, 19} 5²⁰; cf. Jn 11⁷ 8²² 14⁶ 17¹⁷). Jesus Christ is the heavenly King who witnesses to the truth, and whose servants know, love, and obey the truth of God.

(3) In the Pauline Epistles the Kingdom of God is represented as the blessed spiritual inheritance of all who enjoy life in God through faith in Jesus Christ. Its spiritual character is obvious from Ro 14¹⁷, where, in discussing questions of conscience touching meats and drinks, it is said that 'the kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.' So it is not a dominion that concerns itself about ceremonial pollutions; it grasps rather after the attainment of all spiritual blessings. It is impossible for the unrighteous and idolaters, and thieves and extortioners, and such like, to inherit this Kingdom (1 Co 6^{9, 10}, Gal 5²¹, Eph 5⁹).

(4) Other portions of the NT add somewhat to this doctrine of the Kingdom, but offer no essentially different ideal. In He 12²⁸ mention is made of our 'receiving a kingdom that cannot be shaken.' The context speaks of the removal of some things that were of a nature to be shaken, and the allusion is to the old fabric of defunct Judaism, which was a cult of burdensome ritual, and had become 'old and aged and nigh unto vanishing away' (8¹³). These temporary things and their 'sanctuary of this world,' which were at the most only 'a copy and shadow of the heavenly things,' must needs be shaken down and pass away in order that the immovable Kingdom of heaven might be revealed and abide as an 'eternal inheritance.' The old Jerusalem and its temporary cult must pass away and give place to 'the heavenly Jerusalem,' which affords personal communion and fellowship with God and Christ, and innumerable hosts of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect (12²²⁻²⁴).

(5) Eschatological elements of the NT doctrine.—Questions of the time and manner of the coming of the Kingdom arise from the various sayings of Jesus and of the NT writers, which have seemed difficult to harmonize. From the point of view both of Jesus and of the first Apostles, the Kingdom of heaven was nigh at hand, but not yet come. The coming of the Kingdom is also associated with the Parousia, or coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven, the resurrection, and the final judgment of all men and nations. Jesus spoke of 'the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory' (Mt 19²⁸). His great eschatological discourse, reported in all the Synoptics (Mt 24, Mk 13, Lk 21), represents His coming and the end of the age as in the near future, before that generation should pass. It also clearly makes the sublime Parousia follow immediately after the woes attending the ruin of the city and Temple of Jerusalem. Also in Mt 16²⁸ and the parallels in Mk. and Lk. Jesus declares emphatically, 'There are some of them that stand here who shall in no wise taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' The exegetical problem is to show how these statements may be adjusted to the idea of a gradually growing power and dominion which appears in Daniel's vision of the stone which 'became a great mountain and filled the whole earth' (2³⁵), and is also implied in Jesus' parables of the Mustard Seed, the Leaven, and the Seed Growing Secretly,—'first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear' (Mk 4²⁸⁻²⁹). The problem is also complicated by the fact that nearly two thousand years have passed since these words of Jesus were spoken, and 'the end of the world' is not yet. Of the many attempts at the explanation of these difficulties we here mention only three.

(a) A considerable number of modern critics adopt the hypothesis that these various sayings of Jesus were misunderstood by those who heard Him, and have been reported in a confused and self-contradictory manner. The disciples confounded the fall of the Temple with the end of all things, but Jesus probably distinguished the two events in a way that does not now appear in the records. Some critics suppose that fragments of a small Jewish apocalypse have been incorporated in Mt 24. This hypothesis makes it the chief work of the expositor to analyze the different elements of the Evangelical tradition and reconstruct the sayings of Jesus which are supposed to be genuine. The result of such a process naturally includes a considerable amount of conjecture, and leaves the various eschatological sayings of Jesus in a very untrustworthy condition.

(b) According to another class of expositors, the prophecies of Mt 24 contain a double sense, the primary reference being to the fall of Jerusalem, whereas the ultimate fulfilment, of which the first is a sort of type, is to take place at the Second Coming of Christ and the end of the world. It is conceded that the two events are closely conjoined, but it is thought that vv. 1-28 deal mainly with the former event, and from v. 29 onwards the lesser subject is swallowed up by the greater, and the statements made refer mainly to the still future coming of the Lord. But scarcely any two interpreters, who adopt the double-sense theory, agree in their exposition of the different parts of the chapter.

(c) Another method of explaining and adjusting the teaching of Jesus and of all the NT statements about the coming of Christ, the resurrection and the judgment, is to understand all these related events as part and parcel of an age-long process. 'The end of the age,' according to this view, is not the close of the Christian era, but the end or consummation of the pre-Messianic age. The coming of the Kingdom of God, according to Jesus (Lk 17²⁰) is not a matter of physical observation, so that one could point it out and say, 'Lo, it is here!' or, 'Lo, it is there!' Like the lightning it may appear in the east or in the west, or anywhere under the whole heaven, at one and the same moment of time. Nevertheless, no reported sayings of Christ are more positive or more notably reiterated than His declarations that some of His contemporaries would live to 'see the kingdom of God come with power,' and that 'this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled.' The decisive end of an era or dispensation or a particular cult may be seen to be near at hand, sure to come within a generation, for 'that which is becoming old and waxeth aged is nigh unto vanishing away' (He 8¹³); but the coming of a kingdom and power and glory which belongs to the things unseen, heavenly and eternal, is not of a nature to be limited to a given day or hour. There need be, then, no contradiction or inconsistency in the sayings of Jesus as they now stand in the Gospels. No great and noteworthy event could more decisively have marked the end of the pre-Messianic age and the Jewish cult than the destruction of the Temple. But 'the powers of the age to come' were manifest before that historic crisis, and 'the times and the seasons' of such spiritual, unseen things are not matters for men or angels or even the Son of God to tell. But the fall of the Temple and the establishment of the New Covenant and the Kingdom of God were so coincident that the two events might well have been thought and spoken of as essentially simultaneous. Accordingly, 'the regeneration' (Mt 19²⁸) and 'the restoration of all things' (Ac 3²¹) are now in actual process. The Son of Man is now sitting on the throne of His glory, at the right hand of God, and 'he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet' (1 Co 15²⁵). Such a Kingdom is essentially millennial, and has its ages of ages for 'making all things new.' Its crises and triumphs are portrayed in terms of apocalyptic prophecy, and so the language of Jesus in Mt 24²⁹⁻³¹ and similar passages in other parts of the NT is to be interpreted as we interpret the same forms of speech in the OT prophets (cf. Is 13⁹⁻¹⁰ 19¹⁻² 34⁴⁻⁵, Dn 7¹³⁻¹⁴).

According to this last interpretation, the Apocalypse of John is but an enlargement of Jesus' discourse on the Mount of Olives, and the descent of the New Jerusalem out of heaven is a visional symbol of the coming of the Kingdom of God, and the continuous answer to the prayer, 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.' The Apostles, like their Lord, thought and spoke of things supernatural and invisible after the manner of the Hebrew prophets. St. Paul's picture of the Lord's coming from heaven (1 Th 4¹⁴⁻¹⁵) is in striking accord with the language of Mt 24²⁹⁻³¹, and yet has its own peculiar points of difference. In Ro 16²⁰ he speaks of 'the God of peace "bruising Satan" under your feet shortly,' and in 2 Th 2¹⁻¹² he teaches that the Antichrist, 'the man of sin,' is destined to be destroyed by the manifestation of the coming of the Lord Jesus. It was probably not given to the Apostle to understand that what he saw in the vision of a moment would occupy millenniums. In his forms of statement we may discern survivals of his Jewish modes of thought, and a failure to distinguish the times and seasons and methods in which the Kingdom of heaven is ultimately to overcome the prince of the powers of wickedness in high places. But in all essentials of content his prophetic picture of the coming and triumph is true to fact and to the teaching of the Lord Himself. St. Paul also speaks of the Kingdom of God as an inheritance. It is in part a present possession, but it contemplates also a future eternal blessedness. The redeemed 'shall reign in life through Jesus Christ.' Our heavenly Father 'makes us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, delivers us out of the power of darkness and translates us into the kingdom of the Son of his love' (Col 1¹²⁻¹³). Such heirs of God are 'sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, unto the redemption of God's own possession' (Eph 1¹⁴). According to this conception of the heavenly Kingdom, Christ is now upon His throne and continuously making all things new. His Parousia is millennial. He is drawing all men unto Himself, and the resurrection of the dead is as continuous as His own heavenly reign. Whenever 'the earthly house' of any one of His servants is dissolved, he has a new habitation from God, 'a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens' (2 Co §-10). Each man must have his own last day, and each one be made manifest and answer for himself before the judgment-seat of Christ. And when all things are ultimately put in subjection unto the Christ, then also shall the Son of God Himself have perfected His redemptive reign, and God shall be all in all. M. S. TERRY.

KINGS, BOOKS OF.—1. Title, etc.—This is the name of two well-known narrative books of the OT. In Heb. MSS and early printed editions they appear as one book, and even to the present day the Massoretic note appears at the end of the second book only. The division into two was made for the convenience of Greek readers, and passed from the LXX to the Vulgate, and so to the Church. In fact, the division between the parts of the great Biblical narrative which extends from Genesis to 2 Kings is more or less arbitrary,—there is no clear line of demarcation between 2 Samuel and 1 Kings, any more than between 1 and 2 Kings.

2. Method and sources.—What we have just said does not imply that the Books of Kings are exactly like the other historical books. They differ in their method, and in the way in which the narrative is presented. The most striking feature is the attempt to date the events recorded, and to keep two parallel lines of history before the reader. The period of time they cover is something over 400 years, and when it is remembered that these books give us almost the only light we have on events in Israel for this period, their historical value will be evident. At the same time, the light they throw on the method by which the Biblical authors worked is almost equally great. To estimate the historical value, it will be necessary to look at the literary method. The phenomenon which first strikes the reader's attention is the unevenness of the narrative. In some cases we have an extended and detailed story; in others a long period of time is dismissed in a few words. The reign of Solomon occupies eleven chapters—about a fourth part of the work; while the longer reign of Manasseh is disposed of in sixteen verses. From our point of view there is reason to think that the reign of Manasseh was quite as interesting and quite as important as the other.

Still closer examination shows that there are well-marked characteristics of style in certain sections which are replaced by equally marked but totally different ones in other sections. Moreover, there are seemingly contradictory assertions which can hardly have come from the same pen, though they might have occurred in different documents, and have been retained by a compiler who did not fully realize their force. Thus the account of Solomon's forced labour 'raised out of all Israel' seems inconsistent with the other declaration that Solomon made no bond-servants of Israel (1 K 5:13²⁷, cf. 11:2* and 42*). One passage says without qualification that there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all their days; another tells us how Rehoboam gathered a mighty army, but dismissed it at the word of a prophet without making war (1 K 12:21-24 and 14:30). These indications of a compilatory activity, such as we find also in other parts of the OT, are confirmed by the author's reference to some of the books from which he has drawn. Two of these are mentioned so often that they attract the attention of every reader. They are the Books of Annals (in our version 'books of chronicles') of the kings of Israel and of the kings of Judah. To these we may add the references to the Book of the Acts of Solomon. The author had these three books in his hand, and, what is of more importance, he thought his readers were likely to have them at their command. This is the reason why he refers to them—that those readers who are curious for further details may find them in these books. It follows that these sources of his are not the archives of the two kingdoms, but regular books circulated and read among the people at large. But it is clear that other sources were drawn upon.

Some of the material cannot have come from either of the books named. The description of the Temple might supposedly have been embodied in the Acts of Solomon, though this seems improbable. But it is quite certain that the extended life of Elijah and the equally diffuse life of Elisha never had a place in the history of the kings. There must have been a Life of Elijah circulated by some of his disciples or admirers after his death, and the probability is strong that there was also a separate Life of Elisha. Whether these two may not have been embodied in a general work on the Lives of the Prophets, whence the sections which interested him were taken by our author, we may not be able to determine. That these sections did not come from the source with which they are most nearly combined is evident from the difference in tone and point of view. Ahab appears very differently in the Elijah sections and in the chapters which treat of the Syrian wars.

The narratives which deal with Isaiah suggest reflections similar to those which come to us in looking at Elijah and Elisha. They look like portions of a biography of Isaiah. This biography was not our Book of Isaiah, in which some sections are duplicates of what we find in the Second Book of Kings. But other portions of the Book of Isaiah seem to have been drawn from the same Life of Isaiah which furnished the duplicate material of which we have spoken.

Although some of the points that have been touched upon are more or less obscure, we are justified in saying that the Books of Kings are a compilation from at least five separate sources—three which the author cites by name, a Temple chronicle, and a History of the Prophets. The hypothesis of compilation explains some of the discrepancies already noted, and it also explains some of the violent transitions in the narrative. Ch. 20 of 1 Kings is inserted between two passages which belong together, and which were once continuous. This chapter introduces Benhadad as though we knew him, when in fact we have not heard of him. In like manner Elijah appears suddenly in the narrative, without the slightest intimation as to who he is or what he has been doing. These indications confirm the theory of compilation, and they show also that the author has in no case (so far as we can discover) embodied the whole of any one of his sources in his work. He used his freedom according to his main purpose, taking out what suited that purpose and leaving the rest behind.

3. Purpose.—The next inquiry is, What was the purpose which explains the book? In answer to this it is at once seen that the purpose was a religious one. The author was not trying to write history; he was trying to enforce a lesson. For those who were interested in the history as history he gave references to the books in which the history could be found. For himself, there was something more important—this was to point a moral so plainly that his people would take heed to it and act accordingly. This comes to view plainly in the recurring sentences which make up what has been called the framework of the book. These are not always exactly alike—sometimes they are scantier, sometimes they are fuller. But they are the same in purport. A complete example is the following: 'Jehoshaphat reigned over Judah in the fourth year of Ahab, king of Israel. Thirty-five years old was Jehoshaphat when he began to reign; and twenty-five years he reigned in Jerusalem; and his mother's name was Azubah, daughter of Shillai. He walked in all the way of Asa, his father; he turned not from it, doing right in the eyes of Jahweh. Only the high places were not removed,—the people continued sacrificing and offering at the high places. . . . And the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat—and the mighty deeds which he did—are they not written in the Book of Annals of the kings of Judah? . . . And Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David, and Jehoram his son reigned in his stead' (1 K 22:41-42, 44, 46). The first parof this formula is found at the beginning of a reign, the rest at the end. Sometimes there is so little recorded about a king that the two parts come in immediate sequence. But usually they are separated by a narrative, longer or shorter according to what the author thinks fit to give us. The framework itself shows that the author desires to preserve the name of the king, his age at accession, the length of his reign, the name of his mother, who was of course the first lady of the land. These items he was interested in, just because his work would not have been a history without them. But what most interested him was the judgment which he felt justified in pronouncing on the character of the monarch. The very fact that he gives such a judgment in every case shows that he had before him more material than he has handed down to us, for it would have been obviously unjust to pronounce so positively if he had as little ground for his opinion as in many cases he gives to us.

It is important to notice the reference to the high places which comes in immediate sequence to the judgment on the character of the king. The high places in the opinion of later times were illegitimate places of worship. Their toleration casts a shadow on the piety even of kings otherwise commendable, while their destruction is regarded as a proof of religious zeal. What light this throws on the date of the book will appear later. For the present it is sufficient that the treatment of the high places furnishes the ground on which the kings are graded in excellence. The first place is given to Hezekiah and Josiah (who are classed with David), just because they did away with these ancient sanctuaries. The next rank is accorded to Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoash of Judah, Amaziah, Uzziah, and Jotham, and we notice that they all effected certain reforms in the Temple. With reference to each of these, the commendation is tempered by the statement that the high places were not taken away. In the third class we find the remaining kings of Judah, and all the kings of Israel, who are condemned as bad. The formula for the kings of Israel is not quite the same as the one just noticed. For one thing, the name of the queen-mother is not given—whether because the names had not been handed down, or because they were thought to be of minor importance after the destruction of the kingdom, is not clear. The formula may be illustrated by the one used for Baasha,—‘In the third year of Asa king of Judah, Baasha son of Abijah became king over Israel in Tirzah, (and reigned) twenty-four years. He did evil in the eyes of Jahweh, and he walked in the ways of Jeroboam, and in his sin by which he made Israel sin. . . . And the rest of the affairs of Baasha, and what he did, and his power, are they not written in the Book of Annals of the kings of Israel? And Baasha slept with his fathers and was buried in Tirzah, and Elah his son reigned in his stead’ (1 K 15^{23f}. 16¹). The reason given for the condemnation which is visited on all the kings of the Northern Kingdom is that they walked in the ways of Jeroboam, i.,—that is, they fostered the worship of the golden bulls (calves they are called in derision) at Bethel and Dan. This is, in the eyes of the author, distinct rebellion against the God whose legitimate sanctuary is at Jerusalem.

While the longer quotations from his sources usually show the compiler's religious intent, yet he often presents us with brief notices for which he is probably indebted to the Books of Annals, but which have no very direct bearing on his main object. Thus in the case of Jehoshaphat he inserts in his framework a brief notice to the effect that this king made peace with Israel. In the three-membered contest between Zimri, Tibni, and Omri (1 K 16¹⁵⁻²²) he compresses the story of a prolonged civil war into a few lines. In the case of Omri we find a brief notice to the effect that this king built the city of Samaria, having bought the land from a man named Shemer (1 K 16²⁴). Such a notice probably compresses a detailed account in which Omri was glorified as the founder of the capital.

As some of these shorter notices duplicate what we find elsewhere, it seems as if the compiler made out his framework or epitome first and filled it in with his excerpts afterwards. In the insertion of these longer passages the religious motive is always apparent. The matter of supreme importance to him is the worship of the God of Israel as carried on at the Temple in Jerusalem. He is under the influence known as Deuteronomistic. This is seen first in the phrases which recur in those sections which we suspect to be his own composition. In many cases it is not possible to say whether these sections come from the hand of the compiler or whether they were inserted by one of his followers. This is, in fact, of minor importance,—if various hands have been concerned they worked under the same bias. The attitude taken towards the high places is distinctly Deuteronomistic, for the demand that these sanctuaries should be abolished was first formulated by Deuteronomy. Josiah's reforms, as is well known, were the direct result of the finding of this book in the Temple. Hence the strong, we might say extravagant, commendation of this king.

Moreover, it was laid down by the writer of Deuteronomy that obedience to the law which he formulates will be followed by temporal well-being, and that disobedience will be punished by calamity. Now, one object of the writer or compiler of the Book of Kings is to show how this has proved true in the past. He is less thorough in the application of this theory than the author of the Book of Chronicles, but that he has it at heart will be evident on examination. The Northern Kingdom had perished—why? Because kings and people had from the first been disobedient to Jahweh, revolting from His legitimate sanctuary at Jerusalem, and provoking His wrath by the bulls of Bethel. In Judah the same lesson is taught. David, who laid the foundations of the kingdom, was of unusual piety, and was favoured by unusual prosperity. Solomon was the builder of the Temple, and to this extent an example of piety; his prosperity was in proportion. But there were shadows in the picture of Solomon which our author was too honest to ignore. It had not been forgotten that this king built altars to foreign gods. History also told that he had suffered by the revolt of Edom and Damascus. It was easy to see in this the punishment for the king's sins. The historic fact seems to be that the revolt preceded the defection, so that the punishment came before the crime. In any case, the compiler has dealt freely with his material, dating both the defection and the revolt late in the king's reign, at a time when senile weakness would excuse the wise man for yielding to his wiles.

The most distinct instance in which the author teaches his lesson is the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple. It was the custom with ancient historians, as we know, to compose speeches for their heroes which tell us what ought to have been said rather than what was actually said. Our author makes use of this perfectly legitimate literary device. A reading of the prayer shows that it is Deuteronomistic in word and thought throughout. More than one hand has been concerned in it, but the tone is that of the Deuteronomistic school. It confirms what has been said about the purpose of the book. It follows that the historical value of the work must be estimated with due allowance for this main purpose.

4. Date.—The date of the Book of Kings in its present form cannot be earlier than the Babylonian exile. The latest event which it mentions is the release of king Jehoiachin from confinement, which took place in the year B.C. 561; and as the author speaks of the allowance made to the king ‘all his life’ (2 K 25²⁰), we conclude that he wrote after his death. It will not be far out of the way, therefore, to say that the work was completed about B.C. 550. Some minor insertions may have been made later. While this is so, there are some things which point to an earlier date for the greater part of the work. The purpose of the author to keep his people from the mistakes of the past is intelligible only at a time when the avoidance of the mistakes was still possible,—that is, before the fall of Jerusalem. We find also some phrases which indicate that the final catastrophe had not yet come. The recurrence of the phrase 'until this day' (1 K 8³; cf. 9²¹ 12¹⁹, 2 K 22⁸ 16⁹) is one of these indications. It is, of course, possible that all these belong to the older sources from which the author drew, but this hardly seems probable. On these grounds it is now generally held that the substance of the book was compiled about B.C. 600, by a writer who was anxious to enforce the lesson of the Deuteronomistic reform while there was yet hope. This first edition extended to 2 K 23²⁸ or ²⁹. About fifty years later an author living in the Exile, and who sympathized with the main purpose of the book, completed it in substantially its present form. The theory receives some confirmation from the double scheme of chronology which runs through the book. As has been shown in the formula quoted above, there is a series of data concerning the length of each king's reign, and also a series of synchronisms, according to which each king's accession is brought into relation with the era of his contemporary in the other kingdom. The two series are not always consistent—a state of things which is best accounted for on the theory that one was the work of one author, the other the work of the other.

5. Text.—The text of the Books of Kings has not been transmitted with the care which has been shown in some parts of the OT. The LXX shows that early copies did not always agree in their wording or in the order of the paragraphs. In some cases the LXX has a better reading. But the differences are not such as to affect the meaning in any essential point.

KING'S GARDEN (2 K 25⁴, Jer 39⁴ 52⁷, Neh 3¹⁵).—This garden was clearly near the 'gate of the two walls' which was near the Pool of Siloam, and it was in all probability just outside the walls, being irrigated by overflow water from the Siloam tunnel and pool, just as the land in this situation is treated to-day. Indeed, the garden may have covered much the same area as is now cultivated as irrigated vegetable garden by the women of Silwān. See KIDRON [BROOK OF], SILOAM

E. W. G. MASTERTON.

KING'S POOL.—Neh 2¹⁴, prob. identical with Pool of Siloam. See SILOAM.

KING'S VALE.—Gn 14¹⁷ (AV king's dale). See SHAVEI.

KIR.—An unidentified place, subject in the 8th and 7th cents. to Assyria. Amos (1⁶), according to the present Hebrew text, predicted that the Arameans should be carried captive to Kir. In 9⁷ he declares that Jahweh brought them from Kir. It is said in 2 K 16⁹ that Tiglath-pileser carried the people of Damascus captive to Kir, while in Is 22⁶ Kir is mentioned in connexion with Elam as furnishing soldiers to the Assyrian army which fought against Israel. It has been identified with Kur, a river flowing into the Caspian Sea; with Cyropolis; with the Syrian province of Cyrrhestica; with Cyrene; with Kurenia in Media; with Kuria, north of Aleppo; with Koa of Ezk 23²⁸, which has been supposed to be the same as the Gutium of the Bab.-Assyr. inscriptions, which possessed a high civilization as early as B.C. 3000. In reality nothing certain is known of the locality of Kir. GEORGE A. BARTON.

KIR (of Moab).—Coupled with Ar of Moab (Is 16¹), possibly identical with it. Following the Targum, Kir of Moab has long been identified with the modern Kerak, a place of great importance in the times of the Crusades. Kerak is situated on a lofty spur between the Wady el-Kerak and the Wady 'Ain Franji, about 4000 feet above the Dead Sea level. The hills behind rise much higher, so that it is commanded on every side by higher ground, which explains 2 K 3³⁷. It was surrounded by a wall of great thickness, and there are remains of ancient rock-hewn cisterns. The gates were to be reached only through long tunnels in the solid rock. C. H. W. JOHNS.

KIR-HARESETH (Is 16⁷), Kir-haraseeth (2 K 3³⁶ AV [pausal form]), Kir-heres (Jer 48³¹ 38), Kir-hareash (Is 16¹¹ AV [pausal form]).—A place of great strength and importance in Moab; generally regarded as identical with Kir of Moab (wh. see). The LXX and Vulg. take these names as phrases, and translate them on some more or less fanciful Hebrew etymology. The Targum on Isaiah renders Kerak tokpehon, which suggests that haraseeth may be connected with the Assyrian hurshu, 'a cliff,' etc., but the word may be Moabite or Canaanite, and seems to occur in Harosheth of the Gentiles' (Jg 4² 13. 16). The modern Kasr harasha, 35 minutes' walk above Dera'a, preserves a similar title. C. H. W. JOHNS.

KIRIATH is the st. constr. of Kiriath, the complement of which, -jeirim, seems to have fallen out in Jos 18²⁴, from its resemblance to the word for 'cities' which follows. Therefore we ought probably to read Kiriath-jeirim, a reading supported by the LXX. W. EWING.

KIRIATHAIM.—1. A town E. of the Jordan, in the disputed territory between Moab and Reuben, placed by the Onomasticon 10 Roman miles W. of Madeba (Gn 14⁶, Nu 32⁷, Jos 13¹⁹, Jer 48³¹, Ezk 25⁹); unidentified. 2. A town in Naphtali (1 Ch 6⁷⁴), called Kartan in Jos 21². W. EWING.

KIRIATH-ARBA is used as a name for Hebron (wh. see) in Gn 23² etc. Only in Gn 35²⁷ and Neh 11²² is Arba' written with the article. The city may have been so called as the seat of a confederacy between four men or tribes, or the name may be = Tetropolis, 'the city of four quarters.' The Heb. text explains it as 'the city of Arba,' 'the greatest man among the Anakim' (Jos 14¹⁵ RV), or 'the father of Anak' (15¹⁴ 21¹¹). In the first passage LXX reads 'the city Argob, the metropolis of the Anakim'; in the second 'the city Arbok, metropolis,' etc. Perhaps in the last two, therefore, we should read '2m, 'mother,' i.e. 'mother-city,' instead of 'abi, 'father.' W. EWING.

KIRIATH-ARIM (Ezr 2²⁶).—See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

KIRIATH-BAAL.—See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

KIRIATH-HUZOTH.—A spot unidentified, apparently between Ar-moab and Bamoth-baal (Nu 22³⁹, cf. vv. 38. 41). It may be Kureid, S. of Jebel 'Aulras.

W. EWING.

KIRIATH-JEARIM ('city of forests').—One of the cities of the Gibeonites (Jos 9¹⁷), occupied by the Danites (Jg 18¹²), on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15⁹ 18¹⁴). From there David brought up the ark (2 S 6², 1 Ch 13², 2 Ch 1¹). Its older name appears to have been Kiriath-baal (Jos 15⁹) or Baalath (Jos 15⁹ 19, 1 Ch 13²). It is also mentioned as Baal Judah (2 S 6²), and through a textual error as Kiriath-arim (Ezr 2²⁶; cf. Neh 7²⁹). It was probably, like Kedesh, Gezer, etc., an old Canaanite 'high place.' In Jer 26¹⁰ it is mentioned as the home of Uriah the prophet, the son of Shemaiah. See also 1 Ch 26¹⁰ 12 and 1 Es 5¹⁹ [in this last passage it is called Kariatharius]. The site of this important ancient sanctuary and frontier town has been very generally accepted, since the 5th cent. A.D., as close to that of the modern Kureid el-'Enab, a flourishing little village on the high-road from Jaffa to Jerusalem, about 9 miles from the latter. The ancient remains are to the W. of the village, but a handsome Crusading Church in the village itself has recently been restored. Kureid el-'Enab is generally known as Abu Ghosh, after a family of semi-brigands of that name who established themselves there nearly a century ago, and for long held the whole surrounding country at their mercy. Another site, which has been powerfully advocated by Conder, is Khurbet 'Erma, on the S. of the Vale of Sorek, just where the narrow valley opens into the plain. The similarity of 'arim (Ezr 2²⁴) and 'erma, and the nearness of the site to Zorah and Eshtaol, are in its favour. There, too, are ancient remains, and a great rock platform which would appear to mark an ancient 'high place.' On the other hand, it is far from the other cities of the Gibeonites (Jos 9¹⁷). The question cannot be considered as settled.

KIRIATH-SANNAH, KIRIATH-SEPHER.—See DEBIR, No. 1.

KISEUS.—The form in Ad. Est 11² of Kiah (Est 2⁶), the name of the great-grandfather of Mordecai. See Kish, No. 4.

KISH.—1. The father of Saul the first king of Israel (1 S 9¹ 10²¹ 14¹, Ac 13²¹). His home was at Gibeah (rendered 'the hill of God' and 'the hill' in both AV and RV of 1 S 10⁵ and 10¹⁰). 2. The uncle of the foregoing (1 Ch 8³⁰ 9³⁴). 3. The eponym of a family of Merarite Levites (1 Ch 23²¹ = 24²⁹, 2 Ch 29¹²). 4. A Benjamite ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2⁶).

KISHI.—A Merarite Levite, ancestor of Ethan (1 Ch 6⁴; the parallel passage, 1 Ch 15¹⁷, has: K'ishaiah, probably the correct form of the name).

KISHION.—A town allotted to Issachar (Jos 19²⁰), given to the Levites (21²⁸). The parallel passage, 1 Ch 6⁷³, reads Kedesh, which is perhaps a textual error for Kishion. The latter name has not been recovered.

KISHON (Jg 4⁷ 5²¹, 1 K 18⁴⁰, Ps 83⁹).—The ancient name of the stream now called Nahr el-Mukatta', which drains almost the whole area of the great Plain of Esdraelon. The main channel may be considered as rising near the W. foot of Mt. Tabor, and running W. through the centre of the plain until it enters the narrow valley between the S. extension of the Galilaean hills and the E. end of Carmel. After emerging from this it enters the Plain of Akka, running a little N. of the whole length of Carmel, and enters the sea about a mile E. of Haifa. The total length is about 23 miles. In the first part of its course it is in winter a sluggish stream with a bottom of deep mud, and in summer but a chain of small marshes; from just below where the channel is crossed by the Nazareth road near Carmel it usually has a certain amount of water all the year round, and in parts the water, which is brackish, is 10 or 12 feet deep. At its mouth, however, it is almost always fordable. Numerous small watercourses from the Galilaean hills on the N. and more important tributaries from 'Little Hermon,' the Mountains of Gilboa, and the whole southern range of Samaria and Carmel on the E. and S., contribute their waters to the main stream. The greater number of these channels, in places 10 or 15 feet deep with precipitous sides, are perfectly dry two-thirds of the year, but during the winter's rains are filled with raging torrents. A number of copious springs arise along the edge of the hills to the S. of the plain. At Jenin there are plentiful fountains, but they are, during the summer, entirely used up in irrigation; at Ta'anak, at Lejjān, near Tell el-Kasā, at the E. end of Carmel, and at the 'Ayan el-Sa'di, perennial fountains pour their water into the main stream. Those who have seen the stream only in late spring or summer can hardly picture how treacherous and dangerous it may become when the winter's rain fills every channel with a tumultuous flood of chocolate-brown water over a bottom of sticky mud often itself several feet deep. Both animals and baggage have not infrequently been lost at such times. Under such conditions, the Kishon, with its steep, uncertain banks, its extremely crooked course, and its treacherous fords, must have been very dangerous to a flying army of horses and chariots (Jg 5²¹ 22). Of all parts the section of the river from Megiddo (wh. see) to 'Harosheth of the Gentiles' (now el-Harithiyeh), where the fiercest of the battle against Sisera was fought (cf. Jg 5¹⁹ and 4¹⁶), must have been the most dangerous. The other OT incident connected with this river is the slaughter there of the prophets of Baal after Elijah's vindication of Jehovah on the heights of Carmel (1 K 18⁴⁰).

KISS (Heb. nšštqah, Gr. philēma).—Kissing is a mark of affection between parents and children (Gn 27²⁶, Ru 1⁹, 1 K 19²⁰ etc.), members of a family, or near connexions (Gn 29¹³ 45¹⁸), and equals in rank (2 S 20⁹, Ac 20³⁷). Guests are received with a kiss (Lk 7⁴⁶). A kiss from a superior marks condescension (2 S 15¹⁹ 19²⁰). These kisses may be on the lips, but are usually on the cheek or neck. The kiss was a token of love (Ca 1² 8¹), of homage and submission (Gn 41⁴⁰, Job 31²⁷, Ps 21²), and was also an act of idolatrous worship (1 K 19¹⁸, Hos 13²). The Moslems kiss the black stone at Mecca. Juniors and inferiors kiss the hands of seniors and superiors. A wife kisses the hand or beard of her husband. The hand, garments, even the feet of one appealed to may be kissed. Probably Judas presumed to salute with the kiss of an equal (Mt 26⁴⁹ etc.). A kiss on the hand would have been natural. The 'holy kiss,' or 'kiss of love' (1 Co 16²⁰, 1 P 5¹⁴), marked the tie that united Christians in a holy brotherhood.

W. EWING.

KITE.—1. 'ayyāh. In Lv 11¹⁴, Dt 14¹³ AV renders this word by 'kite,' in Job 28⁷ by 'vulture'; RV has uniformly 'falcon.' 2. dā'ah: Lv 11¹⁴ (AV 'vulture,' RV 'kite'). 3. dāyāh: Dt 14¹³ (EV 'glede' [Old Eng. for 'kite']), Is 34¹⁵ (AV 'vulture,' RV 'kite'). The red kite, the black kite, and the Egyptian kite are all found in Palestine, but it is impossible to say which birds are denoted by the different words.

KITRON.—A Canaanite town in the territory of Zebulun (Jg 1³⁰). See KATTATH.

KITTIM (AV Ohittim, which is retained by RV in 1 Mac 1⁸ 8⁹) designates properly the island of Cyprus, and is to be so understood in the geographical list of the descendants of Javan (wh. see), that is, the Ionians, in Gn 10⁴. The name is based on that of the settlement on the south-east of the island, called Kitron by the Greeks, the modern Larnaka. This was the first trading post of the Phoenicians on the Mediterranean, hence it is vaguely used in Ezk 27⁶ as the mother-city of all the maritime settlements westward. The connexion with the Ionians or Greeks is not quite clear, since these were not the first settlers on the island. There were, however, undoubtedly Greek colonists there in the 8th cent. B.C., as we learn from the inscription of the Assyrian Sargon of 720, pointing to a settlement of Ionian Cyprians in Ashdod. A use of the word, still more vague, is found in Dn 11¹⁰, where it refers to the Romans, while in Nu 24²⁴ (as in 1 Mac 1⁸ 8⁹) it is applied apparently to the Macedonians.

KNEADING-TROUGH.—Only Ex 8³ 12²⁴ and RV of Dt 28¹⁷ (AV 'store'). See BREAD, HOUSE, § 9.

KNEE, KNEEL.—The knees are often referred to in Scripture as the place where weakness of the body, from whatever cause, readily manifests itself: e.g. from terror (Job 4⁴, Dn 5⁶), or fasting (Ps 109²⁴). The reference in Dt 28²⁸ seems to be to 'joint leprosy,' in which, after the toes and fingers, the joints of the larger limbs are attacked (Driver, Deut. in loc.). The laying of children on the knees of father or grandfather seems to have involved recognition of them as legitimate members of the family (Gn 30³ 50²³). In many passages of Scripture kneeling is spoken of as the attitude assumed in prayer (1 K 8⁴, Ps 95⁶, Dn 6¹⁰, Ac 20³⁶ etc.). To

'bow the knee' is equivalent to 'worship' (1 K 19¹⁸, Is 45²⁴, Ro 14¹¹ etc.). To fall upon the knees before a superior is an act at once of reverence and of entreaty (2 K 1¹⁴, Mt 17¹⁴, Lk 5⁴ etc.). In the court of an Eastern judge the writer has often seen men prostrate themselves, and then make their plea, resting upon their knees. W. EWING.

KNIFE.—Of the various sorts of knives noticed in the OT mention may be made of the flint knives used for the rite of circumcision (Jos 5¹⁴, cf. Ex 4²⁵)—an instance of conservatism in ritual, to which parallels may be found in all religions. The knives for ordinary purposes under the monarchy were mostly of bronze, of which, as of the earlier flint knives, the recent excavations have furnished many varieties. We also read of sacrificial knives (Gn 22⁶, 10, Ezr 1⁹), of 'a barber's knife' or razor (Ezk 5¹), and of a scribe's knife (Jer 36²³ EV 'penknife'), used for sharpening his reed-pen and making the necessary erasures. Cf. HOUSE, § 9.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KNOP.—Another form of 'knob,' is used to render two different words in EV. 1. The knobs of the stem and arms of the golden candlestick, or rather lampstand, of the Tabernacle (Ex 25³¹ etc.) were the spheroidal ornaments still recognizable in the representation on the Arch of Titus. 2. Knops also denote certain ornaments, probably egg- or gourd-shaped, carved on the cedar lining of the walls of Solomon's Temple (1 K 6¹⁸—note RVm), and similar ornaments on the 'brazen sea' (7²⁴).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KNOWLEDGE.—I. HUMAN KNOWLEDGE.—1. In the OT.—Knowledge, so far as it has a theological use, is moral rather than intellectual. It is assumed that a knowledge of God is possible, but this is the result of a revelation of Himself by God, and not a speculative knowledge achieved by man. So knowledge becomes practically equivalent to religion (Ps 25¹⁴, Is 11²), and ignorance to irreligion (1 S 2¹², Hos 4¹ 6⁶). The Messianic age is to bring knowledge, but this will be taught of God (Is 54¹²). This knowledge of God is therefore quite consistent with speculative ignorance about the universe (Job 38, 39). Perhaps some expressions in the NT which seem to refer to Gnostic ideas may be explained by this view of knowledge.

2. In the NT.—(a) In the Gospels knowledge is spoken of in the same sense as in the OT. Christ alone possesses the knowledge of God (Mt 11²⁷⁻²⁷). This knowledge gives a new relation to God, and without it man is still in darkness (Mt 5⁴, Jn 7¹⁷ 17³). (b) In St. Paul's Epistles.—In the earlier Epistles knowledge is spoken of as a gift of the Spirit (1 Co 13² 12⁸), although God can to a certain extent be known through nature (Ac 14¹⁷, Ro 1¹⁹ 20⁹). 1 Cor. especially urges the subordination of knowledge to charity. In Col 2 and 1 Ti 6²⁰ a wrong kind of knowledge is spoken of—perhaps an early form of Gnosticism. True knowledge, however, centres in Christ, who is the mystery of God (Col 2²). In Him all questions find their answer, and this knowledge is not, like Gnosticism, the property of a few, but is intended for all men (Col 12⁸). In the Pastoral Epp. knowledge is spoken of with reference to a definite body of accepted teaching, which is repeatedly alluded to; it is, however, not merely intellectual but moral (Tit 1¹). (c) In the other NT books knowledge is not prominent, except in 2 Peter, where, however, there is nothing specially characteristic. In Hebrews the ordinary word for 'knowledge' does not occur at all, but the main object of the Epistle is to create and confirm a certain kind of Christian knowledge. Although knowledge in both OT and NT is almost always moral, there is no trace of the Socratic doctrine that virtue is knowledge.

II. DIVINE KNOWLEDGE.—It is not necessary to show that perfect knowledge is ascribed to God throughout the Scriptures. In some OT books—Job and some Psalms—the ignorance of man is emphasized in order to bring God's omniscience into relief (cf. also the personification of the Divine Wisdom in the Books of Proverbs and Wisdom).

III. DIVINE AND HUMAN KNOWLEDGE IN CHRIST.—The question has been much debated how Divine and human knowledge could co-exist in Christ, and whether in His human nature He was capable of ignorance. It is a question that has often been argued on a priori grounds, but it should rather be considered with reference to the evidence in the records of His life. The Gospels certainly attribute to Christ an extraordinary and apparently a supernatural knowledge. But even supernatural illumination is not necessarily Divine consciousness, and the Gospel records also seem to attribute to our Lord such limitations of knowledge as may be supposed to make possible a really human experience. 1. There are direct indications of ordinary limitations. He advanced in wisdom (Lk 2⁵²); He asked for information (Mk 6³⁸ 8⁵ 9²¹, Lk 8³⁰, Jn 11³⁴); He expressed surprise (Mk 6³⁸ 8⁵ 9²¹, Jn 11³⁴). His use of prayer, and especially the prayer in the garden (Mt 26³⁹) and the words upon the cross (Mk 15³⁴), point in the same direction. 2. With regard to one point our Lord expressly disclaimed Divine knowledge (Mk 13³²). 3. In the Fourth Gospel, while claiming unity with the Father, He speaks of His teaching as derived from the Father under the limitations of a human state (Jn 3³⁴ 5¹⁹, 20 8²⁸ 12⁴⁹, 50). 4. While speaking with authority, and in a way which precludes the possibility of fallibility in the deliverance of the Divine message, He never enlarged our store of natural knowledge, physical or historical. If it be true that Christ lived under limitations in respect of the use of His Divine omniscience, this is a part of the self-emptying which He undertook for us men and for our salvation (see KENOSIS). J. H. MAUDE.

KOA.—A people associated with Pekod and Shoa (Ezk 23²³), probably, therefore, a by-form of Kutū (also Gutium), often mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions in the same company. Their seat lay N.E. of Babylonia, in the mountains between the upper Adhem and the Dījālā. Cf. KIR. C. H. W. JOHNS.

KOHATH, KOHATHITES.—Although the origin of the name Levi is doubtful, and scholars are still uncertain whether or not it was the name of a tribe before 'Levite' was a descriptive term denoting one who was trained in priestly duties, there is no doubt that the term 'Levite' had this meaning as early as the period of the Judges (see Jg 17⁷ 9¹³). And in process of time every member of the Levitical or priestly 'caste' traced his descent through one line or another to Levi. These genealogies must have been in the making before the Exile, but were afterwards stereotyped and reduced to system by the priestly school. The name Kohath is found nowhere except in P and Chronicles. The three main divisions of Levites bore the names of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, and these are accordingly given as the names of the 'sons' of Levi (Gn 46¹¹, Ex 6¹⁸, Nu 3¹⁷, 1 Ch 6¹ 16 23⁶). The second division is described either as 'the Kohathites' (Nu 3¹⁷ 20 41²⁴, 27 10²¹ 26⁵⁷, Jos 21⁴ 11, 1 Ch 6³³ 44 9³², 2 Ch 20¹⁹ 29¹²) or 'the sons of Kohath' (Ex 6¹⁸, Nu 3¹⁷ 20 42⁴, 16 7², Jos 21⁵ 20 26, 1 Ch 6² 18 22 61 66 70 15⁶ 23¹²). These were subdivided into four groups, the Amramites, the Izharites, the Hebronites, and the Uzzielites (Nu 3²⁷), each being traced to a son of Kohath (Ex 6¹⁸, Nu 3¹⁷, 1 Ch 6² 18 23¹²). From these families fragments of genealogies remain. Amram is of peculiar importance, because his children were Aaron and Moses (Ex 6²⁰, 1 Ch 23¹³⁻¹⁷); and Korah, a son of Izhar, was notorious in priestly tradition (Nu 16). See KORAH, DATHAN, ABIRAM.

The importance of these families after the Exile was small, with the exception of the priests who traced their descent from Aaron. Some Kohathites are named as appointed to humble offices (1 Ch 9¹⁸ 21¹, Ezr 2⁴, Neh 12²⁵). But the tendency of the period to idealize ancient history led the Priestly writers, including the Chronicler, to construct narratives in which the eponymous ancestors of the Levitical families played a prominent part; see 1 Ch 9¹. (1) During the desert wanderings the Kohathites were on the south side of the Tent (Nu 3³⁰), and they carried the screen of the sanctuary and its furniture, after it had been prepared for travel by the greatest of all the descendants of Kohath—Aaron and his sons (3³¹ 4¹⁻¹⁶ 10²¹); they were privileged to carry their burden upon their shoulders (7⁹), instead of in waggons, as the Gershonites and Merarites; they were superintended by Eleazar, Aaron's son (4¹⁶). (2) After the settlement in Palestine, 23 cities were assigned to them (Jos 21⁴¹. 13-26 = 1 Ch 6⁵⁷⁻⁶¹. 47-70). (3) In David's reign the Chronicler relates that the Temple music was managed partly by Heman, a Kohathite, and his family (1 Ch 6³¹⁻³⁸ 16⁴¹. 25¹. 4-6. 13. 16. 18. 20. 22¹. 23-31; and see 15⁵. 8-10. 17. 19). David divided the Levites into courses 'according to the sons of Levi' (23⁵; Kohathites vv. 12-20 24²⁰⁻²⁵); and particular offices of Kohathites are stated in 26¹⁻⁹. 12-15. 17-19. 22-31. (4) Under Jehoshaphat they led the song of praise at the battle of Engedi (2 Ch 20¹⁹). (5) Under Hezekiah they took part in the cleansing of the Temple (29¹². 14). A. H. M'NEILE.

KOHELETH.—See ECCLESIASTES.

KOLAIAH.—1. The father of the false prophet Ahab (Jer 29²¹). 2. The name of a Benjamite family which settled in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh 11⁷).

KONÆ (Jth 4⁴).—An unknown town of Palestine (AV, following a different reading, 'the villages').

KOPH.—Thenineteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 19th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

KORAH, KORAHITES.—1. Korah is the name of a 'duke,' son of Esau and Aholibamah, named in Gn 36⁵. 14. 16, and therefore an Edomite. 2. A Korah also appears in 1 Ch 2⁴³ as a 'son' of Hebron and descendant of Caleb, the Kenizzite, i.e. Edomite. 3. In 1 Ch 9¹⁹. 21 we hear of a ben-Korah and of a Korahite, the Korahites being further designated as door-keepers.

Combining the various notes, we gather that the sons of Korah were of Edomite extraction, were incorporated among the Levites, and formed a Temple-guild. Moreover, Pss 42-49 and 84. 85. 87. 88 bear the superscription 'to the sons of Korah.' They share, therefore, with the sons of Asaph the honour of forming the Temple-choir. But whether they rose (or fell) from being door-keepers to being singers, or vice versa, it is, in our ignorance of most of the details of the worship of the first Temple, impossible to say. Nor can we say how it was that the guilds of Asaph and Korah came to be transformed into the guilds of Heman, Asaph, and Ethan. See also next article. W. F. COBB.

KORAH, DATHAN, ABIRAM.—The story of the rebellion of Korah, as contained in Nu 16. 17, is now combined with what was originally an entirely different narrative—that of the resistance of Dathan and Abiram, who were laymen, to the civil authority of Moses. Refusing to obey Moses' summons to appear before him, Dathan and Abiram, along with their households, were swallowed up by the earth (Nu 16¹⁴. 24. 12-15. 21¹. 27b-34 [JE]). The story of Korah proper contains two strata, the work of Priestly writers of different ages. The first of these (Nu 16¹⁴. 25-7a. 18-24. 27a. 27b. 36. 41-50 ch. 17) describes a revolt of Korah, at the head of 250 princes of the congregation, against Moses and Aaron, in the interests of the people at large as against the tribe of Levi. The matter is decided by the test of the censers, the rebels being consumed by fire from the Lord. The sequel is found in ch. 17—the blossoming of Aaron's rod. The latest narrative (Nu 16^{7b-11}. 16¹. 26-40) represents Korah at the head of 250 Levites, opposing, in the interests of the tribe of Levi, the monopoly of the priesthood claimed by Aaron. These last two narratives are memorials of the struggles that took place, and the various stages that were passed through, before the prerogatives of Levi were admitted by the other tribes, and those of the house of Aaron by the other Levitical families. [In Sir 45¹⁸ and Jude 11 AV has Core for Korah].

KORE.—1. The eponym of a Korahite guild of door-keepers (1 Ch 9¹⁹). 2. Son of Innah, a Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹⁴).

KUSHAIAH.—See KISHI.

LAADAH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4²¹).

LABAN.—1. Son of Nahor (Gn 29⁵; cf. 24¹⁰, where 'Bethuel, son of,' is apparently an interpolation). He was the brother of Rebekah (24²⁹), father of Leah and Rachel (29), and through them ancestor to three-fourths of the Jewish nation. He had several sons (30³⁵ 31¹), and was father-in-law and uncle of Jacob. He appears first in Scripture as engaged in betrothing his sister Rebekah to Isaac (24²⁹⁻⁴⁰). We meet him next at Haran entertaining Jacob (29¹³. 14), who had escaped from his brother Esau. The details of the transactions between Laban and Jacob for the fourteen years while the nephew served the uncle for his two daughters need not be recounted here (see chs. 29 and 30). At the end of the period Jacob was not only husband of Leah and Rachel and father of eleven sons, but also the owner of very many flocks and herds. As Laban was reluctant to part with Jacob, regarding his presence as an assurance of Divine blessing, the departure took place secretly, while Laban was absent shearing his sheep. Jacob removed his property across the Euphrates, while Rachel took with her the teraphim or household gods of the family. When Laban pursued after them and overtook them at Mount Gilead (31²³), he did no more than reproach Jacob for his stealthy flight and for his removal of the teraphim, and finally made a covenant of peace by setting up a cairn of stones and a pillar; these served as a boundary-stone between the Aramaeans and the Hebrews, which neither were to pass with hostile intent to the other.

In character Laban is not pleasing, and seems to reflect in an exaggerated form the more repulsive traits in the character of his nephew Jacob; yet he shows signs of generous impulses on more than one occasion, and especially at the final parting with Jacob.

2. An unknown place mentioned in Dt. 1¹.

T. A. MOXON.

LABANA (1 Es 5²⁹) = Ezr 2⁴⁵ and Neh 7¹⁸ Lebana(h).

LACCUNUS (1 Es 9²¹) = Ezr 10³⁰ Chelal.

LACE.—The Eng. word 'lace' comes from Lat laqueus, a 'snare,' and is used in that sense in Old Eng. It is then employed for any cord or band, and that is its meaning in Ex 28²⁴. 27 36²¹. 21, Sir 6³⁰.

LACEDÆMONIANS.—In 2 Mac 5⁹ we read that Jason fled for refuge to the Lacedæmonians 'because they were near of kin.' This claim is further set forth in 1 Mac 12²²; cf. 14¹⁸, 20^f, 15²³, where we read of Sparta and an alliance with the Spartans. It was, of course, entirely fanciful, the Hellenes and the Jews belonging respectively to the Indo-European and Semitic branches of the human race. A. E. HILLARD.

LACHISH.—A town in the south country of Judah referred to several times in the Tell el-Amarna tablets. In the Biblical records it first appears as joining the coalition headed by the king of Jerusalem against the Gibeonites (Jos 10⁹), and as being in consequence reduced by Joshua (v. 31) in spite of the assistance given to it by the king of Gezer (v. 33). It is enumerated among the cities of the tribe of Judah (15³⁰). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch 11⁶). Hither Amaziah, king of Judah, fled from conspirators, and here he was murdered (2 K 14¹⁹). In the reign of Hezekiah, Sennacherib took Lachish, and while he was quartered there Hezekiah sent messengers to him to make terms (18¹³⁻¹⁷). Sennacherib's Lachish campaign is commemorated by a sculpture from Nineveh, now in the British Museum. Lachish and Azekah were the last cities to stand against the king of Babylon (Jer 34⁷). Lachish was one of the towns settled by the children of Judah after the Exile (Neh 11³⁰). Micah's denunciation of Lachish as 'the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion' (1¹²) doubtless refers to incidents of which we are quite ignorant.

Lachish was identified by Conder with Tell el-Hesi, an important mound in the Gaza district, which was partially excavated with success by Flinders Petrie and Bliss for the Palestine Exploration Fund (1890-1893). Another site in the neighbourhood, of Roman date, called Umm Lakis, probably represents a later dwelling of the representatives of the ancient Lachishites, and preserves the name of the city. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

LADAN.—1. A name occurring in the genealogy of Joshua (1 Ch 7²⁶). 2. A Gershonite family name (1 Ch 23⁷, s. v. 26²¹ter). In 6¹⁷ it appears as Libni (wh. see).

LADANUM.—See MYRRH.

LADDER.—In ancient times ladders were used chiefly for scaling the walls of a besieged city, as frequently shown on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i. 243; Layard, Nineveh, ii. 372). Although this use of them is probably implied in Pr 21²², scaling-ladders are first expressly mentioned in the time of the Maccabees (1 Mac 5³⁰). See FORTIFICATION, §§ 3, 6.

Jacob's 'ladder' (Gn 28¹²) seems to have been rather a 'flight of stone steps, rising up to heaven' (Driver, Com. in loc.). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

LAEL.—A Gershonite Levite (Nu 3²⁴).

LAHAD.—A Judahite family name (1 Ch 4²).

LAHAI-ROI.—See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

LAHMAM (RVm Lahmas).—A town of Judah (Jos 15⁴⁰), possibly mod. el-Lahm, near Be't Jibrin.

LAHMI.—The brother of Goliath the Gittite, slain by Elhanan the son of Jair (1 Ch 20⁹). There is a discrepancy between this passage and the parallel passage in 2 S 21¹⁹, where we read that 'Elhanan [wh. see] the Bethlehemit slew Goliath the Gittite.' If the text of Chronicles is the more correct, the designation Bethlehemit of Samuel is simply a corruption of the name Lahmi, but the converse might also be the case.

T. A. MOXON.

LAISH.—1. The original name of the town of Dan (Jg 18⁷, 14, 27, 29). The variation Leshem occurs in Jos 19^{47bis}. 2. The father of Palti or Paltiel, to whom Michael, David's wife, was given by Saul (1 S 25⁴⁴, 2 S 3¹⁴).

LAISHAH (Is 10³⁰).—The name of a place connected with Gallim, and mentioned here along with other localities in Benjamin and Judah. If Gallim be Beit Jala near Bethlehem, Laishah would also be in that neighbourhood.

LAKKUM.—An unknown town of Naphtali (Jos 19⁴⁹).

LAMA.—See ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.

LAMB.—See SHEEP, and next article.

LAMB OF GOD.—The lamb was the most common victim in the Jewish sacrifices, and the most familiar type to a Jew of an offering to God. The title 'the lamb of God' (i.e. the lamb given or provided by God; cf. Gn 22⁹) is applied by John the Baptist to Jesus in Jn 1²⁹, 36. The symbolism which the Baptist intended can be inferred from the symbolic allusions to the lamb in the OT. Thus in Jer 11¹⁹ the prophet compares himself to a lamb, as the type of guilelessness and innocence. Again, in Is 53⁷ (a passage which exercised great influence on the Messianic hope of the Jews, and is definitely referred to Christ in Ac 8³²) the lamb is used as the type of vicarious suffering. It seems beyond doubt that these two ideas must have been in the Baptist's mind. It is also quite possible to see in the phrase a reference to the lamb which formed part of the daily sacrifice in the Temple; and also, perhaps, an allusion to the Paschal lamb which would soon be offered at the approaching Passover (Jn 2¹³), and which was the symbol of God's deliverance. Certainly this is the idea underlying the expressions in Jn 19³⁶ and 1 P 1¹⁹. Thus all these strata of thought may be traced in the Baptist's title, viz. innocence, vicarious suffering, sacrifice, redemption.

The lamb is used 27 times in the Apocalypse as the symbol of Christ, and on the first introduction of the term in Rev 5⁶ the writer speaks specifically of 'a lamb as though it had been slain.' The term used in the Greek original is not the same as that found in the Baptist's phrase, but the connexion is probably similar. It seems most likely that the sacrificial and redemptive significance of the lamb is that especially intended by the Apocalyptic author.

The specific title 'the lamb of God' may be an invention of the Baptist's own, which he used to point an aspect of the Messianic mission for his hearers' benefit, or it may have been a well-known phrase currently employed to designate the Messiah; we have no trace of such an earlier use, but it may have existed (see Westcott on Jn 1²⁹). A. W. F. BLUNT.

LAME, LAMENESS.—See MEDICINE, p. 599^b.

LAMECH.—The name apparently of two people in the antediluvian period, the one belonging to the Cainite and the other to the Sethite genealogy. 1. The fifth descendant from Cain (Gn 4¹³⁻²⁴). He seems to have been a man of importance in the early legend, as the names of his two wives (Adah and Zillah), his three sons (Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal-cain), and his daughter (Naamah) are all mentioned. Special interest is attached to him on account of his song—

'Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech:
For I have slain a man for wounding me,
And a young man for bruising me:
If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold,
Truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold.'

The meaning of this song has been the subject of much conjecture. The song is clearly one of exultation, and it has not unnaturally been associated with the fact that Tubal-cain his son is specially mentioned as the 'forger of every cutting instrument.' Jerome relates the Jewish legend that Lamech accidentally slew Cain, but for this, of course, there is no foundation. It has been suggested (Lightfoot, Decas Chorogr. Marc. praem. § iv.) that the reference is to the fact that Lamech, as the first polygamist, introduced greater destruction into the world than Cain. R. H. Kennett sees in the song a deprecation of blood-guiltiness incurred by the fact that Lamech, as a tribal chieftain, has avenged an insult of a boy by slaying him.

A possible variant rendering might be mentioned: 'I would have slain (or 'I will slay') any man who wounds me.' If this is accepted, it materially alters the sense.

2. The father of Noah (Gn 5²⁹). It is now commonly believed, owing to the identity of some names and the similarity of others in the two genealogies, that they are merely different versions of one original list.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF.—1. Occasion.—In b.c. 586 Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem, put out the eyes of Zedekiah, slew the princes, burned the Temple and palaces, razed the walls, and deported the inhabitants (save some of the poorest sort) to forced labour in Babylon (2 K 25). These events and their religious meaning are the theme of the five complete hymns in the Book of Lamentations. The poet looked on these calamities as the death of the Jewish people; and he prepares an elegy for the national funeral.

2. Date.—It need not be supposed that Jeremiah went about composing acrostics while Jerusalem was burning; on the other hand, the language of the poems is not that of some Rabbinical versifier after Nehemiah's time. Between the desolation of a.c. 586 and the restoration of a.c. 536 is the time limit for the production of this book.

3. Form.—The form of these elegies has been recognized to be the type of Hebrew poetry which is peculiar to threnody. Its metrical character depends on the structure of the single line. The line has not the exact measure of a Latin hexameter or pentameter, but consists of five to seven words, making on an average eleven syllables. The line is divided by sense and grammar into two unequal parts, as 6: 5 or 4: 3; the first part being more emphatic in sense, and the second forming an antiphonal supplement to the first. Thus 1¹—

'Ah now! she sits alone—the populous city,
Husbandless doomed to be—the foremost of peoples,
Once the princess over states—a serf in a gang.

Such is the qtnāh-metre, found also in parts of Amos, Isaiah, and Ezekiel.

4. Arrangement.—These Hebrew elegiacs may stand singly, as in La 3, or in two-lined stanzas, as in ch. 4, or in three-lined stanzas, as in chs. 1 and 2. But there is also in Lam. a more artificial embellishment. The 22 stanzas of chs. 1, 2, and 4 are introduced by the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet in regular order, except that 2 and 4 place the letter Pe before the letter Ayin. This inexplicable variation in the order of the letters has been held to imply a difference in authorship. Again ch. 3 has 66 verses, the lines beginning aaa; bbb, etc. Ch. 5 has 22 verses, but no acrostic; and its lines are of a slightly different structure. As this chapter is a prayer, these external marks may have been felt to be inappropriate. The poetic form of Lam. is thus the result of elaborate effort; but this need not imply the absence of genuine feeling. The calamity in remembrance seemed to call for an adequate form of expression, and to invite the resources of technical skill.

5. Contents.—The contents of the five hymns are not pervaded by clear lines of thought; but the nature of the subject forbids us to look for the consistency of a geometrical theorem. The cruel scenes, the pity and horror they occasioned, the religious perplexity at the course of events, are depicted sometimes by the poet himself, again by Jerusalem, or by the personified community. Ch. 1 describes the ruin of Jerusalem and the humiliation of the exiles—vv. 1-11 in the words of the poet, while the city itself speaks in vv. 12-22. The second hymn finds the sting of their sufferings in the fact that they are inflicted by Jehovah, their ancient defender. Ch. 3, 'the triumph song of ethical optimism,' recounts the national misery (vv. 1-18), perceives the purpose of Jehovah in their calamities (vv. 19-47), and calls the people to penitence (vv. 48-66). Ch. 4 contrasts the past history of Zion with its present condition, and ch. 5 is a prayer for mercy and renewal of ancient blessings. The hope for Judah was the compassion of the Lord; 'therefore let us search and try our ways and turn again to the Lord' (3⁴⁰). It forms a curious contrast to the consolation offered to Athens in her decline and fall through the comedies of Aristophanes.

6. Authorship.—No author is named in Lam. itself. In 2 Ch 35²⁵ we read that 'Jeremiah lamented for Josiah, and all the singing men and singing women spake of Josiah unto this day; and they made them an ordinance in Israel: and behold they are written in the lamentations.' This statement is 300 years later than the fall of Jerusalem; and Lam. has nothing to do with Josiah. But it ascribes standard elegies to Jeremiah. The LXX, followed by the Vulgate and other versions, names Jeremiah the prophet as the author of Lam.; and this view prevailed universally till recent times. Internal evidence has been considered unfavourable to Jeremiah's authorship. The alphabetic form, a few peculiar words, an affinity in chs. 2 and 4 with Ezekiel, in chs. 1 and 5 with the younger Isaiah, and in ch. 3 with late Psalms, the accumulation of pictorial metaphors, the denial of vision to prophets, the reliance on Egypt (4¹⁷), are given (Löhr, Com.) as conclusive objections to Jeremiah's being the writer. But the acrostic form would then have the charm of novelty, and would be useful as a mnemonic for professional mourners; and it is not prophecy to which it is here attached. The affinities with later books are not very marked, and may be due to derivation from the elegies. And there is avowedly much resemblance in vocabulary and thought between Jeremiah and Lamentations. Both trace disaster to the sin of the nation, both deprecate trust in alliances, and both inculcate penitence and hope. Probably the internal evidence originated the traditional view that Jeremiah was the author; and the newer scrutiny of the evidence seems hardly sufficient to disprove the verdict of the ancients.

Again it is asked, Would one author make five independent poems on one and the same subject? If several authors treated the theme independently, it is not likely that their work would bear juxtaposition so well as the collection in Lamentations. Jeremiah's life ended some 6 or 7 years after the Captivity began; and 5³⁰ implies a longer interval, since the devastation. If we assign, with Thénien, chs. 2 and 4 to Jeremiah, and suppose that some disciples of the prophet imitated his model in 1, 3, and 5, then perhaps the differences and similarities in the several hymns may be accounted for. When Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus in a.d. 70, there was no new qtnāh; the elegies seem to presuppose a personality of Jeremiah's type as their originator.

7. Names.—The Hebrew name of Lam. is 'Ekkāh' ('How!'), the first word in the book. It is also called Qtnāh or 'Elegies.' The LXX has Threnoi (Jeremiou); Vulg., Threni, id est lamentationes Jeremiae prophetae, and this is the source of the English title.

8. Position in the Canon.—In Hebrew Bibles Lam. is placed in the third division of the OT Canon. Its place is generally in the middle of the five Megilloth, between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. The Jews recite the book on the Black Fast (9th of Ab)—the anniversary of the destruction of Jerusalem. In the Greek OT and the other versions Lam. is attached to the prophecies of Jeremiah, in accordance with the current belief in his authorship.

LAMP.—1. The earliest illuminant everywhere was supplied by pieces of resinous wood. Such probably were the torches of Gideon's adventure (Jg 7¹⁴). RV for AV 'lamps' and other passages. There is no evidence of anything of the nature of our candles, which is a frequent AV rendering of the ordinary Heb. word (nēṣr) for 'lamp,' now introduced throughout by RV except in Zeph 1¹² (but Amer. RV here also 'lamp'). The unearthing of thousands of lamps in the course of recent Palestine exploration, sometimes as many as two or three hundred from a single grave, has made it possible to trace the development of the lamp from early pre-Israelite to Byzantine times. Only the barest outline can be attempted here.

2. Two main stages in this development have to be recognized, the first that of the open, the second that of the closed, lamp. (a) The earliest form found in pre-Israelite strata is that of the plain open clay lamp in the shape of a shell, or shallow bowl, with rounded bottom. It is distinguished from the later form of open lamp by having the rim only slightly pinched along about one-third of its circumference, to keep the wick in position. (b) In the later forms just referred to, which are those of the late Canaanite and early Hebrew periods, the lips are drawn much more closely together, so as to form an elongated spout, as may be seen in the illust. in Hastings' DB iii. 24, fig. 1; Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine (in the sequel cited as BMErc.), plate 66; Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, 87. For types of (a) and (b) side by side, see PEFSI, 1904, 327. (c) The next step apparently was to substitute a flat base for the rounded forms of (a) and (b). This type of open lamp has continued in use to the present day in certain parts of Syria.

3. The introduction of the closed lamp cannot as yet be dated with certainty, but is probably due to Western influence. According to Bliss (BMErc. 130), 'by Seleucid times the open lamp appears largely to have given way to the closed lamp.' (a) The earlier specimens of this type consist of a circular bowl closed at the top, with the exception of a round opening for pouring in the oil, with a flat or concave base. They are further characterized by their long tapering, and sometimes straight, spout, which 'forms a distinct angle with the bowl.' These lamps are entirely without ornament, and, like all the others, without handles. (b) The later closed lamps, on the other hand, have their upper surface ornamented with an endless variety of design, ranging from simple lines through chevrons, spirals, etc., to animal forms. Numerous specimens of (a) and (b) are illustrated in BMErc. pl. 62, 63. For a typical lamp of the Maccabean period, see PEFSI, 1904, 348, pl. iii. No. 5. This may be assumed to have been the prevailing type of lamp in NT times.

4. Many of the specimens hitherto given as illustrations of the lamps of OT are really of early Christian or even Byzantine date. A typical Byzantine form is given in BMErc. pl. 66, No. 6. This type is distinguished from the previous closed type by the fact that 'the curve of the body is continuous with the top of the spout, giving a generally oval shape.' See the collections illustrated PEFSI, 1892, 125; 1904, plate iii; 1905, 150.

5. In addition to the normal lamp with a single wick, the excavations in northern and southern Palestine have brought to light numerous specimens of 'multiple lamps,' a favourite form of which consisted of a bowl, having its rim pinched into three, four, or seven spouts (see BMErc. pl. 66). As in other lands, the Palestinian potter sometimes gave his lamp the shape of an animal, such as the remarkable clay duck from Gezer described and illustrated in PEFSI, 1903, 40.

The favourite material in all ages was clay. A good specimen of a bronze lamp with a handle, from the Greek period, is shown in BMErc. 60. Silver lamps are mentioned in Jth 10². Those of the Tabernacle and Temple were of gold. The usual illuminant was the oil of the olive; other oils, including naphtha, are named in the Mishna (Shabbath, ii. 1 ff.), where may be found, also, a list of the substances for wicks in addition to the ordinary wick of twisted flax (Is 42³ RVm), and other details regarding the household lamp.

6. In the poorer houses the lamp was placed, as it still is, in a niche in the wall. It is in the case of a 'great woman' that we first hear of a lampstand in a private house. Lampstands of stone, about 30 inches in height, have been found in the recent excavations in Crete; one of limestone is figured in Bliss, Mound, etc. 104, from Lachish. The candlestick of AV, which, strangely enough, is retained in RV (except in Mt 5¹⁴, where 'stand' is substituted), is of course a lampstand. For the elaborate lampstands or 'candlesticks' of the Tabernacle and the Temple see those articles. An interesting specimen of a lamp with seven spouts and stand in one piece was found by Sellin at Taanach (illust. in his Eine Nachlese, etc. 22; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 2 [1907] 99).

In ancient times, as at the present day, it was customary to keep the household lamp continually alight, hence the figure in 1 K 11³⁶, 2 K 8¹⁹; conversely, the putting out of the lamp of the wicked (Job 18⁶ [AV 'candle'], Pr 13⁹) denotes their utter extinction.

For a recently discovered, and still obscure, early rite in which lamps and bowls played an essential part, see House, § 3; and for a later rite, see DEDICATION (FEAST OF). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

LAMPSCUS (1 Mac 15²³ RVm).—See SAMPBAMES.

LANCE, LANCET.—The former only Jer 50³⁸, RV 'spear,' but Heb. is kīdōn, hence rather 'javelin'; the latter only 1 K 18²⁸, RV 'lance,' Heb. rōmach. For both these weapons, see ARMOUR AND ARMS, § 1.

LAND CROCODILE (Lv 11³⁰ RV).—See CHAMELEON and LIZARD.

LANDMARK.—The word (gebūl) so rendered must not be identified off-hand, as is usually done, with the kuduru or boundary-stone of the Babylonians, for the fundamental passage, Dt 19¹⁴, 'Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which thy of old time have set,' should rather be rendered: 'Thou shalt not remove (or 'set back') thy neighbour's boundary, which they . . . have drawn.' Under the old Hebrew system of the cultivation in common of the village land, the boundaries of the plots may have been indicated as at the present day by 'a furrow double in width to the ordinary one,' at each end of which a stone is set up, called the 'boundary-stone' (PEFSI, 1894, p. 195 f.). The form of land-grabbing by setting back a neighbour's boundary-line must have been common in OT times, to judge by the frequent references to, and condemnations of, the practice (Dt 19¹⁴ 27¹⁷, Hos 5¹⁰, Pr 22²⁸ 23¹⁰, Job 24²).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

LANGUAGE OF OT AND APOCRYPHA.—See TEXT VERSIONS AND LANGUAGES OF OT.

LANGUAGE OF THE NT.—The object of this article is to give a general non-technical account of the Greek in which the NT is written. It should be stated at the outset that the standpoint of scholarship in regard to this subject has materially altered since Prof. Thayer wrote his excellent article in vol. iii. of the DB. We shall therefore briefly state the nature of our change in view, and then describe the NT Greek as we now regard it, without further reference to older theories.

1. The old view.—In every age of NT study, scholars have been struck by the fact that its Greek to a large extent stands alone. It differs immensely from the language of the great classics of the period which was closed some four centuries earlier, and not much less from that of post-classical writers of its own time, even when those writers were Palestinian Jews, as was Josephus. During the 17th cent. the 'Purist' school sought to minimize these differences, holding that deviation from the 'purity' of classic standards was a flaw in the perfection of the inspired Book, which must at all costs be cleared away. But, except for such eccentricities of learning, the efforts of scholars in general were steadily directed towards the establishment of some rationale for this isolation of what Rothe called the 'language of the Holy Ghost.' Two excellent reasons were found for the peculiarities of NT Greek. (1) NT writers were steeped in the language of the Greek OT, a translation which largely followed the Hebrew original with a lavish literalness. A special religious phraseology was thus created, which not only contributed a large number of forms for direct quotation, but also supplied models for the general style of religious writing, much as the style of modern sermons or devotional books is modelled upon the English of the Bible. (2) The writers were mostly Jews who used Aramaic (a language closely related to Hebrew) in their daily life. When, therefore, they thought and wrote in Greek, they were prone to translate literally from their native tongue; and 'Aramaisms' thus infected the Greek, side by side with the 'Hebraisms' which came from the LXX. The degree to which either of these classes of Semitism was admitted to affect particular words or grammatical constructions in the Greek NT naturally differed in the judgment of different writers; but even Thayer, who wrote after the new lights had already begun to appear, shows no readiness to abandon the general thesis that the NT Greek lies outside the stream of progress in the development of the Greek language, and must be judged by principles of its own.

2. Newer views.—The credit of initiating a most far-reaching change of view, the full consequences of which are only beginning to be realized, belongs to a brilliant German theologian, Adolf Deissmann. His attention having been accidentally called to a volume of transcripts from the Egyptian papyri recently added to the Berlin Museum, he was immediately struck by their frequent points of contact with the vocabulary of NT Greek. He read through several collections of papyri, and of contemporary Greek inscriptions, and in 1895 and 1897 published the two volumes of his Bible Studies (Eng. tr. in one volume, 1901). Mainly on the ground of vocabulary, but not without reference to grammar and style, he showed that the isolation of NT Greek could no longer be maintained. Further study of the papyri he used, and of the immense masses of similar documents which have been published since, especially by the explorers of Oxford and Berlin, confirms his thesis and extends it to the whole field of grammar. To put the new views into two statements—(1) The NT is written in the spoken Greek of daily life, which can be proved from inscriptions to have differed but little, as found in nearly every corner of the Roman Empire in the first century. (2) What is peculiar in 'Biblical Greek' lies in the presence of boldly literal translations from Hebrew OT or Aramaic 'sources': even this, however, seldom goes beyond clumsy and unidiomatic, but perfectly possible, Greek, and is generally restricted to the inordinate use of correct locutions which were rare in the ordinary spoken dialect. The Egyptian non-literary papyri of the three centuries before and after Christ, with the inscriptions of Asia Minor, the Aegean islands and Greece during the same period,—though these must be used with caution because of the literary element which often invades them,—supply us therefore with the long desiderated parallel for the language of the NT, by which we must continually test an exegesis too much dominated hitherto by the thought of classical Greek or Semitic idiom.

3. History and diffusion of the Greek language.—At this point, then, we should give a history of the world-Greek of NT times. A sister-language of Sanskrit, Latin, Slavonic, German, and English and most other dialects of modern Europe, Greek comes before us earliest in the Homeric poems, the oldest parts of which may go back to the 10th cent. B.C. Small though the country was, the language of Greece was divided into more dialects, and dialects perhaps more widely differing, than English in the reign of Alfred. Few of these dialects gave birth to any literature; and the intellectual primacy of Athens by the end of the classical period (4th cent. B.C.) was so far above dispute that its dialect, the Attic, became for all future time the only permitted model for literary prose. When Attic as a spoken language was dead, it was enforced by rigid grammarians as the only 'correct' speech for educated people. Post-classical prose accordingly, while varying in the extent to which colloquial elements invade the purity of its artificial idiom, is always more or less dominated by the effort to avoid the Greek of daily life; while in the NT, on the contrary, it is only two or three writers who admit even to a small extent a style differing from that used in common speech. Meanwhile the history of Greece, with its endless political independence and variation of dialect between neighbouring towns, had entered a new phase. The strong hand of Philip of Macedon brought Hellas under one rule; his son, the great Alexander, carried victorious Hellenism far out into the world beyond. Unification of speech was a natural result, when Greeks from different cities became fellow-soldiers in Alexander's army, or fellow-colonists in his new towns. Within about one generation we suddenly find that a compromise dialect, which was based mainly on Attic, but contained elements from all the old dialects, came to be established as the language of the new Greek world. This 'Common' Greek, or Hellenistic, once brought into being, remained for centuries a remarkably homogeneous and slowly changing speech over the larger part of the Roman Empire. In Rome itself it was so widely spoken and read that St. Paul's letter needed no translating, and a Latin Bible was first demanded far away from Latium. In Palestine and in Lycaonia the Book of Acts gives us clear evidence of bilingual conditions. The Jerusalem mob (Ac 21⁴⁰ 22²) expected St. Paul to address them in Greek; that at Lystra (14¹⁰) similarly reverted with pleasure to their local patois, but had been following without difficulty addresses delivered in Greek. It was the one period in the history of the Empire when the gospel could be preached throughout the Roman world by the same missionary without interpreter or the need of learning foreign tongues. The conditions of Palestine demand a few more words. It seems fairly clear that Greek was understood and used there much as English is in Wales to-day. Jesus and the Apostles would use Aramaic among themselves, and in addressing the people in Judaea or Galilee, but Greek would often be needed in conversation with strangers. The Procurator would certainly use Greek (rarely Latin) in his official dealings with the Jews. There is no reason to believe that any NT writer who ever lived in Palestine learned Greek only as a foreign language when he went abroad. The degree of culture in grammar and idiom would vary, but the language itself was always entirely at command.

4. NT Greek.—We find, as we might expect, that 'NT Greek' is a general term covering a large range of individual divergence. The author of Hebrews writes on a level which we might best characterize by comparing the pulpit style of a cultured extempore preacher in this country—a spoken style, free from artificiality and archaisms, but free from anything really colloquial. The two Lukan books show similar culture in their author, who uses some distinctively literary idioms. But St. Luke's faithful reproduction of his various sources makes his work uneven in this respect. St. Paul handles Greek with the freedom and mastery of one who probably used it regularly all his life, except during actual residence in Jerusalem. He seems absolutely uninfluenced by literary style, and applies the Greek of common intercourse to his high themes, without stopping a moment to polish a diction the eloquence of which is wholly unstudied. Recent attempts to trace formal rhetoric and laws of rhythm in his writings have completely failed. At the other end of the scale, as judged by Greek culture, stands the author of the Apocalypse, whose grammar is very incorrect, despite his copious vocabulary and rugged vigour of style. Nearly as unschooled is St. Mark, who often gives us very literal translations of the Aramaic in which his story was first wont to be told: there seems some reason to suspect that in the oldest form of his text this occurred more frequently still. The other main Gospel 'source,' the 'Sayings of Jesus,' shows likewise the traces of processes of translation. Space forbids any attempt to distinguish the position of all the NT writers, but we may note that the papyri supply parallels in degrees of culture to compare with them in turn, except so far as sheer translation comes in.

5. Help derived from Modern Greek, and from reconstructed Aramaic originals.—We must now return to the development-history of Greek to observe that its later stages, even up to the present day, are full of important contributions to our study of the NT. The 'Common' or Hellenistic Greek, described above, is the direct ancestor of the vernacular of modern Greece and the Greek-speaking districts of Turkey. We are daily learning more of the immense significance of this despised patois for interpreting the sacred language. Here the student must carefully eliminate the artificial 'Modern Greek' of Athenian newspapers and books, which is untrustworthy for this purpose, just as is the Greek of Plutarch or Josephus. The genuine vernacular—with its dialects, based on inconsiderable local variations in Hellenistic, which may have no small weight ere long even in our NT criticism—may be placed by the side of modern folk-ballads and mediæval popular stories and saint-legends, to take us back to the papyri and inscriptions, as our latest-found tools for NT study. The literature, classical and post-classical, will of course retain the place it has always held, when modern methods have taught us how to check its testimony. And Comparative Philology, with lights on the meaning of cases and tenses and moods, may be added to the equipment with which purely linguistic science may now help forward the interpretation of Scripture. All this is on the side of the student of Greek itself. But the other side of NT language must naturally not be forgotten. Contributions of great value have recently been made to our knowledge of the Aramaic, in which nearly all the sayings of Christ must have been uttered, and in which Papias (as usually understood) shows they were first written down. The possibility of reconstructing to some extent the original of our Greek Gospel sources is drawing nearer; and the co-operation of Greek and Semitic scholars promises marked advances in our knowledge of the very kernel of the NT (cf. next art.).

6. Characteristics of NT Greek.—A few concluding words may be given to the general characteristics of the language which had so providentially become the language of the civilized world just at the time when the gospel began its advance. It used to be frequently contrasted unfavourably with the classical Attic, which is undeniably the most perfect language the world has ever seen, for the clearness, subtlety, and beauty with which it can express thought. In Hellenistic Greek the subtlety, the sense of rhythm, and the literary delicacy have largely disappeared. But the old clearness is only enhanced by a greater simplicity; and the boundless resourcefulness of the language impresses us powerfully when in the NT for the first and (practically) last time the colloquial dialect of the people was enshrined in literature, the authors of which were nearly always unconscious that they were creating literature at all. The presentation of Christianity to the Western world as a system of thought could never have been accomplished in Hebrew, even if that language had attained universal currency. In Greek we are always conscious of a wealth of suggestiveness which no translation can convey, an accuracy and precision of thought which repay the utmost exactness of study. This is in no sense lost even when the simpler grammar of the later language becomes the tool of men who had no inheritance of Greek culture. A comparatively elementary knowledge of this simpler Greek, which can be attained without touching the complex structure of the classical language, will constantly reveal important elements in the writer's meaning that are beyond the reach of our language to convey directly. In our own time at last this language is being studied for its own sake; and even classical scholars are beginning to allow that the renewed youth of Greek, under conditions which make it largely a new language, produced a literature which the philologist, and not merely the theologian, can admire.

JAMES HOPE MOULTON.

LANGUAGE OF CHRIST.—The records of our Lord's words and discourses have descended to us in four Greek Gospels. Some early Christian writers assert that St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew; but the Greek St. Matthew has universally, and from the first, been accepted as an authoritative and inspired document. It is not improbable that the writer published his book in the two languages, and that the Greek edition alone has survived. Josephus, who wrote in Greek, prepared a Semitic edition of his Wars for the benefit of those who understood only their vernacular.

At the present day, perhaps, most scholars would admit that the vernacular of Palestine in the time of our Lord was Semitic, and not Greek; but a difference is observed between their theory and their practice; for in all kinds of theological writings, critical as well as devotional, the references to the text of the Gospels constantly assume that the Greek words are those actually uttered by our Lord. But if Greek was not commonly spoken in the Holy Land, it is improbable that He who ministered to the common people would have employed an uncommon tongue. It follows that the Greek words recorded by the Evangelists are not the actual words Christ spoke. We may think we have good grounds for believing that they accurately represent His utterances; but to hear the original sounds we must recover, if that be possible, the Semitic vernacular which underlies the traditional Greek.

The evidence as to the nature of the Palestinian vernacular may be thus stated. In the first century of the Christian era the Holy Land was peopled by men of more than one race and nationality, but there is no reason to suppose they had been fused into one people, with Greek for their common tongue. Most of the inhabitants of Judæa were Jews, being descendants of the returned exiles. In Galilee there was a mixture of races; but the name 'Galilee of the Gentiles' was a survival of the description of an earlier condition. The Syrian and Assyrian invaders of the Northern Kingdom had passed, though leaving their mark, and a period of Jewish ascendancy had followed, created by the victories of the Maccabees. The Idumean princes, though inclined to alliance with Rome, sought to pose as Judaizers. Herod the Great, while in sympathy with Hellenism, was famous as the builder of the third Temple. The strict, orthodox Jews, who were opposed to Hellenism, and compassed sea and land to make one proselyte, would lose no opportunity of re-occupying their fatherland, from Jerusalem in the south to the north of Galilee, and would take with them the ancient customs and the ancestral tongue. Samaria, however, preserved its integrity as a foreign colony, with its own Semitic dialect. Beyond the Jordan, and in the border lands of the south, there was some mingling with the neighbouring Moabite, Idumean, and Arab tribes, and probably many dialects were spoken, the records of which have perished for ever. Yet the Hebrew of the Jerusalem Pharisee, the language of the Samaritans, the speech of the men of Galilee, and the patois of the borderers, were all Semitic dialects. No place is found for the alien speech of Greece. Yet it must not be forgotten that Greek was the language of trade and literature. It would be heard in the seaports, and in the neighbourhood of the great roads by which communication was kept up through Palestine between Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. It was spoken by many in the Roman garrisons, and was the adopted tongue of the Jews of the Dispersion, who cultivated Hellenism, and brought their foreign customs to Jeru-

Jerusalem, when they came to worship or for temporary residence (see Ac 6⁹). But the language of the Palestinian home, of the Palestinian synagogue, of farmers, artisans, and labourers, as well as of educated Jews, who cultivated the ancient ways, was Hebrew, using that term for the moment in a somewhat extended sense. Very significant is the reference to the vernacular in Ac 1⁹, and the obvious inference is confirmed by the description of the title on the cross. Besides the official notice in Latin, which probably few could read, the accusation was written in Greek and in Hebrew. If the majority of the passers by would understand the former, the latter was superfluous. Even if the Hebrew was added only to please the mob, this fact would prove that the lower classes were partial to their vernacular, and were at least bilinguals, and not in the habit of using Greek exclusively (cf. Ac 22³).

The story of Peter's denial incidentally adds another confirmation. He conversed in a language which was understood by the servants and others of the same class assembled round the fire, but he was recognized as a northerner by his accent. There is no evidence that the Galileans pronounced Greek differently from the Judeans, but it is known that their pronunciation of some of the Hebrew letters differed from that of the southerners. Peter and the servants had a Semitic vernacular in common, though with dialectic differences of pronunciation, and possibly of vocabulary.

In the Syrian Church historical documents have been handed down which, whatever be the dates of the existing works, undoubtedly represent very ancient traditions, and depend on documents such as would have been preserved amongst the archives of Edessa. In the Doctrine of Addai this remarkable statement occurs: 'Him whose Gospel has been spread abroad by the signs which his disciples do, who are Hebrews, and only know the tongue of the Hebrews, in which they were born.' In the same Church there was a tradition that their national version of the NT was rather a second record than a translation, and dated from Apostolic times. Such a view (whether true or false matters not now) depends on an assumption that some language related to Syriac, if not Syriac itself, was the vernacular of the Apostles.

The greater part of the NT consists of writings intended for the benefit of Jews who resided outside Palestine, and of converts from heathenism. For such readers the vernacular of Palestine would have been unsuitable; and those of the writers who were not familiar with Greek could employ a translator. St. Peter is said to have been attended by Mark in this capacity. We have already referred to the tradition that Matthew, who wrote for the benefit of his countrymen, composed a Gospel in Hebrew. That some one should have undertaken a work of that nature is highly probable; but the circulation would be limited, for the native Jewish Church did not long retain the position of importance it possessed at first (Ac 21²⁰), and the collection of sacred writings into a Canon was the work of Greek-speaking Christians. The Epistle of St. James is one of the earliest books of the NT, but though intended for Jewish Christians it was written in Greek, as a literary vehicle. An apparent, though not a real, difficulty is presented by the style of certain pieces included in the sacred narratives. The Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, and Lord's Prayer, for example, which must be translations, in accordance with our view of the use of a Semitic vernacular, are thought to savour rather of original composition than of translation. But it should be remembered that the ancient idea of a version was different from ours. Literal rendering often (though not always) yielded to the demands of commentary. Perhaps (to take another, and, as some think, crucial instance), the angel could not have saluted Mary in the native dialect with the famous aliteration—Chaire kecharistōmenē; and yet the Evangelist may have recorded the 'Hail! highly favoured' in that form, influenced by the style of OT diction, in which play on words is a marked feature.

The majority of the quotations in the Gospels appear to be derived from some form of the Septuagint Greek text of the OT. It does not follow that the speakers habitually used Greek. All we can safely infer is that the Evangelists, when writing in Greek, employed a version which had acquired considerable authority by usage, to express the quotations they recorded.

It has been thought that the conversations between our Lord and the woman of Samaria and the Syro-phenician woman must have been carried on in Greek as a common language. It is forgotten that Syriac Samaritan, and the so-called Hebrew of Palestine, were nearly related. Many to whom one or other of these was the vernacular, would have some slight acquaintance with the others. However, the object of this article is not to deny that Christ knew, and sometimes spoke, Greek, but to reinforce the arguments by which we conclude that the vernacular of Palestine was Semitic, and that therefore Christ's teachings were, for the most part, delivered in a different tongue from that in which they have come to us in the Greek Gospels.

By far the greater number of personal and place names connected with Palestine in the NT are of Semitic derivation, but they afford no evidence in relation to our inquiry. The preservation and use of such names would be consistent with a change in the vernacular. Place names are practically permanent; personal names are often sentimentally borrowed from a dead ancestral tongue. Nor would we lay stress on the occurrence of Semitic words, as rabbi, korban, pascha ('passover'), in the Greek text. The men of our Lord's day, whatever dialect they spoke, were the heirs of a religious and social system which had its roots in Hebraism, and of which there were constant reminiscences in the daily use of words belonging to the ancient terminology. But other non-Greek expressions are recorded in connexions which lend them a much greater significance. In Ac 1¹⁹ we are informed that the Semitic name Akeldama, which was given to a certain field, was in the 'proper tongue' of 'the dwellers at Jerusalem.' Our Lord's words on two occasions are given in Semitic,—Taitha kūmi (Mk 5⁴), and Ephphatha (7⁴). On the cross He uttered a cry which might have been a quotation from Ps 22¹; but the form preserved in Mk 15³⁴ varies dialectically from the Hebrew of the opening words of that psalm.

These and other Semitic remains preserved in the pages of the NT, even when account has been taken of all place and personal names and single words, as well as of the few phrases, afford but limited evidence, and are only a few specimens of the Palestinian vernacular. Yet they suffice to show that the dialect was neither ancient Hebrew nor the classical Syriac. It had arisen through corruption of the ancestral tongue, under the influence of surrounding languages, especially Aramaic. Probably it varied considerably in different parts of the Holy Land, and there were 'dialects' rather than 'a dialect' of Palestine. But all the evidence tends to the conviction that Christ habitually employed some form of the vernacular in His discourses, and not the alien language of Greece. G. H. GWILLIAM.

LANTERN.—Only Jn 18³, where some form of 'torch' is more probably intended. The Greek is phanos, a word not found elsewhere in Biblical Greek.

LAODICEA was situated in the valley of the Lycus, a tributary of the Meander in Asia Minor. It was founded by Antiochus II. about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C. It was planted in the lower Lycus glen, Colossæ being situated in the upper. The Lycus glen was the most frequented path of trade from the interior of the country to the west, and the great road passed right through Laodicea. The city was nearly square, and strongly fortified, but dependent for its water supply on an aqueduct 6 miles long. It played a comparatively small part in the dissemination of Greek culture. Its prosperity advanced greatly under the Romans. It was an important manufacturing centre, for instance, for a soft glossy black wool, which was made into garments of various kinds (cf. Rev 3¹⁸). In connexion with the temple of the Phrygian god Men Karou (13 miles W. of Laodicea), there grew up a celebrated school of medicine. Its most famous medicines were an ointment made from spice nard, which strengthened the ears, and Phrygian powder, obtained by crushing Phrygian stone, which was used for the eyes (Rev 3^{1a}). There were many Jewish inhabitants of Laodicea, and the population as a whole was of very mixed race. There is a want of individuality about the life of this city, which has been called 'the city of compromise.' The church there was not founded by St. Paul, but probably by one of his coadjutors, perhaps Epaphras (cf. Col 4¹³). It was no doubt one of the cities which received the 'Epistle to the Ephesians' (Col 4¹⁶), as well as the Epistle to the Colossians (Col 4¹⁶). It was one of the 'seven churches' of the Apocalypse (3¹⁴⁻²²). Its condemnation is perhaps the severest of all. A. SOUTER.

LAPPIDOTH ('torches' or 'lightning flashes').—The husband of Deborah the prophetess (Jg 4⁴). Some commentators take the term to be descriptive of the character of Deborah, 'a woman of lightning flashes.' In favour of this they urge the feminine termination -oth, but the same termination is found elsewhere to men's names, e.g. Meremoth. T. A. MOXON.

LAPWING.—See HOOPOE.

LASCIVIOUSNESS.—The Greek word so translated in Mk 7² etc. is translated 'wantonness' in Ro 13¹³. This is the translation in the VSS before AV in nearly all the passages where AV has 'lasciviousness.' The idea of the Gr. word is shameless conduct of any kind.

LASEA is mentioned by St. Luke (Ac 27⁸), but by no other ancient author. It was the nearest town to Fair Havens in Crete, but it was 5 miles away, and this, apart from the inconvenience of the roadstead, would explain the reluctance of the captain of St. Paul's ship to winter there. The ruins of Lasea were examined in 1856,—the site still bears the ancient name. A. E. HILLARD.

LASHA (Gn 10¹⁹) marked the S.E. boundary of the land of the Canaanites. Jerome identified it with the hot springs of Callirrhoe, in the Wādī Zerqā Ma'nā. Wellhausen would identify it with Laish, on the N. frontier. There is nothing to support this but the resemblance in the name. Again, it is the order in which the names occur. It cannot now be identified. W. EWING.

LASSHARON.—A town taken by Joshua (12¹⁸). LXX B reads here 'the king of Aphek in Sharon.' The Onomasticon gives the name of 'Sharon' to a second district, viz. that between Mount Tabor and Tiberias. The name Sarōna attaches to an ancient site on the plateau, 6½ miles S.W. of Tiberias, which may possibly represent Lassharon (Conder). W. EWING.

LASTHENES.—An officer of high rank, 'kinsman' (1 Mac 11²¹) and 'father' (v. 32) of Demetrius II. He raised a body of Cretan mercenaries, and enabled Demetrius to land in Cilicia, and wrest the throne of Syria from Alexander Balas (Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 3; cf. 1 Mac 10⁶⁷). When Demetrius was endeavouring to make terms with Jonathan the Maccabean, he wrote to Lasthenes in favour of the Jews, and forwarded a copy of his letter to the Jewish prince (1 Mac 11²⁹⁻³⁷).

LATCHET.—See DRESS, § 6.

LATIN.—In such provinces as Judæa the Latin language alone had place in official acts and Roman courts. Where Greek was allowed in court pleadings, it was, so to speak, an act of grace on the judge's part, and there can be little doubt that, e.g., the speech of Tertullus in Ac 24 was in Latin. The Latin words used in a Greek form in the NT are mainly administrative, legal, or military (e.g. census, custodia, prætorium, colonia, libertinus, centurio, legio), or names of Roman coins (denarius, quadrans), but the total number of such Latin words occurring is only about 25. The Gentile names adopted by Jews were generally of Greek form (e.g. Philip)—a Latin form like the name of St. Paul was an exception (to be expected perhaps with one so proud of Roman citizenship). Throughout Palestine, while Latin was the language of the administration, Greek was the main language of commerce, and Aramaic the language of common intercourse among Jews. Hence we find all three languages used for the superscription on the cross (Lk 23³⁸). A. E. HILLARD.

LATIN VERSIONS.—See TEXT (of OT and NT) and VULGATE.

LATTICE.—See HOUSE, § 7.

LAUD.—In Ro 15¹¹ the AV has 'Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people.' The Gr. vbs. being different, two different Eng. vbs. are used. But the RV turns 'laud' into 'praise.' In the OT, however, 'laud' and 'praise' are both used in order to distinguish two Heb. vbs., as in Ps 117¹ 145¹, though not quite consistently. In Ps 147¹³ the difference between the verbs is ignored.

LAUGHTER.—Laughter is used in the Bible in three ways. (1) It is opposed to weeping, as Ec 3¹⁷, Job 8²¹, Ps 126⁷, Lk 6²¹. (2) It expresses incredulity, as Gn 17¹⁷ 18¹². (3) It signifies derision, as Ps 2¹⁴, Bel 1⁹.

LAVER.—See TABERNACLE, § 4, TEMPLE, § 6 (d).

LAW (IN OT).—1. That the 'law was given by Moses' (Jn 1¹⁷) represents the unanimous belief both of the early Christians and of the Chosen Nation. He was their first as well as their greatest law-giver; and in this matter religious tradition is supported by all the historical probabilities of the case. The Exodus and the subsequent wanderings constitute the formative epoch of Israel's career: it was the period of combination and adjustment between the various tribes towards effecting a national unity. Such periods necessitate social experiments, for no society can hold together without some basis of permanent security; no nation could be welded together, least of all a nation in ancient times, without some strong sense of corporate responsibilities and corporate religion. It therefore naturally devolved upon Moses to establish a central authority for the administration of justice, which should be universally accessible and universally recognized. There was only one method by which any such universal recognition could be attained; and that was by placing the legal and judicial system upon the basis of an appeal to that religion, which had already been successful in rousing the twelve tribes to a sense of their unity, and which, moreover, was the one force which could and did effectually prevent the disintegration of the heterogeneous elements of which the nation was composed.

2. We see the beginning and character of these legislative functions in Ex 18¹⁵, where Moses explains how 'the people come unto me to inquire of God: when they have a matter they come unto me; and I judge between a man and his neighbour, and make them know the statutes of God, and his laws (toroth).' Originally torah (the usual word in the OT for 'law') meant, as in this passage, oral instruction or direction. This kind of torah survived for long in Israel. It was a 'method strictly practical and in precise conformity with the genius and requirements of primitive nations,' W. R. Smith (OTJC 339). Cases of exceptional difficulty were brought to the sanctuary, and the decisions there given were accepted as emanating from the Divine Judge of Israel (cf. 1 S 22⁸; and, for the use of 'Elohim' to signify the judges speaking in Jehovah's name, cf. Ex 21⁶ 22⁷). The cases thus brought 'before God' may be divided into three classes, as they dealt respectively with (1) matters of moral obligation, (2) civil suits, (3) ritual difficulties. We read that Moses found it necessary to devolve some of this administrative work upon various elders, whom he associated with himself in the capacity of law-givers.

In this connexion it is important to remember that—until they affected the whole nation. (c) Such oral direction in no sense excludes the idea of any previous laws, or even of a written code. The task of the judges was not so much to create as to interpret. The existence and authority of a law would still leave room for doubt in matters of individual application. (d) As social life became more complex, the three divisions of the torah became more specialized; civil suits were tried by the judge; the prophets almost confined themselves to giving oral direction on moral duties; the priests were concerned mainly with the solution of ritual difficulties. Cf. JUSKICE (II.).

(a) These decisions were orally given. (b) Although binding only on the parties concerned, and in their case only so far as they chose to submit to the ruling of the judge, or as the latter could enforce his authority, yet with the increasing power of the executive government such decisions soon acquired the force of consuetudinary law for a wider circle.

Here, then, we can trace the character of Hebrew legislation in its earliest stages. Law (torah) means oral direction, gradually crystallizing into consuetudinary law, which, so far from excluding, may almost be said to demand, the idea of a definite code as the basis of its interpretative function. Finally, when these directions were classified and reduced to writing (cf. Hos 8¹²), torah came to signify such a collection; and ultimately the same word was used as a convenient and comprehensive term for the whole Pentateuch, in which all the most important legal collections were carefully included.

3. The torah of the Prophets was moral, not ceremonial. The priests, while by their office necessarily much engaged in ceremonial and ritual actions, nevertheless had boundless opportunities for giving the worshippers true direction on the principles underlying their religious observances; and it is for their neglect of such opportunities, and not, as is often crudely maintained, on account of any inherently necessary antagonism between priestly and prophetic ideals, that the prophets so frequently rebuke the priests,—not because of the fulfilment of their priestly (i.e. ceremonial) duties, but because of the non-fulfilment of their prophetic (i.e. moral) opportunities. For the priests claimed Divine sanction for their worship, and tradition ascribed the origin of all priestly institutions to Mosaic (or Aaronic) authorship. This the prophets do not deny; but they do deny that the distinctive feature of the Sinaitic legislation lay in anything but its moral excellence. In this connexion the words of Jeremiah cannot be quoted too often: 'I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices; but this thing I commanded them, saying—Hear my voice, . . . and walk ye in the way that I command you' (Jer 7²³⁻²⁵). The correct interpretation of Am 5²¹⁻²⁶ corroborates Jeremiah's contention. It is wholly unwarrantable to say that the prophets condemned the sacrificial system, or denied its worth and Divine sanction; but, on the other hand, we are justified in asserting that the torah of Jehovah, 'the law of the Lord,' meant to the prophets something wholly different from the punctilious observance of traditional ceremonies; and what is more, they appeal without fear of contradiction to the contents of the Mosaic legislation as completely establishing their conviction that it was in the sphere of morality, rather than in the organizing of worship, that the essence of Jehovah's law was to be found.

4. With this test (as well as with the considerations proposed in § 1) the character of the Decalogue is found to be in complete agreement. Its Mosaic origin has indeed been questioned, on the ground that such an ethical standard is wholly at variance with the 'essentially ritualistic character' of primitive religions. To this it may be replied: we cannot call the prophets as witnesses for the truth of two mutually contradictory propositions. Having already cited the prophets in disproof of the Mosaic authorship of the Levitical legislation, on the ground that the latter is essentially ritualistic (and therefore does not correspond to the prophets' view of the Law of Moses), it is monstrously unfair to deny the Sinaitic origin of what is left in conformity with the prophetic standard, on the ground that it ought to be 'essentially ritualistic' also, and is not.

We have rightly had our attention called to the witness of the prophets. But the weight of their evidence against the early elaboration of the ceremonial law is exactly proportioned to the weight attached to their evidence for the existence and authenticity of the moral code.

A more serious difficulty, however, arises from the fact that we have apparently three accounts of the Decalogue, exhibiting positively astounding divergences (Ex 20, Dt 5, and Ex 34). The differences between Ex 20 and Dt 5 are not hard to explain, as the Ten Words themselves are in each case identical, and it is only in the explanatory comments that the differences are marked. Stylistic peculiarities, as well as other considerations, seem to show that these latter are subsequent editorial additions, and that originally the Decalogue contained no more than the actual commandments, without note or explanation. It is, however, most instructive to observe that no theory of inspiration or literary scruples prevented the editors from incorporating into their account of the Ten Words of God to Moses, the basis of all Hebrew legislation, such comments and exhortations as they considered suitable to the needs of their own times. The difficulty with regard to Ex 34, where a wholly different set of laws seems to be called 'The Ten Words,' has not been solved. Hypotheses of textual displacement abound (cf. OTJC² 336), others confidently assert that the author 'manifestly intends to allude to the Decalogue' (Driver, LOT² 39), while some scholars have suggested, with much force and ingenuity, that we have in Ex 20-23 and 34 a series of abbreviations, re-arrangements, and expansions of ten groups of ten laws each. No final solution has yet been reached; but we may hold with confidence that the traditional account of the Decalogue is correct, and that the Ten Commandments in their original and shorter form were promulgated by Moses himself. On this basis the law of Israel rests, and in the Pentateuch we can distinguish the attempts made from time to time to apply their principles to the life of the people.

5. The Book of the Covenant (Ex 20²²⁻²³) is a collection of 'words' and 'judgments' arising out of the needs of a very simple community. The frequent mention of the ox, the ass, and the sheep proves that this code of law was designed for an agricultural people. The state of civilization may be inferred from the fact that the principles of civil and criminal justice are all comprehended under the two heads of retaliation and pecuniary compensation (cf. OTJC² 340). Religious institutions also are in an undeveloped and archaic stage. The laws, however, recognize, and even insist upon, the claims of humanity and justice. It is possible that the original code may have been promulgated at Sinai; but if so, it has received considerable expansions to suit the agricultural requirements, which first became part of Israel's daily life in the early years of the occupation of Canaan.

6. The Law of Deuteronomy shows a civilization far in advance of that contemplated in the preceding code. Life is more complex; and religious problems unknown to an earlier generation demand and receive full treatment. It is not difficult to fix its approximate date. In the year B.C. 621, king Josiah inaugurated a national reformation resulting from the discovery of a Book of the Law in the Temple. All the evidence points to this book being practically identical with Deuteronomy; all the reforms which Josiah inaugurated were based upon laws practically indistinguishable from those we now possess in the Deuteronomic Code; in fact, no conclusion of historical or literary criticism has been reached more nearly approaching to absolute certainty than that the Book of the Law brought to light in 621 was none other than the fifth book of the Pentateuch.

But was it written by Moses?—(i.) The book itself nowhere makes such a claim. (ii.) The historical situation (suited the times of the later monarchy) is not merely anticipated, but actually presupposed. (iii.) The linguistic evidence points to 'a long development of the art of public oratory.' (iv.) The religious standpoint is that of, e.g., Jeremiah rather than Isaiah. (v.) Some of its chief provisions appear to have been entirely unknown before 600; even the most fervid champions of prophetism before that date seem to have systematically violated the central law of the one sanctuary. (vi.) While subsequent writers show abundant traces of Deuteronomic influence, we search in vain for any such traces in earlier literature. On the contrary, Deut. is itself seen to be an attempt to realize in a legal code those great principles which had been so emphatically enunciated by Hosea and Isaiah.

The laws of Deuteronomy are, however, in many instances much earlier than the 7th century. The Book of the Covenant supplies much of the groundwork; and the antiquity of others is independently attested. It is not so much the substance (with perhaps the exception of (a) below) as the expansions and explanations that are new. A law-book must be kept up to date if it is to have any practical value, and in Deuteronomy we have 'a prophetic re-formulation and adaptation to new needs of an older legislation' (LOT² 91).

The main characteristics of Deut. are to be found in—
(a) The Law of the one Sanctuary, which aimed at the total extinction of the worship of the high places. By confining the central act of worship, i.e. the rite of sacrifice, to Jerusalem, this law certainly had put an end to the syncretistic tendencies which constituted a perpetual danger to Israelitish religion; but while establishing monotheism, it also somewhat impoverished the free religious life of the common people, who had aforesaid learned at all times and in all places to do sacrifice and hold communion with their God.

(b) The wonderful humanity which is so striking a feature of these laws. The religion of Jehovah is not confined to worship, but is to be manifested in daily life; and as God's love is the great outstanding fact in Israel's history, so the true Israelite must show love for God, whom he has not seen, by loving his neighbour, whom he has seen. Even the animals are to be treated with consideration and kindness.

(c) The evangelical fervour with which the claims of Jehovah upon Israel's devotion are urged. He is so utterly different from the dead heathen divinities. He is a living, loving God, who cannot be satisfied with anything less than the undivided heart-service of His children.

It is not surprising that Deuteronomy should have been especially dear to our Lord (cf. Mt 4), or that He should have 'proclaimed its highest word as the first law no longer for Judah, but for the world' (Mt 12³⁵⁻⁴⁰, Dt 6⁴⁻⁵) [Carpenter, quoted by Driver, Deut. p. xxxiv.].

7. The Law of Holiness (Lv 17-26) is a short collection of laws embedded in Leviticus. The precepts of this code deal mainly with moral and ceremonial matters, and hardly touch questions of civil and criminal law. We should notice especially the prominence of agricultural allusions, the multiplication of ritual regulations, the conception of sin as impurity, and, again, the predominance of humanitarian principles.

8. The Priestly Code, comprising the concluding chapters of Exodus, the whole of Leviticus, and other portions of the Hexateuch, probably represents a determined attempt to give practical effect to the teaching of Ezekiel. We may approximately fix its date by observing that some of its fundamental institutions are unknown to, and even contradicted by, the Deuteronomic legislation. On the other hand, the influence of Ezekiel is prominent. The Priestly editor, or school, lays special stress on the ceremonial institutions of Israelite worship. We must not, however, conclude that they are therefore all post-exilic. On the contrary, the origin of a great number is demonstrably of high antiquity; but their elaboration is of a far more modern date. It is sometimes customary to sneer at the Priestly Code as a mass of 'Levitical deterioration.' It would be as justifiable to quote the rubrics of the Prayer Book as a fair representation of the moral teaching of the Church of England. As a matter of fact, P does not profess to supplant, or even to supplement, all other laws. The editor has simply collected the details of ceremonial legislation, and the rubrics of Temple worship, with some account of their origin and purpose. In later history, the expression of Israel's religion through Temple services acquired an increased significance. If the national life and faith were to be preserved, it was absolutely essential that the ceremonial law should be developed in order to mark the distinctive features of the Jewish creed. It is argued that such a policy is in direct contradiction to the universalistic teaching of the earlier prophets. That may be so, but cosmopolitanism at this stage would have meant not the diffusion but the destruction of Jewish religion. It was only by emphasizing their national peculiarities that they were able to concentrate their attention, and consequently to retain a firm hold, upon their distinctive truths. Ezekiel's ideal city was named 'Jehovah is there' (48³). P seeks to realize this ideal. All the laws, all the ceremonies, are intended to stamp this conviction indelibly upon Israel's imagination, 'Jehovah is there.' Therefore the sense of sin must be deepened, that sin may be removed; therefore the need of purification must be constantly proclaimed, that the corrupting and disintegrating influences of surrounding heathenism may not prevail against the remnant of the holy people; therefore the ideal of national holiness must be sacramentally symbolized, and, through the symbol, actually attained.

9. It must be plain that such stress on ritual enactments inevitably facilitated the growth of formalism and hypocrisy. We know that in our Lord's time the weightier matters of the law were systematically neglected, while the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, together with similar subtleties and refinements, occupied the attention of the lawyer and exhausted the energies of the zealous. But our Lord did not abrogate the law either in its ceremonial or in its moral injunctions. He came to fulfil it, that is, to fill it full, to give the substance, where the law was only a shadow of good things to come. He declared that not one jot or tittle should pass away till all things were accomplished; that is to say, until the end for which the law had been ordained should be reached. It took people some time to see that by His Incarnation and the foundation of the Christian Church that end had been gained; and that by His fulfilment He had made the law of none effect—not merely abrogating distinctions between meats, but transferring man's whole relation to God into another region than that of law.

10. 'The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.' The impossibility of ever fulfilling its multitudinous requirements had filled the more earnest with despair. There it remained confronting the sinner with his sin; but its pitiless 'Thou shalt' and 'Thou shalt not' gave him no comfort and no power of resistance. The law was as cold and hard as the tables on which it was inscribed. It taught the meaning of sin, but gave no help as to how sin was to be overcome. The sacrificial system attempted to supply the want; but it was plain that the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sin. In desperation the law-convicted sinner looked for a Saviour to deliver him from this body of death, and that Saviour he found in Christ. The law had been his 'pedagogue,' and had brought him to the Master from whom he could receive that help and grace it had been powerless to bestow. But Christianity not merely gave power; it altered man's whole outlook on the world. The Jews lived under the law; they were the unwilling subjects of an inexorable despotism; the law was excellent in itself, but to them it remained something external; obedience was not far removed from bondage and fear. The prophets realized the inadequacy of this legal system; it was no real appeal to man's highest nature; it did not spring from the man's own heart; and so they prophesied of the New Covenant when Jehovah's laws should be written in the heart, and His sin-forgiving grace should remove all elements of servile fear (cf. esp.

Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴); but it was only the hard discipline of the law that made them realize the necessity and superiority of a more spiritual covenant between man and his God.

11. A word may be said about the giving of the law. Whatever physical disturbances may have accompanied its original proclamation, it is not upon such natural phenomena that its claims to the homage of mankind are based. It is, in a manner, far more miraculous that God should at that early age, among those half-civilized tribes, have written these laws by His spirit on man's conscience and understanding, than that amid thunder and flame He should have inscribed them with His own fingers upon two tables of stone. The Old Testament itself teaches us that we may look in vain for God among the most orthodox manifestations of a theophany, and yet hear Him speaking in the still, small voice. Miracle is not the essence of God's revelation to us, though it may accompany and authenticate His message. The law stands because the Saviour, in laying down for us the correct lines of its interpretation, has sealed it with the stamp of Divine approval, but also because the conscience and reason of mankind have recognized in its simplicity and comprehensiveness a sublime exposition of man's duty to his God and to his neighbour; because 'by manifestation of the truth it has commended itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God' (cf. 2 Co 4⁵).

ERNEST ARTHUR EDGHELL.

LAW (IN NT).—This subject will be treated as follows: (1) the relation of Jesus Christ to the OT Law; (2) the doctrine of law in St. Paul's Epistles; (3) the complementary teaching of Hebrews; (4) the attitude of St. James representing primitive Jewish Christianity.

1. Our Lord stated His position in the saying of Mt 5¹⁷: 'I did not come to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfil.' The expression covers the whole contents of Divine Scripture (sometimes, for brevity, spoken of simply as 'the law'; see Jn 10³⁴ 15²⁶), which He does not mean to invalidate in the least (Mt 5¹⁸), as the novelty of His teaching led some to suppose (see 7^{28f.}), but will vindicate and complete. But His 'fulfilment' was that of the Master, who knows the inner mind and real intent of the Scripture He expounds. It was not the fulfilment of one who rehearses a prescribed lesson or tracks out a path marked for him by predecessors, but the crowning of an edifice already founded, the carrying forward to their issue of the lines projected in Israelite revelation, the fulfilment of the blade and ear in 'the full corn.' Jesus penetrated the shell to reach the kernel of OT representations; and He regarded Himself—His Person, sacrifice, salvation, Kingdom—as the focus of manifold previous revelations (see Lk 4¹⁷⁻²¹ 16¹⁶ 24²⁷, Jn 1¹⁷ 6⁴⁵). The warning of Mt 5¹⁷⁻²⁰ was aimed at the Jewish legists, who dissolved the authority of the law, while jealously guarding its letter, by casuistical comments and smothering traditions, who put light and grave on a like footing, and blunted the sharpness of God's commands in favour of man's corrupt inclinations. The Corban formula, exposed in Mk 7¹⁻¹³, was a notorious instance of the Rabbinical quibbling that our Lord denounced. It is a severer not a laxer ethics that Jesus introduces, a searching in place of a superficial discipline; 'Your righteousness,' He says, 'must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees.'

Our Lord's fulfilment of 'the law'—i.e. in the stricter sense, the body of Mosaic statutes regulating Israelite life and worship—included (a) the personal and free submission to it, due to His birth and circumcision as a son of Israel (Gal 4¹; cf. Mt 3¹⁵ 8⁴ 15²⁶ 17²⁷, Lk 2^{21f.}).

His fulfilment included (b) the development of its unrecognized or partially disclosed principles. Thus Jesus asserted, in accordance with views already advanced among the scribes, that 'the whole law and the prophets hang on the two commandments' of love to God and to our neighbour (Mt 22³⁷⁻⁴⁰, Lk 10²⁶⁻²⁷)—the parable of the Good Samaritan gives to the second command an unprecedented scope. His distinction between 'the weightier matters' of 'justice, mercy, fidelity,' and the lighter of tithes and washings, was calculated to revolutionize current Judaism.

(c) A large part of the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5²¹⁻⁴⁸) is devoted to clearing the law from erroneous glosses and false applications: on each point Jesus sets His 'I say unto you' against what 'was said to the ancients'—mere antiquity goes for nothing; nor is He careful to distinguish here between the text of the written law and its traditional modifications. With each correction the law in His hands grows more stringent; its observance is made a matter of inner disposition, of intrinsic loyalty, not of formal conduct; the criterion applied to all law-keeping is that it shall 'proceed out of the heart.'

(d) Further, our Lord's fulfilment of the law necessitated the abrogation of temporary and defective statutes. In such instances the letter of the old precept stood only till it should be translated into a worthier form and raised to a higher potency (Mt 5¹⁸), by the sweeping away of limiting exceptions (as with the compromise in the matter of wedlock allowed to 'the hard-heartedness' of Israelites, Mt 19³⁻⁹), or by the translation of the symbolic into the spiritual, as when cleansing of hands and vessels is displaced by inner purification (Mk 7¹⁴⁻²³, Lk 11³⁷⁻⁴¹; cf. Col 2^{16f.}, He 9¹⁴). Our Lord's reformation of the marriage law is also a case for (b) above: He rectifies the law by the aid of the law; in man's creation He finds a principle which nullifies the provisions that facilitated divorce. The abolition of the distinction of 'meats' (Mk 7¹⁹), making a rift in Jewish daily habits and in the whole Levitical scheme of life, is the one instance in which Jesus laid down what seemed to be a new principle of ethics. The maxim that 'what enters into the man from without cannot defile,' but only 'the things that issue out of the man,' was of far-reaching application, and supplied afterwards the charter of Gentile Christianity. Its underlying principle was, however, implicit in OT teaching, and belonged to the essence of the doctrine of Jesus. He could not consistently vindicate heart-religion without combating Judaism in the matter of its ablutions and food-regulations and Sabbath-keeping.

(e) Over the last question Jesus came into the severest conflict with Jewish orthodoxy; and in this struggle He revealed the consciousness, latent throughout His dealings with OT legislation, of being the sovereign, and not a subject like others, in this realm. Our Lord 'fulfilled the law' by sealing it with His own final authority. His 'I say unto you,' spoken in a tone never assumed by Moses or the prophets, implied so much and was so understood by His Apostles (1 Co 7¹⁹, Gal 6², 1 Jn 2^{5f.} etc.). Christ arrogates the rôle of 'a son over his house,' whereas Moses was 'a servant in the house' (He 3^{1f.}). Assuming to be 'greater than Solomon,' 'than Abraham,' 'than the temple' (Mt 12⁶⁻⁹, Jn 8³³), He acted as one greater than Moses! The Sabbath-law was the chosen battle-ground between Him and the established masters in Israel (Mk 2²³⁻²⁴ 3², Lk 13¹⁰⁻¹⁷, Jn 5⁹⁻¹⁶). In the public Sabbath assemblies Jesus was oftenest confronted with cases of disease and demoniacal possession; He must do His work as God's 'sent' physician. The Sabbath-rules were clear and familiar; His infraction of them in acts of healing was flagrant, repeated, defiant; popular reverence for the day made accusations on this count particularly dangerous. Men were placed in a dilemma: the Sabbath-breaker is ipso facto 'a sinner'; on the other hand, 'how can a sinner do such signs?' (Jn 9¹⁶ 34⁵). Jesus argues the matter on legal grounds, showing from recognized practice that the 4th Commandment must be construed with common sense, and that 'it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day' and to work in the service of God (Mt 12^{1-11f.}). He goes behind those examples to the governing principle (see (b) above), that 'the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath' (Mk 2^{27f.}); the institution is designed for human benefit, and its usages should be determined by its object. But He is not content with saying this: the war against Him was driven on th

Sabbath-question à outrance; Jesus draws the sword of His reserved authority. He claims, as sovereign in human affairs, to decide what is right in the matter—'The Son of Man is lord of the Sabbath'; more than this, He professes to have wrought His Sabbath works as God the Father does, to whom all days are alike in His beneficence, and through the insight of a Son watching the Father at His labour (Jn 5:17-20)—a pretension, to Jewish ears, of blasphemous arrogance: 'He maketh himself equal with God!' On this ground Jesus was condemned by the Sanhedrin (cf. Jn 19:7), because He set Himself above the Sabbath, on the strength of being one with God. Thus the law of Moses put Jesus Christ to death; it was too small to hold Him; its administrators thought themselves bound to inflict the capital sentence on One who said, 'I am the Son of the Blessed' (Mk 14:61f.).

(f) At the same time, Caiaphas, the official head of the system, gave another explanation, far deeper than he guessed, of the execution: 'That Jesus should die for the nation, and not for the nation only' (Jn 11:49f.). Virtually, He was offering Himself for 'the lamb' of the Paschal Feast, ready to be slain in sacrifice, that He might 'take away the sin of the world.' This mysterious relation of the death of Jesus to Divine law He had hinted at there and there (Mt 20:28, 26:28, Lk 22:27, Jn 3:14, 6:51, 12:24); its exposition was reserved for His Apostles speaking in the light of this grandest of all fulfillments. Jesus made good the implicit promise of the sacrificial institutions of Israel.

2. The word 'law' occurs 118 times in St. Paul's Epistles,—103 times in Romans and Galatians alone. It is manifest how absorbing an interest the subject had for this Apostle, and where that interest mainly lay. Gal 2:19 puts us at the centre of St. Paul's position: 'I through law died to law, that I might live to God.' From legalism, as from a house of bondage, he had escaped into the freedom of the sons of God. (a) Paul 'died to the law,' as he had understood and served it when a Pharisee, regarding obedience to its precepts as the sole ground of acceptance with God. He had sought there 'a righteousness of his own, even that which is of the law' (Ph 3:9), to be gained by 'works,' by which he strove to merit salvation as a 'debt' due from God for service rendered,—a righteousness such as its possessor could 'boast of as his own' (Ro 4:5, 9:11-10:3). Pursuing this path, 'Israel' had failed to win 'the righteousness of God,' such as is valid 'before God'; the method was impracticable—justification on the terms of 'the law of Moses' is unattainable (Ac 13:38f., Ro 8:2). Instead of destroying sin, the law arouses it to new vigour, 'multiplying' where it aimed at suppressing 'the trespass' (Ro 5:20, 7:12, 1 Co 15:56). Not the 'law' in itself, but the 'carnal' sin-bound nature of the man, is to blame for this; arrayed against 'the law of God,' to which 'reason' bows, is 'another law' successfully oppugning it, that 'of sin' which occupies 'my members' (Ro 7:12-23), and which is, in effect, a 'law of death' (8:2).

(b) But St. Paul's Judaistic experience had a positive as well as a negative result: if he 'died to law,' it was 'through law'; 'the law has proved our paedagogos [for leading us] to Christ' (Gal 3:24). Law awakened conscience and disciplined the moral faculties; the Jewish people were like 'an heir' placed 'under guardians and stewards until the appointed times,' and trained in bond-service with a view to their 'adoption' (Gal 4:1-5). Even the aggravations of sin caused by the law had their benefit, as they brought the disease to a head and reduced the patient to a state in which he was ready to accept the proffered remedy (Ro 7:4). 'The Scripture' had in this way 'shut up all things under sin,' blocking every door of escape and blighting every hope of a self-earned righteousness (Gal 3:12f.), that the sinner might accept unconditionally the 'righteousness which is through faith in Christ' (Ph 3:9).

(c) Contact with Gentile life had widened St. Paul's conception of moral law; it was touched by the influences of Greek philosophy and Roman government. He discerned a law established 'by nature,' and 'inscribed in the hearts' of men ignorant of the Mosaic Code and counting with Jews as 'lawless.' This Divine jus (and fas) gentium served, in a less distinct but very real sense, the purpose of the written law in Israel; it impressed on the heathen moral responsibility and the consciousness of sin (Ro 2:14-16). The rule of right and wrong Paul regards as a universal human institute, operating so as to 'bring the whole world under judgment before God' (Ro 3:19); its action is manifested by the universal incidence of death: in this sense, and in the light of 2:12-16, should be read the obscure parenthesis of Ro 5:13f., as stating that 'law' is concomitant with 'sin'; the existence of sin, followed by death, in the generations between Adam and Moses proves that law was there all along, whether in a less or a more explicit form; the connexion of sin and death in humanity is, in fact, a fundamental legal principle (Ro 8:3).

(d) Having 'died to law' by renouncing the futile salvation it appeared to offer, the Apostle had learned to live to it again in a better way and under a nobler form, since he had begun to 'live to God' in Christ. St. Paul is at the farthest remove from Antinomianism; the charge made against him on this score was wholly mistaken. While no longer 'under law,' he is 'not lawless toward God, but in law toward Christ' (Ro 6:14, 1 Co 9:21). The old ego, 'the flesh with its passions and lusts,' has been 'crucified with Christ' (Gal 2:20, 5:24). God's law ceases to press on him as an external power counteracted by 'the law of sin in the members'; the latter has been expelled by 'the Spirit of God's Son,' which 'forms Christ' in him; the new, Christian man is 'in law' as he is 'in Christ'—he sees the law now from the inside, in its unity and charm, and it constrains him with the inward force of 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus' possessing his nature. He 'serves' indeed, but it is 'in the new' life wrought 'of the Spirit, and not in the old' servitude to 'the letter' (Ro 7:6). Constituting now 'one new man,' believers of every race and rank 'through love serve one another,' as the hand serves the eye or the head the feet; for them 'the whole law is fulfilled in one word, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Ro 13:8-10, 1 Co 12:13, 21f., Gal 5:13f., Eph 2:15-16). The Christian 'fulfils the law of Christ,' as the limb the law of the head. Thus St. Paul's doctrine of the Law joins hands with that of Jesus (see 1 above). Thus also, in his system of thought, the law of God revealed in the OT, when received from Christ revised and spiritualized, and planted by 'faith' along with Him in the believer's heart (cf. Jer 31:31-34), becomes for the first time really valid and effective: 'Do we nullify law through faith? God forbid; nay,' he cries, 'we establish law!' (Ro 3:31).

(e) Neither Jesus nor Paul makes a formal distinction between the moral and the ceremonial law (see, however, Ro 9:4). St. Paul's teaching bears mainly on the former: as a Pharisee he had no ritualistic bent, and his ambition was for ethical perfection. 'Circumcision' has lost in his eyes all religious value, and remains a mere national custom, now that it ceases to be the covenant-sign and is replaced in this sense by baptism (1 Co 7:19f., Gal 6:15, Col 2:11f.). It becomes a snare to Gentiles when imposed on them as necessary to salvation, or even to advancement in the favour of God; for it binds them 'to keep the whole law' of Moses, and leads into the fatal path of 'justification by law' (Gal 2:3, 3:21, 5:4). St. Paul's contention with the legalists of Jerusalem on this question was a life and death struggle, touching the very 'truth of the gospel' and 'the freedom' of the Church (Ac 15:1-11, Gal 2:1-10, 5:1). The same interests were threatened, more insidiously, by the subsequent attempt, countenanced by Peter and Barnabas at Antioch, to separate Jewish from Gentile Christians at table through the re-assertion of the Mosaic distinction of 'meats' which had been expressly discarded by Jesus. The assumption of a privileged legal status within the Church meant the surrender of the whole principle of salvation by faith and of Christian sainthood (Gal 2¹¹⁻²¹, Ro 14^{17f.}, 1 Co 8⁸; cf. Mk 7¹⁴⁻²³). In some Churches Paul had to deal with the inculcation of Jewish ritual from another point of view. At Colossæ the dietary rules and sacred seasons of Mosaicism were imposed on grounds of ascetic discipline, and of reverence towards angelic (scil. astral) powers; he pronounces them valueless in the former respect, and in the latter treasonous towards Christ, who supplies 'the body' of which those prescriptions were but a 'shadow' (Col 2¹⁶⁻²²).

3. Col 2¹⁷ forms a link between the doctrine of St. Paul on the Law and the complementary teaching of the writer of Hebrews,—a Jew of very different temperament and antecedents from Saul of Tarsus. This author emphasizes the ceremonial, as Paul the moral, factors of the OT: the Temple, not the synagogue, was for him the centre of Judaism. 'The first covenant,' he says, 'had ordinances of divine service,' providing for and guarding man's approach to God in worship (He 9¹ etc.); for St. Paul, it consisted chiefly of 'commandments expressed in ordinances' (Eph 2¹⁵), which prescribe the path of righteousness in daily life. 'The law' means for this great Christian thinker the institutions of the Israelite priesthood, sanctuary, sacrifices—all consummated in Christ and His 'one offering,' by which 'he has perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (He 9¹⁴-10¹⁴). In his view, the law is superseded as the imperfect, provisional, and ineffective, by the perfect, permanent, and satisfying, as the shadowy outline by the full image of things Divine (7^{18f.} 8¹⁻⁴ 10¹⁻⁴); 'the sanctuary of this world' gives place to 'heaven itself,' revealed as the temple where the 'great high priest'—Divine-human in person, sinless in nature, perfected in experience, and immeasurably superior to the Aaronic order (4^{14f.} 7^{26f.})—appears before the face of God for us, 'having entered through the virtue of his own blood' as our 'surety' and 'the mediator of' our 'covenant,' who has won for mankind 'an eternal redemption' (2¹ 7²⁵ 8⁴ 9²⁴⁻²⁵). Jesus thus 'inaugurated a new and living way into the holy place' (in contrast with the old and dead way of the law); as experience proves, He has 'cleansed the conscience from dead works to serve the living God,' while the law with its repeated animal sacrifices served to remind men of their sins rather than to remove them (7²⁵ 9¹⁴ 10¹⁻⁴). Equally with St. Paul, the author ad Hebrews regards 'remission of sins' as the initial blessing of the Christian state, which had been unattainable 'under law,' and 'the blood of Christ' as the means of procuring this immense boon. In Paul's interpretation, this offering 'justifies' the unrighteous 'before God' and restores them to the forfeited status of sonship; in the interpretation of Hebrews, it 'cleanses' worshippers and brings them 'nigh to God' within His sanctuary; on either view, the sacrifice of Calvary removes the barriers set up, by man's sin 'under the law,' between humanity and God.

4. For St. James also the OT law was transformed. He conceives the change in a less radical fashion than Paul or the writer of Hebrews; James stands sturdily on the platform of the Sermon on the Mount. Re-cast by 'the Lord of glory' and charged with 'the wisdom that cometh from above,' the law is new and glorified in his eyes; like Paul, he knows it as 'the law of Christ.' All the disciples of Jesus were one in the place they gave to that which James calls 'the sovereign law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (2⁸⁻¹³; cf. 1 Co 13); deeds of pure brotherly love prove 'faith' alive and genuine; they make it 'perfect,' and guarantee the believer's 'justification' (ch. 2). When he describes this law as 'a perfect law, the law of liberty,' James' idea is substantially that of Paul in 1 Co 9²¹ and Ro 8², viz. that the law of God is no yoke compelling the Christian man from without, but a life actuating him from within; the believer 'bends over it' in contemplation, till he grows one with it (1²; cf. 2 Co 3¹⁸). 'The tongue' is the index of the heart, and St. James regards its control as a sure sign of perfection in law-keeping (3¹⁻¹²). James treats of the law, not, like Paul, as it affects the sinner's standing before God,—nor, like the author of Hebrews, as it regulates his approach in worship,—but as it governs the walk before God of the professed believer. His Epistle is, in effect, a comment on the last clause of Ro 8⁴, 'that the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled in us.'

5. The word 'law' is entirely wanting in the Epistles of St. Peter and of St. John. 1 P 1¹⁸. 1²⁴ 3¹⁸ manifest the influence of Paul's doctrine of salvation on the writer; while 1 Jn 1⁷. 9 indicates a leaning to the mode of representation characteristic of Hebrews, and 1 Jn 2¹ and 4¹⁰ virtually sustain the doctrine of St. Paul on law, sin, and sacrifice. G. G. FINDLAY.

LAWGIVER.—The word is found six times in the AV of the OT (Gn 49¹⁰, Nu 21¹⁸, Dt 33²¹, Ps 67¹ 108⁸, Is 33²²). The Heb. mēchōḡēg, which it translates, is from a root meaning to 'cut' or 'engrave,' and hence to 'enact' a law, afterwards to be engraved on the public archives. The Heb. word appears to have two meanings: (1) 'ruler'; so in Dt 33²¹, where RVm gives 'ruler,' and in Is 33²², where the parallelism shows the meaning—'Jehovah is our judge, Jehovah is our lawgiver.' (2) 'Ruler's staff'; so in Gn 49¹⁰, where the word is parallel to 'sceptre,' and in Ps 67¹ 108⁸, where the RV renders it 'Judah is my sceptre.'

In the NT the word 'lawgiver' (Gr. nomothētēs) is found once only (Ja 4¹²); there it is applied to God as 'the lawgiver and judge,' who is regarded as the Supreme Source of all law. Other passages (He 7¹¹, Ro 9⁴) where kindred Gr. words are used, have a reference to the law of Moses, or, to be more exact, the law of Israel.

T. A. MOXON.

LAWYER.—This term in Scripture does not belong so much to the legal as to the religious sphere. The 'lawyers' busied themselves with the study and exposition of the Written and the Oral Law of Israel, and were practically identical with the scribes (wh. see).

LAYING ON OF HANDS.—This ceremony, of frequent occurrence in both OT and NT, is a piece of natural symbolism with the central idea that through physical contact the person performing it identifies himself with the other in the presence of God. In OT this is done with a view to the transference (a) of a Divine blessing (Gn 48^{14f.}; cf. Nu 27¹⁸. 22, Dt 34⁹); (b) of a burden of guilt (Lv 1⁴ 4^{3f.} 24 16^{21f.} etc.). In NT, while it is variously employed, the general idea is always that of blessing.

1. The simplest case is when Jesus lays hands of blessing on the little children (Mt 19¹³. 15 ||). The fact that the mothers desired Him to do so shows that this was a custom of the time and people. The narrative in Mt. shows further that, as used by Jesus, it was no magical form, but the symbolic expression of what was essentially an act of prayer (19¹³).

2. In His deeds of healing Jesus constantly made use of this symbol (Mk 6⁸ 8²³, Lk 4⁴⁰ 13¹³; cf. Mt 9¹⁸ ||, Mk 7³²)—an example which was followed by the Apostolic Church (Ac 9¹². 17 28⁸). In these cases, however, besides its religious symbolism, the act may further have expressed the healer's sympathy (cf. the hand laid even on the leper, Mk 1⁴, Lk 5¹³), or have been designed to bring a reinforcement to faith.

3. In the early Church the imposition of hands was used, sometimes in close association with the act of baptism (Ac 9¹⁷. 18 19⁶. 5; cf. He 6², which, however, may include all the various kinds of laying on of hands), but sometimes quite apart from it (Ac 8¹⁷. 19), as an accompaniment of prayer that believers might receive a special endowment of the Holy Ghost in charismatic forms. That this endowment does not mean the essential gift of spiritual life, but some kind of 'manifestation' (1 Co 12⁷), is proved when Ac 9¹⁷ ('filled with the Holy Ghost') is compared with Ac 2⁴, and when 8^{16, 17} is read in the light of the request of Simon Magus (v. 18²), and 19² in the light of 19⁹. The case of Ananias and Saul (9¹⁷) further proves that the laying on of hands for this purpose was not a peculiar Apostolic prerogative.

4. In four passages the laying on of hands is referred to in connexion with an act that corresponds to ordination (the word in its ecclesiastical sense does not occur in NT. 'Ordained' in Ac 14²² should be 'elected' or 'appointed'; see RV). The Seven, after being chosen by the multitude, were appointed to office by the Apostles, with prayer and the laying on of hands (Ac 6⁶). The 'prophets and teachers' of the Church at Antioch 'separated' Barnabas and Saul for their missionary work by laying their hands on them with fasting and prayer (13³). Timothy received the 'gracious gift' which was in him with the laying on of the hands of a body of elders (see art. PRESBYTERY), with which St. Paul himself was associated (cf. 1 Ti 4¹⁴ with 2 Ti 1⁶). Timothy's 'gracious gift' probably means his special fitness to be St. Paul's companion in the work of a missionary evangelist (see Hort, Chr. Ecclesia, p. 184 ff.).

5. Of the manner in which deacons and elders or bishops were set apart to office no information is given in NT. The injunction, 'Lay hands suddenly on no man' (1 Ti 5²²), has often been supposed to refer to the act of ordination; but the fact that the whole passage (vv. 12-22) deals with offenders points rather to the imposition of hands in the restoration of the penitent (cf. 2 Co 2⁴, Gal 6¹), a custom that certainly prevailed in the early Church at a later time. The fact, however, that Jewish Rabbis employed this rite when a disciple was authorized to teach, favours the view that it was commonly practised in the Apostolic Church, as it was almost universally in the post-Apostolic, in consecration to ministerial office. But the silence of the NT at this point is against the supposition that the rite was regarded as an essential channel of ministerial grace, or anything more than the outward and appropriate symbol of an act of intercessory prayer (see Mt 19¹³, Ac 6¹³ 28⁸; and cf. Augustine, de Baptismo, iii. 16, 'What else is the laying on of hands than a prayer over one?'). See, further, art. BISHOP. J. C. LAMBERT.

LAZARUS.—A common Jewish name, a colloquial abbreviation of Eleeazar.

1. The brother of Martha and Mary, the friend of Jesus (Jn 11^{2, 11, 20}, where 'love' and 'friend' represent the same root in Greek). The family lived at Bethany, a village within two miles of Jerusalem just over the brow of Olivet. Lazarus was the subject of the greatest miracle of the Gospel story (Jn 11¹⁻⁴⁴). In the last year of His ministry Jesus sojourned at Jerusalem from the Feast of Tabernacles in October to that of the Dedication in December; and, on being driven out by the violence of the rulers (Jn 10^{31, 39}), He retired to 'Bethany beyond Jordan' (10⁴⁰; cf. 12² RV). A crowd followed Him thither, and in the midst of His beneficent activities of teaching and healing tidings reached Him that His friend had fallen sick. He might have responded immediately to the sisters' appeal either by hastening to their home and laying His hand on the sick man, or by sending forth His word of power and healing him across the intervening distance of some twenty miles (cf. Jn 4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴, Mt 15²¹⁻²⁸—Mk 7²⁴⁻³⁰). But He did neither; He remained where He was for two days, until Lazarus was dead. He desired not only to manifest His power to His friends, but to make a signal appeal to impenitent Jerusalem, by working a miracle which would attest His Messiahship beyond all question.

At length He set forth. If the messenger started in the morning, he would reach Jesus the same evening.

Jesus stayed two days, and setting out early would arrive on the evening of the fourth day. Thus on His arrival Lazarus had been dead four days (v. 39). In that sultry climate burial followed immediately on death, and it sometimes happened that a swoon was mistaken for death, and the buried man came to life again. The Jewish belief was that the soul hovered about the sepulchre for three days, vain to re-animate its clay. On the fourth day decomposition set in, and hope was then abandoned. Jesus arrived on the fourth day, and there was no doubt of the reality of Lazarus' death and of the ensuing miracle. It was not a recovery from a trance, but a veritable resurrection. He went to the rock-hewn sepulchre, and in presence of the sisters and a large company of mourners, including many of the rulers who had come from the adjacent capital to testify their esteem for the good Lazarus and their sympathy with Martha and Mary (v. 19), summoned the dead man forth and restored him, alive and well, to his home. It was a startling miracle. It made a profound impression on the multitude, but it only exasperated the rulers. They convened a meeting of the Sanhedrin and determined to put Jesus to death (vv. 47-53).

He retired to Ephraim near the frontier of Samaria, and stayed there until the Passover drew near; then He set out for Jerusalem to keep the Feast and to die. Six days before it began (Jn 12¹), He reached Bethany, and despite the Sanhedrin's decree He received a great ovation. He was honoured with a banquet in the house of one of the leading men of the village. Simon, who had been a leper and had probably been healed by Jesus (Jn 12¹⁻¹¹—Mt 20²⁶⁻³²—Mk 14²⁻⁹), Lazarus was one of the company. The news of His arrival at Bethany reached Jerusalem, and next day the multitude thronged out and escorted Him in triumph into the city. It was the raising of Lazarus that excited their enthusiasm (Jn 12^{9, 17, 19}).

After this Lazarus appears no more in the Gospel story. Surely he of all men should have stood by Jesus at His trial and crucifixion; and the explanation of his absence is probably that he had been forced to flee. Observing the popular enthusiasm, the infuriated rulers had determined to put him also to death (Jn 12^{10, 11}). He would withdraw more for Jesus' sake than for his own. His presence only increased the Master's danger.

2. The beggar in our Lord's parable (Lk 16¹⁻¹³).—This is the only instance where Jesus gives a name to a parabolic character, and there was an idea in early times that it was not a parable but a story from real life. A name was found also for the rich man—Ninevis or Phinix. He is often styled Dives, but this is merely Latin for 'the Rich Man.' In fact, however, Lazarus is less a name than a definition. It means 'God has helped'; and Jesus calls the beggar Lazarus by way of indicating what commended him to God. He was not only poor but also diseased. It is, however, a mistaken notion that he was a leper (hence lazzaretto, lazar-house), for then he must have kept afar off and durst not have lain at the rich man's gateway.

The parable is a drama with two scenes: (1) The conditions of the Rich Man and the Beggar here—the former with his mansion, his fine clothing, his sumptuous table; and the latter lying at his gateway, full of sores, with none to tend him, hungrily eyeing the feast, and glad of any scraps that were flung to him. (2) Their conditions hereafter—a striking reversal: Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, i.e. the place of honour (cf. Jn 13²¹), at the heavenly feast; the Rich Man in Hades, thirsting for a drop of water.

The parable is clothed with Jewish imagery. 'Hell' in v. 23 is Hades, the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Sheol, the unseen world, where, according to Jewish theology, all souls good and bad alike, had their abode and received their due reward. It was an aggravation of the misery of the wicked that they had the felicity of the righteous continually in view (cf. Rev 14¹⁰). A feast, with Abraham the father of the faithful presiding, was the Jewish ideal of the felicity of the Messianic Kingdom (cf. Mt 8¹¹). Jesus, ever anxious to appeal to His hearers, has clothed His parable with this familiar imagery.

The purpose of the parable is not to condemn riches and exalt poverty in the spirit of Ebionitic asceticism. It is an enlargement of the Lord's admonition in v. 9: 'Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when it shall fail, they may receive you into the eternal tabernacles' (RV). The merit of Lazarus was not that he was poor, but that he had found his help in God; the offence of the Rich Man was not that he was rich, but that he lived a self-indulgent and luxurious life, regardless of the misery around him. Had he made friends to himself of Lazarus and others like him by means of his mammon of unrighteousness, he would have had a place and a welcome among them when he entered the unseen world. DAVID SMITH.

LEAD.—See MINING AND METALS.

LEAH.—The elder daughter of Laban, married to Jacob by stratagem (Gn 29²¹⁻²⁷). Jacob's love for her was less than for Rachel (v. 10); sometimes she is said to be hated (vv. 31-32). She was the mother of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and a daughter Dinah (29³¹⁻³² 30¹⁸⁻²⁰ 21). She was buried in the cave of Machpelah before Jacob went to Egypt (49³¹). She is mentioned in Ru 4¹. Her name probably means 'mistress,' equivalent to Assyrian li'at (Haupt, GGN, 1883, p. 100, and others). This is preferable to the view that it means 'wild cow,' from the Arabic, chiefly because the correspondence in form of the words is more exact. GEORGE R. BERRY.

LEASING.—A 'leasing' is a lie. Wyclif uses the word often. Thus Jn 8⁴⁴ 'Whanne he spekith a lesinge, he spekith of his owne thingis; for he is a lyere, and fadir of it.' The word occurs in AV in Ps 4² 5⁸ and 2 Es 14¹⁸.

LEATHER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 5.

LEAVEN.—The leaven both of OT and of NT may be assumed to have always consisted of a piece of fermented dough from a previous baking. There is no clear trace, even in the Mishna, of other sorts of leaven, such as the lees of wine or those enumerated by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xviii. 26). In ordinary cases, in the preparation of the household bread, the lump of dough, above referred to, was either broken down into the water in the kneading-trough (see BREAD) before the fresh flour was added, or it might be 'hid' in the latter and kneaded along with it, as in the parable, Mt 13³³. The bread made from dough thus prepared was 'leavened bread' (Ex 12¹⁸ and oft.); cakes made from flour without the addition of leaven received the special name mazzoth, 'unleavened cakes,' which gave their name to 'the feast of unleavened cakes' (Ex 23¹⁸ etc., EV 'unleavened bread').

The prohibition of leavened bread during the continuance of this Feast, including the Passover, is probably another illustration of conservatism in ritual, the nomadic ancestors of the Hebrews, like the Bedouin of the present day, having made their bread without leaven. The further exclusion of leaven from the offerings placed upon the altar of J^h—although admitted when the bread was to be eaten by the priests (Lv 7¹³ 23¹⁷)—is to be explained, like the similar exclusion of honey, from the standpoint that fermentation implied a process of corruption in the dough. The antiquity of this prohibition is attested by its occurrence in the earliest legislation (Ex 34²⁵ 23¹⁸). It does not seem to have been observed, however, in Amos' day in the Northern Kingdom (see the Comm. on Am 4⁵).

This antique view of leaven as (in Plutarch's words) 'itself the offspring of corruption, and corrupting the mass of dough with which it has been mixed,' is reflected in the figurative use of 'leaven' in such passages as Mt 13³³, and especially in the proverbial saying twice quoted by St. Paul, 'a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump' (1 Co 5⁶, Gal 5⁹; cf. 1 Co 5⁷). In Mt 13³³, however, it is the silent but all-pervading action of leaven in the mass of the dough that is the point of comparison. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

LEBANA (Neh 7⁴⁸) or LEBANAH (Ezr 2⁴⁸).—The head of a family of returning exiles; called in 1 Es 5²⁸ Labana.

LEBANON, now Jebel Lebnaan, is mentioned more than 60 times in the OT. The name, from the root labān ('white'), was probably given on account of the mountain's covering of snow. The snow of Lebanon is mentioned in Jer 18⁴. Many passages refer to its beauty, particularly in relation to its cedars and other trees (see Ps 72¹⁵, Ca 4¹¹, Hos 14⁵ 7). From Lebanon was obtained wood for building the first (2 Ch 2⁹) and the second (Ezr 3⁷) Temple. Lebanon was famous for its fruitfulness (Ps 72¹⁵) and its wine (Hos 14⁷).

The term 'Lebanon' may be considered in most places as referring to the whole mountain mass, more correctly distinguished as Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon (Libanus and Antilibanus of Jhb 17). The two ranges traverse N. Syria, running roughly parallel, from S.W. to N.E., and are separated by a deep valley—the biq'ah of Jos 11¹⁷ 12⁷—known to-day as d-Buqa'. The western range, Lebanon proper, is nearly 100 miles long, but the eastern, if Hermon is deducted as a separate entity, is only 65 miles long. The former range is divided from the mountains of Galilee by the deep chasm made by the Litāni river in its passage seawards. In the N. a somewhat similar gorge formed by the Nahr d-Kebtr, the ancient Eleutherus, divides it from the Jebel Nusairiyeh. The summits of the range rise in height from south to north. In the S. a few points attain to almost 7000 feet; in the centre, E. of Beyrout, Jebel Kuneiseh is 6960 feet, and Jebel San'nin 8554 feet; further N., to the S.E. of Tripoli, is a great semicircular group of mountains, sometimes known as the 'Cedar group,' on account of the famous group of these trees in their midst, where the highest point, Jebel Mukhmāl, reaches 10,207 feet, and several other points are almost as lofty. Geologically the Lebanon is built of three main groups of strata. Lowest comes a thick layer of hard limestone, named—after its most characteristic fossil (Cidaris glandaria)—Glandaria limestone; above this are strata of Nubian sandstone, yellow and red in colour, and in places 1500 feet thick, overlaid and interlaced with strata of limestone containing fossil echinoderms and ammonites; and thirdly, above this group, and forming the bulk of the highest peaks, is another layer, many thousand feet thick in places, of a limestone containing countless fossils known as hippurites, radiolites, and such like. The sandstone strata are most important, for where they come to the surface is the richest soil and the most plentiful water, and here flourish most luxuriantly the pines which are such a characteristic feature of W. Lebanon scenery. A great contrast exists between the W. and E. slopes. The former are fertile and picturesque, while down their innumerable valleys course numberless mountain streams to feed the many rivers flowing seawards. The E. slopes are comparatively barren, and, except at one point, near Zahleh, there is no stream of importance. Of the Lebanon rivers besides the Nahr Litāni (Leontes) and the Nahr d-Kebtr (Eleutherus), the following may be enumerated from S. to N. as the more important: Nahr ez-Zaherani, Nahr d-'Awwali (Bostrenus), Nahr Beirūt (Magoras), Nahr d-Kab (Lycus), Nahr Ibrahim (Adonis), and the Nahr Qadisha or 'holy river,' near Tripoli.

The Lebanon is still fairly well wooded in a few places, though very scantily compared with ancient times, when Hiram, king of Tyre, supplied Solomon with 'cedar trees, fir trees, and algum trees out of Lebanon' (1 K 5⁸, 2 Ch 2⁹). In regard to cultivation there has been a very great improvement in recent years, and the terraced lower slopes of the mountain are now covered with mulberry, walnut, and olive trees as well as vines. Many of the views in the Lebanon are of most romantic beauty, and the climate of many parts is superb. Wild animals are certainly scarcer than in olden days. In the time of Tiglath-pileser I. the elephant was hunted here, but it has long been extinct. Jackals, gazelles, hyænas, wolves, bears, and panthers (in order of commonness) are found and, inland from Sidon, the coney (Hyrax) abounds.

Politically the Lebanon rejoices in a freer and better government than any other part of Syria, as, since the massacres of 1860, a Christian governor, appointed with the approval of the European Powers, rules on behalf of the Sultan. The district, except in the N., is now extensively supplied with excellent carriage roads, and the range is crossed by the French railway from Beyrout to Damascus, the highest point traversed being 4880 feet above sea-level.

Between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon is the great hollow known to the Greeks as Coele-Syria, and to-day called Buqa' el-Aztz. Considered geologically, this wide valley is a product of the same great 'fault' as produced the deep Jordan valley. It is now a great, fertile, but little cultivated, plain, from 3 to 6 miles wide, and in its rise, not far from Baalbek, two famous rivers, the Litâni (Leontes), which flows S., and the Nahr el-Ast or Orontes, which flows N., and enters the sea near Antioch. This hollow plain, besides being crossed transversely by the Damascus railway and road, is traversed over more than half its length by the new line past Baalbek, Homs, and Hamath to Aleppo. Some part of this plain, 'the valley of the Lebanon, would appear to have been conquered by the Israelites (Jos 11¹⁷).

The Anti-Lebanon is to-day known as Jebel esh-Sherki or 'the east mountain,' the equivalent of 'Lebanon towards the sun-rising' of Jos 13³. In Ca 7⁴ it is referred to as 'the tower of Lebanon that looketh towards Damascus.' In Dt 1⁷ 32¹¹, Jos 1⁴ 9¹, the Heb. 'Lebanon' is in the LXX tr. 'Anti-Lebanon.' Anti-Lebanon is somewhat arbitrarily divided from Hermon, which is structurally its S. extremity, by a pass (along which the French diligence road runs), and especially by the Wady Barada. In the N. it terminates in the plain around Homs. Its highest point is Tâla at Mûsa (8755 feet), but several other peaks are almost as lofty. A valley, like the Buqa' in miniature, traverses the S. part of the range from N. to S., and in this rises the Nahr Yafâfeh, which empties its waters down the Wady Yafâfeh to join the Litâni; and the Nahr Barada, which, after rising in a beautiful pool at the S.W. extremity of this plain, runs down the Wady Barada to Damascus. The N. part of this range is very bare and wild. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LEBAOTH.—See BETH-BIRI.

LEBBEUS.—See THADDÆUS.

LEB-KAMAI.—In Jer 51¹ is a phrase 'in the midst of them which rise up against me' (Heb. leb-qamai). This is generally recognized as being an example of the Kabbalistic rule of hermeneutics whereby a cipher word was obtained by taking the letters of the alphabet in the reverse order, the last for the first, the last but one for the second, and so on. By this process (known as Atbash), leb-qamai gives us Kasdim (the Chaldeans). W. F. COBB.

LEBONAH.—A place near Shiloh on the way to Shechem (Jg 21¹⁹). It is prob. the ruin Khan el-Lubban, about 3 miles W.N.W. of Seilân (Shiloh).

LEOAH.—The 'son' of Er (1 Ch 4²¹).

LEEKS.—The Heb. word châtser, which is elsewhere tr. 'grass' or 'herb,' is rendered 'leeks' in Nu 11⁵, and in this passage, owing to the association with onions and garlic, the tr. is probably correct, leeks being the herb par excellence. The leek (Allium porrum) is much grown in Palestine, where it is a general favourite. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LEES.—The sediment which settled at the bottom of the wine-jars, composed of morsels of husks, stalks, etc.; in OT only in figures. See WINE AND STRONG DRINK, § 3.

LEG.—1. kē'ad' ayim, a fem. dual, in which form alone it appears (Ex 12⁹ etc.). It denotes the legs from knee to ankle (Gesenius). 2. regel (1 S 17⁴), lit. 'foot.' 3. shôq, the leg, apparently including the thigh, for which it stands in Ex 29²², 27, Lv 7²², 23, 8²⁴, 9²¹, 10⁴⁴, Nu 6²⁹ 18¹⁸, 1 S 9²⁴, in all of which AV tr. 'shoulder,' but RV, correctly, 'thigh.' In Ps 147¹⁰ shôqē hā-tsh may mean 'foot-soldiers.' The proverbial phrase 'hip and thigh,' is literally 'leg upon thigh' (Jg 15⁸), descriptive of the confusion of severed limbs. 4. shôbel (Is 47³) means 'train' (RV, correctly, 'strip off the train'). 5. skelos (Jn 19¹⁸). To hasten the death of the crucified, it was customary to break their legs. W. EWING.

LEGION.—This term, which means literally 'a gathering,' looks back to the early days of the Roman citizen army. In the time of the Empire it indicated a force of about 6000 infantry, together with complements of other arms. The infantry proper were divided into ten cohorts (the word is tr. 'band' [wh. see] in Mt 27²⁷, Mk 15¹⁶, Jn 18³, 12, Ac 10¹ 21³¹ 27¹), each containing about 600 men, and each commanded on occasion by a military tribune. Of these tribunes there were six to a legion. A cohort was itself subdivided into ten centuries, each commanded by a centurion. It is not necessary to remember all these facts in studying the NT use of the word 'legion' (Mt 26⁵³, Mk 5⁹, 16, Lk 8³⁰). What chiefly impressed Semites was apparently the size of the legion, and 'legion' appears to have become a proverb among them for a large number of persons in orderly combination. A. SOUTER.

LEHABIM, occurring only in Gn 10¹³ (= 1 Ch 1¹¹), are descendants of Mizraim, the Egyptian eponym. The general opinion is that they are the same as the Lubim (wh. see), whether the word is an alternative traditional pronunciation of the name of this people, or whether, as is more probable, the form here given is due to textual corruption. The fact that Lubim or Libyans is a fairly common word, and that it is not found in the ethnological list of Gn 10, where it would naturally appear in the place of Lehabim, adds something to the evidence of identity. Perhaps Ludim (wh. see) in the same verse is another variant. J. F. M'CURDY.

LEHI ('jawbone').—The scene of Samson's well-known adventure with the jawbone of an ass (Jg 15¹⁴, 19). The site has been placed in Judah, between the Cliff of Etam and the country of the Philistines.

LEMUEL.—The name of a king, otherwise unknown, to whom Pr 31¹⁻⁹ is addressed by his mother. His identity has been much discussed; he has been identified (by the Rabbinical commentators) with Solomon, (by Grotius) with Hezekiah. Cf. also Massa. It is possible that the name is a fanciful title to represent any virtuous king, invented for the purpose of conveying certain maxims. T. A. MOXON.

LENDING.—See DEBT.

LENTILS ('ādāshim, Gn 25⁴, 2 S 17²³ 21¹, Ezk 4⁹).—These are without doubt the Arab. adar—a kind of small reddish bean, the product of Erum lens, a small leguminous plant 6 or 8 inches high, much cultivated in Palestine, and ripening in June or July. It is the bean from which the well-known revallenta, a food for invalids, is made. In Palestine a kind of 'pottage' known as mufjedderah, universally popular, is made from it. It is of a reddish-brown colour, and is certainly the original 'red pottage' of Esau (Gn 25³⁰). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LEOPARD (nāmēr).—This animal (Felis pardus, Arab. nīmīr) is still found at times in the wilder parts of Palestine. Its beautiful spotted skin (Jer 5⁶) is from time to time brought into the towns for sale. Some dervishes clothe themselves in a leopard's skin. Its fierceness (Hos 13⁷), its agility (Hab 1⁸), and untamableness (Is 11⁴) are all mentioned. The name Nimr is a favourite one with the Arabs, who admire these qualities. In the names 'waters of Nimrīm' ('leopards,' Is 15⁴, Jer 48³⁴) and 'Beth-nimrah' ('f. leopard,' Nu 32^{23, 26}) references to the leopard also occur; cf. the 'mountains of nēmērīm' (i.e. 'the leopards,' Ca 4⁸). The cheetah (Felis jubata) is found also in Galilee, and it too may have been included under the Heb. word nāmēr. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LEPROSY.—This term, as used in Scripture, seems to include not only true leprosy (dephthiasis)—probably the disease of Job—but also such skin diseases as psoriasis, ring-worm, and vittigo. For the priestly regulations as to the diagnosis of the disease and the treatment of lepers, see art. CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, § 5. The 'leprosy' in garments (Lv 13¹⁷) seems to be an effect of fungus or mildew, while that in houses (14²⁴) is probably dry-rot.

LESHEM.—A form, occurring only in Jos 19^{47b}, of the name Laish (see DAN).

LESSAU.—A village where an encounter took place between the Jews and Nicanor (2 Mac 14¹⁶). The site is unknown, and the text is uncertain.

LET.—In Anglo-Saxon latan meant 'to permit' and letan, 'to hinder.' In course of time both words were spelled 'let.' Consequently in AV, besides its modern meaning of 'permit,' the vb. 'let' sometimes has the opposite meaning of 'hinder.' Thus 2 Th 2⁷, 'only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way.' The other places are Ex 5⁴, Nu 22^{16m}, Is 43¹², Wis 7²², Ro 1⁴.

LETECH, LETHEK.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

LETUSHIM.—One of the Dedanite tribes in N. Arabia (Gn 25³), the others being Leummim and Asshurim (wh. see). In this verse LXX adds two other tribes; but in the parallel passage, 1 Ch 1³⁷, the sons of Dedan are omitted altogether both in MT and in most MSS of LXX. None of the three tribes has been identified.

LEUMMIM.—A tribe of the Dedanites (Gn 25³). Cf. LETUSHIM.

LEVI.—1. The third son of Jacob by Leah (Gn 29³⁴ [J]). The genealogical story connects the name with the verb lāwāh, 'to be joined,' and P (Nu 18^{2, 4}) plays upon the same word, saying to Aaron: 'Bring the tribe of Levi . . . that it may be joined (yilāwā) unto thee.' Many modern scholars hold to this improbable etymology of the name—improbable, among other reasons, because, unlike other tribal names, it is not nominal, but adjectival. It is said to signify 'the one who attaches himself.' Accordingly 'the Levites are those who attached themselves to the Semites who migrated back from the Delta, therefore, Egyptians' (Lagarde, Or. ii. 20, Mitt. i. 54). Others say 'those who were attached to the ark' as priestly attendants. Still others make it a gentile noun, and connect it with the South-Arabian lāw'u, (f. lāw'at), 'priest.' Against this is the primitive use of 'Levite' as one of the tribe of Levi. The word is probably a gentile from Leah ('wild-cow') as Wellh. (Proleg. 146) suggests, and as Stade (GV I 152) asserts. If this be correct, and it has the greater probability in its favour, it points to early totem worship.

In the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49⁵⁻⁷) we have one of the most important passages bearing upon the early history of this tribe and that of Simeon:

Simeon and Levi are brethren;
Weapons of violence are their swords.

Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce;
And their wrath, for it was cruel:
I will divide them in Jacob,
And scatter them in Israel.'

From this passage it is abundantly evident that Levi was, like all the other Israelitish tribes, a purely secular organization. Simeon and Levi are both set forth as bloodthirsty characters, and there is not the slightest hint of Levi being a priestly caste. The treacherous act referred to, which was so serious a violation of tribal morals that it cost them the sympathy of the other tribes, is probably recorded in Gn 34 in two different versions, the oldest of which is J's. The other now interwoven with it is probably P's enlargement of the original. According to the story, Shechem, the son of Hamor, became enamoured of Dinah, the sister of Simeon and Levi, and seduced her. He made an honourable arrangement to marry the girl and to discharge whatever obligations her family might impose upon him. Simeon and Levi took advantage of the Shechemites' disability and slew them. Like other stories, though related in personal form, it is tribal in intention. It portrays early relations between the Israelites and the original inhabitants. The love of the Shechemite for the daughter of Jacob points to some sort of an alliance in which the right of connubium was acknowledged, and the act of Simeon and Levi was, therefore, a barbarous repudiation of the rights of their native allies. From Jg 9 it is clear that the sons of Hamor re-possessed themselves of the city, the other tribes having withheld their assistance, probably more from fear of Canaanite revenge than from any overwhelming moral detestation of the act. The result was fatal for the future of the tribes, at first more particularly for Levi, but later also for Simeon. So complete were the disastrous consequences to Levi at this time that the tribal independence was lost, and the members became absorbed by the other tribes, especially by Judah. There is no mention of Levi and Simeon in Jg 5.

Some early connexion with Moses may have aided them in finding recognition about the sanctuaries in the early days. Then the altar did not call for a consecrated servitor; but, as we see in the case of Micah, who had a private sanctuary in Ephraim, there existed apparently a preference for a Levite (Jg 17). It is not absolutely clear from the reference here that 'Levite' is equal to 'priest,' as is commonly held. This would imply that by this time all Levites were priests. 'Filling up of the hand' (translated 'consecrated' in vv. 5, 12) may refer to a ceremony of induction into the priestly office, the principal act of which was the solemn placing of the god (or other religious symbol) in the hands of the future officiant at the shrine. It is the phrase used by the Assyrian kings when they speak of the gods bestowing upon them the kingship. It is the phrase which became the terminus technicus for consecration to the priesthood, and there is no reason for giving a different meaning to it here. In Jg 3-16 there is no mention of a priest. For the altar-service alone priests were not necessary, as we see in the case of Gideon and Manoah. The fact that the word 'levite' became synonymous with 'priest' indicates that the priesthood drew heavily from the tribe. It is not the only time that worldly misfortune has contributed to religion. See also PRIESTS AND LEVITES, TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

LEVIATHAN.—In four of the five passages where this word appears, the LXX have dragon, and their belief that a creature of serpentine form was meant is confirmed by the derivation of Heb. lāwāh, which signifies 'to twist or wind.' The leviathan of Job 41¹⁻²⁴ is the crocodile, with added traits drawn from the ancient Creation myths. On the assumption that Ps 74¹⁸⁻¹⁷ refers to the Exodus, we should again find the crocodile in v. 14. But it is at least equally probable that the allusion is to the creation of the world (vv. 16, 17), and to the mythological sea-monsters then vanquished.

Leviathan here has several heads; the great serpent of Babylonian tradition had seven. Is 27¹ distinguishes between two leviathans, the flying serpent, and the crooked or coiled serpent—symbols of two heathen kingdoms. The identification of the kingdoms depends on the date of the prophecy: Assyria and Babylon, Persia and Greece, Syria and Parthia, are rival suggestions. The species of sea-monster pointed to in Ps 104²⁶ is left indefinite. The leviathan (RV; AV 'their mourning') aroused by magicians (Job 3⁸) is most likely a denizen of the abyss which threatens the world with destruction. Many, however, take him to be the mythical sky-dragon which was supposed to cause eclipses. It will be noted that there is a close connexion between leviathan and the watery world. Robertson Smith held that it is a personification of the water-spout (*RS*², p. 176). The Apocalyptic and Rabbinical writers gave full scope to their fancy in dealing with this theme. Leviathan and Behemoth were created on the fifth day, and the depths of the sea were assigned to the former as his abode; during the last quarter of each day God plays with him (as the LXX and some recent expositors interpret Ps 104²⁶); the Jordan empties itself into his mouth; his flesh will be for food to the godly in the days of the Messiah; part of his skin will be made into a tent for them, whilst the rest is spread on the walls of Jerusalem, and its brightness is visible to the ends of the earth (En 60⁷⁻⁸, 2 Es 6⁹, Apoc. Bar 29⁴; Aboda zara, 3b; Baba bathra, 74b; Targ. on Nu 11^{34f.}). Cf. art. BEHEMOTH. J. TAYLOR.

LEVITICUS.—1. Scope.—The book has received its title from the name 'the Levitical book,' which was prefixed to it in the LXX. Since, however, the special functions of the Levites are not referred to, the scope of the book is better brought out in the title 'Law of the Priests,' which is given to it in the Talmud. As such, Leviticus practically confines itself to legislation, and, except in the section chs. 17–26, to priestly legislation. Even the few passages, such as chs. 8 and 10, which are cast in the form of narrative, do not aim at describing what once happened, but use this form in order to prescribe what is to continue. The JE narrative, which was a history, does not appear to have been drawn upon; and Leviticus, unlike Exodus and Numbers, offers no exact dates of month and year. The book does not give a history of Israel's past, but chiefly embodies some of the rules of the one living institution which persisted in Israel from its formation as a nation to the destruction of the Temple. Since, however, this institution was moulded to meet the nation's changing circumstances, the praxis which regulated its services required and received constant modification. Some of these changes can be traced in Leviticus; but it is impossible to detail them in a brief sketch like the present. Readers who wish more details on the ritual can find them and their justification in the art. in Hastings' DB, or in Driver's LOT.

2. Sources.—The general editor is the same as the editor who arranged Exodus in its present form, though a little has been added by later hands. (1) He took from P that history of the sacred institutions which appeared in Ex 25–29 (see Exodus); chs. 8, 9, with 10¹²⁻¹⁵ (which supplements 9²¹), 10¹⁻⁷ (10³⁰⁻³²) 16²⁻⁴, s. 17¹. 24¹⁻⁴, s. 2. These sections are not of the same period.

Thus ch. 8, which relates the anointing of the priests is the fulfilment of Ex 29 and 40¹²⁻¹⁴. It formed part of that expansion of Ex 25–29 which now occupies Ex 35–40, and to which also belong 24¹⁻⁴ on the Tabernacle lamps, vv. 4¹⁻⁴ on the shewbread—sections which in some inexplicable way have strayed into their present incongruous position. Ch. 9 with 10¹²⁻¹⁵, which recounts the sacrifices at the inauguration of the Tabernacle, originally formed the sequel of Ex 25–29, and was followed by 10¹⁻⁷ (the story of Nadab and Abihu offering strange fire), and was closed by 16²⁻⁴, s. 17¹. (the rule as to the time and way for Aaron to approach the Holy Place which had thus vindicated its awful sanctity). 10¹⁶⁻²⁰ (on the goat of the sin-offering) is a later addition, and gives an interesting illustration of the way in which it was sought to reconcile differences in the older laws (cf. it with 9¹⁵ and 6²⁴⁻³⁰).

(2) Chs. 1–6.—Into this framework the editor has fitted laws from other sources. Thus he seems to have separated ch. 8 from its natural position after Ex 40, because he counted it suitable, after the Tabernacle was set up and before the priests were anointed or the Tabernacle inaugurated, to insert the laws prescribing the sacrifices which the priests when anointed were to offer in the Tabernacle.

This law-book has its own history, and in particular once existed in two sections. Thus 6²⁴⁻³⁰, with its subscription 7³⁷⁻⁴¹, was originally a code addressed to the priests, dealing with matters ancillary to the sacrifices, and especially concerned with the priests' dues. Because of this esoteric character of the little code, 6²⁰⁻²³ (on the priests' meal-offering) was inserted. With the exception of that section, each of the regulations is introduced by the formula 'this is the law of'; and this formula appears in the subscription. It represents the early rules on this subject.

Again, 1¹⁻⁶ is a book addressed to the people, defining their sacrifices, but it has received large modification. From a comparison of 1²¹, with 3¹ it is evident that ch. 3 (the law of the peace-offering) once followed immediately on ch. 1 (the burnt-offering). These are probably very old. The different formulae used in ch. 2 (3rd person in vv. 1³⁻⁴, 2nd person in v. 4⁹) and its intrusive position prove that the law of the meal-offering has been developed. A comparison between the law of the sin-offering in ch. 4 and similar laws elsewhere proves how largely this part of the ritual has been elaborated. Thus the sin-offering for the congregation is a bullock in v. 14 instead of the goat of 9¹⁵ and Nu 15²⁴; and the high priest's sin-offering (vv. 3¹⁻¹²) is more elaborate than that in 9⁴⁻¹¹ and Ex 29¹⁰⁻¹⁴. 5¹⁻¹³ (examples of unintentional sins which require a sin-offering, and mitigations for the case of those who cannot afford a lamb or a goat) has suffered change, since vv. 2³ evidently break the connexion between v. 1 and v. 4. It is, however, older than ch. 4, though the relation is specially difficult to define. 5¹⁴⁻⁶⁷ defines the cases which require a guilt-offering, and makes it clear that originally this sacrifice was a composition for fraud practised upon God (5^{14f.}) or man (6¹⁻⁷). When he united these codes on the sacrifices, the editor added a rule (7²²⁻²⁷) forbidding fat and blood more expressively than 3⁷, and a rule (7²⁸⁻³⁴) giving heave leg and wave breast to the priest, and a subscription (v. 34¹).

(3) Chs. 11–15.—The priests, however, had other functions in the life of the people besides those immediately connected with the sacrifices. It was their business to determine on all questions connected with uncleanness. As soon, therefore, as the editor had described the inauguration of the Tabernacle and the priesthood, he grouped together a series of regulations bearing on this side of the priestly duties.

Chs. 11–15 deal with this more civil yet priestly function. The rules in ch. 11 on clean and unclean animals (vv. 2–23 41–45, with their subscription v. 46¹) appear in a more primitive form in Dt 14¹⁻²⁰, and have probably been taken from the Law of Holiness (see below). The law of defilement from touching unclean animals and all carcasses (vv. 24–40), which prescribes also the purification required in case of neglect of the regulations, is ignored in the subscription v. 46¹, and must be an insertion. Chs. 12, 15 prescribe the forms of purification after childbirth and after certain physical secretions. In their basis these rules are very old, but the careful detail of derivative uncleanness (cf. esp. 15¹⁻¹², 19–27) shows where a slow elaboration has been at work. Chs. 13, 14 contain a series of directions for the diagnosis of leprosy in human beings, clothing, leather, and houses, and for the method of purification. The primitive character of the prescribed purification (14²⁻⁸), along with the fact that this can be carried out apart from the Temple, proves the early origin of the rules. The gravity of the task thus imposed on the priest and the serious issues involved make it even probable that the directions were not left to the discretion of individuals, but were early committed to writing.

(4) In ch. 16 the sacrificial ritual culminates in the Day of Atonement. This embodies very old elements (see AZAZEL), but has been so altered that its original character is no longer to be distinguished. The chapter in its present form contains two parts. The historical introduction (vv. 1-4, s. 12¹), once connected with ch. 10) prescribes how and when the high priest may approach the Holy Place. The ritual of the Day of Atonement (vv. 5, 7-10, 15-34) was united with this, because it defines the purpose for which the high priest made his annual entry. The place given to this ritual after chs. 11-15 is appropriate, because in its sacrifices priest and people united to make atonement for the sanctuary and all holy things, and purge them from the pollution contracted through the forms of uncleanness specified in these chapters.

(5) LAW OF HOLINESS OR H.—Chs. 17-26 form an independent body of laws, which have had their own history, and which, after receiving something of their peculiar form from an earlier collector, have been incorporated, after considerable modifications by the general editor, into the greater law-book. That these were once independent is proved by: (a) the long hortatory conclusion in ch. 26 and the opening instructions as to the place of sacrifice; (b) the presence in them of matters which have already been dealt with (cf., e.g., 17:10-14 with 7:21, 19:4-8 with 7:15-18, 20:2 with ch. 11); (c) the fact that the laws have a much wider scope than those of chs. 1-16. But this early code has not survived in its integrity, for (i.) certain subjects are broken off before completion (19:4-8 20:2); and (ii.) the arrangement of subjects shows a considerable confusion (cf. 19:4-8, 20-22 20:7).

Ch. 17 prescribes that all animals suitable for sacrifice must be slain at the sanctuary, that such animals, when sacrificed, must be offered to Jahweh alone, that blood and the flesh of carcasses must not be eaten. If vv. 1-8 were ever in force while the Israelites inhabited Palestine, the order requiring every goat, sheep, or ox which was slaughtered to be brought to the Jerusalem Temple practically made it illegal to kill these animals. P, which required all sacrifices to be brought to the Jerusalem Temple as the only sanctuary, permitted all animals to be freely slaughtered, but forbade the eating of fat and blood. Probably the code, in its early form, recognized the local sanctuaries, and required the slaughter of animals suitable for sacrifice to take place before the Lord, i.e. at one of these accessible shrines. The change is due to the desire to discredit these shrines.

Ch. 18 is a series of laws on incest (and Molech-worship), with admonitory introduction and conclusion. Ch. 19 contains a group of miscellaneous laws, with introduction and conclusion. These laws, which are curt and direct, give an interesting view of the morals of early Israel, and should be compared and contrasted with the relative sections in Ex 20-23, Dt 22-25. Ch. 20, which is different in character from the preceding chapters, prescribes in general penalties for certain offences already specified. In it vv. 10-21 (with the penalties for incest) may be the conclusion of ch. 18. The fact, however, that it is followed by a conclusion (vv. 22-24), while ch. 18 is provided with its own, has led some to count the two sections independent. Again, vv. 24 show where laws corresponding with ch. 11, if not that collection itself, originally stood in H; vv. 1-4 (against Molech-worship), vv. 5-7 (against traffic with familiar spirits), v. 9 (against cursing father or mother) may have been brought together here, because, like most of the laws in vv. 10-21, they prescribe the death-penalty.

Chs. 21, 22 deal with priests and offerings. They state the ceremonial restraints required of the priests in their domestic life (21:1-15), demand bodily perfection in every officiating priest (vv. 16-24), ordain that sacrificial food may be eaten only by those who are ceremonially clean and who can claim membership in a priestly family (22:1-16), and require the sacrificial animals to be perfect (vv. 17-25). Three minor regulations as to the sacrifices (vv. 26-30) are followed by an exhortation (vv. 31-33). Not only the recurrent formula, 'I am the Lord,' but the insistence on a ceremonial holiness, which characterizes the early code, proves that the basis of these chapters is old. The material has been largely revised by P, but the elaborate analysis cannot be entered into here.

Ch. 23 is a calendar of the sacred seasons, which has not so early received much change. In general, it may be said that vv. 9-20, 22, 39b, 40-43, though not left without minor modifications, belong to the early code. Here the festivals still represent the religious life of a people which is settled on the land and engaged in agriculture. No more precise date than, e.g., 'when ye reap the harvest of your land,' is laid down for a festival, because no other was practicable. The people celebrated the harvest when the harvest was gathered. The other sections (vv. 1-8, 21, 23-25, 39a, 41) give rigid dates and betray the change which became necessary, as soon as many of the worshippers were no longer agriculturists and were scattered beyond the limits of Palestine. The definite dates prescribed by a centralized priesthood became a necessity of the national and religious life. These later sections come from P.

Ch. 24 (on vv. 1-9 see above) deals with blasphemy (v. 16¹) and injuries to men and cattle (vv. 17-22). These early sections closely resemble ch. 20, and may once have stood in closer connexion with it. The penalty pronounced on blasphemy was specially interesting to P, and was illustrated by an incident taken from the desert-wanderings (vv. 10-14, 22; cf. Nu 15:32-36).

Ch. 25 contains the rules for the Sabbatical year (vv. 1-7, 20-22) and those for the year of Jubilee (vv. 8-19, 23-34). The section, vv. 20-22, has been separated from its original context in order to make the regulations contained in it apply to the Jubilee as well as the Sabbatical year. The analysis of the chapter is very uncertain. It seems to have contained the rule as to the Sabbatical year (cf. vv. 1-7 with Ex 23:10¹), and note the prominent interest in agriculture). In connexion with the Jubilee, it ordered that land must not be alienated absolutely, but must revert to its original owners at the Jubilee (vv. 13-15). It also provided for the relief of an impoverished Israelite by ordering: (a) that his land might be redeemed by a kinsman (v. 25); (b) that usury was not to be exacted from him (vv. 35-38); (c) that, when he was in bondage, he must be treated humanely (vv. 39, 40a, 43, 47, 53, 55). P took over this early law with a number of modifications, added fresh regulations as to the redemption of land (vv. 20, 10b-12, 23, 28-34), and especially extended the benefits of the Jubilee from land to persons (vv. 10b-12, 44-46, 48-52, 54). A comparison of vv. 40-42 with Dt 15:12-18 suggests that in the course of time the latter rule had proved impracticable, and that this relaxation was designed to take its place.

Ch. 26, after two fragments, of which v. 1 is parallel to 19¹, and v. 2 identical with 19³⁰, contains the hortatory conclusion (vv. 3-6), which the collector of H appended to his law-book. It closes with the subscription (v. 6), which the editor of Leviticus added when he inserted the collection in its present position. The resemblances between vv. 3-6 and the Book of Ezekiel are too numerous to be catalogued here, but they deserve special attention.

As H is evidently incomplete and its character is strongly marked, efforts have been made to detect fragments of its legislation in other parts of the Pentateuch. In particular, Ex 31:13, 16, Lv 11:22, 41-47, Nu 15:37-41 have been assigned to it. It is necessary, however, to remember that undue stress should not be laid on the appearance of such characteristic formulæ as 'I am the Lord,' 'I am the Lord which sanctify you,' since, when once some laws had been countersigned by these formulæ, it was natural to introduce them into others. Even in the case of Lv 11:22, all that can be said is that similar legislation must have been in H; it is unwise to suppose that this section belonged to H, for laws of this type must have appeared in several of the codes, and in the nature of the case the language used could not greatly vary.

The law-book which is obtained after the excision of the later elements is a valuable survival of one of the codes which represented and guided the life of early Israel under the monarchy. To estimate it, both in its uniqueness and in its common characteristics, it is useful briefly to compare H with the other codes which have come down. Thus it agrees with Deut. and the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23) in the prominence given to the social as well as to the ceremonial life of the people, and in the recognition that this life is still largely an agricultural life. Its closer affinity to the Book of the Covenant is found in the concise formulæ into which its laws are cast, as though they were meant for direct popular use, and in the fact that these laws are addressed to the people, not to the priest. It resembles Deut. very closely in forbidding certain forms of idolatry and semi-heathen practices which were common in Palestine. The two codes are penetrated throughout by the sense that what gives Israel its distinctive character is its religion, though they express this in different ways—H dogmatically forbidding ('for I am the Lord'), Deut. developing the reason why some things are forbidden. On the other hand, Deut. betrays the existence of a more complex and developed social life than H, though the basis for both is still the land. Thus H leaves the great festivals connected with the agricultural life, while Deut. seeks to add historical motives to them, and thus prepares for the time when the people, even though torn from the land, can find a bond of national and religious life in these festivals. Again, to H the centralized priesthood and developed ritual of Deut. are unknown: it ignores the central sanctuary and the Levites. The chief distinction between H and the Book of the Covenant is that H is more detailed and shows a larger interest in the ceremonial side of Israel's life. The latter point must not, however, be pressed too far, since H has not survived in its entirety, and, having passed through the hands of a Priestly editor, may have retained more particularly those sections which interested him, and which therefore may have been made to appear relatively more conspicuous.

Further, when compared with P, H does not conceive of Israel as grouped round the sanctuary, but regards the local sanctuaries as forming an element in the popular life. It knows nothing of the centralized and hierarchical priesthood, and the priesthood it knows is one side of a larger life, not its controlling factor. Its sacrifices are the older and simpler burnt-offering and thank-offering, without the development of guilt- and sin-offerings. Though 6²⁻⁷ be taken to represent the early sin-offering required by this code, its place is very secondary compared with P. The laws of H are generally cast into concise formulae to meet practical needs. They are backed continually by religion, but the religion supplies a sanction and a command rather than a reason and a motive. The book is specially conscious of Israel's religion as one which requires separation from all heathen pollution. Holiness is separateness, 'for I Jahweh sanctify you.' The period at which the laws were compiled is still debated, but the affinity between H and Ezekiel is so close that a direct connexion must be presumed. This affinity does not consist in common phrases, nor can it be measured by identity of language; it shows itself in the common point of view which justified Ezekiel in borrowing phrases, because no others could be found which were so adequate to embody his meaning. To both holiness is the stamp of Israel's religion, and this holiness is largely construed as absence of ceremonial pollution—a pollution which includes more than ethical elements. The law-book probably arose at some sanctuary other than Jerusalem, and expressed and determined the religious life which centred there. As such, it offers a welcome and pleasant sketch of pre-exilic Israelitish life. It probably owed its survival through the Exile, in spite of the superior influence of Deut., to the fact that it deeply influenced the thought of Ezekiel. The priest-prophet preserved a book to which he owed so much; and it is not impossible that certain features in the conclusion (26¹⁻⁴⁵) which have seemed to several to point to the Exile, may be due to Ezekiel himself or to a member of his school.

Ch. 27 contains rules on the commutation of vows and tithes. It belongs to P, and owes its present position to the fact that it presupposes the year of Jubilee (ch. 25).

A. C. WELCH.

LEWD.—In the AV 'lewd' does not always mean 'lustful,' as it does now. That meaning, indeed, is not found in the Apocr. or NT. There the meaning is simply 'wicked,' as Ac 17⁴ 'certain lewd fellows of the baser sort.' So 'lewdness' is usually simply 'wickedness.'

LIBANUS.—The (Greek) form of the (Heb.) name Lebanon (wh. see), 1 Es 4¹⁸ 5¹⁴, 2 Es 15²⁰, Jth 1⁷, Sir 24¹³ 50¹³ [all].

LIBERTINES.—Ac 7⁶ brings the Libertines forward as a group or synagogue amongst the Hellenistic Jews concerned in the prosecution of Stephen. There is no sufficient reason for emending the text. And, the text standing as it is, the conclusion at once follows that the men in question came from Rome. The 'Libertines,' or 'Freedmen' of Rome, were a considerable class. Among the vast bodies of slaves composing the imperial and aristocratic households, emancipation was a common occurrence. The Freedmen frequently held positions of great influence, and sometimes played a noble, oftener an ignoble, part. Amongst the Libertines were found many Jews, not a few of them being the descendants of the Jerusalemites carried away by Pompey. Some of these latter, having bought their freedom and returned to the Holy City, would probably be men of more than average force and earnestness. Hence they were natural leaders in the opposition to Stephen's destructive criticism of Jewish institutionalism

HENRY S. NASH.

LIBERTY.—Moralists are accustomed to distinguish between formal freedom, or man's natural power of choice, and real freedom, or power to act habitually in accordance with the true and good. Scripture has little to say on the mere power of choice, while everywhere recognizing this power as the condition of moral life, and sees real liberty only in the possession and exercise of wisdom, godliness, and virtue. Where there is ignorance and error, especially when this arises from moral causes (Ro 1²¹, Eph 4¹⁸, 1 Jn 2¹¹ etc.)—subjection to sinful lusts (Ro 7¹⁴⁻²³, Eph 2³, 1 P 1¹⁴ 4²⁻³; cf. 2¹⁸ etc.), fear and distrust of God (Ro 8¹⁵ He 12¹⁸⁻²¹ etc.), bondage to the letter of the law (Gal 4²⁴ 25)—there cannot be liberty. Sin, in its nature, is a state of servitude (Jn 8³⁴). Spiritual liberty is the introduction into the condition which is the opposite of this—into the knowledge and friendship of God, the consciousness of cleansing from guilt, deliverance from sin's tyranny, the possession of a new life in the Spirit, etc. Even under the Law, saints could boast of a measure of liberty; God's commandment was found by them to be exceeding broad (Ps 119⁹⁶, cf. Ps 51¹¹⁻¹²). But the gospel gives liberty in a degree, and with a completeness, unknown under the Law and unthought of in any other religion. It does this because it is the religion of reconciliation, of the Spirit, of sonship, of love. Jesus already teaches that His yoke is easy and His burden light; this because He inculcates meekness and lowliness of heart—a spirit like His own (Mt 11²⁹⁻³⁰). His religion is to St. James 'the perfect law, the law of liberty' (1²⁵). The instrument in freeing from bondage is 'the truth' (Jn 8³²); the agent is the Spirit of God. 'Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there,' of necessity, 'is liberty' (2 Co 3¹⁷). As the result of the reception of the truth of the gospel, the believer knows himself justified and saved (Ro 6⁷), knows God as Father, and is assured of His love (1 Jn 4¹⁹⁻²⁰); receives the spirit of adoption, in which is liberty (Ro 8¹⁵ 16); experiences deliverance from the dominion of sin (6¹⁷ 18 7²³ 8²); is set free from the yoke of outward observances (Gal 4⁹, cf. 5¹ 'with freedom did Christ set us free; stand fast, therefore,' etc.); has victory over the world (Gal 4⁴, 1 Jn 5⁴); lives in the power of the Spirit (Gal 5¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 22-23); has release from fear of death (He 2¹⁵), etc. On the freedom of man's will, see PREDESTINATION, p. 749^a.

LIBNAH.—1. An unidentified station in the desert wanderings (Nu 33²⁰). 2. A Canaanite city taken by Joshua after Makkedah and before Lachish (Jos 10¹⁰ etc.), named between Arad and Adullam (12¹⁶), and between Makkedah and Ether in the Shephelah (15²²). It was given to the Levites (21¹³, 1 Ch 6⁴⁷). Taking advantage of an Edomite revolt, it rose against Judah under Joram (2 K 8²²). It was besieged by Sennacherib (2 K 19³⁴ = Is 37³⁶). Hamutal, mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, was a native of Libnah (2 K 23³¹ 24¹⁸, Jer 52¹). The district is clearly indicated, but the site is still unknown. Conder (PEFS, 1897, p. 69) suggests el-Benawy, 10 miles S.E. of Lachish (Tell el-Hesi).

W. EWING.

LIBNI.—The eldest son of Gershon, that is to say, the eponym of a principal family of Gershonite Levites, Ex 6¹⁷, Nu 3¹⁸, 1 Ch 6¹⁷, 20. In 1 Ch 6²⁹ [Feb. 14], perhaps owing to some dislocation of the text, the name appears as that of the eponym of a family of Merarites. The patronymic Libnites occurs in Nu 3²¹ 26⁵⁸. Cf. LADAN.

LIBRARY.—See WRITING, § 5.

LIBYA, LIBYANS.—See LUBIM.

LICE (kinnim, Ex 8¹⁶⁻¹⁸, Ps 105³¹; cf. kēn, Is 51⁸, see GNAT).—RVm suggests 'sandflies or fleas' instead of 'lice.' All the insects named are only too common in Palestine and Egypt. The three well-known varieties of pediculi or lice are perpetually prevalent among the dirty, and a plague of them would certainly be much more terrible than one of the harmless, though irritating 'sand-fly' (Simulium), and far more disgusting than one of the flea (Pulex). Cf. p. 733^b. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LIDEBIR.—See DEBIR, No. 3, and LO-DEBAR.

LIE, LYING.—1. In the OT.—The simple lie, which is a deliberate suppression of the truth in conversation, was condemned by the Levitical code as contrary to the character of holiness demanded by, and becoming to, the people of Israel's holy God (Lv 19¹¹, cf. 6²¹). Perjury, as an aggravation of the ordinary sin, was emphatically condemned, and stringently punished in the legislative enactments of Israel (Ex 23¹, Dt 19¹⁶⁻²⁰). There can be no doubt that the moral consciousness of the Hebrews was alive to the sinfulness of deceit (Pr 19²² 21²⁸ 24²⁸ 25¹⁸ 30⁸; cf. Is 58¹ AVm). The lying selfishness of Cain, and the reprehensible deception practised by Abraham, are recorded by the historian in a tone which reveals his attitude towards such acts (Gn 4⁹ 20²⁻¹⁸ 12¹⁻²⁰; cf. 2 K 5²⁰⁻²⁷ where Gehazi's punishment is the reward of his thoughtless levity at a time of national gloom, as well as of his deceitful conduct and words). The moral reprobation of falsehood reaches its climax in the utterances of the prophets. According to these teachers, it is at the foundation of all human depravity (Hos 7¹⁴ 12¹, Mic 6¹¹). Truth can be arrived at and spoken only by those who are in personal touch with the sacred Fountain of truth (cf. Is 65⁸). Indeed, some of the most emphatic declarations as to the moral attributes of Jehovah are based on the belief that He is above all else the God of truth (Nu 23¹, 1 S 15²⁹; cf. Ps 89³, Ezk 24¹, Mal 3⁶; see 2 Ti 2¹³, Tit 1²). Hence the enormity of the guilt of those teachers who had not Jehovah as the source of their inspiration, though they might speak in His name, who pandered to the prevailing moral degeneracy (Jer 5¹ 6² 29⁹, Ezk 13⁶; cf. Wis 14²⁸, etc.), or who encouraged their hearers in idolatry with its debasing ritual (Jer 16⁴, Jon 2⁸; cf. Ps 31⁶).

A curious phenomenon in the OT is the bold speculation which sought to explain the authorship of the lying instruction by which Jehovah's enemies were seduced to their own destruction. The iniquity of Ahab's conduct, and its fatal consequences, are detailed in the light of this conception (1 K 22), while, with a still more unequivocal directness, Samuel is said to have been counselled by God to deceive Saul (1 S 16¹⁴). In both instances the historian is evidently interpreting events by the ideas current in his day.

2. In the NT.—Falsehood is here traced back to its source in the principle of evil. Jesus attributes its origin to Satan (Jn 8⁴⁴; cf. Ac 5³, Rev 12⁹). Membership in the Christian body postulated a new creation

'in righteousness and holiness of truth' (Eph 4²²; and forbade one member to lie to another (Col 3⁹).

The denial of the Messiahship of Jesus is characterized by the Johannine author as a lie (1 Jn 2²²), while the same writer makes self-deceit the cause of that Pharisaic complacency which he so unsparingly condemns (1 Jn 1⁸). The Pauline representation of paganism bases its degrading moral influence on the fact that it is founded essentially on a lie (Ro 1²⁷).

The awful fate which awaits 'all liars' (Rev 21⁸) is the outcome and direct development of the OT judgment of this sin, for it fundamentally estranges the guilty from Him whose 'word is truth' (Jn 17¹⁷; cf. Rev 21²⁷ 22¹⁸, and see Ps 51⁶ 24⁴ 119¹⁶⁰). Cf. also TRUTH. J. R. WILLIS.

LIFE.—I. IN THE OT—

The term 'life' in EV is used, with a few unimportant exceptions, as the equivalent of one or other of two Heb. expressions: (1) chai, or mostly in plur. chayim; (2) nephesh. The LXX makes a general distinction between these two, by usually rendering the former as zōē and the latter as psychē. The former term occurs more frequently than the latter. The notion of life and the terms used to denote it belong, like 'death,' to the primitive elements in human thought and speech. Roughly speaking, we may explain (1) as primarily = what is fresh, new, in active existence; and (2) as primarily = breath.

1. Self-originated movement, especially as seen in locomotion and breathing, were naturally the earliest criteria of life. So still, scientists are investigating life as merely a 'mode of motion.' Life, however, has not yet yielded up its secret to human inquiry; not yet has life, by any experiment, been produced from purely inorganic origins. Meantime those who do not stumble at a theistic view of creation hold an entirely worthy and satisfactory position in following the Genesis Creation narratives, and ascribing the origin of all life to God, who 'giveth to all life and breath and all things' (Ac 17²). The mystery of life abides, but it is not in the least likely that any results of scientific investigation will ever really conflict with this position.

Life as a physical phenomenon is pre-eminently associated with animals—the living creatures of the sea, the land, and the air (Gn 1²⁴). Plant-life is hardly recognized as such. OT writers do not go so far as to predicate life of trees in much the same way as of animals, as is the case with some of the early Greek philosophers (e.g. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. i. 7, 12). Still 'green' and 'dry,' as applied to plants, correspond to 'living' and 'dead.' There is the feeling that trees possess 'a sort of' life; and such references to trees as that concerning the fresh sprouting of a stock or root (Job 14⁷, Is 11¹) are very significant. Notice also the way in which the prosperity of man is likened to that of a flourishing tree (Ps 1³ etc.), and other frequent illustrative uses.

Physical life is not only primitively connected with the breath, but also with the blood. The effect of the draining away of the blood (as from a wound) in the lessening vitality of the body and finally death—a matter of early observation—naturally explains this. A certain sacredness thus attaches to the blood (1 S 14⁴²), and definite prohibitive legislation relating to the eating of flesh with the blood becomes incorporated in the laws of Israel (Lv 3¹⁷ 7²⁶ etc.). This primitive conception of blood as the seat of life lies at the root of the whole OT system of sacrifices and of all the Scripture ideas and teachings based thereupon.

The sacredness of life as such is strongly emphasized. The great value ascribed to human life is indicated by the numerous laws relating to manslaughter and to offences which interfere in any way with a man's right to live and with his reasonable use and enjoyment of life. The feeling extends to other creatures. See the suggestive words 'and also much cattle' in Jon 4¹¹. The beasts are associated with man's humiliations and privations (Jon 3⁷, Jl 1¹⁸, 28); their life is a thing to be considered. We find the ground of this feeling in the view that God is not only the original Creator or Source of life, but directly its Sustainer in all its forms (Ps 36¹, Ps 104, 145 passim). This seems also to be the fundamental significance of the very common expression 'the living God' (lit. 'God of life').

2. Life is predominantly set forth as man's summum bonum. Life and death are respectively 'the blessing and the curse,' and that uniquely (Dt 30¹⁹). 'Choose life' is the appeal pointing to the one desirable boon. Every man should answer to the description in Ps 34¹². The language which disparages life and praises death (e.g. Job 7¹⁶, Ec 4¹², etc.) is the expression of an abnormal state of feeling, the outcome of man's experience of misery in one form and another. But it is not mere existence that is in itself desirable. As Orr points out, life in its Scripture use has 'a moral and spiritual connotation' (Christian View [1893], p. 393); and it is only the godly and righteous life that is a boon from the Scripture point of view. Such is the burden of the Wisdom books, when they speak of 'finding life,' and describe wisdom as a 'tree of life' (Pr 3¹⁸ 8³⁴).

3. The idea of a life to come is in many portions of the OT conspicuous by its absence. There is nothing anywhere that will compare with the NT conception of 'eternal life.' The latter expression, it is true, is found in the OT, but only once, and that in the late-Hebrew Book of Daniel (12²). It is to be remembered that, though this book is in EV numbered among the Major Prophets, its affinities are not with that group but rather with later post-Biblical Jewish writings. In these writings the use of this expression is best illustrated. Enoch, Ps.-Sol., 4 Mac. furnish examples. See also in Apocrypha, 2 Mac 7⁹ 8³. 'Life' alone in this later use comes to be used as 'life eternal.' (See, e.g., 2 Mac 7¹⁴; cf. in NT, Mt 7¹⁴ 19¹⁷). Later Jewish use, however, prefers the clearer phrase, 'life of the age to come'; and along this line the genesis of the term 'eternal life' must be explained. (Cf. the last clause in the Nicene Creed: 'the life of the world to come'). Jewish eschatological hopes, first for the nation and afterwards for the individual, contributed largely to the development of this idea.

At the same time, though in some parts of the OT the hope of life hereafter seems expressly excluded (see, e.g., Is 38¹¹, 18, Ec 9¹⁰ [Ec 12⁷ is not in conflict, for it embodies the idea of 're-absorption,' and is not to be read in the light of Christian hope and teaching]), and this world alone is known as 'the land of the living,' the very asking of the question in Job 14¹⁴ is significant, and the language of Ps 16 concerning 'the path of life' lends itself readily to an interpretation looking to life beyond death.

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—Chs. 1-5 of Wis. yield much that is of interest relating to contemporary Jewish thought; e.g. God is the author of life but not of death (1¹², 2²¹). The wicked live in harmony with the saying, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die' (ch. 2). The righteous have immortality as their inheritance, whilst the wicked shall be brought to judgment and shall be destroyed (chs. 3-5). For an impressive presentment of a foolish appreciation of life, see also 15¹⁷. In Sir 15¹⁷ 'Before man is life and death,' we have an echo of Dt 30¹². The conception of life ('soul') as a loan that can be recalled is found in Wis 15¹⁶, a close parallel with Lk 12²⁰. Such phrases as 'the fountain of life' (Sir 21¹²) and 'the tree of life' (2 Es 2¹² 8²²) recall their use in both OT and NT. For the former, see Ps 36⁸, Pr 10¹¹, Jn 4¹⁰, 14, for the latter Gn 2⁹, Rev 2⁷ 22² etc. 2 Es 7 furnishes a notable and picturesque view of life beyond death, with the judgment of the righteous and the unrighteous. See especially the long passage beginning at v. 7⁷. The return of the spirit 'to him who gave it,' v. 7⁸, has none of the limitations that attend a similar reference to death in Ec 12⁷. (See above.)

III. IN NT—

The term 'life' is the Eng. equivalent of three terms used in the original—(1) zōē. This is of most frequent occurrence; generally corresponding to chayyim in OT; = life in the absolute; vitality; full, active existence. It is the term capable of embodying all progressive conceptions as to what constitutes life, and so regularly occurring in the phrase 'eternal life.' (2) psychē, generally = OT nephesh, but the fluctuation between 'life' and 'soul' (see, e.g., the well-known passage Mt 16²¹) as its rendering in English is significant. The primary notion is that of the animating principle (in contrast to the 'body'). It further denotes the specific life or existence of any individual. By an easy transition it comes to stand for a man's 'self' (roughly 'soul'). (3) bios, occurring only a few times = the present state of existence, this life; as in Lk 8¹⁴, 1 Ti 2², 2 Ti 2¹, 1 Jn 2¹⁸ 3¹⁷ (zōē, however, is sometimes used in this sense, with 'this' or 'the present' qualifying it, e.g. 1 Co 15¹⁹); also = means of subsistence; and so = 'living' (Lk 8³ 16¹² etc.).

1. The teaching of Jesus.—As regards the present life we gather from the Gospels that Jesus never bewailed its brevity and vanity. The mournful notes of some of the OT Scriptures, the pensive commonplaces of so much of man's thoughts and moralizings, find no echo here. On the contrary, in His own life He graciously exemplifies the joie de vivre. This in one respect was made even a ground of complaint against Him (Mt 11¹⁹). The sacredness of life is insisted on, and the Sixth Commandment is accentuated (Mt 5²¹). The preciousness of life, even in its humblest forms ('sparrows,' Mt 10²⁹ || Lk 12⁹), appears in connexion with our Lord's arresting doctrine of Divine Providence, which stands in such unhesitating defiance of the sterner features of the world of life (In Memoriam, lv. f.).

Very conspicuously Jesus condemns over-anxiety about this life and its 'goods.' Simplicity and detachment in regard to these things are repeatedly insisted on (see, e.g., Mt 6¹⁹, 31, Lk 12³⁴). Certainly the accumulation of a superabundance of the 'goods' of life at the expense of others' deprivation and want is in direct opposition to the spirit of His teaching. The deep, paradoxical saying (Mt 16²⁶) about losing and finding one's life is of significance here—a saying found not only in the three Synoptics (see Mk 8³⁶, Lk 9²⁴), but also in its substance in Jn 12²⁵.

Eternal life figures conspicuously in the teaching of Jesus. He did not originate the expression: it was already established in the Rabbinical vocabulary. The subject was, and continued to be, one greatly discussed among the Jews. The phrasing of Jesus—as when He speaks of 'inheriting' (Mt 19²⁹), 'having' (Jn. passim), 'receiving' (Mk 10²⁹), 'entering into,' or 'attaining' (Mt 19¹⁷), eternal life, or life simply—is also that of the Jewish teachers of His own and a later day. (Note even the significance of the wording in Mk 10¹⁷.) 'Life' alone as 'eternal life' is used in Mt 7¹⁴, Mk 9⁴⁴ etc.; also in John's Gospel (as 3³⁶ 10¹⁰ etc.). (See above.)

The Johannine Gospel conspicuously gives 'eternal life' as a chief topic of Christ's teaching; whilst in the Synoptics 'the kingdom of God' holds the corresponding place. The connexion between the two conceptions is intimate and vital. The primary characteristic of eternal life is that it is life lived under the rule of God. The definition found in Jn 17³ (with which Wis 15¹⁶ invites comparison) shows how essentially it is a matter of moral and spiritual interests. The notion of everlastingness rather follows from this: the feeling that death cannot destroy what is precious in God's sight. Cf. Tennyson:

'—Transplanted human worth
Shall bloom to profit elsewhere.'

But the life is a present possession, an actual fact of experience (Jn 3³⁶ 5²⁴ 6¹⁷ etc.). We have, however, the indication of a special association of eternal life with the hereafter in Mk 10³⁰ ('in the world to come') Mt 25⁴⁶. Cf. also v. 490^a.

LIGHT

It is the teaching of Christ that has caused the words 'eternal life' to be written, as it were, across the face of the NT. Still more are we to notice the unique claim made as to His relation to that life. The keynote of the Johannine presentation is 'in him was life' (Jn 1⁹), and throughout He is consistently represented as giving and imparting this life to His people. Note also, it is eternal life as predicated of these that is principally, if not exclusively, in view in the Evangelical teaching: there is little or nothing on human immortality in the widest sense.

2. The rest of the NT.—The leading theme of 1 Jn. is 'eternal life,' and it is handled in complete accord with the Fourth Gospel.—St. Paul is in agreement with the Johannine teaching on the cardinal topic of eternal life. His Epistles throb with this theme, and he conspicuously presents Christ as the source of this life in its fullest conception, or the One through whom it is mediated. See Ro 6²³, and note his strong way of identifying Christ with this life, as in Gal 2²⁰, Ph 1²¹, Col 3³⁻⁴. Christ is also presented as author or mediator of life in the widest sense, the life that moves in all created things (Col 1¹⁸⁻¹⁷; cf. Jn 1³). St. Paul, again, uses 'life' alone as containing all the implicates of 'eternal life' (Ro 5¹⁷, 2 Co 5¹, Ph 2¹⁶). The supremely ethical value associated with life is seen in the definition given in Ro 8⁹, with which cf. Jn 17³. The new life of the Spirit as a dynamic in the present and as having the promise of full fruition in eternity, is central in the Apostle's exposition of Christianity.—For the rest, the Apocalypse should be noticed for its use of such images as 'crown of life,' 'book of life,' 'fountain,' 'river,' and 'water of life,' and the 'tree of life' (which we also meet with elsewhere)—all embodying the Christian hope of immortality. J. S. CLEMENS.

LIGHT.—To the ancient mind light was a holy thing, and the Scriptures associate it with God. He dwells in light (Ex 24¹⁶, 1 Ti 6¹⁶); He is clothed with light (Ps 104²); He is light, and in Him is no darkness at all (1 Jn 1⁵); His glory is the effulgence of His light (Rev 21²³). Cf. the ancient Greek Evening Hymn rendered by Keble: 'Hail, gladdening Light, of His pure glory poured,' etc. Hence Jesus, God Incarnate, is called 'the Light of the world' (Jn 1⁹, 9 18¹²), 'an effulgence of the glory of God' (He 1³); and salvation is defined as walking in His light and being enlightened by it (Jn 8¹², 12³⁶, 1 Jn 1⁷, 2 Co 4⁶, Eph 5⁸⁻¹⁴, 1 Th 5⁵, 1 P 2⁹). And Christians as His representatives and witnesses are the light of the world (Mt 5¹⁴⁻¹⁶, Ph 2¹⁵). On the contrary, a godless life is darkness (Jn 3¹⁸, 12³⁵, 1 Jn 2¹¹).

DAVID SMITH.

LIGHTNING.—Our colloquial use of 'fire' for 'lightning' had its counterpart in Heb., e.g. in such a phrase as 'fire' (ʿesh) and hail' (Ex 9²³ etc.; cf. Gn 19²⁴, 1 K 18³⁸ etc.). The Heb. ʿor (Job 37³) is lit. 'light'; bāzāq (Ezk 1¹⁴) should probably read bārāq; lapidd, lit. 'torch,' is used in the plur. for 'lightnings' (Ex 20¹⁸); a word of uncertain meaning, chōziz (Job 28³⁸, 38³⁸, Zec 10⁴), is evidently related to thunder, and should probably in each case be tr. 'thunder-cloud.' The usual Heb. word is bārāq, Gr. astrapē (2 S 22¹⁸ etc., Mt 24²⁷ etc.). It is used fig. for the glitter of bright metal (Dt 32²⁴, lit. 'the lightning of my sword'; cf. Ezk 21¹⁹, Nah 3³, Hab 3¹¹), and for the glittering weapon itself (Job 20²⁸). It is suggested, either by the flash of polished metal, or by the speed of the chariot (Nah 2⁴). Lightning is associated with the appearance of God (Ex 19¹⁶ etc.), and He alone can control it (Job 38³⁵, Ps 18¹⁴). With lightnings as with arrows, God scatters His enemies (Ps 144⁶ etc.). A radiant face (Dn 10⁶), and gleaming garments (Mt 28³), are like lightning. There is vivid suggestiveness in the comparison of Satan's overthrow with the descent of lightning (Lk 10¹⁸). Cf. the name Barak (Jg 4⁶), with the Carthaginian Barca.

LINE

LIGN ALOES.—See ALOES.

LIGURE.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

LIKHI.—The eponym of a Manassite family (1 Ch 7¹⁰).

LIKING.—In older English 'liking' was used for the outward appearance, qualified by good or ill. So Job 39⁹ 'Their young ones are in good liking.'

LILITH.—The word occurs only in Is 34¹⁴, and is rendered in AV by 'screech-owl' and in RV by 'night-monster.' Belonging to the post-exilic time, it is connected with Jewish ideas on demons which, as foreign influence became felt, were developed on the lines of Babylonian and Persian myths. The Lilith is mentioned in connexion with the desolation which would haunt Edom; it was a hairy monster, and specially dangerous to infants (cf. Lamia). Strange stories are told about Lilith by the Rabbins. It was a nocturnal spectre who assumed the form of a beautiful woman in order to beguile and destroy young children. In the Talmud she is associated with the legends of Adam, whose wife she was before Eve was created, and so became the mother of the demons. T. A. MOXON.

LILY (shūshan, 1 K 7¹⁹; shōshannah, 2 Ch 4⁵, Ca 2¹, Hos 14⁵).—The Heb. word is probably a loan word from the Egyptian for the 'lotus.' In Arab. it is sūsan, which includes a great number of allied flowers—lilies, irises, gladioli, etc. No doubt the Heb. word was equally comprehensive. Flowers of this group are very plentiful in Palestine, the irises being pre-eminent for their handsome appearance. The 'lily work' (1 K 7¹⁹, 2²⁰) is likely to have been modelled after the lotus (Nymphaea lotus) itself: lotus-like flowers appear on some Jewish coins. The Gr. krinon of Mt 6²⁸, Lk 12²⁷ probably had as wide a significance as shūshan, and included much more than actual lilies.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LIME (sth, LXX konía) is mentioned by name in EV only in Is 33¹², Am 2¹. Is 33¹² 'the peoples shall be as the burnings of lime,' i.e. they shall be so utterly consumed as to be comparable to the heap of quicklime that is left after limestone has been burned in a furnace. In Am 2¹ the prophet denounces Moab because they 'burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime'—phosphate of lime being the chief ingredient of the ash of well-burned bones. In Dt 27⁴ sth occurs both as vb. and noun, but is rendered 'plaster.' For Is 27⁹ see CHALK-STONES. The 'whited sepulchres' of Mt 23²⁷ and the 'whited wall' of Ac 23³ are allusions to the whitewashing of tombs with diluted quicklime so as to render them conspicuous, and of walls for purposes of embellishment. J. C. LAMBERT.

LINE.—1. qaw, which is of mos. frequent occurrence, is properly a measuring line (e.g. Jer 31¹³, Ezk 47¹, Zec 1¹⁰). Figuratively it denotes a rule of life (cf. 'precept upon precept, line upon line' of Isaiah's teaching, Is 28¹⁰). Ps 19⁴ 'their line is gone out through all the earth' has been variously interpreted. The LXX, taking the line to be a resonant cord, rendered by phthonggos—'a musical sound,' and St. Paul quotes that version in Ro 10¹⁸ (EV 'sound'). More probably, however, the idea is still that of a measuring line. Cf. Perowne (Psalms, in loc.), who gives 'line or boundary'—'as the heavens seems to measure and mark out the earth (whence the term horizon or boundary).' 2. hebhel, a rope or cord, esp. a measuring cord used in measuring and dividing land (cf. Ps 78⁵, Am 7¹⁷, Zec 2¹). 'The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places' (Ps 16⁶) alludes to the marking out of plots of land with a measuring cord. 3. tiqūdāh (fr. the same root as qaw) is used of the cord of scarlet thread that Rahab bound in the window (Jos 2¹⁸, 21). 4. chāl, properly a sewing-thread, only in 1 K 7¹⁵. 5. pāthil, a string or cord, only in Ezk 40³. 6. seredh in Is 44¹³ is misrendered 'line,' for which RV gives 'pencil,' RVm

'red ochre.' 7. In NT 'line' occurs only in AV of 2 Co 10¹⁴. The Gr. word is kanōn, a measuring rod (AVm 'rule,' RV 'province,' RVm 'limit'), and so, figuratively, a rule. Probably the Apostle's idea is that of a measuring line, as defining the boundary between his own province and another's. J. C. LAMBERT.

LINEN is cloth made from the prepared fibre of flax. In ancient Egypt great proficiency was attained in its manufacture (Pliny, HN vii. 56; Strabo, xvii. 41; Herod. ii. 182), and a flourishing trade was carried on (Pr 7¹⁶, Ezk 27⁷). As material of wearing apparel it has always been esteemed in the East. In a hot climate it tends to greater freshness and cleanliness than cotton or wool. The Egyptian priests were obliged to wear linen (Herod. ii. 37; Wilk. Anc. Egypt. iii. 117). The 'cotton garments' mentioned on the Rosetta stone were probably worn over the linen, and left outside when the priests entered a temple. The embalmed bodies of men and animals were wrapped in strips of linen. No other material was used for this purpose (Wilk. ib. iii. 115, 116, 484). Perhaps we may trace Egyptian influence in the place given to linen in the hangings, etc., of the Tabernacle, and in the garments of the priests (Ex 25⁴ 26¹ etc., 28¹⁵ etc.). It formed part of the usual clothing of royalty, and of the wealthy classes (Gn 41⁴, Est 8¹⁵, Lk 16¹⁹). It is the dress worn by persons engaged in religious service. The priests are those who 'wear a linen ephod' (1 S 22¹⁸). The child Samuel in Shiloh (1 S 2¹⁸), and David, bringing oak the ark (2 S 6¹⁴ etc.), also wear the linen ephod; cf. Ezk 9¹⁰, Dn 10⁶. It formed the garment of the Levite singers (2 Ch 5¹²). It was the fitting raiment of the Lamb's wife, 'the righteousness of the saints' (Rev 19⁸); presumptuously assumed by 'the great city Babylon' (18¹⁶); in it are also arrayed 'the armies that are in heaven' (19¹⁴).

No clear and uniform distinction can be drawn between several Heb. words tr. 'linen.' bad appears to be always used of garments (Gn 41⁴ etc.), while shesh may perhaps mean the thread, as in the phrase 'bad of fine twined shesh' (Ex 39²⁸), the cloth made from it (Ex 25⁴ 26¹, Ezk 27⁷ etc.), and also garments (Ex 28⁸ etc.). We cannot, indeed, be certain that 'linen' is always intended (Guthe, Bib. Wörterbuch, s.v.). The modern Arab. shash means 'cotton gauze.' būla is a word of Aramaean origin, occurring only in later books (Ezk 27¹⁶, 1 Ch 4²¹, Est 10¹), whence comes the Gr. bysos, which covered both bad and shesh (Jos. Ant. iii. vi. 11f.). By later writers it was taken to represent cotton (Liddell and Scott, s.v.). phishim is a general term, denoting the flax, or anything made from it (Jos 2⁹, Jg 15⁴, Jer 13⁷ etc.). sadin was a sheet in which the whole body might be wrapped (Jg 14¹², Pr 31¹³ etc.). It probably corresponded to the indōn 'linen cloth' of Mk 14¹², and the shroud of Mt 27⁵⁹ etc. ēlōn (Pr 7¹⁶) is probably fine Egyptian thread, with which cloths and hangings were ornamented. othōnē (Ac 10¹⁴) is a large sheet; othonia (Jn 19⁴⁰ etc.) are strips for bandages. omolōton (Sir 40⁴) was cloth of unbleached flax. shat'atnez (Lv 19¹⁹) was probably cloth composed of linen and cotton.

Linen yarn (1 K 10²⁸, 2 Ch 1¹⁶, miqweh) should almost certainly be rendered with RV 'drove.' W. EWING.

LINTEL.—See HOUSE, § 6.

LINUS.—One of the Christians at Rome from whom St. Paul sends greetings at the end of the Second Epistle to Timothy (4²¹). All writers agree that he is identical with the first Bishop of Rome. Thus Irenaeus: 'Peter and Paul, when they founded and built up the Church of Rome, committed the office of its episcopate to Linus.' And Eusebius: 'Of the Church of the Romans after the martyrdom of Paul and Peter, the first to be appointed to the office of Bishop was Linus, of whom Paul makes mention at the end of his letter to Timothy.' His episcopate lasted about twelve years, but there is considerable difference of opinion as to its date.

LION.—

(1) āry, aryeh, full-grown lion (Gn 49⁹, Jg 14⁸ etc.).
(2) kēphir, a young strong lion (Jg 14⁸, Job 4¹⁰, Ezk 19² etc.).

(3) lābī (cf. Arab. labwah), specially lioness (Gn 49⁹, Nu 23²⁴, Job 4¹¹ etc.); and lēbīyyah (Ezk 19²).

(4) layish, particularly in poetry (Job 4¹¹, Pr 30²⁰, Is 30⁸ etc.).

(5) shachal, poetically, lit. 'the roarer' (Job 4¹⁰ 10¹⁸ 28⁹, Hos 5⁴, Ps 91¹³).

(6) bēnē-shachal is tr. in AV of Job 28⁹ 'lion's whelps,' but ought to be, as in RVm, 'sons of pride.'

Lions have been extinct in Palestine since the time of the Crusades, but evidently were once plentiful, especially in the thickets along the Jordan (Jer 49¹⁰ 50⁴, Zec 11³). They were a source of danger to men (1 K 13²⁴, 20³, 2 K 17²⁵), and especially to shepherds' flocks (1 S 17³⁴, Is 31⁴, Am 3¹², Mic 5⁸). The terrifying roar of the lion is referred to in Pr 19¹² 20² etc., and it is compared to the voice of God (Jer 25³⁰, Jl 3¹⁶, Am 3⁸). Metaphorically, Judah is described as a lion in Gn 49⁹, Dan in Dt 33², and Israel in Nu 23²⁴ 24²; but in the NT the lion is usually typical of Satan (1 P 5⁸; cf. 'Lion of the tribe of Judah,' Rev 5⁵).

LIP (Heb. sāphāh, sāphām; Gr. cheilos).—1. sāphāh, the usual OT word, and of very frequent occurrence. Only rarely are the lips referred to from the point of view of description of physical beauty and charm (Ca 4³ 11 5¹³). Once they are associated with kissing (Pr 24²⁶), once with drinking (Ca 7⁴, with which cf. Ps 45²), once (anthropomorphically of J¹) as the source from which the breath issues (Is 11⁴); once the protrusion of the lips occurs as a gesture of mocking contempt (Ps 22⁷). Twice (2 K 19²⁸, Is 37³⁹) we have an allusion to the cruel Assyrian custom of passing a ring through the lips of captives and leading them about with a rope or thong. But in the great majority of cases the lips are referred to as organs of speech (Job 27⁴, Ps 119¹⁷¹, Pr 15⁷ 24²). Hence, according to the kind of words they utter and the quality of the heart from which the words come, they are described figuratively as uncircumcised (Ex 6¹² 30¹), flattering (Ps 124³), feigned (17¹), lying (31¹⁸), joyful (63³), perverse (Pr 4²⁹), righteous (16¹³), false (17⁴), burning (26²²), unclean (Is 6⁸). By an intensification or extension of this figurative use, swords are said to be in the lips (Ps 59⁷), adders' poison to be under them (140³), or in them a burning fire (Pr 16²⁷). In Is 57¹⁹ 'the fruit of the lips' = praise. For Hos 14³ see CALVES OF THE LIPS. 2. sāphām (Ezk 24¹⁷ 21, Mic 3⁷, only in the phrase 'cover the lips'), whose equivalent is 'moustache,' it being the Eastern custom to cover this as a sign of stricken sorrow. 3. cheilos occurs 6 times in NT, always in quotations from LXX: Mt 15⁸ and Mk 7⁶ = Is 29¹³; Ro 3¹³ = Ps 140³ [139⁴]; 1 Co 14²¹ = Is 28¹¹; He 13¹⁶ = Hos 14²; 1 P 3¹⁰ = Ps 34¹³ [33⁹].

LIST.—The Old Eng. vb. 'to list' occurs in Mt 17¹², Mk 9¹³, Jn 3⁴, Ja 3⁴. It means 'to desire or choose.'

LITTLE OWL.—See OWL.

LIVELY.—In AV 'lively' sometimes means 'living.' Thus in 1 P 2⁸ Christians are 'lively stones,' while in the previous verse Christ is a 'living stone,' though the Gr. word is the same in both verses. The other passages are Ac 7³⁸ 'lively oracles' and 1 P 1³ 'lively hope.'

LIVER (kābēdh).—1. In the great majority of cases where the liver is mentioned, it is in connexion with the law of sacrifice as prescribed in P (Ex 29¹² 22, Lv 3⁴ 10 16 etc.), and always in association with the caul (yōthereth). The LXX, followed by Josephus (Ant. iii. ix. 2), takes yōthereth to be a lobe of the liver; but it is now agreed that it denotes the fatty mass at the opening of that organ. According to Semitic ideas, a peculiar holiness belonged to the liver and kidneys (wh. see), together with the fat attached to them; the reason being that they were regarded as the special seats not only of emotion but of life itself. Because of its sacredness the liver with its fat was not to be eaten, but was to be offered in sacrifice to J¹. 2. Pr 7²² 'till a dart strike through his liver,'

Is 21¹ 'my liver is poured upon the earth' (cf. Job 16¹⁸ 'he poureth out my gall upon the ground') are further illustrations of the physiological ideas referred to above. Either they are strong expressions for a deadly disease, or they denote sorrowful emotion of the most poignant kind. 3. In Ezk 12²¹ the king of Babylon, at the parting of the way, 'looked in the liver' as one of the three forms of divination he employed. 4. In To 6¹⁻¹⁶ 8² the liver of a fish is used for the purpose of exorcism. See, further, art. MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY, p. 568^b.

LIZARD.—

- (1) letā'ah, a generic name for 'lizard.'
- (2) ṣāb (cf. Arab. dabb), tr. AV 'tortoise,' RV 'great lizard.'
- (3) anāqāh, tr. AV 'ferret,' RV 'gecko.'
- (4) kōach, tr. AV 'chameleón,' RV 'land crocodile.'
- (5) chōmet, tr. AV 'snail,' RV 'sandlizard.'
- (6) ṭāshemeth, tr. AV 'mole,' RV 'chameleón' (wh. see).

All these names occur in Lv 11²⁹⁻³⁰, as 'unclean' animals; most of them are very uncertain.

- (7) semāmīth (Pr 30²⁸), tr. AV 'spider,' RV 'lizard.'

Lizards are ubiquitous and exceedingly plentiful in Palestine: over 40 species have been identified. The most common is the green lizard (Lacerta viridis). The Palestinian gecko (Ptyodactylus Hasselquistii) is common in all native houses; it is able to walk up the walls and along the ceilings by means of the disc-like suckers at the ends of its toes. If semāmīth was, as many scholars claim, a lizard, then probably the gecko is the special species indicated. The dabb is a large lizard (Uromastix spinipes), with a long spiny tail. The sandlizards or skinks are common on soft, sandy soil; seven species are found in Palestine. The 'land crocodile,' known to the Arabs as the warre, is a large lizard, sometimes five feet long; two species have been found in the Jordan valley—the Psammosaurus scineus and the Monitor niloticus. The chameleón is dealt with in a separate article. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LOAF.—See BREAD.

LO-AMMI.—A symbolical name given to Hosea's son (Hos 1¹), signifying 'not my people,' as Lo-ruhamah, the name of his daughter, signifies 'not-pitied.' Opinions are divided as to whether these names are of actual persons used symbolically, or are purely allegorical. See art. HOSEA. W. F. COBB.

LOCUST.—

(1) 'arbeh (root = 'to multiply') occurs more than 20 times; in Jg 6⁷⁻¹², Job 39²⁹, and Jer 46²³ it is, however, tr. 'grasshopper' in AV.

(2) chāgāb (tr. AV and RV 'locust' in 2 Ch 7¹³, elsewhere 'grasshopper'), possibly a small locust: see Lv 11²², Nu 13³³, Ec 12⁵, Is 40²².

(3) gēbīm (pl.), Am 7¹, AV 'grasshoppers,' RV 'locusts,' AVm 'green worms'; gōbār, Nah 3¹⁷, AV 'great grasshoppers,' RV 'swarms of grasshoppers.'

The remaining words are very uncertain. (4) qāzām, tr. 'palmer worm' (i.e. caterpillar). (5) yelaq, tr. (RV) 'canker-worm.' (6) chāšīl, tr. 'caterpillar.' These three (Jl 1⁴⁻²² etc.) may all be stages in the development of the locust, or they may, more probably, be some varieties of grasshoppers. (7) chargāl, Lv 11²² (mistranslated in AV 'beetle'; RV 'cricket'), and (8) sol'ām, Lv 11²² (tr. AV and RV 'bald locust'), are also some varieties of locust or grasshopper (it is impossible to be certain of the varieties specified). (9) ṭelšānāl, Dt 28⁴², from a root meaning 'whirling,' may refer to the cicada, which fills the countryside with its strident noise all through the hot summer.

Locusts and grasshoppers are included in the family Acrididae. The latter are always plentiful, but the locusts fortunately do not appear in swarms, except at intervals of years. The most destructive kinds are Acridium peregrinum and Edipoda migratoria. When they arrive in their countless millions, they darken the sky (Ex 10¹⁴). The poetical description in Jl 2¹⁻¹¹ is full of faithful touches; particularly the extraordinary noise they make (v. 5) when they are all feeding together. Their voracious onslaught is referred to in Is 33¹, and their sudden disappearance when they rise in clouds to seek new fields for destruction is mentioned in Nah 3¹⁷. They clear every green thing in their path (Ex 10¹⁴). No more suitable figure can be conceived for an invading army (Jg 6⁷⁻¹², Jer 46²³). When, some forty years ago, the Anezi Bedouin from E. of the Jordan swarmed on to the Plain of Esdraelon, an eye-witness looking from Nazareth described the plain as stripped utterly bare, 'just as if the locusts had been over it.' When locusts are blown seaward, they fall into the water in vast numbers (Ex 10¹⁹). The present writer has seen along the N. shore of the Dead Sea a continuous ridge of dead locusts washed up. The smell of piles of rotting locusts is intolerable. The feebleness and insignificance of these little insects, as viewed individually, are referred to in Nu 13³³, Ps 109²³, Is 40²². Locusts are still eaten (cf. Mt 3⁴). See FOOD, 8. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LOD, LYDDA.—A town in the territory of Benjamin, not apparently of pre-Israelite origin, but built (1 Ch 8¹²), along with Ono, by the Benjamite Shemed (but Luthen and Auanau occur side by side in the lists of Thothmes III.). Elsewhere it is mentioned only in the post-Captivity lists (Ezr 2³⁴, Neh 7⁷⁷ 11³⁰); and in connexion with the healing of Aeneas at this place (Ac 9³²). Its inhabitants were enslaved by Cassius, and freed by Antony (Jos. Ant. xiv. xi. 2, xii. 2). Cestius Gallus burned it, and it afterwards surrendered to Vespasian (BJ. ii. xix. 1, iv. viii. 1). In the Middle Ages it was the seat of a bishopric. It is a centre of the cultus of that strange being called by the Christians Saint George (to whom the church is dedicated), and by the Muslims el-Khudr—probably an ancient spirit of vegetation. It was known as Diospolis in the Byzantine period, but the dirty modern town which represents the ancient site retains the old name Ludd. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

LODDEUS (1 Es 8⁴⁶, 46).—The 'captain in the place of the treasury' (or 'at the place Casiphia,' Ezr 8¹⁷) to whom Ezra sent for Levites; called Iddo in Ezr 8¹⁷.

LO-DEBAR.—A place in Gilead, near to, and apparently east from, Mahanaim. It was the retreat of Mephibosheth till he was summoned to court by David (2 S 9⁴, 5). It is mentioned also upon the occasion of David's flight to the east of the Jordan (17²⁷). The site has not been recovered. It is perhaps the same as Lidebir of Jos 13²⁸.

LOG.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

LOGIA.—See GOSPELS, § 2 (c).

LOGOS.—In classical Greek logos signifies both 'word' and 'reason,' but in the LXX and the NT it is used, with few exceptions, in the former sense only. When it is God's word that is spoken of, it denotes the declaration or revelation of the Divine will, and specifically the Christian gospel as the utterance of the Divine plan of salvation (c.g. Mt 13¹²⁻²³ ||, Ph 1⁴). But in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel (1¹ [3 times] 14, with which cf. 1 Jn 1¹ [5⁷ of AV is spurious; see RV] and Rev 19¹³ 'Logos' (EV Word) is applied to Jesus Christ, and is used to set forth His peculiar glory as the only-begotten Son of God, who is also the Life and Light of men. It is with this Johannine Logos that we have now to deal, and in doing so it seems necessary to consider (1) the content of John's Logos doctrine; (2) its sources; (3) its place in the Fourth Gospel; (4) its theological significance.

1. Content.—Three stages appear in the exposition of the Logos doctrine given in the Prologue. (a) First (vv. 1-3), the nature and functions of the Logos are set forth in His relations to God, the world, and man. He was with God in the beginning, i.e. He eternally held relation of communion with Him as a separate personality—a personality itself Divine, for 'the Word was God.' As to the world, it was made by Him (v. 3, cf. v. 10), perhaps with the further suggestion that from Him it draws continually the life by which it is sustained (v. 4). But from Him there flows also the higher life of man as a spiritual being possessed of reason and conscience, for His life becomes the universal light of human souls (v. 4, cf. v. 9). (b) The second stage of the exposition (vv. 1-12) is a contrast of the Logos with the word of God that came by John the Baptist. John was not the Light; he came only to bear witness of it. The Logos is the true Light, and the mediator of Divine life to all who believe on His name. (c) Finally (vv. 14-18), the author describes the incarnation of the Logos in the flesh, and declares His identity with the historical Jesus Christ, the bringer of grace and truth. In v. 18 the whole Prologue is summed up. Here the writer returns to the point from which he set out (cf. v. 1), but his readers now understand that the eternal Logos is one with Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

2. Sources.—(1) For these some have been content to refer to the OT and the post-canonical Jewish writings. And it is true that a connexion is clearly to be traced. We can hardly mistake a reference in the Prologue (vv. 1, 3, 4, 10) to the creative word of God in Gn 1. In the Psalms and Prophets, again, a personification of the word of Jehovah is common (e.g. Ps 33⁶, Is 55¹¹). And in the Wisdom literature, both canonical and apocryphal, this personifying tendency is carried still further (Pr 8²²⁻²⁴, Sir 24), though it is God's Wisdom, not His Word, that becomes His representative, and a full personification of the Word does not meet us till we have reached a point in Jewish history where Greek influences have begun to make themselves felt (Wis 9¹⁶⁻¹⁷). All this, however, is very far from explaining the Johannine Logos doctrine. The most that can be said is that the doctrine of the Prologue reflects a tendency of Jewish thought, finding its roots in the OT, to conceive of the Divine self-revelation as mediated by the personified Wisdom or Word of Jehovah.

(2) Some have held that John's Logos doctrine was derived entirely from the Judæo-Alexandrian philosophy, and specifically from the teaching of Philo. From early times there had grown up among the Greeks a conception of the Logos as the Divine Reason manifested in the universe, and explaining how God comes into relation with it. To this Logos philosophy Plato's doctrine of ideas had contributed, and afterwards the Stoic view of the Logos as the rational principle of the universe. In his efforts to blend Judaism with Hellenism, Philo adopted the term as one familiar alike to Jews and to Greeks, and sought to show by means of allegorical interpretations that the true philosophy of God and the world was revealed in the OT. And St. John, it is supposed, simply appropriated this teaching, and by means of an idealizing treatment of Christ's life constructed in his Gospel a philosophical treatise on the doctrine of Philo. The theory breaks down on any examination. To Philo the Logos was the principle of Reason; to St. John He was the Divine revealing Word. Philo's Logos is not really personal; St. John's certainly is. Philo does not identify the Logos with the Messiah; to St. John He is no other than the Christ, the Saviour of the world. Philo sees in the flesh a principle opposed to the Godhead; St. John glories in the fact of the Incarnation. With Philo the antithesis between God and the world is a metaphysical one; with St. John it is ethical and religious. St. John cannot, then, have derived his doctrine of the Logos from Philo. But he undoubtedly used the term because Philo had made it familiar to Græco-Jewish thought as a means of expressing the idea of a mediation between God and the universe, and also because he himself had received certain formal influences from the Philonic philosophy (see, e.g., the value he assigns to knowledge; his crystallization of the gospel into such general terms as light, 'truth,' 'life'; his constant antithesis of light and darkness). Apart, however, from such formal influences and the convenience of a familiar and suggestive term, the real source of the Johannine Logos doctrine is still to seek.

(3) That source is assuredly to be found in the actual historical personality of Jesus Himself as we find it set forth in the rest of this Gospel. More and more it becomes impossible for the careful student of this book to treat it as a philosophical romance in which a purely idealizing treatment is given to the figure of Jesus; more and more the substantial historical truth of the presentation becomes evident. And, assuming the substantial truth of the narrative, it seems clear that St. John uses his Logos conception, not 'to manufacture the Light of the World out of the Messiah of Israel,' but to set forth, in a way that would appeal to the men of his own place and time, Christ's real relations to God and the universe as these had been attested by His words and deeds, by His dying and rising from the dead, and by all the facts of His self-revelation. We must bear in mind, moreover, that while the term 'Logos' was a new one to be applied to Christ, the place of dignity and power assigned to Him by John was by no means new. Both St. Paul and the author of Hebrews had taught the doctrine of Christ's eternal Sonship, and of His functions as the creator of the universe and the revealer of the Father (Ph 2¹¹, Col 1¹⁵⁻²⁰ 29, He 1¹⁻⁴), and the teaching of both, already familiar and widely accepted in the Church, is subsumed in the Johannine doctrine of the Logos.

3. Place in the Fourth Gospel.—The attempt has been made to distinguish between the Logos doctrine in the Prologue as Hellenic, and the Gospel itself as Palestinian; and it has been maintained that the influence of the Logos idea does not extend beyond the Prologue, and that it was merely intended to introduce to Greek readers the story of the Jewish Messiah with a view to making it more attractive and intelligible. We may remind ourselves, however, of Strauss's comparison of this Gospel to the seamless robe of Jesus, a judgment which has been verified by nearly every critical student of whatever school. It is true that when we pass beyond the Prologue the word 'Logos' is not repeated. The author nowhere puts it into the mouth of Jesus,—one evidence surely of his historical fidelity. But, all the same, the doctrine of the Prologue manifestly works right through the narrative from beginning to end (see such passages as 3¹³⁻²¹ 6⁴⁵⁻⁴⁸ 7²⁵ 29 8¹² 14 16 10²⁰ 12⁴⁴⁻⁵⁰ 14⁶⁻¹¹ 17⁸ 18 24 etc.). It is very noticeable that in 20⁹, where, before laying down his pen, the writer reveals the motive of his work, he really sums up the great ideas of the Prologue as he declares that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing we may have life through His name. The Logos, then, is not a mere catchword, put forth in order to seize the eye and arouse the interest of the Greek reader. The Logos idea underlies the whole Gospel, and has much to do with the author's selection of his materials. In the Prologue, as in any other well-written introduction, the plan of the work is set out, and the Logos doctrine is stated there because it supplies the key to a right understanding of the history that follows.

4. Theological significance.—From the time of Justin, and ever since, the Logos doctrine of St. John's Prologue has served as the material of many a Christian metaphysic. It is no doubt inevitable that this should be the case; but we must be careful not to make St. John responsible for the theological constructions that have been woven out of his words. If an injustice is done him when his doctrine of the Logos is supposed to be nothing more than the fruitage of his study of Philo, another injustice is committed when it is assumed that he is setting forth here either a metaphysic of the Divine nature or a philosophy of the Incarnation. It is plain, on the contrary, that in all that he says it is the religious and ethical interests that are paramount. He uses the Logos conception for two great purposes,—to set forth Jesus (1) as the Revealer of God, and (2) as the Saviour of men. The first of these ideas, as has been said, is one that we find already in the Pauline Epistles and in Hebrews; but by his emphasis on the relations of Fatherhood and Sonship St. John imparts a peculiarly moral meaning to the essential nature of the God who is revealed in Christ. But it is above all for a soteriological purpose that he seems to employ the Logos idea. The Logos, who is identified with Jesus Christ, comes forth from the bosom of the Father, bringing life and light to men. He comes with a gospel that supersedes the Law of Moses, for it is a gospel of grace as well as of truth. Himself the Son of God, He offers to all who will believe on His name the right to become the children of God. And so, while the Logos is undoubtedly the agent of God's creative will, He is still more distinctively the mediator of God's redeeming purpose. It is therefore as a religious power, not as a metaphysical magnitude, that St. John brings Him before us. The Evangelist shows, it is true, as Kihn points out, that the absoluteness of Christ's historical mission and His exclusive mediation of the Divine saving grace are guaranteed by the fact that the roots of His personal life reach back into the eternal life of God. His Logos doctrine thus wards off every Christology that would see in Jesus no more than a prophetic personality of the highest originality. But, while the Logos idea 'illuminates the history with the light of eternity, it can reveal eternity to us only in the light of history, not in its own supernatural light' (PRE xi. 605).

LOIS.—The grandmother of Timothy (2 Ti 1⁵), and probably the mother of Eunice, Timothy's mother. The name is Greek. The family lived at Lystra (Ac 16¹), where St. Paul first made their acquaintance. Lois was a devout Jewess by conviction, who instructed her family diligently in the Holy Scriptures.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

LONGSUFFERING.—In the OT the RV uses this word only in Jer 15¹, where it is the translation of a phrase usually rendered 'slow to anger' (cf. Ex 34⁶, Nu 14¹⁸, Ps 86¹, in which passages AV has 'long-suffering').

In the NT 'longsuffering' is the usual tr. of makrothumia and the corresponding verb. (The only exceptions are 'patience,' He 6¹², Ja 5¹⁰; cf. vb. in Mt 18²⁶, 22, Ja 5⁷; and adv. in Ac 26³). The RV improves on AV by using 'longsuffering' in 1 K 18⁷, 1 Th 5⁴. The Gr. word means 'a long holding out of the mind before it gives room to action or passion—generally to passion.' (Trench, Synonyms of NT, § liii.); it implies the opposite of short temper; cf. Old Eng. 'longaninuity.' In the NT the longsuffering of God is regarded as a proof of His 'goodness' (Ro 2; here and elsewhere 'longsuffering,' || 'forbearance' [arochē]) and of His faithfulness (2 P 3⁹⁻¹⁰); it is manifested in the gracious restraint which characterizes His attitude towards those who deserve His wrath (Ro 9²², 1 P 3²⁰). The Divine longsuffering is perfectly exemplified in Christ's dealings with sinners (1 Ti 1¹⁶). Longsuffering is, therefore, a conspicuous grace in the ideal Christian character (2 Co 6⁶, Eph 4², Col 3¹², 1 Th 5⁴, 2 Ti 3¹⁰⁻¹⁴); it is viewed as an evidence of Divine strengthening (Col 1¹¹), as a manifestation of love (1 Co 13⁴), and as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5²²).

LORD.—The Heb. OT has three leading names for God: (1) 'the name of four letters' (tetragrammaton)

JHWH (familiar to us in the incorrect form 'Jehovah'; the real vocalization is almost certainly 'Jahweh' [see God, p. 299b]); (2) Adonai; (3) Elohim. By a misinterpretation of Lv 24¹⁶ the Jews shrank from uttering the first of these, and added to its four consonants, in their reading of the OT, the vowels of either Adonai or Elohim. When the vowels of the former were added, the AV and RV generally translate the word by 'Lord'; when those of the latter, by 'God'; using small capitals in each case. If, however, Adonai is originally in the text, they represent it by 'Lord,' using an initial capital only. Thus in the OT 'Lord' represents Jahweh when it was read as Adonai; and 'Lord' represents Adonai when it stands in the original text. This distinctive printing is not observed in the NT. There are several other Hebrew words in the OT expressing the general idea of lordship, which are rendered by 'lord' (Gn 45⁸, Jos 13³, Ezr 8² etc.).

In the NT 'Lord' is used once as tr. of Rabboni (Mk 10⁸), and five times of despotēs (Lk 2³, Ac 4²⁴, 2 P 2¹, Jude 4, Rev 6¹⁰); in all the latter cases the RV has 'master' in text or margin. Elsewhere it represents kyrios, applying the title (1) to God (Mt 1², Ac 5¹⁹ etc.); (2) to Christ (Lk 6⁶, Jn 20²⁸ etc.). Indeed, as applied to Christ, it is the highest confession of His Person (1 Co 12³, Ro 10⁹, Rev 19⁴). The form 'lord' in NT indicates mere possession of authority (Mt 18²², Lk 16⁸ etc.).

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

LORD OF HOSTS (Jahweh tsēbā'ōth) appears in the OT as a title of God 282 times, of which all but 36 are found in the Prophetic writings. There is considerable uncertainty as to what the term 'hosts' signifies and it seems best to suppose that its meaning underwent modifications in the course of time. We can, perhaps, distinguish three stages.

1. It is possible that at one time the title suggested the idea of Jahweh as the leader of the Israelite forces. In favour of this view is the fact that the word tsēbā'ōth outside this phrase always refers to bodies of men, and usually to Israelite forces. There is no doubt that in the early stages of the history of the nation the popular view of the functions of Jahweh was concentrated to a large extent on this point that He was the guider and commander of the armies in warfare; and the same idea lingered late, and lies at the bottom of the objection to the institution of the monarchy which is put in Samuel's mouth (cf. 1 S 8³⁰ with 1 S 12²). In the same way, David, as he taunts Goliath, says to him, 'I come in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel' (1 S 17⁴⁵). And once more there is evidently a special connexion between the title 'Lord of hosts' and the Ark which is regarded as the habitation of Jahweh in His capacity as War-God (cf. 1 S 4³, 5⁶⁻⁸, 5. 6). But this explanation of the origin of the title, as Deltzsch pointed out, is greatly invalidated by the fact that we do not find it in the period in which we should expect it to be most common, that is, in the wars of the Wand'ring in the Wilderness.

2. So we are brought to another view, which may merely mark a later stage: the 'hosts' are the spiritual forces which stand at God's disposal. So in Jos 5¹⁴⁻¹⁵, when Joshua asks the unknown warrior whether he is on their side or on that of their enemies, the implied answer of the Divine stranger is that he belongs to neither side, but is come as captain of the Lord's host to succour His people. For the idea of the angelic host engaged in the service of God, cf. 2 S 24¹⁶, 1 K 22¹⁹, 2 K 6¹⁷; and in the NT Mt 26⁵¹, Lk 2³, He 1¹⁴.

3. The third stage is reached in the prophets, esp. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zechariah, and Malachi, where the title assumes a far wider meaning and embraces all the forces of the universe. The term 'host of heaven' is commonly used of the heavenly bodies to which the later kings paid idolatrous worship (cf. also Gn 2¹, Ps 33⁶). As the idea of the omnipotence of God grew loftier and wider, the elemental forces of nature were regarded as performing service to their Creator. So the sun is God's minister (Ps 19⁴⁻⁵), and even so early as the Song of Deborah the stars are represented as joining by God's behest in the battle against the invader (Jg 5²⁰). Hence the term 'Lord of hosts' becomes with the prophets the highest and most transcendental title of God, and is even rendered by the LXX in a certain number of passages 'Lord of the forces (of nature).' It serves as a constant reminder of the illimitable width of God's sway, and as such it acquires a close connexion with the other great attribute of God, His holiness. Hence we get the summit of the OT creed in the angelic song of praise, Is 6³, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts: the fulness of the whole earth is his glory.'

In the NT, with the exception of a quotation from Is 1³ in Ro 9³, the term occurs only in Ja 5⁴ (in both passages EV has the form 'Lord of Sabaoth'), where it is singularly appropriate in the passionate denunciation of the oppression practised by the unscrupulous landowners, recalling as it does the spirit of the Hebrew prophets.

LORD'S DAY.—1. Name and origin.—The title used by St. John (Rev 1¹⁰), probably to describe the day upon which the Christian Church in Apostolic days assembled 'for worship. The Acts of the Apostles shows us the disciples of Christ immediately after Pentecost as a closely united body, 'of one heart and soul,' supported by daily gatherings together and the Eucharist (4³² 24⁴²⁻⁴⁶). Their new faith did not at first lead them to cut themselves off from their old Jewish worship, for their belief in Jesus as Messiah seemed to them to add to and fulfil, rather than to abolish, the religion of their childhood. This worship of Christians with their Jewish fellow-countrymen secured the continuation of the Church of God from one dispensation to another; while their exclusively Christian Eucharists consolidated the Church and enabled it to discover itself.

The daily worship of the Christian Church would no doubt soon prove impracticable, and a weekly gathering became customary. For this weekly gathering the Sabbath was unsuitable, as being then observed in a spirit radically different from the joy and liberty of the new faith; doubtless also the restrictions as to length of a Sabbath day's journey would prove a bar to the gathering together of the little body. Of the other six days none so naturally suggested itself as the first. To it our Lord had granted a certain approval; for on it He rose from the grave and appeared to His disciples, and on the following Sunday repeated His visitation; while, if Pentecost that year fell on the first day of the week (which it did if the chronology of St. John be followed), it received a final seal as the special day of grace.

That this day was actually chosen is seen in the NT (Ac 20⁷, 1 Co 16²). And mention of it is found in the literature immediately following the Apostolic writings.

Not the least interesting evidence is found in a report to the Emperor Trajan written by Pliny, a heathen magistrate, not long after the death of St. John, which mentions that the custom of the Christians was to meet together early in the morning on a certain 'fixed day' and sing hymns to Christ as a god, and bind themselves by a sacramentum to commit no crime. Ignatius, the earliest of post-Apostolic Christian writers, also speaks of it, telling the Magnesians to lead a life conformable to 'the Lord's Day.'

And from then to now a continuous stream of evidence shows that the Church has faithfully observed the custom ever since.

The title by which early Christian writers usually called the festival was 'the Lord's Day'; but before long the Church felt no difficulty in adopting the heathen title of 'Sunday,' realizing that as on that day light was created, and the Sun of Righteousness arose on it, there was to them a peculiar fitness in the name.

The most valuable evidence as to the method by which the early Church observed the day is found in Justin

LORD'S PRAYER

Martyr's Apology (l. 67, A.D. 120), where we read that on the day called Sunday the Christians met together, out of both city and country, and held a religious service at which first the writings of Apostles and Prophets were read; then the president preached; after which common prayers were said; and when these were ended, bread and wine were brought to the president, who uttered prayers and thanksgivings, to which the people said, 'Amen'; all present then participated in the Eucharist, the deacons carrying it to the absent. Thus it is clear that the early Church continued the Apostolic custom (Ac 20⁷) of celebrating the Lord's Supper every Lord's Day—a custom so wide-spread as to enable Chrysostom to call Sunday dies panis, or 'the day of bread.'

2. Relation to the Sabbath.—The relation of the Lord's Day to the Sabbath is best defined as one of close affinity rather than of identity. The Sabbath was originally instituted as a provision for deep physical and spiritual needs of human nature. It sprang from the love of God for man, providing by religious sanction for the definite setting apart of the seventh day as a time for rest from labour and for communion with God. Our Lord found the original institution almost hidden beneath a mass of traditional regulations. Thus his action towards the Sabbath as He found it, was to bring men back to its first ideal. This He did by showing that their tradition told how David broke the letter of its regulation and yet was guiltless (Lk 6³); how charity and common sense led men to break their own rules (13¹⁶); how the Sabbath was granted to man as a blessing and not laid on him as a burden (Mk 2²⁷); and how He as Son of Man, fulfilling ideal manhood, was its Lord (2²⁸); but while our Lord thus purified the Sabbath, there is no proof that He abolished it. He foreknew its ultimate abolition, as He foreknew the ultimate destruction of the Temple; and He cleansed it as He cleansed the Temple.

We can best see Christ's will regarding the Sabbath and the Lord's Day in what actually happened. For what happened had its rise in Apostolic times, and has been adopted by the Church universal ever since, and is thus assuredly His will as wrought by the Spirit. The Acts shows us that the Christians who were originally Jews observed both the Sabbath and the Christian Lord's Day (Ac 21²⁰⁻²¹); and this double observance lasted among them at least until the destruction of the Temple. The Jewish members of the Church were soon outnumbered by the Gentile, and these latter would feel in no way drawn to continuing the observance of the Jewish Sabbath as well as their own Lord's Day; and this the more so that they had received the gospel under the wider teaching of St. Paul, who had emphasized the danger of an undue observance of days, and had spoken of the Sabbath as 'a shadow of the things to come' (i.e. the Christian dispensation; cf. Col 2¹⁶, Gal 4¹⁰⁻¹¹, Ro 14⁵). But if the Gentile Christian did not observe the Jewish Sabbath, yet he could not be ignorant of its deeper meaning, for he saw the Sabbath observed by his Jewish neighbours, and read in the OT of its institution and uses; and thus imperceptibly the essential principles of the Sabbath would pass into the Christian idea of their own sacred day of rest and worship. Christ's intention, then, seems to have been to allow the Sabbath to die slowly, but by His Spirit to teach the Church to perpetuate for mankind in her Lord's Day all that was of eternal moment in the Sabbath. Thus was avoided the danger of pouring the new wine of Christian truth and liberty into the old bottles of Jewish traditional observances.

LORD'S PRAYER.

v.⁹ Thus therefore pray ye:

(1) Our Father which art in the heavens;

(2) Hallowed be thy name.

v.¹⁰ (3) Thy kingdom come.

(4) Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on [the] earth.

LORD'S PRAYER

- v.¹¹ (5) Our daily (?) bread give us to-day.
 v.¹² (6) And forgive us our debts, as we also [forgive] our debtors.
 v.¹³ (7) And bring us not into temptation;
 (8) But deliver us from the evil (one?).
 For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, unto the ages. Amen.
 Lk 11²⁻⁴.
 v.² Whosoever ye pray, say,
 (1) [Our] Father [which art in the heavens];
 (2) Hallowed be thy name.
 (3) Thy kingdom come.
 (4) [Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on the earth.]
 v.³ (5) Our daily (?) bread give us day by day.
 v.⁴ (6) And forgive us our sins, for we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us.
 (7) And bring us not into temptation;
 (8) [But deliver us from the evil (one?)].

The request of one of the disciples—'Lord, teach us to pray' (Lk 11¹)—expresses a desire which doubtless found a place in the hearts of all. Great teachers were expected to give their disciples a form of prayer. Because John had taught his disciples to pray, Christ was petitioned to do the same for His followers.

The Lord's Prayer has been delivered to us in two forms, one by Mt., another by Lk.; in each case in a different context. The forms are set out above for comparison, in a literal translation, as a preliminary to the consideration of questions connected with the texts and the contexts. The places in which there is a difference of reading or where words are omitted by some authorities, are enclosed in brackets. The form in Mt. consists of eight clauses, which correspond, clause by clause, to an equal number in Lk., according to the longer text. The shorter Lukan text omits clauses 4 and 8. The Doxology is found only in MSS of Mt., and not in the oldest of these.

'Thus,' after this manner' (Mt 6⁹) introduces the prayer as a model of acceptable devotion. 'Whosoever' (Lk 11²) enjoins the use of the words which follow, and implies that the prayers of Christ's disciples should be conceived in the spirit of the form He was giving them.

In clause 4 (Mt.) the article before 'earth' is omitted in some MSS; but as, by a well-known rule the article in Greek is often implied, but not expressed, after a preposition, the omission does not demand a change in the translation.

In clause 6 (Mt.) a few old authorities read the perfect—'have forgiven.'

In Lk., clause 1, the words 'Our' and 'which art in the heavens,' and the whole of clauses 4 and 8, are omitted by a few ancient authorities, and, in consequence, have been rejected by the RV. Yet the TR of Lk. is attested by the majority of the MSS. If we go behind these witnesses, and, in spite of their evidence, accept the shorter Lukan form, it will perhaps follow that the rejected clauses were never parts of the Prayer, as taught by Christ, but are later amplifications, which obtained a place in Mt., and thence were copied into the Lukan text.

Clause 6 in Lk. explains the corresponding words in Mt. In the latter 'as' is not of strict proportion, but of general condition. It cannot be, as is sometimes stated in devotional exegesis, that we are to pray God to measure His boundless pity by our imperfect attempts to forgive; but we plead that we have endeavoured to remove what would be a bar to His grant of pardon; and this is expressed clearly in Lk., 'for we ourselves also forgive.'

The Doxology, which is not found in the oldest MSS, is contained in the majority of copies. The evidence of the ancient versions is divided. Some of the Fathers, in commenting on the Lord's Prayer, take no account of a Doxology; but Chrysostom and others recognize it, and note its connexion with the preceding petitions. If the Doxology be not an integral part of the Matthaean text, it is certainly of very great antiquity. It may have been interpolated from a Liturgy; for it is now admitted that liturgical forms existed in the earliest days of Christianity, although perhaps at first they were unwritten, and were transmitted orally.

The word in clause 5 which we have provisionally rendered 'daily' was of doubtful import in early times, for different interpretations have been given by the ancients.

Origen (3rd cent.), the greatest textual critic of primitive days, says that the word (epiousios) was coined by the Evangelists, and is not found in earlier Greek writers. Among the Syrians one Version (Curetonian) has in Mt. 'bread constant of the day,' in Lk. 'bread constant of every day'; in Lk. the Lewis Version (not extant in Mt.) has the same as the Curetonian; in Mt. the Pesh. has 'bread of our need to-day,' in Lk. 'bread of our need daily.' The ancient Latin rendering of epiousios was 'daily.' This is read now in the Vulgate in Lk., but in Mt. was altered by Jerome to 'super-substantial.' The term is derived either from epi and ienai, 'to come upon,' i.e. 'succeed,' 'be continual'; or from epi and ousia, 'upon substance,' i.e. 'added to, or adapted to, substance.' The Syriac rendering 'constant' comes from the first derivation; the second derivation permits their other rendering 'of our need,' bread 'adapted to our human substance.' Jerome's rendering in Mt. takes epiousios in a spiritual sense, 'something added to natural substance.' In either case 'bread' may be taken in an earthly or a heavenly sense. The fulness of Scriptural language justifies the widest application of the term. If we adopt the derivation from ienai 'to come,' the bread epiousios will be—(i) whatsoever is needed for the coming day, to be sought in daily morning prayer—'give us to-day'; (ii) whatsoever is needed for the coming days of life. The petition becomes a prayer for the presence of Him who has revealed Himself as 'the Bread.' Another application, the coming feast in the Kingdom of God (cf. Lk 14¹⁵), seems excluded by the reference to the present time in both Evangelists.

In clause 8 the Greek may be the genitive case of ho ponēros, 'the evil one,' or of to ponēron, where the article to is generic, 'the evil,' 'whatsoever is evil.' The Greek is indefinite, and commentators have taken the words in both applications.

We have already observed that the longer readings in the Lukan form of the Prayer may be due to the attempts of copyists to harmonize the text with the form found in their days in Mt. Some may further argue that the two forms are different reminiscences of the same instruction. If it be held that the Gospels are late compositions, in which, long after the events recorded, certain unknown writers gathered together without method, or accurate knowledge, such traditions as had reached them, it will be as justifiable as it is convenient to treat all related passages as mere varying traditions of the same original. But if it be admitted that the Evangelists were accurate and well-informed historians, there is no ground for identifying the Prayer in Lk. with that in Mt. They occupy different places in the history. Mt. records the Prayer as part of a discourse. It was delivered unasked, as a specimen of right prayer, in contrast to the hypocritical and superstitious habits which the Master condemned; and it is followed by an instruction on forgiveness. The occasion in Lk. is altogether different. Christ had been engaged in prayer; then, in response to a request, He delivered a form for the use of His disciples, and enforced the instruction by a parable and exhortations teaching the power of earnestness in prayer. The differences of text, especially if the shorter readings in Lk. be adopted, distinguish the one form from the other; and it is unreasonable to deny that the Master would, if necessary, repeat instructions on an important subject.

The Prayer is rightly named 'the Lord's,' because it owes to the Master its form and arrangement; but many of the sentiments may be paralleled in Jewish writings, and are ultimately based on the teachings of the OT.

In a work accessible to the ordinary reader, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers (ed. C. Taylor), we read (ch. v. 30): 'R. Jehudah ben Thema said, Be strong as a lion, to do the will of thy Father which is in heaven.' In ch. iv. 7 (n. 8) examples are given of the use of 'the Name' as a substitute for titles of the Almighty, and including all that they imply. The Rabbinical doctrine of the correspondence of the upper with the lower world is exemplified by Taylor, ch. iii. 15 n. Hillel said of a skull floating on the water (ii. 7), 'Because thou drownest, they drowned thee, and in the end they that drowned thee shall be drowned'; which illustrates clause 6 of the Prayer. From Talmudic prayers are quoted (p. 128) the petitions: 'May it be thy will to deliver us from evil man, evil chance, etc.; and 'Bring me not into the hands of sin, nor into the hands of temptation.' In the OT we may compare with clause 1, Is 63¹; clause 2, Ex 20⁷; clauses 2, 3, Zec. 14³; clause 4, Ps 103² 135⁵; clause 5, Ex 16⁴, Pr 30⁶; clause 6, Ob 15. The Doxology may be compared with 1 Ch 29¹¹.

It is remarkable that there is no instance in the NT of the use of the Prayer by the disciples; but the scantiness of the records forbids an adverse conclusion. There is in 2 Ti 4¹⁸ what seems to be an allusion to clause 8, and to the Doxology, in relation to St. Paul's experience. The first word of the Prayer in our Lord's vernacular and in the Evangelists' translation is alluded to in Ro 8¹⁴, Gal 4⁵. It is doubtful whether an Oriental would consider that he had satisfied the requirements of the 'thus' and the 'whosoever' by ex tempore or other devotions, which merely expressed the sentiments of the Prayer. In any case, from early days the opinion has prevailed in the Church that the use of the actual words is an essential part of every act of worship.

LORD'S SUPPER.—See EUCHARIST.

LORDS OF THE PHILISTINES.—The chieftains or 'tyrants' of the five Philistine cities, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath. Wherever they are mentioned (Jos 13³, Jg 3¹⁶, s. 18, 27, 30, 1 S 5⁵, 11 6⁴, 12, 16, 18, 7¹, 20⁴, 6, 7, 1 Ch 12¹⁹) the word translated 'lord' is a peculiar one, being identical with the Heb. word for 'axle.' Once (1 S 18³⁰) the Heb. word for 'princes' is applied to them. Probably the peculiar word is a native Philistine title. Their functions, so far as can be gathered from the OT, were the same as those of petty kings.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

LO-RUHAMA.—See HOSEA, LO-AMMI.

LOT.—The son of Haran, brother of Abraham. His name seems clearly derived from a root meaning to wrap closely. The account of his life is contained in Gn 11²⁷–14¹⁵ 19. He was born in Ur, and went with Abraham to Haran, and thence to Canaan. He accompanied Abraham in much of his wandering. The separation between them (ch. 13) was due to a quarrel between their herdsman, each having great possessions of cattle. As a result, Lot dwelt in the cities of the plain, making his home in Sodom. During the expedition of Chedorlaomer (ch. 14) he was carried away captive, and rescued by Abraham. In ch. 19 is narrated the escape of Lot and his daughters from Sodom, with the subsequent incidents. The city of Zoar, where they dwelt for a time, is possibly the Zoara or Zodr of Josephus, at the S.E. extremity of the Dead Sea, in the modern Ghōr es-Sāfīeh, a well-watered region. The mountain to which he finally went is doubtless the mountainous region later known as Moab. The story of the daughters of Lot (19³⁰–38) is now usually considered to be not history, but a traditional account of the origin of the two nations, Moab and Ammon. The basis of the story is partly popular etymology of the two names; while it is prompted chiefly by national rivalry and hostility. That Lot was a righteous man (2 P 2⁷, 8) may be granted in a relative sense, in comparison with the Sodomites; but he shows no great strength of character.

Lot's wife.—The historical character of the story of Lot's wife and her transformation into a pillar of salt is doubtful: it may have arisen from the peculiarities of the cliffs in the vicinity of the Dead Sea. At its S.W. extremity is a range of cliffs 6 miles long and 600 feet high, called Jebel Usdum, 'the mountain of Sodom.' These consist of crystallized rock salt, covered with chalky limestone and gypsum, and curiously furrowed and worn, so as sometimes to resemble a human figure.

LOVE, LOVER, LOVELY, BELOVED.—

1. 'Love' (noun and verb, native Eng.) represents a single Heb. word, which ranged, like the Eng. term, from (1) sensuous, and often (though not necessarily) evil, desire (as in Gn 25²⁸, 2 S 13¹, Jer 2²⁸), through (2) family affection and natural friendship (Gn 22², Ex 21⁵, 1 S 18¹, 2 S 1²), up to (3) the highest spiritual passion. Under (3) comes (a) J's love to Israel, to the righteous, etc. (Dt 4³⁷ 77¹, 1 K 10⁹, Hos 3¹ 9¹⁵ 11⁴ 14⁴, Zeph 3¹⁷, Jer 2², Is 43⁴ 48¹⁴ 63⁹, Mal 1², Ps 11⁴ 47⁴ 78⁸ 87² 146⁸, Pr 31² 81², 2 Ch 21⁹ 9⁸); and (b) Israel's love to J', His name, word, ways, etc. (e.g. in Ex 20⁶, Dt 6⁵ etc., Neh 1³; 1 K 3²—same verb as in 11⁴; Ps 51¹ 31² 116¹ 119⁹⁷ etc.; Mic 6⁸). Under a strong synonym meaning to cleave to or hang upon, J' is said (Dt 7⁷) to have 'set his love upon' Israel, and the saint (Ps 91¹⁴) to have 'set his love upon' J'. Passages coming under (b) are relatively numerous, and date from the redemption of the Exodus. The instances of (a) we have enumerated in full; none of these is certainly earlier than Hosea, who first represented the covenant of Jehovah as a spousal contract. In similar connexion, J's love to His people is poetically expressed by a word, of twofold form, signifying 'darling' ('beloved,' etc.), in Dt 33¹², Is 54, Ps 60⁴ 127³; this term figures much in Canticles. 'Love does not appear with this association in Gn.; but the phrase 'walked with God,' of 5²² 21 6⁹ (also Mic 6⁸, Mal 2²), conveys the idea of companionship. Several other Heb. synonyms occur, of limited use and slight significance. Lover (OT) is used in the evil meaning of (1)—paramour, and in sense (2) above—a derivative (in Heb.) from the main stem first referred to, Lovely in 2 S. 1²—lovable. For 'greatly beloved' in Dn 9²² etc., see RVm.

Love, like joy (wh. see), holds a unique place in the Israelite as compared with other religions, as it signifies the reciprocal affection of God and people. According to Greek philosophy, the gods are as much above human affection as inanimate things are below it: 'for friendship demands reciprocity; but relationship with God admits of no return of love, and therefore of no love in the proper sense, for it would be preposterous if any one said that he loves Zeus' (Magna Moralia). The sentiment of the OT is just the opposite of this; J' calls Israel 'the seed of Abraham, my friend' (Is 41⁸; cf. Ps 91, 116 etc.). In several of the texts referred to under (3) above, usages (a) and (b) are correlative; the people's love to J' presupposes and grows out of J's love to it. The fact that the word denoting this affection comes from the sphere of conjugal love and of friendship imports reciprocity; see, in illustration, Ex 33⁴, Hos 21⁴–21 11⁴, Is 62⁵–6 63⁷–10. The Divine Wisdom says, in Pr 8¹⁷, 'I love them that love me,' conditioning J's affection on the return made to it (cf. Jn 14²¹ 15¹⁰). Yet it was not because of the greatness or the worth of this people that J' 'chose' them—the case was quite otherwise—but out of His unmerited goodness and His faithful regard for their forefathers (Dt 7⁷, 9⁴, Ezk 16³–14; cf. Ro 5¹¹); the characteristic saying of 1 Jn 4¹⁹, 'We love, because he first loved us,' equally applies to the OT redemption. The union of affection between J' and Israel, grounded on the covenant with the fathers and the redemption from Egypt, is the distinctive and vital element in the OT doctrine of love. 'Love' becomes increasingly prominent in the prophetic speech as the relations between God and people become increasingly strained, during the national downfall and exile; see esp. Hosea and Deutero-Isaiah.

The character of J', 'the Holy One of Israel,' gives to His love its qualities—purity, intensity, selflessness, fidelity; reciprocal love calls forth like qualities in His people (see the relevant expressions of love to J' in the Psalms). Israel's sin is the base requital it has rendered; see Dt 32⁴, Is 51⁴ 63⁷⁻¹⁰, Mic 6¹, Jer 20²¹, Mal 12⁴, Neh 9¹⁷. God's love is kindness, loving-kindness (see art.: very frequent); to those in any degree worthy and approved becoming delight, joy, in special cases it is mercy (wh. see) toward the weak, sinful, needy—'mercy' is more conspicuous than 'love' in the OT, and looks beyond the covenant-bond. God's love breaks into grief, anger, wrath, threatening (the reaction of affronted love) against the faithless and wanton (Dt 7⁷⁻¹¹, Ps 78⁴⁰, Is 63¹⁰, Am 3¹ etc.); it burns with jealousy, when its chosen are seduced into idolatry and vice—Jⁿ's loathing of Israel's corruption reveals at once the purity of His nature and the zeal of His affection (Ex 20⁵, Nu 25¹¹, Dt 29¹⁸⁻²¹, Zeph 1⁸, Jer 44¹ etc.). For the same reason, there is in Him a 'jealousy over Zion,' etc., when His 'beloved' is injured or wronged (Jl 2¹⁸, Zec 1¹⁴ etc.). Is 19²⁵ 42¹⁻⁴ etc., adumbrate the inclusion of 'the nations' in the covenant; and Ps 100, 103¹³ 145⁹⁻¹², Jon 4¹¹ reveal a universal and truly humane love in Jⁿ (cf. Lk 22³⁹⁻⁴², Tit 3¹).

2. The Greek language discriminated in expressing love: it distinguished (1) sexual love, eros; (2) family love, natural affection, storgē; (3) social love, friendship, philia; (4) sometimes, in a broader ethical sense, philanthropia, humanity, kindness. The LXX translators, though not consistent in their usage, enlisted (5) agapē to denote religious love, the love of God to man or man to God, or of man to man under God's covenant (1v 19¹⁸)—i.e. love suffused with religion. The lower kinds of love, (1) and (2), they express by philia—eros is avoided; agapē, however, encroaches here upon philia. The verb agapaō (or -azō; noun agapē rare outside of Scripture) was used in all periods of Greek synonymously with phileo, implying in distinction therefrom affection rather than passion, and practical affection, love shown by signs, rather than sentiment. The AV, after the Latin caritas (charitas), rendered agapē in NT 30 times by 'charity,' which RV has corrected to 'love.' Being a term of the heart, free from debasing and narrow associations, agapē was suitable for Biblical use. In the NT vocabulary of love, (1) never occurs—'lust' represents the evil eros; agapē and philia are the prevailing synonyms (verbs agapaō and phileo), the latter sometimes replacing the former in application to the higher love, with the connotation of endearment or intimacy; see Jn 5²⁰ and 16²⁷ (a quasi-family affection), 11⁵ 38—spoken about Jesus (agapaō in v.5), 20² (agapaō, in parallels), 21¹⁵ (no idle variation); and in 1 Co 16²², where the negative coalesces with the verb ('If any one is no friend of the Lord'), storgē (2) is found in its negative in Ro 1³¹, 2 Ti 3³; and in the peculiar compound of Ro 12¹⁰, the adjective 'tenderly-affectioned.' In Tit 3¹ Paul speaks of 'the philanthropy (4) of God.' 'Beloved' ('well-' 'dearly-') represents a derivative of agapaō, used of Christ, or Christians, as dear to God; and of Christians, as dear to fellow-believers. It is synonymous with 'brethren'; this usage is frequent in salutations and apostrophes. 'Lovely' in Ph 4⁸ reproduces an adjective akin to philia (3) = amiable or affectionate. There are several NT Gr. compounds of phil-, rendered 'love of—' and 'lover(s) of—' agapē (agapaō), signifying primarily a voluntary, active affection, has brought from the LXX into the NT the deeper sense of spiritual affection, the love that links God and man and unites soul and soul in the Divine communion. Like philia, it implies reciprocity, fellowship,—if not existing, then desired and sought.

The Apostle John gives the final and complete NT doctrine of love. (a) The love of God John sees 'perfected' in those who 'love one another' and thus 'keep God's commands,' from whose souls accordingly 'fear' is 'cast out,' who 'abide' wholly in the realm of love that is constituted by the one Spirit dwelling in their hearts (1 Jn 2⁵ 3²⁴ 4¹¹ 15-21); by such love men are 'perfected into one,' even as Christ is 'one' with the Father by virtue of the love subsisting eternally between them (Jn 17²¹⁻²³; cf. Mt 3¹⁷ 17⁴)—there is love's prime fountain. Gradually, almost timidly, OT saints had learned to speak of Jⁿ's 'love' to men; Christ builds everything upon this. Coming from His 'bosom' (Jn 1¹). He knows the Father's love, and seeks to convey it to and share it with His brethren. His mission is to show the Father,—to declare how much, and to what effect, 'God loves the world' (Jn 3¹⁶, 17²⁶ etc.). 'thankless and evil' though it is (1k 6²⁵). In love which heaps kindness on the worst and seeks out the most alienated, lies the 'perfection' of God in His character of Father (Mt 5⁴⁸, Lk 15 etc.; cf. Ro 2⁴, Col 1¹²). The bestowment of 'the Son of his love,' 'the only begotten,' on our race, and the sacrifice of that Son's life for man's redemption, display with infinite force and effect the love of the Father towards His unworthy children; see Jn 1¹⁴ 3¹⁴⁻¹⁹, Ro 5⁸⁻¹⁰ ('love of God,' or 'of Christ,' means always in Paul God's, or Christ's, love to man) 8², 1 Jn 4⁹ 14, Col 1¹². The love which God thus 'commends' subsisted in Him apart from and anterior to this proof; it actuates all God's dealings with mankind,—in creation, providence, and moral discipline (Mt 5⁴⁸ 6³³ 23 10²⁹, Ja 1¹⁷, 1 P 4¹⁹). 'Love is of God,' since 'God is love'; it comes from Him, being absolutely in Him: 'love' gives the best conception we can form of God's nature. Since its objects are pitiable, God's redeeming love is mercy (Lk 1⁵⁰, Eph 2⁴, Tit 3¹, 1 P 1³)—'love' predominates in the NT, as 'mercy' in the OT; and as men are sinful and undeserving, love wears the form of grace (wh. see: Paul's favourite term, as 'love' is John's). God's 'good-will' (or 'pleasure') is His love taking determinate expression (Lk 2¹⁴ 12³², 1 Co 1³, Eph 1⁵ etc.); His 'kindness' is love in its considerateness or bounty (Lk 6³⁵, Ro 2⁴); His 'long-suffering' is love in its patience, restraining anger and delaying chastisement (Ro 2¹ 9²², 1 Ti 1¹⁸, 1 P 3²⁰). Jesus Christ is not the mere channel of the Father's good-will: He shares in it infinitely—the love of God' is seen in 'the love of Christ' (Ro 8³⁸, 9, 2 Co 5¹⁴, Gal 2²⁰, Eph 3¹⁹; cf. Jn 10¹¹⁻¹⁵ 13¹ 14¹², Rev 1⁵ etc.). Ja 4⁵ testifies to a 'jealous yearning' in the Holy Spirit, over Christians infected with 'love of the world'; cf. Eph 4¹³, Is 63¹⁰.

(b) The love of Christians towards God and Christ is the heart's response to the Father's love exhibited in Christ (1 Jn 4¹⁹). This is not spontaneous on man's part, but comes by 'knowing the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge' (Eph 3¹⁹, Ro 5¹⁷, Eph 2⁴ 3¹⁷⁻¹⁹, Jn 15¹⁸ 17²⁶). Grateful and obedient love to God results from faith (wh. see: 'faith and love,' also 'faith, hope, love,' are companions; 1 Co 13¹³, 1 Th 1³, 1 Ti 1¹⁴, Phil 4¹ etc.) in Jesus Christ—His mission and sacrifice for sin, His Person recognized as the full representation of the mind of God (2 Co 4⁴, Gal 5⁵, Eph 5¹; cf. 2⁹, 1 P 1⁸, 1 Jn 4¹⁹ 19); it is the 'fruit' and evidence of the Holy Spirit's indwelling, who is the Father's 'gift' of love to His reconciled children (Gal 5²², 1 Co 2¹², Ro 5⁵, 1 Jn 4¹⁹). 'Abba, Father!' was the cry of this new-born filial love (Ro 8¹⁵, Gal 4⁶). Its antithesis is found in 'the love of the world,' of 'self,' 'pleasure,' 'money' (1 Jn 2¹⁵, Ja 4⁴, 2 Ti 3²⁻⁴, Lk 16¹³, Jn 15¹⁹⁻²⁴). Love towards God is the fundamental law of man's nature, broken by his transgression—a law proclaimed in comprehensive terms in the OT, recalled by Jesus and recognized by the true Israelite (Mt 22³⁷); the false professors of Judaism 'had not the love of God in them,' for indeed they 'had not known Him' or they would have 'received' His messenger, they would have 'loved' His Son (Lk 11⁴², Jn 5³⁸ 42⁸ 8¹² 36). The world's radical hostility towards God shows itself in unbelief towards Christ, and consequent persecution of Christians (Jn 15¹⁹⁻¹⁶³, Ro 8⁷ 38, Gal 4²⁹, 1 Jn 3¹²). Love towards God (and Christ) renovates and purifies the heart, inspires a constant self-devotion, and makes the perfect vision of God the object of fervent anticipation (1 P 1¹³⁻¹⁵ 18-21, Eph 4¹ 5⁵, Col 3¹²⁻¹⁵, 1 Jn 3¹⁻³ 4¹¹, Rev 21⁷ 22³, Jn 14²³ 17²⁴). To cherish this love to the Father is to live as one who 'has learnt Christ'; it is to follow in His steps, with the certainty of arriving where He is (Jn 17²⁴ 15¹⁸ 14²³, Eph 4²⁰⁻²⁴). Thus one wins the crown of life' (Ja 1¹², Rev 2¹⁰, Ro 8³⁸⁻³⁹); hence the coupling of 'love and hope' (wh. see).

(c) If love to God is rekindled by the knowledge of God's love to man in Christ, this holds no less of man's love to man, to which most NT instances of the word refer. This was the matter of 'the second commandment' of Jesus, which is 'like unto the first and great commandment,' and is grounded equally with it upon creation and the true order of the world (Mt 22^{37ff.}). Sin, brought in by 'the wicked one,' confounded this order, planting hate, lust, deceit, the destroyers of love and life, in human nature (Jn 8⁴⁴, 1 Jn 3¹², Ja 1^{14f.} 4^{1f.} 11); this whole evil brood Paul traces to wilful ignorance of God (Ro 1¹⁹⁻²², Eph 4¹⁷⁻¹⁹). In 'laying down his life for us' Jesus Christ has laid the foundation of a new empire of love, a régime and fashion of life the opposite of that inaugurated by Cain (1 Jn 3¹², cf. 1 P 2^{21f.}, 2 Co 5^{15f.}, Eph 4³¹⁻⁵², Col 1¹⁸, Tit 3²⁻⁷). The 'new commandment' is, after all, 'the old commandment which' men 'had from the beginning' (1 Jn 2^{7f.}); God's Fatherly love manifest in the unstinted bounties of nature, which visit 'just and unjust' every day, dictates to His 'children' love to 'enemies' and kindness to 'the evil' (Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁸). 'The love of Christ,' reaffirming and immensely reinforcing the primeval law, 'constrains us' to 'live no longer to ourselves but to him' (2 Co 5¹⁴⁻¹⁹); in living to Him one lives for His Church and for humanity (Eph 5^{25f.}, Mt 25³⁴⁻⁴⁶, 1 Co 8^{11f.}, Ro 1^{14f.}, 1 Jn 3¹⁸, Eph 3⁹⁻⁹, Col 1²⁴⁻²⁹). 'If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar' (1 Jn 2⁹ 4^{20f.}; cf. Tit 1⁸); true love ever speaks in beneficent deed (Ja 1²⁷ 2^{15f.}, 1 Jn 3^{17f.}). The terms of Christ's redemption bind His redeemed to human service; they have become both witnesses and engaged parties to God's covenant of grace in Christ made with mankind (Jn 1²⁹ 6³³⁻³⁵, Mt 10⁸ 26²⁸, Mk 16¹⁵, Lk 24^{48f.}, Ac 1⁸, Ro 5¹²⁻²¹, Col 1², 1 Jn 2¹, Rev 5⁹ etc.). The gift of the Spirit is bestowed expressly with this world-aim in view; the salvation of each sinner is a step towards and an earnest of the world's salvation (Mt 5^{13f.} 13³, Ja 1¹⁸, 1 P 2⁹, Eph 3¹⁷, Gal 3⁴). The love of God must reach the world and rule the world through those who know it in 'knowing the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

LOVE FEAST (Agape).—The Love Feast of the Christian Church in Apostolic times was a common meal of which all the brethren partook, and was still connected with the Eucharist. The 'breaking of bread from house to house' (Ac 2⁴⁶) probably included both under the title 'the Lord's Supper' (1 Co 11²⁰). From Ac 20⁷ we gather that the religious exercises of the Love Feast were prolonged till dawn, and ended with the Eucharist. The scandalous behaviour, which St. Paul was constrained to rebuke at Corinth in A.D. 57-58 (1 Co 11¹⁷⁻³⁴), shows that not all who came to the Love Feast were in a fit condition to communicate. More serious evils still were introduced by false teachers described by Jude 12: 'they who are hidden rocks at your love feasts when they feast with you, shepherds that without fear feed themselves.' The writer is dependent on 2 P 2¹³: 'spots are they and blemishes, revelling in their love feasts, while they feast with you.'

In spite of the disorders, which marred the religious value of these social club-feasts and led in the end to their suppression, they lasted for a considerable period. Ignatius of Antioch wrote to the Smyrnaeans (c. 8): 'It is not lawful apart from the bishop either to baptize or to hold a love feast,' in a context which proves that the Agape included the Eucharist. Tertullian (Apol. c. xxxix.) gives a vivid description of the feast explained by its own name.

'The participants, before reclining, taste first of prayer to God. As much is eaten as satisfies the cravings of hunger; as much is drunk as befits the chaste. They say it is enough, as those who remember that even during the night they have to worship God; they talk as those who know that the Lord is one of their auditors. After manual ablution and the bringing in of lights, each is asked to stand forth and sing, as he can, a hymn to God, either one from the Holy Scriptures or one of his own composing. This is a proof of the measure of our drinking. As the feast commenced with prayer, so it is closed with prayer.'

The food consisted of bread, fish, and vegetables. The pictures of the Love Feasts in the catacombs give fish a prominent place. Interesting specimens of prayers used at them are found in the Didache. The direction to give thanks 'after ye are satisfied' plainly associates the prayer with the Love Feast rather than the Eucharist (c. 10):—

'We give Thee thanks, Holy Father, for Thy Holy Name which Thou hast made to tabernacle in our hearts, and for the knowledge and faith and immortality, which Thou hast made known unto us through Thy servant Jesus; Thine is the glory for ever and ever. Thou, Almighty Master, didst create all things for Thy Name's sake, and didst give food and drink unto men for enjoyment, that they might render thanks to Thee; but didst bestow upon us spiritual food and drink and eternal life through Thy Servant. . . .

The separation of the Love Feast from the Eucharist seems to have been due, in the first instance, to the action of the Roman Government, always jealous of secret societies. Pliny's letter to Trajan speaks of the celebration of the Eucharist in the early morning as followed by a simple meal, which had been left off since the issue of the edict forbidding clubs. On the other hand, fear of calumnies regarding any more or less secret feast, and experience of disorders like those which prevailed at Corinth, were motives which from time to time hindered the practice in certain districts, and finally extinguished it.

LOVINGKINDNESS.—Two ideas are blended in this expressive word; it denotes kindness which springs from the loyalty of love. It is the frequent tr. (30 times in the AV, 42 times in the RV) of the Heb. word chesedh, which G. A. Smith renders 'leal love' (Book of the Twelve Prophets, i. 243 n). The EV most frequently tr. chesedh 'mercy' and not seldom 'kindness.' The Amer. RV gives 'lovingkindness' uniformly when the reference is to God's love to man. The adoption of this helpful suggestion would bring out the connexion between 'lovingkindness' as a fundamental attribute of the Divine nature (Ex 34^{6f.} etc.), its poetic personification (Ps 42⁸ 57³ 89¹⁴), and the appeal to God to be true to Himself,—to save and to redeem 'for His lovingkindness' sake' (Ps 6⁴ 44² 115¹). For the combination of 'lovingkindness' with 'faithfulness' see Ps 89, where each word occurs seven times, and cf. La 3^{21f.}, Is 55². Cf. also LOVE. J. G. TASKER.

LUBIM.—The name of a people, standing in EV for the Libyans in Nah 3⁹, 2 Ch 12¹⁶, and replaced by the word 'Libyans' itself in Dn 11⁴². These were a very ancient people living west of Egypt, who were subdued by the Egyptians at an early date and long furnished mercenary soldiers to their armies. At length they invaded Egypt, subdued it in the 10th cent. B.C., and established a powerful dynasty, of which the Biblical Shishak was the founder. Probably Lubim should be read for Ludim (wh. see) in certain passages. Cf. LEHABIM. J. F. M'CURDY.

LUCAS, Philm 24 (AV), for Luke (wh. see).

LUCIFER.—In Is 14¹² occurs the phrase 'heli (held) ben shachar,' commonly but incorrectly rendered 'Lucifer son of the morning,' as if the expression heli (held) must mean 'the morning-star' (cf. AVm and RV 'day-star'). In this connexion, heli (held) can denote only the waning of some luminary, as it is forcibly compared with the impending fate of the then king of Babylon, whose utter destruction the prophet is engaged in foretelling. The waning luminary intended by the author may probably have been only the old moon crescent seen at dawn, just about to disappear. It could scarcely have been a morning-star, whose chief point would be its brightness. This allusion to a waning luminary possibly reflects some myth similar to the Greek Phaethon legend (Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, 132-134). From a supposed reference in Lk 10¹⁸ and Rev 9¹⁻¹¹ to this passage in Isaiah, the name 'Lucifer' came to be used synonymously with 'Satan.'

N. A. KOENIG.

LUCIUS.—1. A 'consul of the Romans' (1 Mac 15¹⁰⁰), who transmitted the decree of the senate in favour of the Jews. Probably the reference is to Lucius Calpurnius Piso, consul in B.C. 139. 2. Of Cyrene, one of certain prophets and teachers at Antioch in Syria, mentioned in Acts 13¹, to whom it was revealed that Paul and Barnabas should be separated for the work to which they had been called. The suggestion that he was the same person as St. Luke, the Evangelist, has nothing to support it. 3. Mentioned in Ro 16²¹, as sending greetings to the brethren at Rome. Possibly the same person as 2, but of this there is no certain proof.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

LUCRE.—The Eng. word 'lucre' is in AV always qualified by the adj. 'filthy,' because the word itself had not then the offensive meaning it has now. Erasmus speaks of God turning men's wickedness 'into the lucre and encrease of godliness.' It simply meant gain. Filthy lucre means sordid gain.

LUD, LUDDIM.—Usually supposed to stand for the country and people of Lydia (wh. see). In Gn 10²² (1 Ch 1⁷) Lud is named as one of the 'sons' of Shem, along with the well-known Elam, Asshur, and Aram, and the uncertain Arpachshad. In this list the Elamites at least are not Semitic, but are regarded as such by reason of association with the Babylonians. In a similar way the Lydians may be associated here with the Semitic Assyrians, whose rule once extended to the borders of the Lydian empire. No better explanation has been given, and they are at any rate an Asiatic people.

On the other hand, Ludim is given as the name of one of the descendants of Mizraim (Egypt) in Gn 10¹² (1 Ch 1¹¹) in a list of peoples all undoubtedly African. Here there can be no question of Asiatic Lydians, and experts are divided as to whether an unknown African people is referred to, or whether we are to read Lubim (wh. see). This reading would suit equally well Jer 46⁹, and even the singular form Lud might with advantage be emended into Lub in Ezk 27¹⁰ 30⁸. Is 66¹⁹.

J. F. M'CARDY.

LUHITH.—The ascent of 'Luhith' (Is 15⁵) is probably the path called the 'descent or going down of Horonaim,' the latter lying, probably, higher than Luhith (cf. Jer 48⁵). The way leading through Wady Bene Hammad, from the district of Zoar to the eastern plateau, may be intended. The Onomasticon places Luhith between Arcopolis and Zoar. It is not now known.

W. EWING.

LUKE (EVANGELIST).—Luke, a companion of St. Paul, is mentioned in Col 4¹⁴, Philm 2⁴, 2 Ti 4¹¹, in all three places in connexion with Mark. He is generally believed to be the author of the Third Gospel and Acts, and therefore a frequent fellow-traveller with the Apostle of the Gentiles. (See art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES for proofs, and for his place of origin.) He has been identified, but without probability, with Lucius of Cyrene (Ac 13¹). He may have been converted by St. Paul, possibly at Tarsus, where he could have studied medicine. Tertullian calls St. Paul his 'illuminator' and 'master' (adv. Marc. iv. 2), which perhaps has this meaning; but it may be a mere conjecture. Luke joined St. Paul on his Second Missionary Journey, apparently for the first time, at Troas. He was not an eye-witness of the Gospel events (Lk 1²), but had ample means of getting information from those who had been. He was a Gentile (cf. Col 4¹⁰, and v. 14); thus he could not have been of the Seventy, or the companion of Cleopas (Lk 24^{13, 18}), as some have thought. He was a doctor (Col 4¹⁴), and perhaps had attended St. Paul in his illnesses. A tradition, perhaps of the 6th cent., makes him a painter, who had made a picture of the Virgin. He was possibly of servile origin; his name, which seems to be an abbreviation of Lucanus, Lucius, Lucilius, or Lucianus, may well have been a slave's name; and physicians were often slaves. Chrysostom and Jerome take him for 'the brother whose praise in the gospel' is spread abroad (2 Co 8¹⁸; see art. GOSPEL). Other traditions connect him with Achaia, Bithynia, or Alexandria; some assign to him a martyr's crown.

A. J. MACLEAN.

LUKE, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—1. The Third Gospel in the Early Church.—Of 2nd cent. writers the following can without doubt be said to have known the Gospel or to imply its previous composition: Justin Martyr (c. 150 A.D.), who gives particulars found in Lk. only; Tatian, his pupil, who included it in his Harmony (the Diatesaron); Celsus (c. A.D. 160 or c. 177), who refers to the genealogy of Jesus from Adam; the Clementine Homilies (2nd cent.); the Gospel of pseudo-Peter, a Docetic work (c. A.D. 165? Swete); the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, a Jewish-Christian work (before A.D. 135, Sinker in Smith's Dict. of Christ. Biog.); the Epistle of the Church of Lyons and Vienne (A.D. 177); Marcion, who based his Gospel upon Lk. and abbreviated it [this is certain—as against the hypothesis that Lk. is later than, and an expansion of, Marcion, as the Tübingen school maintained—from the evidence of Irenæus, Tertullian, and Epiphanius; from the exact similarity of style between the portions which are not in Marcion and those which are; and for other reasons]; the Valentinians; and Heracleon, who wrote a commentary upon it. The first writers who name Luke in connexion with it are Irenæus and the author of the Muratorian Fragment (perhaps Hippolytus), Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria—all at the end of the 2nd century. If we go back earlier than any of the writers named above, we note that Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and the Didache writer perhaps knew Lk.; but we cannot be certain if their quotations are from Mt. or from Lk. or from some third document now lost, or even from oral tradition. Yet Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp probably quote Acts, and the title of the Didache seems to come from Ac 2⁴, and this presupposes the circulation of Luke. It will be observed that the ecclesiastical testimony shows the existence of Lk. before the second quarter of the 2nd cent., but we have not, as in the case of Mt. and Mk., any guidance from that early period as to the method of its composition or as to its author.

2. Contents of the Gospel.—The preface (1¹⁻⁴) and the Birth and Childhood narratives (1⁵⁻²⁴) are peculiar to Luke. The Evangelist then follows Mk. (up to 6¹⁹) as to the Baptist's teaching and the early ministry, inserting, however, sections common to him and Mt. on the Baptist and on the Temptation, and also the genealogy, the miraculous draught of fishes, the anointing by the sinful woman, and some sayings (especially those at Nazareth) peculiar to himself. From 6²⁰ to 8³ Lk. entirely deserts Mk. The intervening portion contains part of the Sermon on the Mount (not in the order of Mt.), the message of the Baptist, and the healing of the centurion's servant (so Mt.) and some fragments peculiar to himself, especially the raising of the widow's son at Nain (Lk. practically omits the section Mk 6^{42-8²⁶}—Mt 14^{22-16¹²}). The Marcan narrative, containing the rest of the Galilean ministry, the charge to the Twelve, the Transfiguration, etc., is then resumed, nearly in the same order as Mk., but with some omissions, to 9⁵⁰ (= Mk 9⁵⁰), where a long insertion occurs (9^{51-18¹⁴}). After this Luke takes up Mk. almost where he left it (Lk 18¹⁵ = Mk 10¹⁵). The insertion deals largely with the Peræan ministry and the journeys towards Jerusalem, and contains many parables peculiar to Lk. (the Good Samaritan, the Importunate Friend, the Rich Fool, the Barren Fig-tree, the Lost Sheep, the Lost Piece of Money, the Prodigal Son, the Unjust Steward, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Ten Lepers, the Unjust Judge, the Pharisee and the Publican), and also several incidents and sayings peculiar to Lk., e.g. the Mission of the Seventy; this section also has portions of the Sermon on the Mount and some parables and sayings common to Mt. and Lk., a few also which are found in other parts of Mk. From 18¹⁶ to the end the Markan narrative is followed (from 19⁴⁴ to 22¹⁴ very closely) with few omissions, but with some insertions, e.g. the parable of the Pounds, the narrative of Zacchæus, of the Penitent Robber, of the two disciples on the Emmaus road, and other incidents peculiar to Lk. In the Passion and Resurrection narrative Luke has treated Mk. very freely, adding to it largely, and in several cases following other sources in preference.

Viewing the Third Gospel as a whole, we may with Dr. Plummer divide it thus: Preface, 1¹⁻⁴; Gospel of the Infancy, 1⁵⁻²⁴; Ministry, mainly in Galilee, 3¹⁻⁹⁵⁰; Journeyings towards Jerusalem, and the Ministry outside Galilee, 9^{51-19²⁸}; the Ministry in Jerusalem in the last days, 19^{28-21²⁸}; the Passion and Resurrection, 22-24.

3. The Sources.—The preface (1¹⁻⁴), the only contemporary evidence of the manner in which Gospels were written, tells us that the Evangelist knew of written Evangelic narratives, and had access to eye-witnesses, though he himself had not seen the events which he chronicles. Of the former sources (documents), the preceding section will lead us to name two (see also art. GOSPELS), namely the 'Petrine tradition' (see art. MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO]), which is our Mk. or else something very like it, and which the First Evangelist also used; and another, which is often called the 'Logia,' but which it is safer to call the 'non-Markan document,' which is a common source of Mt. and Lk., but which is now lost (see art. MATTHEW [GOSPEL ACC. TO]). In the use of the latter the order of Lk. differs greatly from that of Mt., and the question arises which of the two Evangelists has followed this source the more closely. Now we have seen (§ 2) that Luke has followed the order of his Markan source very closely; it is therefore probable that he did the same with the 'non-Markan document.' We may then presume that the order of the latter is more faithfully reproduced in Lk. than in Mt.—With regard to the sections peculiar to Lk. we must probably separate 1⁵⁻²⁴ from the rest. This section has a strong Aramaic tinge; it is an 'episode of family history of the most private character' (Ramsay); it is told from the point of view of a woman, and is full of womanly touches; it represents the Mary side of the story, while the narrative in Mt. represents the Joseph side. It is therefore highly probable that the ultimate, if not the immediate, source was the Virgin Mother, and that the story had not passed through many hands. Some postulate an Aramaic written source for this section (Plummer). But it is by no means certain that Luke the Gentile understood Aramaic; and the character of the narrative rather points to an oral source (Ramsay). The introduction of the Aramaic style (which begins abruptly at 1⁵ after the very Greek preface) may probably be an intentional change on the author's part, and be due to a diligent study of the LXX. For the rest of the matter peculiar to Lk., it is usual, perhaps rightly, to assume a special source, oral or written; but it must be observed that the silence of Mt. does not negative the supposition that much or most of this matter was contained in the 'non-Markan document.' Silence does not necessarily mean ignorance.

Assuming now (see § 5) that the author was Luke, Paul's companion, we can see at once that he was in a position to gather together not only written materials, but also first-hand oral reports. The two years at Cæsarea (Ac 24²⁷) would give him good opportunities for collecting materials both for the Gospel and for Acts. Mary may well have been alive at the time (c. A.D. 57), or at least Luke may have met several of the women best known to her. And both in Palestine at this time and later at Rome, he would have direct access to Apostolic information: in the former case, of several of the Twelve; in the latter, of St. Peter. At Rome he would probably read the written 'Petrine tradition,' his Markan source.

We must notice that Lk. is not the Pauline Gospel in the same sense that Mk. is the Petrine. St. Paul could not be a 'source' as St. Peter was; and indeed the preface to Lk. contradicts such an idea. Yet the Pauline influence on Luke is very great, not only in his ideas but in his language. Many words and phrases are peculiar in NT to Luke and Paul. Among other topics insisted on by both may be mentioned the universality of the Gospel (Lk 3³⁴, 4⁴³, 10³⁴, 13²⁹ etc.).

As a detail in the consideration of the treatment of his sources by Luke, we may notice the Lord's Prayer, which is much shorter in Lk. than in Mt. (see RV). Does this mean that the Prayer was delivered twice, in two different forms, or that Luke abbreviated the original, or that Matthew enlarged it? The first hypothesis is a priori quite probable; but if we have to choose between the two others, the presence of the Lukan phrase 'day by day' (11³, so 19¹⁷, Ac 17¹), not elsewhere in NT, and of others which seem to be simplifications (as 'we forgive' for 'we have forgiven' of Mt. RV, or 'sins' for 'debts' of Mt.), points to the Matthean prayer being the original. But it is difficult to believe that either Evangelist would deliberately alter the Lord's Prayer as found in his sources; the case is not parallel with other alterations. If we hold the Prayer to have been given only once, the most probable explanation of the differences would seem to be that, our Lord not having laid down fixed rules for worship, but only general principles, the first Christians did not feel bound to use, or did not know, His ipsissima verba; hence the liturgical usage with regard to the Prayer would vary. The First and Third Evangelists might well incorporate in their Gospels that form to which they were accustomed in worship. We must not forget also that as originally delivered the Prayer was, doubtless, in Aramaic, and so in any case we have not Jesus' exact words.

4. The writer's style and interests.—The Third Evangelist is at once the most literary and the most versatile of the four. The sudden change from a classical to an Aramaic style at 1⁵ has been noticed in § 3; when the writer is working on the 'Petrine tradition,' and the 'non-Markan document,' the Aramaic tinge is much less marked. The same thing is seen in Acts, where the early chapters have a strong Aramaic tinge which is absent from the rest. Yet the special characteristics of language run through both the books, and their integrity and common authorship is becoming more and more certain. The writer has a keen sense of effective composition, as we see by the way in which he narrates his incidents (e.g. that of the sinful woman, 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰). Yet his descriptions are not those of an eye-witness; the autoptic touches which we find in the Second Gospel (see MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO]) are absent here. The author's interests are many—his sympathy with women, his 'domestic tone' shown by the social scenes which he describes, his medical language and descriptions of cures (a large number of technical phrases used by Greek medical writers and by Luke have been collected), and his frequent references to angels, are clearly marked in both books. It has been said that in his Gospel he avoids duplicates; but this statement can hardly stand examination (cf. the two songs (1⁴⁶, 6⁸), the two feasts (5²⁹, 19¹⁹), the mission of the Twelve and of the Seventy (9¹, 10¹), the two disputes as to who is the greatest (9⁴⁶, 22²⁴), etc.).

The Evangelic symbol usually ascribed by the Fathers to Luke is the calf, though pseudo-Athanasius gives him the lion; and it is said that the Gospel has a sacrificial aspect, the calf being the animal most commonly used for sacrifice. But this appears to be very fanciful, and it is not easy to see why Lk. is more sacrificial than the other Gospels.

5. Authorship and date.—(a) The Third Gospel and Acts have the same author. Both books are addressed to the same person, Theophilus; the style of both is identical, not only in broad features, but in detail

(see § 4), and Ac 1¹ refers to a 'former' (or 'first') treatise. Thus, if the author is not the same in both cases, the later writer has deliberately interwoven into his book the whole style of his predecessor, in a manner that absolutely defies detection. That this should have happened is a gross improbability. (b) We have no external evidence of authorship before Irenæus, who names Luke (§ 1). But the internal evidence of Acts is very strong that the writer was Luke, the companion of St. Paul (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES). We must therefore conclude either that the author was Luke, or that he wished to pass for him. The latter hypothesis is maintained by some on the ground that the writer is indebted to Josephus, who wrote his Antiquities c. A.D. 94. It may be remarked that this fact, if proved, would not preclude the Lukan authorship, for if Luke was a young man when travelling with St. Paul, he might well have been alive and active in a literary sense c. A.D. 100 (so Burkitt). But it is extremely improbable that he had ever read Josephus. The crucial cases are those of the taxing in Lk 2² and of Theudas in Ac 5³⁶, discussed in § 7 below, and in art. THEUDAS, where dependence is shown to be most unlikely (see also art. EGYPTIAN [THE]). Other things point to an absence of literary connexion; e.g. Acts describes Agrippa's death quite independently of Josephus. The argument from language, on the other side, scarcely deserves serious refutation; the common use of the LXX accounts for most of the resemblances (see, further, Plummer, St. Luke, p. xxx; the connexion between Lk. and Josephus is denied by Schürer, Harnack, Zahn, and by most English writers). For the reasons then, which are stated in art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, we conclude that Luke was the author. It may be added that it is difficult to conceive any reason which the author, if not Luke, could have had for the pretence. Luke was not sufficiently well known for a forger to use his name.

(b) Date.—For the reasons just stated we must probably choose a date immediately after Ac 28³⁰ (Blass, Headlam, Ralmon, etc.), or else between A.D. 70 and 80 (Sanday, Plummer, Ramsay, etc.). To the present writer the earlier date for Acts, and therefore for Lk., seems on the whole more likely (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES), and this probability is not diminished by Lk 1¹ 21²⁰, the chief passages adduced for the later date. Sanday and Plummer think that the earlier date does not allow enough time for drawing up the narratives spoken of in 1¹; but it is not obvious why written Gospels should have been attempted at an early stage. The passage 21²⁰, where 'Jerusalem compassed with armies' replaces 'the abomination of desolation' of Mk 13¹⁴, is said to betoken a date later than the destruction of Jerusalem, and to describe what had actually happened. But if the change be due to Luke, it is just what we should expect—a Hebraism interpreted for Gentile readers (see § 6); in any case it scarcely goes further than Dn 9²⁶. Sir J. Hawkins (Hours Synoptica) thinks that there must have been a considerable interval between Lk. and Acts. The whole question of date is far from certain.

6. Purpose of the Gospel.—St. Luke clearly writes for the Gentiles, being a Gentile himself (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 2), and undertakes his task because the works of his predecessors were incomplete,—probably as not beginning with our Lord's birth,—and because he was in possession of good information. He writes to Theophilus, thought by Origen and Ambrose to be an Imaginary Christian, but more probably a real person, perhaps, as Ramsay deduces from the epithet 'most excellent' (Lk 1³), a Roman citizen of rank (this is denied by Blass and Plummer). He has also in view, however, other Gentile converts. He explains Jewish customs (22¹), substitutes Greek names for Hebrew ('Zelotes' for 'Cananean' 6¹⁴, Ac 1¹³, 'the Skull' for Golgotha' 23³¹, 'Master' for 'Rabbi' often), is sparing of OT quotations and of references to prophecy, uses 'Judæa' for the whole of Palestine (1⁴ 7¹⁷ 23⁶, Ac 2⁹ 10³⁷ 11²³; but in Lk 4⁴ RVM and Ac 11¹ the more restricted sense is probable), and insists on the universality of the Gospel (see § 3). An interesting detail which shows the readers to whom the book is addressed is pointed out by Sir Wm. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem p. 63). In 5¹⁹ Luke alters the description of the breaking up of the mud roof through which the paralytic was let down (Mk 2⁴)—a description which would be unintelligible to a Western—and speaks of the man being let down through the 'tiles.'

7. Accuracy of Luke.—Very different estimates have been made as to the trustworthiness of Luke as a historian. He is the only Evangelist who connects his narrative with contemporary events in the world at large (2¹ 3¹, Ac 11²⁸ 18² 24²⁷ etc.), and who thus gives us some opportunities of testing his accuracy. His accuracy has been assailed by a large number of scholars, and as strongly defended by others. The former fix especially on two points: (a) Gamaliel's speech about Theudas (Ac 5³⁶.) is said to be absolutely unhistorical, and to be an invention of the writer, who had read and misread Josephus (see § 5 and art. THEUDAS). (b) The reference to the enrolment (AV taxing) in Lk 2¹⁶ is said to be also unhistorical. It is objected that Augustus did not order a general enrolment, that if he did, the order did not apply to Herod's kingdom, and that, even if it did so apply, there was no reason why Joseph and Mary should go to Bethlehem; that no census had been made in Judæa till A.D. 6-7, when Quirinius was governor of Syria ('the census' Ac 5³⁷, Josephus); and that Quirinius was never governor of Syria in Herod's lifetime (he died B.C. 4). As against these objections it used to be urged that Luke was accurate in most particulars, but that he made a mistake about Quirinius only. Now Luke does not say that a Roman census was being made in Palestine when Jesus was born; the enrolment is said by him to have been tribal and according to lineage, not according to the place where persons happened to be at the time, as was the Roman custom. He says that this was the first of a series of enrolments, and that Augustus instituted the rule of enrolments for the [Roman] world—this is the force of the Greek phrase used. A remarkable confirmation of Lk. has recently come to light, by the discovery in Egypt of some papyri which show that periodic enrolments by households in a cycle of 14 years did as a matter of fact take place in that country. Many actual census papers, beginning A.D. 20, have been found. This fact is confirmed by Clement of Alexandria. Sir Wm. Ramsay, in his fascinating work (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? 1st ed. 1898), argues with much probability that the first enrolment in Syria was in B.C. 8, and that the 14 years' cycle was used. The second enrolment would be that of Ac 5³⁷, which led to great riots in Palestine, because the Roman system, so offensive to Jewish patriotism, was then first introduced. No such riots are said by Luke to have occurred at the census when Jesus was born. Ramsay gives reasons for thinking that this was because Herod, ruling a semi-independent kingdom, though he could not from fear of losing Augustus' favour forego the census (this agrees with Josephus' account of his relations with Rome), yet conducted it in Jewish fashion, and postponed it for a year or two. This would give B.C. 6 (summer) for our Lord's birth. All this fits in well with Luke. The difficulty of Quirinius alone remains. An inscription found near Tibur makes it probable that he was for the second time governor of Syria A.D. 6-9. He was consul B.C. 12; and his former governorship must therefore have fallen between these dates. In a technical argument Ramsay urges that Quirinius, during a time of war, held in B.C. 6 a special office in Syria as the Emperor's deputy, with command of the forces, while another was civil governor; and that Luke's phrase (lit. 'while Quirinius was ruling Syria') suits this state of affairs. This would completely vindicate Luke's accuracy. Cf. QUIRINIUS.

The accuracy of the Gospel is really vouched for by the remarkable accuracy of Acts, which gives so many opportunities of testing it (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 12, and also art. LYSAANIAS). But it may be asked whether Luke was a good chronologer. Did he really write 'in order' (Lk 1³)? This phrase does not necessarily imply chronological order; it may merely imply method. Yet the chronological note in 3¹ leads us to think that Luke meant the former, though he certainly is less definite as to dates than Josephus or Tacitus, who were able to consult public records. Sir Wm. Ramsay decides that he had 'little of the sense for chronology.' It may be said, however, that he had more of this characteristic than his predecessors. The sources used by him had probably few, if any, marks of time. The earliest generation of disciples did not write histories for posterity, but religious narratives to teach their contemporaries faith. Luke, however, does insert some definite chronological landmarks; we may be certain that they come from him and not from his sources. He shows his trustworthiness in giving dates when he can do so; and when he has no information he does not pretend to guide us. A. J. MACLEAN.

LUNATIC.—See MOON, POSSESSION.

LUST.—The Eng. word 'lust,' which is now restricted to sexual desire, formerly expressed strong desire of any kind. And so, as Thomas Adams says, there can be a lusting of the Spirit, for the Spirit lusteth against the flesh (Gal 5¹⁷).

LUTE.—See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, 4 (1) (b).

LUZ.—1. Gn 28⁹ 35⁸ 48³, Jos 16² 18¹³, Jg 12²³. The exact locality is uncertain, and a comparison of the above passages will show that it is also uncertain whether Luz and Bethel were one or two sites. In Gn 28⁹ it is stated that Jacob changed the name of the place of his vision from Luz to Bethel (cf. also Gn 35⁶, Jg 12²³). The two passages in Joshua, however, seem to contradict this; both of them speak of Luz and Bethel as two distinct places. A possible solution is that Luz was the name of the old Canaanite city, and Bethel the pillar and altar of Jacob outside the city. 2. Luz is also the name of a city built on Hittite territory after the destruction of the original Canaanite city (Jg 12²³).

T. A. MOXON.

LYCAONIA meant originally the country inhabited by the Lycaones, a central tribe of Asia Minor. It is for the most part a level plain, which is merged on the north and east in the plains of Galatia and Cappadocia, and is bounded on the west and south by hills. It was and is an excellent country for pasturage. Its exact boundaries varied at different times. At some uncertain date a part of Lycaonia, containing fourteen cities, of which Iconium was one, was transferred to Galatia. (See ICONIUM.) Lycaonia was part of the Seleucid Empire until b.c. 190. Later the whole or part of it belonged successively to the Pergamene kings, the Galatians, Cappadocia, and Pontus. At the settlement of b.c. 64 by Pompey, the north part was added to Galatia, the south-east to Cappadocia, and the west was added to the Roman Empire, to be administered by the governor of the Roman province Cilicia. In b.c. 39 Mark Antony gave the western part (including Lystra and Iconium) to Polemon, but in b.c. 36 it was transferred to Amyntas along with Galatia proper. (See GALATIA.) Amyntas conquered Derbe and Laranda, which were incorporated in the Roman Empire when Amyntas' kingdom was made into the province Galatia in b.c. 25. In A.D. 37 Eastern Lycaonia, which up to that time had continued under the weak Cappadocian rule, was placed under Antiochus of Commagene, along with most of Cilicia Tracheia, and got the name Lycaonia Antiochiana.

Under Claudius and Nero, when St. Paul visited the churches of South Galatia, Lycaonia included the two parts, the Roman and Antiochian. The former part included Lystra and Derbe and a number of smaller places, and it is correctly described in Ac 14⁶. The Apostles, when persecuted at Iconium in Phrygia (or the Phrygian district of the vast province Galatia), crossed into Lycaonia (another district of the same province). In Ac 16¹⁻⁴ this territory is not explicitly named, but its two cities are mentioned by name. In Ac 18²³ the same cities are included in the expression used.

Both parts of Lycaonia were comprised in the united province of Galatia-Cappadocia under Vespasian and his sons (A.D. 70 onwards). They were again divided by Trajan in 106. About A.D. 137 'the triple eparchy' was formed, consisting of Cilicia, Lycaonia, and Isauria.

The name of the Lycaonians is not mentioned in the Bible, but their language is in Ac 14¹¹; it was no doubt prevalent in the villages and smaller towns.

A collection of Christian inscriptions (of 3rd cent. A.D. and later) has been discovered in Lycaonia, which for numbers cannot be matched in any other Eastern province. They show the wide diffusion of Christianity in this district evangelized by St. Paul. A. SOUTER.

LYCIA was a mountainous country in the S.W. of Asia Minor, which played very little part in the early history of Christianity. In it were situated many great cities, such as Patara (Ac 21¹) and Myra (Ac 27⁷, cf. 21¹). The former was a celebrated seat of the worship of Apollo, the latter an important harbour, between which and Alexandria there was constant traffic in ancient times. Lycia was ruled by the Persians, and conquered by Alexander the Great. After his death it belonged to the Seleucid Empire, was then taken from Antiochus by the Romans in b.c. 188, and given to Rhodes at first, but afterwards freed in b.c. 138. It was one of the self-governing states, to which the Romans sent letters in favour of the Jews in b.c. 138-7 (1 Mac 15²³); see CARIA, DELOS. This proves that there were Jews there. Lycia was made a Roman province by Claudius in A.D. 43 on account of dissensions between its cities, and in A.D. 74 was formed into a double province along with Pamphylia. A. SOUTER.

LYDDA.—See LOD.

LYDIA was the name for the central part of the coastland on the west of Asia Minor in ancient times, having been so called from the race which inhabited it, the Lydians. At the earliest time of which we have any knowledge it was a prosperous kingdom, and the name of the last king, Croesus, has become proverbial for wealth. The Persians seized the kingdom from him about b.c. 546 ('Lydia' in Ezk 30⁶ AV is corrected to 'Lud' in RV). Alexander the Great conquered it in b.c. 334. The possession of it was disputed by the Pergamenians and Seleucids till b.c. 190, in which year it became definitely Pergamene (cf. 1 Mac 8⁵). In b.c. 133 it passed by will with the rest of the Pergamene kingdom into the Roman Empire, and the whole kingdom was henceforth known as the province Asia, by which name alone it is indicated in the NT (see ASIA). After the formation of this province, the term 'Lydia' had only an ethnological significance. The chief interest of Lydia for us is that it contained several very ancient and important great cities (of the Ionian branch), Smyrna, Ephesus, Sardis, Colophon, etc., some of which were among the 'churches of Asia.' The evangelization of the country is connected with St. Paul's long residence in Ephesus (Ac 19¹⁰). A. SOUTER.

LYDIA.—A seller of purple-dyed garments at Philippi, probably a widow and a 'proselyte of the gate' (see art. NICOLAS), whom St. Paul converted on his first visit to that city, together with her household, and with whom he and his companions lodged (Ac 16¹¹⁻⁴⁰). She was of Thyatira in the district of Lydia, the W. central portion of the province Asia, a district famed for its purple dyes; but was doubtless staying at Philippi for the purpose of her trade. She was apparently prosperous, dealing as she did in very fine wares. It has been held that Lydia is the proper name of this woman; but it seems more likely that it merely means 'the Lydian,' and that it was the designation by which she was ordinarily known at Philippi. She is not mentioned (at least, by that name) in St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, and unless we identify her with Euedia or Syntyche, she had probably left the city when the Apostle wrote; for a conjecture of Renan's, see art. SYNZYGUS. The incident in Ac 16 is one example out of many of the comparatively independent position of women in Asia Minor and Macedonia.

LYE.—See NITRE and SOAP.

LYRE.—See MUSIC and MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, 4 (1) (a).

LYSANIAS.—This tetrarch of Abilene is mentioned only in Lk 3¹. St. Luke has been accused of gross inaccuracy here, and is said to be referring to a Lysanias who died B.C. 36. But that Lysanias was king (not tetrarch) of Chalcis (not Abilene). Josephus speaks of 'Abila of Lysanias' and of a tetrarchy of Lysanias; he is confirmed on the latter point by a medal and an inscription. Thus Luke's statement is made at least quite probable. Perhaps Lysanias was a dynastic name of the rulers of Abilene. Abila was the capital of Abilene, and lay on the N. side of Mount Hermon. See also ABILENE.

A. J. MACLEAN.

LYSIAS.—1. A general of Antiochus Epiphanes, charged with a war of extermination against the Jews (1 Mac 3²², cf. 2 Mac 10¹¹ 11¹⁵); defeated at Bethsura (1 Mac 4³⁴); after the death of Epiphanes he championed the cause of Eupator, and finally suffered death along with the latter at the hands of Demetrius (6¹⁴ 68 72⁴, 2 Mac 14²). Cf. art. MACCABEES, § 2.
2. See next article.

LYSIAS, CLAUDIUS.—A chiliarch of a cohort in Jerusalem who rescued St. Paul from the Jews in the Temple and took him to the 'Castle,'—the fortress Antonia which commanded the Temple. His second name shows him to have been a Greek, but he had bought the Roman citizenship (Ac 22²⁹) and taken the name Claudius. On account of a plot he sent St. Paul guarded to Felix at Caesarea, and wrote a letter of which the version in Ac 23²⁹, although doubtless only a paraphrase, yet clearly represents the true sense. It is just what we should expect from Lysias, being much more favourable to his course of action than the real fact warranted. (See art. EGYPTIAN [THE]).

A. J. MACLEAN.

LYSIMACHUS.—1. The translator of the Greek edition of Esther into Greek (Ad. Est 11¹). 2. The brother of the high priest Menelaus. He excited the hatred of the populace by his systematic plundering of the Temple treasures, and was finally killed in a riot (2 Mac 4²⁹ 39-42).

LYSTRA (modern Khatyn Scrai).—A city situated about 18 miles S.S.W. of Iconium in the south of the Roman province Galatia and in the Lycaonian part of that province, connected with Pisidian Antioch by the direct military 'Imperial road,' which did not pass through Iconium (Ramsay in Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces of the Roman Empire, p. 241 ff.). Both Pisidian Antioch and Lystra were 'colonies' (see COLONY) established by the Emperor Augustus in A.D. 6 to make the Roman occupation more effective, and the official language of these was Latin. Hardly any remains of the city exist above ground. No trace of the temple of Zeus-before-the-City (Ac 14¹²) has been found, but it is probable that a college of priests was attached to it. The sacrifice to Barnabas and Paul as Zeus and Hermes (or rather the national Lycaonian gods corresponding to these) took place at the entrance to it. The town appears not to have been much Grecized, and the uncultivated populace expressed themselves in Lycaonian. There were Jews in Lystra (Ac 16¹), but there was evidently no synagogue. Timothy was a native of Lystra, which was visited by St. Paul four times in all (Ac 14⁶ 21 16¹ 18²), and addressed by him in the Epistle to the Galatians.

MAACAH.—1. A son of Nahor (Gn 22²⁴). 2. The daughter of Talmai, wife of David, and mother of Absalom (2 S 3³ etc.). 3. The father of Achish, king of Gath (1 K 2²⁹), possibly the same as Maach (1 S 27²). 4. Wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (2 Ch 11²⁰). When she is called 'daughter' of Absalom (1 K 15² 10, 2 Ch 11²⁰), 'granddaughter' may be intended, as Absalom had but one daughter, Tamar, who may have married Uriel of Gibeah (2 Ch 13², where the name is given as Micalah; cf. Jos. Ant. vii. x. 1). Maacah fell under the spell of loathsome idolatry, for which Asa deposed her from the position of queen-mother, which she appears to have held till then (1 K 15¹³, 2 Ch 15¹⁶). 5. A concubine of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴⁸). 6. Wife of Machir (1 Ch 7¹⁴). 7. Wife of Jehiel, the father of Gibeon (1 Ch 8²⁹ 9³⁵). 8. One of David's warriors, father of Hanan (1 Ch 11⁴⁵). 9. The father of Shephatiah, the captain of the Simeonites (1 Ch 27¹⁶). W. EWING.

MAACAH.—A small kingdom out of which the Aramean (1 Ch 19⁶) inhabitants were not driven (Jos 13¹³). It probably lay in what is now known as the Jaulān, E. of the Sea of Galilee and the Upper Jordan (Dt 3¹⁴, Jos 12¹³ 13¹¹), but its borders cannot now be determined. Its king and army were hired against David by the Ammonites, and shared their overthrow in the battle fought near Medeba (2 S 10, 1 Ch 19). The inhabitants were called Maacathites (2 S 23³⁴ etc.).

W. EWING.

MAADAI.—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³⁴); 1 Es 9³⁴ Momdis.

MAADIAH.—A priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12³); called in v. 17 Moadiah.

MAAI.—One of the sons of Asaph who took part in the dedication of the walls (Neh 12³⁶).

MAALEH-ACRABBIM.—Jos 15³ AV ('ascent of Akrabbim,' RV). See AKRABBIM.

MAANI (1 Es 5³¹) = Meunim, Ezr 2⁵⁰, Neh 7⁵².

MAARATH.—A town of Judah (Jos 15⁵⁹). Possibly the name survives in Beit 'Ummār, west of Tekoa.

MAAREH-GEBA (AV 'the meadows of Gibeah,' RVm 'the meadow of Geba').—The place from which the men placed in ambush rushed forth to attack the Benjamites (Jg 20³⁵). There can be little doubt that we ought to emend MT to 'to the west of Geba' (better Gibeah).

MAASAI.—The name of a priestly family (1 Ch 9¹²).

MAASEAS.—The grandfather of Baruch (Bar 1¹) = Mahseiah of Jer 32² 51⁵⁹.

MAASEIAH.—1. A priest, of the sons of Jeshua, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10¹⁸ [1 Es 9¹⁹ Mathelias]). 2. A priest, of the sons of Harim, who had committed the same offence (Ezr 10²¹ [1 Es 9²¹ Manes]). Foreign wives had been taken also by 3. and 4.—A priest, of the sons of Pashhur (Ezr 10²² [1 Es 9²² Massias]), and a layman, of the sons of Pahath-moab (v.³⁰ [1 Es 9²⁴ Moossias]). 5. A wall-builder (Neh 3²³). 6. One of those who stood upon the right hand of Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8⁷); called in 1 Es 9²⁴ Baalsamus. 7. One of those who expounded the Law to the people (Neh 8⁷); called in 1 Es 9²⁴ Maiannas. He is perhaps the same as the preceding. 8. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²⁸). 9. A Judahite (Neh 11⁵); in 1 Ch 9⁵ Asaiah. 10. A Benjamite (Neh 11⁷). 11. 12. Two priests (Neh 12⁴¹). 13. A priest in the time of Zedekiah (Jer 21¹ 29²⁸ 35⁴ 37³). 14. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah (Jer 29²¹). 15. A Levitical singer (1 Ch 15¹⁸ 20⁹). 16. One of the captains who assisted Jehoiada in the overthrow of Athaliah (2 Ch 23¹). 17. An officer of Uzziah (2 Ch 26¹¹). 18. A son of Ahaz slain by Zichri the Ephraimite (2 Ch 28⁷). 19. Governor of Jerusalem under Josiah (2 Ch 34⁹). 20. In 1 Ch 6⁴⁰ Baaseiah appears to be a textual error for Maaseiah.

MAASMAS (1 Es 8³) = Shemaiah. Ezr 8⁴.

MAATH.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3²⁸).

MAAZ.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2²⁷).

MAAZIAH.—A priestly family which constituted the 24th course (Neh 10⁸, 1 Ch 24¹⁹).

MACALON (1 Es 5²¹).—The same as Michmash; cf. Ezr 2²⁷.

MACCABEES.—The name commonly given to the Jewish family otherwise known as Hasmonæans, who led the revolt against Syria under Antiochus iv., and furnished the dynasty of leaders and rulers in the State thus formed. The family is said to have derived its name from a more or less mythical ancestor Hasmonæus. The chief members of the house were:

1. Mattathias (b.c. 167–166), a citizen of Modin, and of priestly descent. When, in accordance with the policy of Antiochus iv., the royal officer attempted to establish heathen sacrifices in that town, Mattathias refused to conform, killed the officer and a Jew about to offer sacrifices, levelled the heathen altar to the ground, and fled with his five sons to the mountains. There he was joined by a number of other patriots and by 'the Pious' (see HASIDÆANS). After a few months of vigorous fighting in behalf of the Torah, Mattathias died, leaving the conduct of the revolt to his five sons. Of these, Eleazar and John were killed in the succeeding struggle without having attained official standing. The other three were his successors (1 Mac 2).

2. Judas (b.c. 166–161), called Maccabec, or 'the Hammerer,' from which surname the entire family came to be known. Judas was essentially a warrior, whose plans involved not only the re-establishment of the Torah, but also, in all probability, the re-establishment of the Jewish State in at least a semi-independent position. He defeated successively the Syrian generals Apollonius and Beron. Antiochus iv. then sent Lysias, the imperial chancellor, to put down the revolt, and he in turn sent a large body of troops against Judas, under three generals—Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. Judas called the fighting men of Galilee together at Mizpah, organized them, and at Emmaus surprised and utterly defeated the forces of Gorgias (b.c. 166–165). In the autumn of 165, Lysias himself came against Judas at the head of a great army, but was defeated at Bethzur. Thereupon, in December 165, Judas cleansed the Temple of the Syrian pollutions and inaugurated the re-established worship with a great feast. For a year and a half he waged war on his enemies on the east of the Jordan, while his brother Simon brought the Jews scattered throughout Galilee back to Judæa for safety. His vigorous campaign, however, seems to have alienated 'the Pious,' who had seen their ambition realized in the re-establishment of the Temple worship. Lysias returned with a great army, and at Beth-zacharias completely defeated Judas. He then laid siege to Jerusalem, where the citadel was still in Syrian hands. Jerusalem surrendered, but Lysias did not attempt again to disestablish the Jewish faith. He appointed Alcimus as high priest, who was received by 'the Pious' as legitimate, although he favoured the Greeks. Judas and his party, however, remained in revolt, and when Lysias returned to Syria, undertook war against Alcimus himself. Demetrius i., who had succeeded Antiochus iv., sent Nicanor to put an end to the rebellion. He was defeated by Judas at Capharsalama, and retreated to Jerusalem, where he threatened to burn the Temple if Judas were not delivered up. This once more brought 'the Pious' to the support of Judas, who decisively defeated the Syrians at Adasa, Nicanor himself being killed. Josephus states that at this time Alcimus died and Judas was made high priest. Although this is probably an error, Judas was now at the head of the State. He sent ambassadors to Rome asking for assistance, which was granted to the extent that the Senate sent word to Demetrius i. to desist from fighting the Jews, the allies of the Romans. This international policy of Judas displeased 'the Pious,' however, and they deserted him; and before the message of the Senate could reach Demetrius, Judas had been defeated by the Syrian general Bacchides, at Elasa, and killed (1 Mac 3–9²⁷).

3. Jonathan (b.c. 161–143) undertook the leadership of the revolt, only to suffer serious defeat east of the Jordan, where he had gone to avenge the killing of his brother John by the 'sons of Jambri.' For a time it looked as if Syria would again establish its complete control over the country. The high priest Alcimus died, and Bacchides, believing the subjection of Judæa complete, returned to Syria (b.c. 160). The land, however, was not at peace, and in the interests of order Bacchides gave Jonathan the right to maintain an armed force at Michmash. The fortunes of the Maccabæan house now rose steadily. As a sort of licensed revolutionist, Jonathan was sought as an ally by the two rivals for the Syrian throne, Alexander Balas and Demetrius i. Each made him extravagant offers, but Jonathan preferred Alexander Balas; and when the latter defeated his rival, Jonathan found himself a high priest, a prince of Syria, and military and civil governor of Judæa (b.c. 150). When Alexander Balas was conquered by Demetrius ii., Jonathan laid siege to the citadel of Jerusalem, which was still in the hands of the Syrians. Demetrius did not find himself strong enough to punish the Jews, but apparently bought off the siege by adding to Judæa three sections of Samaria, and granting remission of tribute. Jonathan thereupon became a supporter of Demetrius ii., and furnished him auxiliary troops at critical times. Thanks to the disturbance in the Syrian Empire, Jonathan conquered various cities in the Maritime Plain and to the south of Judæa, re-established treaties with Rome and Sparta, and strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem, cutting off the Syrian garrison with a high wall. Joppa was garrisoned and various strategic points throughout Judæa fortified. This steady advance towards independence was checked, however, by the treacherous seizure of Jonathan by Trypho, the guardian and commanding general of the young Antiochus v., by whom he was subsequently (b.c. 142) executed (1 Mac 9²²–12).

4. Simon (b.c. 143–135), another son of Mattathias, succeeded Jonathan when the affairs of the State were in a critical position. A man of extraordinary ability, he was so successful in diplomacy as seldom to be compelled to carry on war. It was greatly to his advantage that the Syrian State was torn by the struggles between the aspirants to the throne. Simon's first step was to make the recognition of the independence of Judaea a condition of an alliance with Demetrius II. The need of that monarch was too great to warrant his refusal of Simon's hard terms, and the political independence of Judaea was achieved (n.c. 143-142). In May 142 Simon was able to seize the citadel, and in September 141, at a great assembly of priests and people, and princes of the people, and elders of the land, he was elected to be high priest and military commander and civil governor of the Jews, 'for ever until there should arise a faithful prophet.' That is to say, the high-priestly office became hereditary in Simon's family. Following the policy of his house, Simon re-established the treaty with Rome, although he became involved in a strenuous struggle with Syria, in which the Syrian general was defeated by his son, John Hyrcanus. Like his brothers, however, Simon met a violent death, being killed by his son-in-law at a banquet (1 Mac 13-16⁹).

6. John Hyrcanus (n.c. 135-105). Under this son of Simon, the Jewish State reached its greatest prosperity. Josephus describes him as high priest, king, and prophet, but strangely enough the records of his reign are scanty. At the opening of his reign, John's position, like that of his father and uncle, was critical. Antiochus VII (Sidetes), the last energetic king of Syria, for a short time threatened to reduce Judaea again to political dependence. He besieged Jerusalem and starved it into surrender. For some reason, however, probably because of the interference of the Romans, he did not destroy the city, but, exacting severe terms, left it under the control of Hyrcanus. Antiochus was presently killed in a campaign against the Parthians, and was succeeded by the weak Demetrius II., who had been released from imprisonment by the same nation. John Hyrcanus from this time onwards paid small attention to Syrian power, and began a career of conquest of the territory on both sides of the Jordan and in Samaria. The affairs of Syria growing ever more desperate under the succession of feeble kings, John ceased payment of the tribute which had been exacted by Antiochus, and established a brilliant court, issuing coins as high priest and head of the Congregation of the Jews. He did not, however, take the title of 'king.' His long reign was marked by a break with the Pharisees, who, as successors of 'the Pious,' had been the traditional party of the government, and the establishment of friendship with the Sadducees, thereby fixing the high priesthood as one of the perquisites of that party. John died in peace, bequeathing to his family a well-rounded out territory and an independent government (Jos. Ant. XIII. viii.-x.; BJ I. ii.).

6. Aristobulus I. (n.c. 105-104). According to the will of John Hyrcanus, the government was placed in his widow's hands, while the high priesthood was given to the oldest of his five sons, Aristobulus. The latter, however, put his mother in prison, where she starved to death, established his brother Antigonus as joint-ruler, and threw his other three brothers into prison. In a short time, urged on by suspicion, he had his brother Antigonus killed, and he himself took the title of 'king.' Of his short reign we know little except that he was regarded as a friend of the Greeks, and conquered and circumcised the Itureans, who probably lived in Galilee. At this time the final Judaizing of Galilee began (Jos. Ant. XIII. xi.; BJ I. iii.).

7. Alexander Jannæus (n.c. 104-78). After the death of Aristobulus, his widow Alexandra (Salome) released his three brothers from prison, and married the oldest of them, Alexander Jannæus (or Jonathan), making him king and high priest. Alexander carried on still more vigorously the monarchical policy of Aristobulus, and undertook the extension of Judaea by the conquest of the surrounding cities, including those of Upper Galilee. He was essentially a warrior, but in his early campaigns was defeated by the Egyptians. Judaea might then have become a province of Egypt had not the Jewish counsellors of Cleopatra advised against the subjection of the land. The Egyptian army was withdrawn, and Alexander Jannæus was left in control of the country. His monarchical ambitions, however, aroused the hostility of the Pharisees, and Judaea was rent by civil war. For six years the war raged, and it is said that 50,000 Jews perished. The Pharisees asked aid from Demetrius III., and succeeded in defeating Alexander. Thereupon, however, feeling that they were in danger of falling again into subjection to Syria, many of the Jews went over to Alexander and assisted him in putting down the rebellion. The consequent success of Alexander was marked by a series of terrible punishments inflicted upon those who had rebelled against him. During the latter part of his reign he was engaged in struggles with the Greek cities of Palestine, in the siege of one of which he died, bequeathing his kingdom to his wife Alexandra, with the advice that she should make friends with the Pharisees (Jos. Ant. XIII. xii.-xv.; BJ I. iv.).

8. Alexandra (n.c. 78-69) was a woman of extraordinary ability, and her reign was one of great prosperity, according to the Pharisees, whose leaders were her chief advisers. She maintained the general foreign policy of her house, defending her kingdom against various foreign enemies, but particularly devoted herself, under the guidance of her brother Simon ben-Shetach, to the inner development of Judaea along lines of Pharisaic policy. The Sadducean leaders were to some extent persecuted, but seem to have been able to bring about their appointment to the charge of various frontier fortresses. The death of Alexandra alone prevented her being involved in a civil war (Jos. Ant. XIII. xvi.; BJ I. v.).

9. Aristobulus II. (n.c. 69-63). After the death of Alexandra civil war broke out. According to the queen's provision, her eldest son, Hyrcanus II., who was already high priest, was to have been her successor. In fact, he did undertake to administer the State, but his younger and more energetic brother Aristobulus organized the rebellion, defeated Hyrcanus, and compelled him to surrender. By the agreement that followed, Hyrcanus was reduced to private life in the enjoyment of a large revenue. It was at this time that Antipater, the father of Herod I., appeared on the scene. He was an Idumean of boundless ambition and much experience. He undertook to replace Hyrcanus on the throne. With the assistance of Aretas, king of Arabia, he organized an army and besieged Aristobulus in the Temple Mount. As the war was proceeding, Pompey sent Scaurus to Syria (n.c. 65). Scaurus proceeded towards Judaea to take advantage of the struggle between the two brothers. Before he reached Judaea, however, both Aristobulus and Hyrcanus referred their quarrel to him. Scaurus favoured Aristobulus, and ordered Aretas to return to Arabia. This decision, however, did not end the controversy between the brothers, and they appealed to Pompey himself, who meantime had arrived at Damascus. The two brothers pleaded their cause, as did also an embassy of the Jewish people, which asked that the monarchy be abolished, and the government by the high priest be re-established. Pompey deferred his decision, and ordered the two brothers to maintain peace. Aristobulus, however, undertook to continue the revolt, fleeing to Alexandrium, a fortress on the Samaritan hills, above the Jordan Valley. At the command of Pompey he surrendered the fortress, but fled to Jerusalem, where he prepared to stand a siege. Pompey followed him, and Aristobulus promised to surrender. When, however, Gabinius, the Roman general, went to take possession of the city, he found the gates closed against him. Thereupon Pompey proceeded to besiege the city. The various divisions of Jerusalem surrendered to him except the Temple Mount. This was captured after a long siege, and at terrible cost (n.c. 63). Pompey went into the Holy of Holies, but did not touch the Temple treasures. He did, however, make Judaea tributary to Rome and greatly reduced its territory. Aristobulus was taken prisoner, and Hyrcanus was re-established as high priest, but without the title of 'king.' Great numbers of Jews were taken by Pompey to Rome at this time, together with Aristobulus, and became the nucleus of the Jewish community in the capital. With this conquest of Pompey, the Maccabæan State really came to an end; and Judaea became tributary to Rome (Jos. Ant. XIV. i.-iv. BJ I. vi. and vii.).

10. Hyrcanus II. was a weak man, but had for his adviser and major domo Antipater, an exceedingly able man. The State, as re-organized by Gabinius, was attached to Syria, and Hyrcanus exercised the function of high priest (63-40). During this time Judaea was swept more completely into the current of Roman history, because of the assistance rendered by Antipater and Hyrcanus to Caesar in his struggle with the party of Pompey in Egypt. In gratitude Caesar gave many rights and privileges to the Jews throughout the Roman world. Hyrcanus was, however, not appointed king, but 'ethnarch,' and Antipater was made procurator. The walls of Jerusalem, which had been broken down by Pompey, were now rebuilt, and various cities taken away by Pompey were restored to the Judæan territory. Hyrcanus, completely under the control of Antipater, supported Cassius in the struggle which followed the death of Caesar, but in the disturbances following the death of Brutus and Cassius espoused the cause of Antony. At this critical juncture Antipater was killed, and his two sons, Phasael and Herod, were appointed by Antony tetrarchs of the country of the Jews. Antigonos, however, the second son of Aristobulus, with the assistance of the Parthians, captured Phasael, compelled Herod to flee, and seized the State. Hyrcanus was carried away prisoner by the Parthians, and his ears were cut off, so that he could no longer act as high priest.

After Herod had been made king, Hyrcanus was brought back to Judaea, and became a centre of one of the various intrigues against Herod, who had married Hyrcanus' granddaughter Mariamme. As a result, Herod had him executed (b.c. 30), on the charge of conspiracy with the king of Arabia (Jos. Ant. xiv. v.-xiii.; BJ i. viii.-xiii.).

11. Alexander, the elder son of Aristobulus II., who escaped from Pompey on the journey to Rome, collected an army and headed an insurrection in Judaea (b.c. 57). He was finally defeated, and later during the civil wars was beheaded by order of Pompey as a friend of Cæsar.

12. Antigonos, with his father Aristobulus, escaped from the Romans, and in b.c. 56 headed a revolt in Judaea. Aristobulus retreated to Macherus, but after two years' siege was compelled to surrender, and went again as prisoner to Rome, where he was poisoned (b.c. 49), just as he was setting out to the East to assist Cæsar. Antigonos in b.c. 47 attempted unsuccessfully to induce Cæsar to establish him as king of Judaea in place of Hyrcanus and Antipater. After the death of Cæsar and during the second triumvirate, Antigonos attempted to gain the throne of Judaea with the assistance of the Parthians, and in 40-37 maintained himself with the title of 'king and high priest.' At the end of that period, however, Herod I., who had been appointed king by the Romans, conquered Antigonos with the assistance of Rome. Antigonos was beheaded (b.c. 37) by Antony at the request of Herod (Jos. Ant. xiv. xiv.-xvi.; BJ i. xiv.-xviii. 3).

13. Alexandra, daughter of Hyrcanus II., married her cousin Alexander, son of Aristobulus II. She was a woman of great ability, and as the mother of Mariamme, wife of Herod I., was an object of bitter hatred on the part of Herod's sister Salome. She was executed by Herod in b.c. 28.

14. Aristobulus III., son of Alexander and Alexandra, became a member of the household of Herod after the latter's marriage with Mariamme. Like all Hasmonæans, he was possessed of great personal beauty, and was a favourite with the people. At the request of his sister he was made high priest by Herod (b.c. 35). On account of his popularity, Herod had him drowned while he was bathing at Jericho, in the same year, when he had reached the age of seventeen.

15. Mariamme, daughter of Alexander and Alexandra, was reputed to be one of the most beautiful women of the time. She became the wife of Herod, who loved her jealously. Driven to madness, however, by the scandalous reports of his sister Salome, Herod had her executed in b.c. 29.

Although the direct line of Hasmonæans was thus wiped out by Herod, the family was perpetuated in the sons of Herod himself by Mariamme—Alexander and Aristobulus. Both these sons, indeed, Herod caused to be executed because of alleged conspiracies against him, but the Maccabæan line still lived in the persons of Herod of Chalcis and Agrippa I. and II. (see HEROD). SHAILER MATHEWS.

MACEDONIA.—The Macedonians were a part of the Hellenic race who settled early in history in the region round the river Axios at the N.W. corner of the Egean. When they first came into Greek politics they had dominion from the mountains N. of Thessaly to the river Strymon, except where the Greek colonies of the peninsula of Chalcidice kept them back. Their race was probably much mixed with Illyrian and Thracian elements; they did not advance in culture with Southern Greece, but kept their primitive government under a king, and were regarded by the Greeks as aliens. Down to the time of Philip (b.c. 359) they played a minor part as allies of various Greek cities having interests in the N. Egean. Under Philip, through his organization of an army and his diplomatic skill, they became masters of Greece, and under his son Alexander conquered the East. The dynasties which they established in Syria and Egypt were Macedonian, but in the subsequent Hellenization of the East they took no larger part than other Greek races. In their original dominions they remained a hardy and vigorous race. After several wars with Rome, Macedonia was divided into four separate districts with republican government, but it received the regular organization of a province in a.c. 146.

Macedonia was the scene of St. Paul's first work in Europe. See PHILIPPI, THESSALONICA, BEREÆ. The province at that time included Thessaly, and stretched across to the Adriatic; but Philippi was a colony, not subject to the governor of the province, and Thessalonica was also a 'free city,' with the right of appointing its own magistrates. The Via Egnatia ran across the province from Dyrrhachium to Neapolis, and St. Paul's journey was along this from Neapolis through Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, to Thessalonica. A further visit is recorded in Ac 20³⁻⁶, and the Pastoral Epistles imply another after his first imprisonment (1 Ti 1³).

MACHERUS.—A place E. of the Dead Sea, fortified by Alexander Janneus, and greatly enlarged and strengthened by Herod the Great (Jos. BJ vii. vi. 1). According to Josephus, the daughter of Aretas retired to this place when she left the bigamous Antipas. He describes it as 'in the borders of the dominions of Aretas and Herod,' and then 'subject to her father' (Ant. xviii. v. 1). He goes on to say that here John was imprisoned and beheaded (Mt 14⁶, etc.). If it was then subject to Aretas, this is at least curious. The fortress was one of the last taken by the Romans in the war of independence (BJ ii. xviii. 6, vii. vi.). It is identified with the ruin of Mukdûr, on the height about half-way between Wady Zerka Ma'in and Wady el-Môjib. W. EWING.

MACHBANNAI.—A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12¹³).

MACHBENA.—Named in the genealogical list of Judah (1 Ch 2⁴⁹). Machbena is probably the same as Cabbon of Jos 15⁴⁰, which may perhaps be identified with el-Kubeibeh, situated about 3 miles south of Beit Jibrin.

MACHI.—The father of Geuel, the Gadite spy (Nu 13¹⁵).

MACHIR.—1. The eldest 'son' of Manasseh (Jos 17¹), the only son (Nu 26³⁹). Machir was also the 'father of the Gilead.' These names are ethnographic, and their use suggests that the Machirites were either coterminous with the tribe of Manasseh (wh. see) or were its most warlike part. Settled on the W. of Jordan, they invaded N. Gilead some time after the days of Deborah, and so became the 'father of the Gilead.' 2. Son of Ammiel of Lo-debar on the E. of Jordan. He clung to the house of Saul as long as possible, and afterwards victimised David's men when that king was fleeing from Absalom (2 S 9³ 17²). W. F. COBB.

MACHNADEBAI.—One of the sons of Buni, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10⁴⁶).

MACHPELAH.—The name of a locality in which, according to the Priestly narrative of the Hexateuch, were situated a field and a cave purchased by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite, to serve as a burial-place for himself and his family (Gn 23¹⁻¹⁸). Here Sarah was buried by her husband; and subsequently Abraham himself, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob were laid to rest in the same spot (Gn 49³¹). The appellation 'Machpelah,' which seems in strictness to designate the site comprehensively, is also applied to the actual field and the cave within it, which are respectively called 'the field of Machpelah' (Gn 23¹⁹ 49³⁰ 50¹³) and the 'cave of Machpelah' (Gn 23² 25⁹). The place is described as being 'before Mamre' (Gn 25⁹), 'before' usually meaning 'east of' (see Gn 25¹⁸, Jos 13¹, 1 K 11⁷), just as 'behind' signifies 'west of' (Nu 32³). Mamre, in Gn 23¹⁹, is identified with Hebron, which is the modern el-Khalil ('the Friend,' i.e. Abraham, cf. Is 41⁸, Ja 22²), a town built on the sides of a narrow valley, the main portion of it lying on the face of the E. slope. The traditional site of the cave of Machpelah is on the E. hill, so that it would appear that ancient Hebron was built to the west of the modern city, on the W. hill, and that it has subsequently extended into the valley and climbed the opposite declivity.

Above the supposed site of the cave there is now a rectangular enclosure called the Haram, measuring 181 ft. by 93 ft. internally (the longer axis running from N.W. to S.E.), and surrounded by massive walls 40 ft. high, which are conjectured to date from the time of Herod the Great, though some authorities incline to assign them to a still earlier period. At the S.E. end of the quadrangle is a mosque, once a Christian church, 70 ft. by 93 ft., parts of which are attributed to the 12th century. Within the mosque are cenotaphs of Isaac and Rebekah; in a porch on the N.W. side are those of Abraham and Sarah; whilst at the opposite end of the enclosure are those of Jacob and Leah. The Haram has been but rarely entered by Christians in modern times. King Edward VII. was admitted to it, when Prince of Wales, in 1862; and the present Prince of Wales, with his brother, visited it in 1882. The cave, which is reputed to be the real resting-place of the patriarchs and their wives, is below the floor of the mosque, and is thought to be double, in accordance with a tradition which perhaps is derived from the LXX rendering of Machpelah as 'the double cave.' The entrances to it, of which there are said to be three, are in the flagged flooring of the building. It is doubtful whether any Christian has been allowed to enter it in modern times.

G. W. WADE.

MACRON.—Surname of Ptolemy (1 Mac 3³⁸, 2 Mac 14⁶), who was governor of Cyprus (2 Mac 10²¹.) and subsequently of Coele-Syria and Phœnicia (2 Mac 8⁹).

MADAI (Gn 10² = 1 Ch 1⁵).—See MEDES.

MADMANNAH.—A town in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15²¹), named with Hormah and Ziklag. Its place is taken in Jos 19⁶ etc., by Beth-marcaboth. No satisfactory identification has been suggested. Conder mentions Umam Demineh N. of Beersheba, but does not think it suitable.

W. EWING.

MADMEN.—A place in Moab, which, if the MT be correct, has not been identified. The name occurs only in Jer 48 [Gr. 31], where there is a characteristic word-play: gam Madmên tiddômî, also, (o Madmen, thou shalt be brought to silence!) (LXX kai pausin pausai). It is a very natural suggestion that the initial m of Madmen has arisen by dittography from the final m of the preceding word, and that for Madmen we should read Dimon (cf. Is 15⁹), i.e. Dibon (cf. Jer 48¹⁸). Cf. art. MEDEBA.

MADMENAH.—A place apparently north of Jerusalem, named only in the ideal description of the Assyrian invasion, Is 10²¹. The name has not been recovered.

MADON.—A royal city of the Canaanites in the north (Jos 11¹²). Khribet Madin near Hattin might suit. If, however, Madon be a scribal error for Maron, then Meirôn, at the foot of Jebel Jermuk, may be the place intended.

W. EWING.

MAELUS (1 Es 9²⁸) = Mijamin, Ezr 10²⁸.

MAGADAN.—See DALMANUTHA.

MAGBISH.—An unknown town, presumably in Benjamin, whose 'children' to the number of 156 are said to have returned from the Exile (Ezr 2³⁰); omitted in the parallel passage Neh 7²⁸, perhaps identical with Magpiash of Neh 10²⁰.

MAGDALA, MAGDALENE.—See MARY, No. 3.

MAGDIEL.—A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36⁴² = 1 Ch 1⁵⁴).

MAGI.—The plural of magus, which occurs in Ac 13⁹ (tr. 'sorcerer'—see RVm). Used as a plural word it denotes the 'wise men' of Mt 2 (see the RVm note at v. 1). The subject of this article is twofold—(1) the elucidation of that narrative, and of one or two other Biblical references to the Magi; (2) the brief delineation of the religion connected with the Magi, in its relation to the religious history of Israel. These two points need not be kept apart.

Herodotus tells us that the Magi formed one of six tribes or castes of the Medes. Since another of the six is expressly named as 'Aryan,' it seems to follow that the other five did not belong to the conquering race; and the Magi would accordingly be an aboriginal sacred caste, like the Brahmins in India. When Cambyzes, the son of the great Cyrus, died, the Magi seem to have made an attempt to regain civil power, of which Cyrus and his Aryans had deprived them; and a Magian pretender Gaumata held the throne of Persia for some months, until dispossessed and slain by Darius in B.C. 522. There is reason to believe that the Magi, in the course of a generation or two, made a bid for spiritual power: they conformed to the religion of the conquerors, profoundly altering its character as they did so, and thus gained the opportunity of re-asserting their own sacred functions among their fellow-countrymen, who were predisposed to accept their re-introduction of the old beliefs under the forms of the new. We have but little evidence to guide us in re-constructing this primitive Median religion. The sacred caste itself appears to be mentioned in Jer 39³, 13 (see RAB-MAG); and a ritual observance, preserved still in Parsi worship, figures in Ezk 8¹⁷, from which we gather that sun-worship, accompanied with the holding of the barsom ('bunch of fine tamarisk boughs,' as the geographer Strabo defines it) to the face, was a characteristic of Magian ritual before it was grafted on to Persian religion.

There are three special characteristics of Magianism proper which never obtained any real hold upon the religion with which the Magi subsequently identified themselves. These are (1) astrology, (2) oneiromancy, or divination by dreams, and (3) magic, which was traditionally associated with their name, but was expressly forbidden by the religion of the Persians. The first two of these features appear in the narrative of the Nativity. We have evidence that the Magi connected with the stars the fravashi or 'double' which Parsi psychology assigned to every good man—a part of his personality dwelling in heaven, sharing his development, and united with his soul at death. A brilliant new star would thus be regarded by them as the heavenly counterpart of a great man newly born. That dreams guided the Magi at one point of their adventure is expressly stated (Mt 2¹³); and it is fair to postulate similar direction in the initial interpretation of the star. There is, of course, nothing in this to convince those who have decided that the narrative of the Magi is legendary; nor is this the place to examine the difficulties that remain (see STAR OF THE MAGI). But it may at least be asserted that the story has curiously subtle points of contact with what we can re-construct of the history of Magian religion; and the invention of all this perhaps involves as many difficulties as can be recognized in the acceptance of the narrative as it stands.

The doctrine of the fravashi, just now referred to, may be paralleled rather closely in the Bible; and it is at least possible that the knowledge of this dogma, as prevailing in Media, may have stimulated the growth of the corresponding idea among post-exilic Jews. When in Mt 18¹⁰ Jesus declares that the angels of the little ones are in heaven nearest to the Throne, the easiest interpretation is that which recognizes these angels as a part of the personality, dwelling in heaven, but sharing the fortunes of the counterpart on earth. This gives a clear reason why the angels of the children should be perpetually in the Presence—they represent those who have not yet sinned. So again in Ac 12¹⁶ Peter's 'angel' is presumably his heavenly 'double.' The conception was apparently extended to include the heavenly representatives of communities, as the 'princes' of Israel, Greece, and Persia in Dn 10 and 12, and the 'angels' of the churches of Asia in Rev 2 and 3. If this doctrine really owed anything to the stimulus of Magianism, it is in line with other features of later Jewish angelology. It is only the naming and ranking of angels, and the symmetrical framing of corresponding powers of evil, that remind us of Parsi doctrine: the Jews always had both angels and demons, and all that is claimed is a possible encouragement from Parsi theology, which developed what was latent already. A more important debt of Judaism to Persian faith is alleged to be found in the doctrine of the Future Life. From the beginning Zoroastrianism (see below) had included immortality and the resurrection of the body as integral parts of its creed. It is therefore at least a remarkable coincidence that the Jews did not arrive at these doctrines till the period immediately following their contact with the Persians, who under Cyrus had been their deliverers from Babylonian tyranny. But though the coincidence has drawn some even to adopt the linguistically impossible notion that the very name of the Pharisees was due to their 'Parsi' leanings, a coincidence it remains for the most part. The two peoples came to the great idea by different roads. The Persians apparently developed it partly from the analogy of Nature, and partly from the instinctive craving for a theodicy. The Jews conceived the hope through the ever-increasing sense of communion with a present God, through which their most spiritual men realized the impossibility of death's severing God from His people. But we may well assume that the growth of this confident belief was hastened by the knowledge that the doctrine was already held by another nation.

How well the religion of the Magi deserved the double honour thus assigned to it—that of stimulating the growth of the greatest of truths within Israel, and that of offering the first homage of the Gentile world to the infant Redeemer—may be seen best by giving in a few words a description of the faith in general.

Its pre-historic basis was a relatively pure Nature-worship, followed by the common ancestors of the Aryans in India and Persia, and still visible to us in the numerous elements which appear in both Veda and Avesta—the most sacred books of India and Iran respectively. To Iranian tribes holding this faith came in the 7th cent. B.C., or earlier, the prophet Zarathushtra, called by the Greeks Zoroaster. He endeavoured to supersede Nature-worship by the preaching of a highly abstract monotheism. The 'Wise Lord,' Ahura Mazda (later Ormazd), reigned alone without equal or second; but Zoroaster surrounded Him with personified attributes, six in number, called Amesha Spenta (Amshaspands), 'Immortal Holy Ones,' who were the archangels of the heavenly court. The problem of Evil he solved by positing a 'Hurtful Spirit,' Angra Mainyu (later Ahriman), with his retinue of inferior demons (see Asmoneus), who is a power without beginning, like Ormazd, creator of all things evil, and perpetual enemy of God and of good men. In the end, however, he is to be destroyed with his followers, and Good is to triumph for ever. Truth and Industry, especially in agriculture, are the practical virtues by which the righteous advance the kingdom of Ahura Mazda. The eschatology is striking and lofty in its conception, and the doctrine of God singularly pure. Unhappily, with the prophet's death the old polytheism returned, under the guise of angel-worship, and the Magi were ere long enslaving the religion to a dull and mechanical ritual. Many of these degenerate elements have, however, been largely subordinated in modern Parsism. The small community, mostly concentrated round Bombay, which today maintains this ancient faith, may assuredly challenge any non-Christian religion in the world to match either its creed or its works. JAMES HOPE MOULTON.

MAGIC, DIVINATION, AND SORCERY.—Magic, divination, sorcery, and witchcraft are all connected with belief in superhuman powers, and are methods whereby men endeavour to obtain from these powers knowledge of the future, or assistance in the affairs of life. Belief in magic and divination is most prevalent in the lower stages of civilization and religion. The arts of the magician and the diviner were founded upon the same logical processes as have issued in the development of modern science; but the limits within which deduction would be valid were disregarded, and the data were frequently imperfect. Accidental coincidence was often confused with causal sequence. (See Hastings' DB, art. 'Divination'). Magic and divination were derived from attempts at reasoning which were very often erroneous; but from such crude beginnings science has slowly grown.

In their beginning these arts were associated with religion; and diviners and magicians were those thought to be most intimately connected with the Deity, and, owing to their superior knowledge of Him and His ways, best able to learn His secrets or secure His aid. Among the Arabs the priest was originally also the soothsayer; the Heb. kōhēn, 'priest,' is cognate with the Arab. kāhin, 'soothsayer'; the primitive priest had charge of the shrine of the god, and both offered sacrifices and gave responses. In this manner classes of professional diviners and magicians arose, as in Egypt (Gn 41⁸, Ex 7¹¹), in Babylon (Dn 2²), in connexion with Baal (1 K 18¹⁹), and even among the Israelites in the lower rank of professed prophets (Mic 3¹¹; see G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, Introd.). Such officials were set apart for their office by some rite specially connecting them with the god, as the eating of a particular food, or the wearing of a sacred dress (cf. 2 K 1⁸, Zec 13⁴). The animism, in which magical arts had their root, soon passed beyond the simple belief that Nature was peopled with spirits, and began to distinguish between good and evil spirits. When that distinction had been attained, the art of the magician and diviner also became subject to moral distinctions, according to the character of the spirit whose aid was sought and the purpose in view. This diversity in the moral characteristics of magic and divination is illustrated in the history of Israel; for divination is akin to some of the institutions sanctioned by God, such as the Urim and Thummim (Ex 28³⁰, Lv 8⁸), and it includes, at the other extreme, such necromancy as that of the witch of Endor. Among Semitic races and by the Egyptians, magic and divination were associated with the worship of various gods and the belief in the existence of a vast number of demons. With the gradual rise of religion in Israel under the teaching of God, early modes of prying into the future, and magical methods of seeking superhuman help, were slowly abandoned, and, as revelation became clearer, they were forbidden. The teaching of the inspired prophets of Jehovah was very different from that of the merely professional prophets and from the religion of the common people. Throughout pre-exilic times there was a struggle in Israel between the pure worship of Jehovah alone as inculcated by the great prophets, and the worship of 'other gods,' such as the local Canaanitish Baalim and idols in the homes of the people. In process of time magic and divination became closely linked with these illicit cults, and were consequently denounced by the great prophets; but at the same time the desire of the human heart to learn the future and to secure Divine help (which lies at the root of magic and divination) was met by God, purified, elevated, and satisfied by the revelation of His will through the prophets. God's revelation was suited to the stage of spiritual development to which the people had attained, hence His prophets sometimes employed methods similar to those of divination; consequently some forms of divination are allowed to pass without censure in many passages of the Bible, but these were gradually put aside as the people were educated to a more spiritual conception of religion. On the other hand, as men sought to prognosticate the future by illicit commerce with false gods and spirits, magic and divination became generally degraded and divorced from all that is right and good. This explains the increasing severity with which magic and divina-

Jon are regarded in Scripture; nevertheless we find it recorded, without any adverse comment, that Daniel was made head of the 'wise men' of Babylon—although these included magicians, enchanters, sorcerers, and 'Chaldeans'—(Dn 2: 48); and that the wise men (Mt 21) were magi. (See Grimm-Thayer's Lex. p. 385.) In explanation it may be said that reliance upon divination is a moral evil in proportion to the religious light vouchsafed to the individuals concerned; and God accommodated the methods of His teaching to the condition of those to whom He revealed Himself.

General course of the history of magic and divination in Israel.—Several sources can be traced from which the Israelites derived their magical arts, and different periods are apparent at which these influences were felt. (a) From patriarchal times up to Israel's contact with Assyria, most of their occult arts were the outcome of the beliefs common to Semitic peoples. Although their sojourn in Egypt brought them into contact with a civilized nation which greatly practised divination and sorcery, we cannot trace any sign that they borrowed many magical arts from the Egyptians at that time. In this early period of Israelitish history we find divination by teraphim, the interpretation of dreams, and necromancy, besides the authorized means of inquiry of God. The very earliest legislation enacts that witchcraft shall be punished by death (Ex 22: 18 [JE]); and we read that Saul put to death 'those that had familiar spirits and the wizards' (1 S 28: 7).

(b) Under the influence of the Assyrian advance southward, the small States of Palestine were driven into closer relations with one another, owing to the necessity of united opposition to the common foe. This was prejudicial to religion, through its rendering Israel more tolerant towards the gods of their allies (e.g. the worship of the Phœnician Baal, fostered by Ahab), and by its favouring the introduction of methods of magic and divination in use among their neighbours (cf. 1s 2, Jer 10: 1). This evil tendency was encouraged by Manasseh (2 K 21: 6), but in the reformation of Josiah, idolatry, witchcraft, and the use of teraphim were suppressed (2 K 23: 24) in accordance with Dt 18: 10-12 (D).

(c) The Captivity brought Israel into contact with a much more fully developed system of magic and divination than they had known before. In Babylon, not only were illicit magical practices widely indulged in, but the use of such arts was recognized by their being entrusted to a privileged class (Dn 2). The officials are here denominated 'magicians' (chattummim, scribes who were acquainted with occult arts), 'enchanters' (ashshaphim, prob. a Bab. word meaning 'those who used conjurations,' but its derivation is uncertain), 'sorcerers' (mikashshephim, in its root-meaning perhaps indicating those who mixed ingredients for magical purposes [LXX pharmakoi], but this is not certain), and 'Chaldeans' (kasdim, a name which, from being a national designation, had come to mean those who were skilled in the occult lore of Babylonia and could interpret dreams). Recent discoveries have revealed that the Babylonians believed in a vast number of demons who could be compelled by proper spells; also they practised astrology (Is 47: 13-15), augury from the inspection of victims (Ezk 21: 21), the tying of magic knots, and the designation of fortunate and unfavourable days.

(d) Egyptian influences were strongly felt in the century before, and the one following, the Christian era. The Mishna shows the presence of a very strong tendency to occult sciences, and in the NT we find examples of Jews who practised them in Simon Magus (Ac 8: 9) and Elymas (13: 9). Among the Alexandrian Jews, and later by the Alexandrian Gnostics, magic was much used, and the name of Jehovah in various forms entered into their spells and the inscriptions upon their amulets. Books of incantations, reputed to have been the work of Solomon, were extant, and the Babylonian Talmud is full of superstition (Schürer, HJP II. iii. 152). Such books and charms were burnt at Ephesus when their owners became Christians (Ac 19: 19). So celebrated was Ephesus for its magic, that 'Ephesian letters' was a common name for amulets made of leather, wood, or metal on which a magic spell was written (Farrar, St. Paul, ii. 26).

A. Distinguishing divination, in which prominence is given to the desire to know the future, from magic, which has for its object power to do something by supernatural aid, we have now to inquire into the modes of divination and magic which appear in the Scriptures.

Forms of divination mentioned in the Bible.—

(a) The casting of lots.—The casting of lots was founded on the belief that God would so direct the result as to indicate His will (Pr 16: 33). It was employed: (1) In crises in national history and in individual lives. Most scholars consider that the phrase 'enquire of God' refers to the use of Urim and Thummim, which seems to have been of the nature of drawing lots. This occurs in the arrangements for the conquest of Canaan (Jg 1: 1), in the campaign against the Benjamites (20: 7), in David's uncertainty after the death of Saul (2 S 2: 2), and in war (5: 2). The Phœnicians cast lots to discover the cause of the tempest (Jon 1: 7).—(2) In criminal investigation. It was employed to discover the wrongdoer in the cases of Achan (Jos 7: 14) and Jonathan (1 S 14: 4).—(3) In ritual. Lots were cast in reference to the scapegoat (Lv 16: 8). Two goats were brought, and lots were cast; one goat was offered as a sin-offering, and the other was sent away into the wilderness.—(4) In dividing the land of Canaan (Nu 26: 33-34, Jos 21: 6, 9).—(5) In selecting men for special duties: the election of Saul (1 S 10: 2), the choice of the men to attack Gibeah (Jg 20: 2), the division of duties among the priests (1 Ch 24: 3).

In most cases the method of casting the lot is not stated. Several ways were in use among the Israelites, some of which were directly sanctioned by God as a means of Divine guidance suited to the degree of religious knowledge attained by the people at the time. The following methods can be distinguished:—

(i.) By Urim and Thummim. Although not certain, it is believed by most scholars that the Urim and Thummim were two stones which were carried in a pouch under the breastplate of the priest, and which were drawn out as lots (see Hastings' DB s.v. 'Urim and Thummim'). In connexion with this the ephod is mentioned. In some passages this evidently means a priestly dress (e.g. 1 S 2: 22), but in other references it is considered by some to have been an image of gold representing Jehovah (Jg 8: 27, 18: 14 [see Harper, Amos and Hosea, p. 221]) or the gold sheathing of an image (Is 30: 2), although in this passage some understand it as being a garment. The use of the ephod in connexion with the Urim and Thummim is not known. The employment of the Urim and Thummim for consulting God disappeared before the clearer guidance received through the inspired prophets. Apparently it had ceased by the time of Israel's return from the Captivity (Ezr 2: 63). Inquiry respecting the future was also made of heathen deities (2 K 1: 2), and their responses were probably given by the drawing of lots.

(ii.) By belomancy and in other ways. The word gōsom (which is specially applied to the drawing of lots as with headless arrows) is used of divination generally and frequently translated 'to divine.' It is generally referred to unfavourably (except Pr 16: 33). Arrows are once specified as the means by which the lot was cast (Ezk 21: 2). This practice is found among the Arabs, and was also used in Babylonia. Arrows with the alternatives written upon them were shaken in a quiver at a sanctuary, and the first to fall out was taken as conveying the decision of the god. Nebuchadnezzar is represented as deciding in this manner his line of march (Ezk 21: 2), and, as the result of casting the lot, holding in his hand 'the divination Jerusalem, i.e. the arrow with 'Jerusalem' written upon it (see Driver, Deut. p. 224).

Without any indication of the method of divination, operations denoted by the word qesem appear among the Moabites (Balaam, Nu 23: 24, payment being made for the service, 22: 7), among the Philistines (1 S 6: 2), and among the Babylonians (Is 44²⁶). It also appears as a method of the lower rank of prophets in Israel (Mic 3¹⁻¹¹, Ezk 13³, 22²⁶). Prophets are named in connexion with diviners (qôsemim, Jer 27⁹ 29⁹). The word is used in relation to necromancy and the consultation of teraphim (1 S 15²³ 28¹, 2 K 17¹⁷, Zec 10⁸). The practice is forbidden in Dt 18¹⁰.

(iii.) By rhabdomancy. This is alluded to in Hos 4¹². Probably pieces of stick were used for drawing lots, as in the case of divination by arrows.

(b) Dreams and visions.—Numerous instances occur in which Divine intimations were communicated to men by dreams and visions. (1) In so far as these were spontaneous and unsought, they do not properly belong to the domain of divination. Such occur in Gn 20³ 28¹² 31¹⁰. 24 37¹, 1 K 3⁸, Mt 12²⁰ 21² 27¹⁹. Dreams are spoken of as a legitimate channel for God's communications to His prophets and others (Nu 12⁶, 1 S 28⁶, Job 33¹⁵, Jt 28⁹).—(2) But the belief in Divine warnings through dreams came very near to divination when interpreters were sought to make clear their meaning, as in Egypt (Gn 40⁵, 41¹ Pharaoh calls the chartumim—a word used only in the sense of scribes possessed of occult knowledge), among the Midianites (Jg 7¹³), and in Babylon (Dn 2¹).—(3) Dreams were sought by the prophets of a lower order in Israel, and it is known that among the Egyptians and other ancient nations special means, such as fasting or drugs, were used to induce them, from the belief that they were Divine communications. In Egypt it was a common practice for worshippers to sleep within the precincts of the temples in order to obtain intimations by dreams, and some devotees lived by the rewards received by them for recounting the dreams which had come to them in the temple. References to misleading divination by dreams occur in Dt 13¹⁻³ (prophets were to be judged by the character of their teaching and to be put to death if they favoured idolatry), Jer 23²⁵⁻²⁸ 27⁹ 29⁸, Zec 10³.

Vision (châzôn, with its cognate words) has a similarly wide application, extending from the God-given experiences of the higher prophets to the misleading predictions of false prophets. Instances of its highest signification occur in Is 1¹ 2¹, Am 1¹, Mic 1¹. The word is used respecting the deception practised by lower prophets, as in Nu 24³, 18, where reference is apparently made to the seer receiving the intimation in a trance, but the interpretation is not quite certain (see Gray, Numbers, p. 361); other physical phenomena appear in connexion with prophesying (1 S 10¹⁰ 19¹⁸⁻²⁴; see G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, i. p. 21). The word also appears in connexion with false prophets (Is 28⁷ 30¹⁰, La 2¹⁴, Ezk 12³ 13⁵, 15 21¹⁹ 22²⁸, Zec 10²).

(c) Observation of omens (augury).—nâchash, tr. 'to divine' or 'to use enchantments,' the agent being called 'an enchanter' (Dt 18¹⁰), means 'to learn by means of omens.' Very probably the expression is derived from nâchâsh, 'a serpent,' with the underlying idea that the intimation was obtained by the worshipper through the assistance of the serpent-god; another, but less likely, derivation is from the 'hissing' or 'whispering' tones of the diviner. The word is very frequently used with a bad sense attaching to it.

Words were sometimes taken as omens of the future (1 K 20²³ RvM 'took it as an omen,' also 1 S 14¹⁰). The movements of animals also constituted omens. It was considered by the Arabs that some animals, under the influence of a higher power, could see what was invisible to men, and consequently their action became an omen. It would be quite in accordance with this that Balaam's ass should see what was hidden from her master (Nu 22²⁷); a similar belief in the significance of the movements of animals is shown in the lords of the Philistines watching the way the kine took with the ark of God (1 S 6¹²).

The methods of divination by omens are often unexpressed, as Gn 30²⁷, Lv 19², 2 K 17¹⁷ 21², 2 Ch 33³. The following practices in divination by omens appear:—(i.) By hydromancy (Gn 44⁵). In Egypt it was common to attempt to divine the future by the appearance of the liquid in a goblet or dish.—(ii.) By the observation of the clouds. The clouds were carefully studied by diviners among the Chaldeans, and the word ônése seems to indicate this practice as existing among the Hebrews and Philistines (Is 2²; see Cheyne, Isaiah, vol. i. p. 17). Driver, however, leaves the kind of divination undecided, and suggests a derivation from an Arabic root meaning 'to murmur' or 'whisper,' the reference being to the mutterings of the soothsayer (Deut., p. 224). Perhaps it meant the bringing of clouds by magic arts, as in Jer 14²² (see Delitzsch on Is 2²). It has also been suggested that the word is a denominative from ayin ('eye'), and means 'to glance with an evil eye.' This form of augury was forbidden (Lv 19², Dt 18¹⁰), and those practising it were denounced (Mic 5¹², Jer 27⁹). Manasseh fostered it (2 K 21⁶, 2 Ch 33³).—(iii.) By astrology. The stars were very early believed to have an influence on the fortunes of men (Jg 5⁹, Job 38³³). Professional astrologers were prominent among the Assyrians and Babylonians, among whom a standard astrological work was constructed as early as the 16th cent. B.C. (Cheyne, Isaiah, vol. i. p. 310). Babylonian astrology, with its announcement of coming events and notification of favourable and unfavourable days (such as are now extant on Babylonian clay tablets), is mentioned in Is 47¹³; but astrology does not seem to have been practised by Israel in early times; Jeremiah speaks of it as 'the way of the nations,' and warns the people against it. In later times astrology was regarded by the Jews in a less unfavourable light: e.g. Dn 2¹⁸, where Daniel is made chief of ten wise men who included astrologers (cf. Mt 2, where the wise men, who appear to have been astrologers, were met by God in their darkness, and led to the infant Saviour (Edersheim, LT i. 202)).—(iv.) By inspecting victims. Forecasting the future from the appearance of the livers of victims is mentioned in Ezk 21². This was common in Babylon (Diod. Sic. ii. 29) and also among the Romans (Cic. de Divin. ii. 12). It does not appear to have been in use among the Israelites; the sacrifices of Balaam (Nu 23¹⁻⁴) were not for this purpose, but to propitiate the deity consulted.

Connected with the use of omens is the appointment of 'signs' by prophets to assist their consultors in believing what they predicted. Signs were given by God and His prophets as well as by false prophets; these were exhibitions of Divine power in smaller matters by which men might be enabled to trust God in things of greater moment (Jg 6³⁶); or they were instances of truth in small predictions, to awaken confidence in greater promises or threatenings (Ex 4¹ 10¹, Is 7¹¹); or they were simply the attachment of particular meaning to ordinary facts to remind men of God's promises or threats (Gn 9¹² 17¹¹, Is 8¹⁸, Ezk 12¹¹, Zec 3⁸). In the time of Christ such signs were demanded by the Jews (Mt 12²⁸ 16¹, Lk 11¹⁶, Jn 4⁴, 1 Co 12²). Cf. art. SIGN.

(d) Necromancy and familiar spirits.—Of these there were two kinds:—(1) A spirit (primarily a subterranean spirit, 'ôb) was conceived as dwelling in a human being (Lv 20²⁷), most commonly in a woman. Those thus possessed were sometimes called 'ôbôth (Is 8⁹), or the woman was denominated ba'alath 'ôb (1 S 28⁷). Another explanation (H. P. Smith, Samuel, p. 239) makes the 'ôb a sort of idol, on the ground that Manasseh 'made' an 'ôb (2 K 21⁶) and that it is classed with teraphim (2 K 23²⁴). These necromancers professed to have the power of calling up the dead (1 S 28¹¹, Is 8⁹). Of their method of procedure we know nothing. In the interview with the witch of Endor, it appears that Saul was told by the witch what she saw, but the king himself entered into the conversation. Necromancers seem to have deceived their inquirers by speaking in a thin weak voice to make it appear that it was the spirit speaking through them (Is 8⁹ 29⁴). The LXX generally represents them as ventriloquists, engastrimythoi (cf. gozles, 2 Ti 3¹³). A similar belief that a spirit might dwell in a human being and give responses appears in Ac 16¹⁶; this opinion was common in heathendom. The Jews had similar views respecting the indwelling of demons in cases of demoniacal possession.

(2) Other diviners represented themselves as having fellowship with a spirit from whom they could receive intimations. These spirits were called yiddô'ônim, the meaning being either that the spirits were wise and acquainted with the future, or that they were known to the wizards and had become 'familiar spirits' to them. The word occurs only in conjunction with 'ob, as in Lv 19^a 20^a, Dt 18^a.

(e) Divination by teraphim.—The teraphim were images in human form (cf. Michal's stratagem, 1 S 19^b), and they were worshipped as gods (Gn 31¹⁹, Jg 18²⁴), but in later times they seem to have been degraded to magical uses.

Some suppose them to have been the remains of a primitive ancestor-worship, and connect the word with rephā'im which means 'ghosts' (root rāphāh, 'to sink down'; 'to relax'). Some Jewish commentators (cf. Moore, Judges, p. 382) have suggested that they were originally the mummied heads of human beings, and that images of wood or metal were substituted for these in later times.

Teraphim were used for divination by Israelites and Arameans (Gn 31¹⁹), and Nebuchadnezzar is represented as consulting them (Ezk 21²¹). Josiah abolished teraphim as well as other methods of illicit divination (2 K 23²⁴), but they subsequently reappeared (Zec 10²). The use of the teraphim in divination is not stated, but it was probably somewhat similar to the consulting of familiar spirits, namely, the diviner gave the response which he represented himself to have received from the teraphim.

B. Magic, like divination, had both legitimate and illicit branches. The moral character of the attempt to obtain supernatural aid was determined by the purpose in view and the means used to attain it. Witchcraft, which sought to injure others by magical arts, has always been regarded as evil and worthy of punishment among all nations. Invocation of aid from false gods (who were still regarded as having real existence and power) and from evil spirits has been generally denounced. But there was also a magic, which has been denominated 'white magic,' having for its object the defeat of hostile witchcraft and the protection of individuals from evil influences.

1. Magic employed to counteract the work of evil spirits or the arts of malicious magicians.—This kind of magic was extensively practised among the Assyrians and Babylonians, and was the kind professed by the wise men who were under the patronage of Nebuchadnezzar (Dn 2). It also appears in the ceremony of exorcism. In Babylonia illness was traced to possession by evil spirits, and exorcism was employed to expel them (see Sayce, Hibbert Lecture). Exorcism was practised by the later Jews (Ac 19¹³, Mt 12²⁷).

The method of a Jewish exorcist, Eleazar, in the time of Vespasian is described by Josephus (Ant. viii. ii. 5). He placed a ring containing a magical root in the nostril of the demoniac; the man fell down immediately, and the exorcist, using incantations, said to have been composed by Solomon, adjured the demon to return no more.

This kind of magic is also exemplified in the use of amulets and charms, intended to defend the wearer from evil influences. These derived their power from the spells which had been pronounced over them (thus lāchash, which began with the meaning of serpent-charming, came to mean the muttering of a spell, and from that it passed to the meaning of an amulet which had received its power through the spell pronounced over it), or from the words which were inscribed upon them, or the symbolic character of their form. They were used by all ancient peoples, and were opposed by the prophets only when they involved trust in other gods than Jehovah. Probably the earrings of Gn 35⁴ and Hos 2² were amulets; so also were the moon-shaped ornaments of Jg 8²¹, 28 and Is 3¹⁸; their shape was that of the crescent moon which symbolized to the Arabs growing good fortune, and formed a protection against the evil eye (see Delitzsch on Is 3¹⁸). Perhaps the 'whoredoms' and 'adulteries' of Hos 2² were nose-jewels and necklaces which were heathen charms. Written words were often employed to keep away evil. The later Jew, understanding Dt 6⁸, in a literal sense, used phylacteries

(Mt 23^b), to which the virtue of amulets was attributed, although their origin apparently was mistaken exegesis rather than magic. The use of such charms was very prevalent in the early centuries of the Christian era among the Alexandrian Jews and the Gnostics.

2. Magic in forms generally denounced by the great prophets.—(a) Magic which was apparently dependent upon the occult virtues attributed to plants and other substances.—The Hebrew term for this was kesheph. The root kāshaph means 'to cut,' and has been explained as denoting the cutting which the worshipper inflicted upon himself (as 1 K 18²⁸), or (by W. Robertson Smith) as the cutting up of herbs shredded into the magic brew; the latter meaning is supported by the LXX tr. of kesheph by pharmaka, and also by Mic 5¹², where kēshāphīm appear to be material things; such a decoction is perhaps referred to in Is 65⁴, and some Jewish commentators consider the seething of a kid in its mother's milk (Ex 23¹⁹) to refer to a magical broth which was sprinkled over the fields to promote their fertility; this custom is found among other Eastern peoples. A wider signification is, however, possible, as in 2 K 9²², where kēshāphīm has the meaning of corrupting influences (AV 'witchcrafts'). Some derive kāshaph from an Assyrian root meaning 'to bewitch' (see Hastings' DB, art. 'Magic').

Hebrew magic came to a considerable extent from Assyria and Babylonia, where the art was practised by a class of men specially set apart for it (Dn 2; cf. also Is 47⁹, 12, Nah 3). Egyptian sorcerers are also noticed (Ex 7¹¹), but Egyptian influence in the art was most strongly felt by the Jews in post-exilic times. The belief in the virtue of mandrakes as love-philtres appears in Gn 30¹⁴ and Ca 7¹³ (dādā'im, from the root dād, 'to fondle'). Sorcerers are frequently denounced in the Bible (Ex 22¹⁸, Dt 18¹⁰, 2 K 9²², 2 Ch 33⁶, Jer 27⁹, Gal 5²⁰, Rev 9²¹ 21³).

(b) Magic by spells or the tying of knots.—The tying of knots in a rope, accompanied by the whispered repetition of a spell, was common in Babylonia (cf. Is 47⁹, 12) and in Arabia. This practice may lie behind the word chābar, Dt 18¹¹ (Driver, Deut. p. 225), or the word may refer to the spell only as a binding together of words. chābar is also used with the special meaning of serpent-charming (Ps 58⁵). This art, as now found in India and Egypt, was also denominated by the word lāchash (Ps 58⁵, Ec 10¹¹, Jer 8¹⁷); from the muttering of the charm, the word gained the meaning of whispering (2 S 12¹⁹, Ps 41⁷), and it is used of a whispered prayer (Is 26¹⁶, or, as some understand it in this passage, 'compulsion by magic'). Magical power was also held to be present in the reiteration of spells or prayers as in the case of the priests of Baal (1 K 18²⁶), and this repetition of the same words is rebuked by our Lord (Mt 6⁷).

In close connexion with the power of spells is the belief in the efficacy of cursing and blessing when these were uttered by specially endowed persons (Nu 22⁵, Jg 5²³); also there were magicians who professed to make days unlucky by cursing them (Job 3⁸).

An authorized ceremony closely approaching the methods of magicians is found in the ritual for the trial by ordeal of a wife charged with unfaithfulness (Nu 5¹²⁻³¹); the woman brought the prescribed offerings and the priest prepared a potion of water in which was put dust from the Tabernacle floor; the curse, which the woman acquiesced in as her due if guilty, was written and washed off with the water of the potion, the idea being that the curse was by this means put into the water, and the potion was afterwards drunk by the woman.

(c) Symbolic magic.—Magicians often made, in clay or other material, figures of those whom they desired to injure, and, to the accompaniment of fitting spells, inflicted upon these models the injuries they imprecated. They believed that in this way they sympathetically affected the persons represented. A trace of this symbolism is to be found in the placing of golden mice and emeralds in the ark by the Philistines when they sent it back to Israel (1 S 6⁹); by this means they believed that they would rid themselves of the troubles which the ark had brought to them.

MAGISTRATE.—This word is used in the AV to represent either 'judge' or 'ruler'—'authority' in the most general sense. The latter is its meaning in Jg 18⁷ (RV 'none in the land, possessing authority'—implying independence of Zidon and Phœnicia). The former is its meaning in Ezr 7², where it stands for shōphetim (the same word as suffles, by which the Romans designated the Carthaginian magistrates). In Lk 12¹¹, Tit 3¹ it stands for derivatives of the general word archo, 'to rule,' but in the passages from Lk, with a special reference to judges. In Ac 16³⁶⁻³⁸ the word is used to translate the Gr stratēgos. This is often used as the equivalent of the Lat. praetores, and in the older Roman colonies the two supreme magistrates were often known by this name. But we have no evidence that the magistrates at Philippi were called praetores, and it probably represents the more usual duumviri.

MAGNIFICAT.—Obsol. for 'magnificent'; retained by EV in 1 Ch 22² from the Geneva version—'the house . . . must be exceeding magnificat.' The adv. occurs in Rhem. NT, Lk 16¹⁹ 'He fared every day magnifically.'

MAGNIFICAT.—The hymn Magnificat (Lk 1⁴⁶⁻⁵⁵) has been well described as 'something more than a psalm, and something less than a complete Christian hymn' (Liddon). It is the poem of one who felt nearer to the fulfilment of the promises than any writer of the OT. But no Evangelist of the NT could have failed to speak of Christ by His human name, writing after His Death and Resurrection.

In the TR the hymn is ascribed to the Virgin Mary, but there is a variant reading 'Elisabeth' which demands some explanation. 'Mary' is the reading of all the Greek MSS, of the great majority of Latin MSS, and of many Early Fathers as far back as Tertullian (2nd cent.). On the other hand, three Old Latin MSS (cod. Vercellensis, cod. Veronensis, cod. Rhedigeranus-Vratislaviensis) have 'Elisabeth.' This reading was known to Origen (Hom. 5 on Lk 5), unless his translator Jerome interpolated the reference. Niceta of Remesiana (fl. c. 400) quoted it in his treatise 'On the good of Psalmody.' We can trace it back to the 3rd cent. in the translation of Irenaeus. There is fairly general agreement among critics that the original text must have been simply 'and she said,' so that both 'Mary' and 'Elisabeth' should be regarded as glosses.

On the question which is the right gloss, opinions are divided. In favour of 'Elisabeth' it has been suggested that the exclamation vv. 42-44 does not cover all that is implied in v. 41, 'and Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost.' Such words when used of Zacharias in v. 61 are followed by the Benedictus. Are we to look on the Magnificat as a corresponding prophecy on the lips of Elisabeth? On the other hand, the glowing words of Elisabeth (vv. 42-44) need a reply. She who had answered the angel so humbly and bravely (v. 43) would surely speak when thus addressed by a near relation. Indeed, v. 44, 'all generations shall call me blessed,' seems like a reply to Elisabeth's 'Blessed is she that believed' in v. 41. In the OT the formula of reply is frequently without a proper name, and the first chapters of Lk. have 'a special OT colouring.'

Another argument has been founded on the reading of v. 44: 'Mary abode with her,' where the Pesh. and the Sinaitic Palimpsest render 'with Elisabeth.' It is suggested that the tell-tale 'with her' of the Greek text proves that the hymn was ascribed to Elisabeth. But in the OT the personality of the singer is, as a rule, sunk in the song, and the name is mentioned at the end as if to pick up the thread (cf. Balaam, Nu 24²; Moses, Dt 32⁴ 34¹ [Bp. Wordsworth]). On the whole, the external evidence is in favour of the gloss 'Mary.' The question remains whether the hymn is more suitable on the lips of Elisabeth as expressing the feeling of a mother from whom the reproach of childlessness has been removed. Such an idea seems to express very inadequately the fulness of meaning packed into these few verses. The first words remind us of the song of Hannah as a happy mother (1 S 2¹), but the hymn is founded to a much greater extent on the Psalms, and the glowing anticipation of the Messianic time to come befits the Lord's mother. It is characteristic that she should keep herself in the background. No personal fear of the reproach of shame, which might be, and indeed was, levelled against her, no personal pride in the destiny vouchsafed to her, mar our impression of a soul accustomed to commune with God, and therefore never lacking words of praise.

The hymn has four strophes. In strophe i. (vv. 46, 47) she praises God with all the powers of soul and spirit. In ii. (vv. 48-49) she speaks of living in the memory of men, not as something deserved but because it is the will of the holy Lord. In iii. (vv. 51-52) she rises to a large view of the working out of God's purposes in human history, in the humbling of proud dynasties, and the triumph of the meek. In iv. (vv. 54, 55) she comes back to the fulfilment of the promises in the Messianic time, beginning with the Incarnation, which is the crowning proof of God's mercy and love.

MAGOG.—The name of a people, enumerated in Gn 10² among the 'sons' of Japheth, between Gomer (the Cimmerians) and Madai (the Medes), and mentioned in Ezk 38² (cf. 39⁶) as under the rule of Gog, prince of 'Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal,' who is to lead in the future a great expedition against the restored Israel, from 'the uttermost parts of the north,' and who has among his allies Gomer and Togarmah,—the nations whose names are italicized being also mentioned in Gn 10² as closely connected with 'Magog.' From these notices it is evident that Magog must have been the name of a people living far N. of Palestine, not far from Meshech and Tubal, whose home is shown by Assyrian notices to have been N.E. of Cilicia. Following Josephus, Magog has commonly been understood of the Scythians,—a wild and rough people, whose proper home (Hdt. iv. 17-20, 47-58) was on the N. of the Crimea, but who often organized predatory incursions into Asia and elsewhere: about b.c. 630 there was in particular a great irruption of Scythians into Asia (Hdt. i. 104-6), which seems to have supplied Ezekiel with the model for his imagined attack of nations from the N. upon the restored Israel (chs. 38, 39). Why, however, supposing this identification to be correct, the Scythians should be called 'Magog' is still unexplained. The name has not as yet been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. In Rev 20⁸ 'Gog and Magog' are applied figuratively to denote the nations who are pictured as brought by Satan, at the end of the millennium, to attack Jerusalem, and as destroyed before it (see, further, Gog).

S. R. DRIVER.

MAGOR-MISSABIB.—A nickname given (Jer 20⁹) by Jeremiah to Pashhur, chief officer in the Temple, who had caused Jeremiah to be beaten and put in the stocks as a false prophet. The name is an etymological play on the word Pashhur, and denotes 'fear-round-about'; but whether Pashhur (wh. see) was to be that to his surroundings, or vice versa, does not appear.

W. F. COBB.

MAGPIASH.—See MAGBISH.

MAGUS.—See BAR-JESUS, MAGI, MAGIC, and SIMON MAGUS.

MAHALALEEL.—See MAHALALEL.

MAHALALEL.—1. Son of Kenan and great-grandson of Seth (Gn 5¹², 18, 19, 16, 17 [P]—1 Ch 1³, Lk 3³⁷ Mahalaleel); —Mehujael in J's list (Gn 4¹⁸). 2. The son of Perez, who dwelt at Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh 11⁹).

MAHALATH.—1. See BAREMATH, No. 1.—2. Wife of Rehoboam, 2 Ch 11¹³. 3. See PSALMS, p. 772^a.

MAHANAIM ('two camps' or 'two hosts' [if the Heb. word is really a dual, which is very doubtful]).—An important city E. of Jordan on the frontier of Gad and Manasseh (Jos 13²⁶, 30); it was a Levitical city within the territory of Gad (Jos 21³⁸, 40). It was clearly N. of the Jabbok, as Jacob travelling S. reached it first (Gn 32²). Here Abner made Ish-bosheth, son of Saul, king (2 S 2⁸), and here David took refuge from his rebel son Absalom (2 S 17²⁴⁻²⁷ 19²⁸). Solomon put Abinadab in authority in this city (1 K 4¹⁴). There is apparently a reference to Mahanaim in Ca 6¹³ (see RV and AVm). The site of Mahanaim is quite uncertain. A trace of the name appears to linger in Mahneh, the name of a mass of ruins in the Jebel Ajlūn N.W. of the village Ajlūn. Merrill suggests a ruin called Suleikhat in the Wady Ajlūn, near its entrance to the Jordan valley; others consider the site of Jerash, which is first mentioned, as Gerasa, in the time of Alexander Jannaeus, as a likely spot for so prominent and, apparently, so attractive a city.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MAHANEH-DAN (Jg 13² 18¹³).—The locality of this spot is given in these two passages as 'behind Kiriath-jearim,' and as 'between Zorah and Eshtaul.' In the former passage we are told that 'the Spirit of Jehovah began to move Samson in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaul'; in the latter passage the derivation of the name is given as the place where the last encampment of the band of 600 Danite warriors took place, before they set out on their expedition to Laish. The exact position of the spot has not been identified, as the site of Eshtaul (wh. see) is not known with certainty.

T. A. MOXON.

MAHARAI.—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23²⁸, 1 Ch 11³⁰); according to 1 Ch 27¹³, of the family of Zerah, and captain of the Temple guard for the tenth monthly course.

MAHATH.—1. The eponym of a Kohathite family (1 Ch 6³, 2 Ch 29¹²); perhaps to be identified with Ahimoth of 1 Ch 6². 2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹³).

MAHAVITE, THE.—The EV designation in 1 Ch 11¹⁶ of Eliel, one of David's heroes. The MT should prob. be emended to read 'the Mahanaimite.'

MAHAZIOTH.—The Hemanite chief of the 23rd course of singers (1 Ch 25⁴, 30).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ ('spoil speedeth, prey hasteth'), Is 8¹⁻².—A symbolical name given to one of Isaiah's sons to signify the speedy destruction of the power of the allied kings Rezin and Pekah by the king of Assyria.

MAHLAH.—1. One of the daughters of Zelophehad (wh. see), Nu 26³³ 27¹ 36¹¹, Jos 17³. 2. One of the sons of Hammolecheth, 1 Ch 7¹⁸.

MAHLI.—In Ex 6¹⁹, Nu 3³⁰, 1 Ch 24²⁸⁻²⁹, it is the name of a son of Merari, Levi's youngest son. In 1 Ch 23²⁵ 24³⁰ a son of Mushi, Mahli's brother, bears the same name. Ezr 8¹⁸ speaks of 'a man of discretion (see ISH-BEHELEH), of the sons of Mahli . . . and Sherebiah, etc. 1 Es 8⁴⁷ [Mooli] drops 'and,' thus identifying this son of Mahli with Sherebiah. In Nu 3³³ 26³⁴ Mahli's descendants are called 'the family of the Mahlites.' According to 1 Ch 23²², these Mahlites were descended from the daughters of Eleazar, the elder son of the Mahli mentioned in Ex 6¹⁹. Eleazar left no male offspring. Their cousins, the sons of Kish, therefore took them in marriage, and prevented the extinction of their father's name.

MAHLON.—See CHILION.

MAHOL.—The father of Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda (1 K 4³¹), who are mentioned as famous for their wisdom, though surpassed in this respect by Solomon. Apparently, then, Mahol is a proper name, but it is also found in Ps 149³ 150⁴ (EV tr. 'dance') amongst instruments of music, so that the four wise men mentioned above may really be described as 'sons of music,' in which case their wisdom may have consisted chiefly in their skill in the composition of hymns.

T. A. MOXON.

MAHSEIAH.—Grandfather of Baruch and Seraiah (Jer 32⁷ 51⁶⁰); called in Bar 1¹ Maaseas.

MAIANNAS (1 Es 9¹¹)—Maaseiah, Neh 8⁷.

MAIL.—See ARMOUR, 2 (c).

MAINSAIL.—See SHIPS AND BOATS.

MAKAZ.—A town on the W. slopes of Judah (1 K 4⁸). The LXX reading, Michmash, is impossible. The site has not been recovered.

W. EWING.

MAKE.—In Jg 18³ 'to make' means 'to do'—'What makest thou in this place?' In Jn 8⁴ 'Whom makest thou thyself?', and Jn 19⁷ 'He made himself the Son of God,' 'make' means 'pretend to be'; cf. Jos 8¹⁴ 'Joshua and all Israel made as if they were beaten.' This is the meaning also in 2 S 13³ 'Lay thee down on thy bed, and make thyself sick.' In Ezk 17¹⁷ 'Neither shall Pharaoh with his mighty army and great company make for him in the war,' 'make for' means 'assist.'

MAKED.—A 'strong and great' city in Gilead (1 Mac 5²⁶, 27). The site is unknown.

MAKHELOTH (Nu 33², 28).—One of the twelve 'stations' of the children of Israel (Nu 33²¹); unknown.

MAKKEDAH.—A Canaanite royal city in the Shephelah, where the five kings of the Canaanites, defeated by Joshua at Gibeon, and chased by Israel down the valley by way of Beth-horon and Azekah, took refuge in a cave (Jos 10¹⁰, 16⁸), whence, later, by Joshua's orders, they were brought forth and slain. The city was taken and the inhabitants put to the sword. Azekah has not been identified, but in Jos 15¹¹ it is named with Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Naamah, which may be identified with the modern Katrah, Dajūn, and Na'aneh. In this district the name Makkedah has not been found, but Warren and Conder agree in suggesting d-Mughār, 'the cave,' as the most likely spot. The rock-quarrying and tombs mark an ancient site, and caves are found in no other place where Makkedah might be located. It lies on the N. of Wady Surār, about 15 miles S. of Jaffa. The Onomasticon places it about 7 miles E. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), a position hardly to be reckoned within the Shephelah.

W. EWING.

MAKTESH.—The name of a locality mentioned only in Zeph 1¹ as 'the Phœnician quarter' (?) of Jerusalem. The word denotes a mortar, and presumably was given to the place because it was basin-shaped. If so, a part of the Tyropœon valley has as good a claim as any other locality to be regarded as what is referred to. Certainly the Mt. of Olives is but a precarious conjecture.

W. F. COBB.

MALACHI.—1. Author.—The Book of Malachi raises a question of authorship which cannot be answered with certainty. Who was the author? Was his name Malachi? A priori, it might be supposed that the author of the last book of prophecy in the OT Canon would be sufficiently well known to have his name attached to his work. If the name appeared with the book (especially if the name was Ezra, as the Targum asserts), it could scarcely have been lost or forgotten before the 'Minor Prophets' were collected, and the Canon of the Prophets was closed.

It is, however, doubtful whether Malachi is the person, name of the prophet. The word, as it appears in the superscription, means 'my messenger,' and in this sense it is used in 3¹. It is argued that the word ought to have the same signification in both places. But, while in 3¹ it can scarcely mean anything else than 'my messenger,' this meaning does not suit the superscription, which would run, 'Oracle of the word of Jahweh through my messenger.' The oblique case of Jahweh with the direct reference of the suffix in 'my messenger,' is more than awkward. The LXX renders the superscription 'by the hand of his messenger.' The change of text is very slight. Whether there was MS authority for it cannot be determined.

The termination of the word Malachi may be adjectival. It would thus be equivalent to the Latin Angelicus, and would signify 'one charged with a message or mission' (a missionary). The term would thus be an official title, and the thought is not unsuitable to one whose message closed the Prophetic Canon of the OT, and whose mission in behalf of the Church was of so sacred a character. If this were the explanation, it is probable that greater definiteness would be attached to the words. It should be noted that, while the LXX render the word Malachi by 'his messenger' in the superscription, they prefix, as the title of the book, Malachias, as if the Hebrew should read Malachiyah, i.e. 'messenger of Jahweh.' Some such form must be adopted if the Malachi of the superscription is taken as a proper noun. The form would thus correspond to Zacharias, and many other proper nouns (so Vulg. both in the title and in the superscription). This is a possible grammatical explanation, and the name 'messenger of Jahweh' is suitable to the condition of Judah at the time. The Jews had little experience of prophets when the message of this book was delivered. It is significant that Haggai, the earliest prophet of the post-exilic period, is expressly designated 'messenger of Jahweh' (Hag 1¹³). He had already received the official title of prophet (nabî'), (v. 1). But there were prophets and prophets. False prophets had done much to bring about the Exile. If there were to be prophets after the Exile, it was important that the new community should be in no doubt as to their character. This was secured in the case of the first of the post-exilic prophets by the express statement that he was the messenger of Jahweh, and that what he spoke was the message of Jahweh. In the case of the last of the prophets of the OT Canon, an assurance of a similar character would be furnished symbolically by the name Malachiyah ('messenger of Jahweh'). This, pro tanto, favours the form of the word as it appears in the title of the LXX and the Vulgate.

But 3¹ remains. If Malachi is a proper noun—the name of the author—in 1¹, should the word not have the same significance in 3¹? The answer is, that there is no insuperable objection to the twofold explanation. The form admits of the twofold reference. The question is one of probability. At this point, however, reference should be made to the Targum, according to which Ezra was the author of the Book of Malachi; and this opinion continued to prevail among the Jews. Jerome accepted it, and it was favourably regarded by Calvin and others. No doubt the Targum expressed the Jewish opinion of the time. But that does not settle the question. In the four or five centuries between the appearance of the Book of Malachi and the birth of Christ, the life of the OT Church centred in the Law of Moses. That law was given, mainly, by Ezra to the post-exilic Church. As years passed, and the traditions of the scribes began to gather about the Law, the figure of Ezra stood out as the prominent one in post-exilic times. Everything of importance connected with the Law was wont to be assigned to him. Take along with that the fact that Malachi occurs as a common noun in 3¹, and the additional fact that the prophecy closes with a solemn warning to remember the Law of Moses, and it may appear not improbable that Ezra should have been claimed as the author of this closing passage, and of the prophecy in which it is found.

In these circumstances the authority of the Targum is not of very great weight. But in one respect the Targum is of importance. If the name of Ezra was the only one associated with the Book of Malachi when the Targum was prepared, it is probable that the book originally appeared anonymously—at least, that it bore no name when the volume of the Minor Prophets was made up, and that the compiler either regarded the term Malachi in 3¹ as the name of the author, or attached it to the book in the superscription as an official title. It is scarcely necessary to observe that the name of the author is not required for the authentication of the message. The terms of the superscription are amply sufficient for the purpose of authentication. It is the 'Oracle of the Word of Jahweh' that the prophet delivers. This is equivalent to 'The word of Jahweh came—or was—to . . . (so and so)' in other books of prophecy, and implies the familiar 'Thus saith Jahweh' of prophetic address.

2. Date.—Opinion is greatly divided regarding the date of the book. That it belonged to the Persian period appears from the name (pechah) given to the governor (cf. Hag 1¹, 14 etc., Neh 5¹⁴ etc.). Further, it is obvious that the statutory services of the Temple had been in operation for some time before the message of Malachi was delivered. Abuses had crept in which could not be associated with those who had returned from Babylon and rebuilt the Temple. The dedication of the Second Temple took place in B.C. 516, and the condition of religious life depicted in Malachi must have been a good many years later than that date. This is very generally admitted.

Two dates are most worthy of consideration—the first shortly before Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem, and the second during Nehemiah's second visit to the holy city. Certain expressions occurring in the book are held to favour the former (cf. 2¹, 4, 5, 3¹, 10, 22 [EV 4]). These, breathing the spirit of Deut., are supposed to show that the author was under the influence of the Deuteronomistic Code. If his activity was later than 445, the influence of P would have been expected to show itself. But the expression 'the law of Moses' (32² [EV 4]) finds a natural explanation in connexion with the whole Pentateuchal legislation read before the people in 445 (Neh 8 ff.). The covenant with Levi (24, 5) seems to presuppose Nu 25¹⁰⁻¹³ (P). And the reference to the tithes (31⁰) appears to rest on Lv 27³⁰⁻³³ and Nu 18²¹⁻³² (both belonging to P). Deuteronomistic expressions of an ethical character are suitable to any earnest prophet after Amos, and are not determinative of date as are the passages which presuppose P,—on the assumption that P was first promulgated in B.C. 445. The language, upon the whole, favours a date later than the appearance of P. The contents of the book point in the same direction. Ezra's reformation appears to have been limited to the banishing of the foreign wives, and the effort to effect a complete separation of the Chosen People from the idolatrous tribes round about. The author of Malachi brings three main charges against the Church of his day: (1) against the priests for the profanation of the services of the Temple; (2) against the community (priests included) for marrying heathen wives; (3) against the people generally for immorality, indifference, and infidelity. All this agrees very closely with the state of affairs with which Nehemiah had to deal on his second visit to Jerusalem (Neh 13²⁶). And upon the whole (the conclusion can only be a matter of comparative probability), the period of that visit may be accepted for the prophetic activity of the author of Malachi. The date would be somewhere about B.C. 430.

3. Contents.—The book may be divided into the following sections:

I. 1. The superscription.

II. 1²⁻³. Jahweh's love to Israel. This love proved by the history of His dealings with Israel from the days of their great ancestor Jacob, as contrasted with the history of Jacob's brother Esau and of his descendants.

III. 1⁴⁻²⁹. Israel's forgetfulness of Jahweh,—neglect and contempt of His offerings, through illegal proceedings on the part of the priests.

IV. 2¹⁰⁻¹⁸. Denunciation of divorce and of foreign marriages.

V. 2¹⁷⁻³⁹. Day of Jahweh (i.e. His coming to judgment) against unbelievers, scoffers, etc., especially with the view of purifying the priests in order that acceptable offerings may be presented unto Him.

VI. 3⁷⁻¹². Drought and locusts sent on those who neglected to bring the tithes for the service of the Temple and the support of the priests.

VII. 3¹³⁻⁴¹ [EV 3¹²⁻⁴⁹]. The punishment of the wicked, and the triumph of the righteous, on the day of Jahweh, with a concluding exhortation to obey the Law of Moses, and a promise of the coming of Elijah to lead the people to repentance.

4. Doctrine.—Malachi, in its doctrinal contents, is in entire harmony with the Prophetic books that preceded it, and adds its testimony to the fact that, while Divine revelation is progressive, and the circumstances of the time add a special character and colour to the different Prophetic books, the fundamental doctrines are the same in all. The keynote of Malachi's message is found in the opening words of 1². Israel's position as the Chosen People is founded in the electing love of Jahweh. The divorcing of Jewish and the marrying of heathen wives is a crime against the love of Jahweh. Further, Jahweh—as in all the prophets from Amos downwards—is a God of righteousness. He rewards the righteous and punishes the wicked. The day of Jahweh, on which the wicked are punished and the righteous rewarded, is the same as in Amos and his successors; and the closing words of the prophecy, dealing with this day of Jahweh, connect the OT with the NT, in which the day of the Lord occupies a position of equal importance with that assigned to it in the OT. The special circumstances of the time, which serve so far to determine the date, appear in the importance assigned to ritual, and the severity with which neglect or irregularity in this part of religious observance is treated.

5. Style.—As might be expected, the style and diction of a book belonging to the last half of the 5th cent. are inferior to those of the pre-exilic prophets. The language is mostly plain, homely prose. There are, however, poetic passages, some of considerable merit (cf. 1¹⁰ 3¹⁰ 10¹⁰ 10¹⁰ [EV 4¹⁰]). The most striking feature of the style is the discussion of an important subject by means of question and answer,—a dialectic method which became common afterwards, and which about the same time was well known in Athens through the labours of Socrates. G. G. CAMERON.

MALACHY.—2 Es 1¹⁰ (AV and RV) for Malachi.

MALCOM.—1. One of the heads of the fathers of Benjamin, and the son of Shaharaim and Hodesh (1 Ch 8⁹). 2. In Zeph 1⁸ Malcam is apparently the name of an idol, and might be rendered literally 'their king,' as in the margin of AV and RV. Quite possibly, however, there is an error in the pointing of the Hebrew word, and it should be rendered Milcom (wh. see), the 'abomination' of the children of Ammon, and identical with Molech (cf. 1s 8¹, Jer 49¹⁻³, and 1 K 11¹). See also art. MOLECH. T. A. MOXON.

MALCHIAH.—1. A priest, the father of Pashhur (Jer 21¹ 38¹), same as Malchijah of 1 Ch 9¹², Neh 11¹². 2. A member of the royal family, to whom belonged the pit-prison into which Jeremiah was let down (Jer 38⁶).

MALCHIEL.—The eponym of an Asherite family (Gn 46¹⁷, Nu 26⁴⁵, 1 Ch 7¹). The gentilic name Malchielites occurs in Nu 26⁴⁵.

MALCHIJAH.—1. A descendant of Gershom (1 Ch 6¹⁰ [Heb. *]). 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur (1 Ch 9¹², Neh 11¹²), same as Malchiah of Jer 21¹ 38¹. 3. Head of the 5th course of priests (1 Ch 24⁹), perhaps the same as the preceding. 4. 5. Two of the sons of Parosh, who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁰ bin); called in 1 Es 9²² Melchias and Asibias respectively. 6. One of the sons of Harim who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³¹). In Neh 3¹ he is mentioned as taking part in the repairing of the wall. He is called in 1 Es 9²² Melchias. 7. Malchijah the son of Rechab repaired the dung-gate (Neh 3⁴). 8. One of the guild of the goldsmiths who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3³¹). 9. One of those who stood at Ezra's left hand at the reading of the Law (Neh 8⁴). 10. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10³), probably the same as No. 2. 11. A priest who took part in the ceremony of dedicating the wall (Neh 12⁹).

MALCHIRAM.—Son of Jeconiah (1 Ch 3¹⁸).

MALCHI-SHUA.—The third son of Saul (1 S 14⁴⁰); slain by the Philistines at Mt. Gilboa (1 S 31², 1 Ch 10²).

MALCHUS.—The name of the high priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off in the Garden of Gethsemane at the arrest of our Lord. St. John is the only Evangelist who mentions his name (Jn 18¹⁰), thereby substantiating the fact that he was intimately acquainted with the high priest and his household (Jn 18¹⁵). The incident is related in the other three Gospels (Mt 26⁵¹, Mk 14⁴⁷, Lk 22⁵⁰). On a comparison of the four accounts, it seems that Malchus pressed forward eagerly to seize Jesus, whereupon Peter struck at him with his sword. The blow, missing its main object, almost severed the ear, but not quite, as Jesus ouched it and healed it.

Luke, the physician, is the only Evangelist who mentions the healing of the ear.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

MALICE.—

1. (i) OT.—All in Pr.-Bk. version: Ps 94² 119¹⁵⁰ and 107⁷ (adj.) 59⁸ (adj.) and 55³ (adv.). (ii.) Apoc.—All in AV: Wis 12¹⁰. 20 16⁴ (and RVm), * Sir 27³⁰ and 28⁷; * 1 Mac 9¹ and 13². 2 Mac 4³⁰. (iii.) NT.—In RV: 1 Co 5¹⁴ 14²⁰, Eph 4²², Col 3², Tit 3², Ja 1²¹ mg. 1 P 2¹ (AV and RVm); 'maliciousness' Ro 12¹⁷, 1 P 2¹ (AV and RVm 'malice'); 'malicious' * 3 Jn 10¹ AV.

2. Discussion is needless as to (i.), for the Heb. is clear. (See RV.) All the other instances, however, except those marked * represent a Gr. word (kakia) which has a much wider meaning than 'malice' as now used. It may be 'wickedness,' as Ac 8²², Ja 1²¹; or 'evil' = 'trouble,' Mt 6²⁴.

3. The point is important, because 'malice' has acquired its exclusive meaning 'spitefulness' only since the 17th century. It indicated evil of any sort (cf. Pr.-Bk. as cited above, and for some striking examples see art. in Hastings' DB). This change accounts for RV renderings of Apoc., and would perhaps have justified further emendation of AV.

4. The modern usage is a return to the classical malitia. Its relation to kakia was discussed by Cicero, who coined vitiostitas as the nearest rendering; for whereas 'malice' indicated a particular fault, 'vitiostity' stood for all (Tusc. Disp. iv. 34).

H. F. B. COMPTON.

MALLOTHI.—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25⁴ *).

MALLOWS (malluch, connected with melach 'salt'), Job 30⁴, RV salt-wort.—Almost certainly the sea orache (Atriplex halimus), a perennial shrub with leaves somewhat like the olive, common in saltish marshes, especially near the Dead Sea, where it is associated with the retem (see JUNIPER). The sour-tasting leaves can be eaten, but only in dire necessity. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MALLUCH.—1. A Merarite, ancestor of Ethan

(1 Ch 6⁴⁴). 2. One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³⁹); called in 1 Es 9³⁰ Mamuchus. 3. One of the sons of Harim who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³⁹). 4. 5. Two of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10^{4, 27}). No. 4 is probably identical with Malluch of Neh 12², called in 12⁴ Malluchi.

MALLUCHI.—The eponym of a priestly family who returned with Zerub. (Neh 12¹⁴); probably the same as Malluch of Neh 10⁴ 12².

MALLUS.—A city of Cilicia which joined Tarsus in a rebellion against Antiochus Epiphanes about B.C. 171 (2 Mac 4³⁰). Tradition said that it was founded at the time of the Trojan War. Its coinage shows that it was an important town. Its site is doubtful, but as ancient statements make it near the river Pyramus, near the sea, and also on a hill, Professor Ramsay identifies it with Kara-Tash, on a coast line of hills E. of Magarsa, which served as its port. The W. branch of the Pyramus has become almost completely dried up. A. E. HILLARD.

MALOBATHRON.—RVm of Ca 2¹⁷ for EV Bether (wh. see). It is argued by Post, against this rendering, that the malobathron plant (Laurus malobathrum) did not grow wild on any of the mountains of Palestine. Others would render (by a slight textual emendation) 'mountains of cypresses.'

MALTANNEUS (1 Es 9³⁰) = Mattenai, Ezr 10³⁴.

MAMDAI (1 Es 9³⁴) = Benaiah, Ezr 10³⁴.

MAMMON.—This is a Semitic word, but of doubtful derivation. It has been referred to Heb. aman, 'a reliable (store),' and to taman (t being elided), 'hidden treasure.' Augustine (Serm. on Mount) says it was the name for 'riches' among the Hebrews, and that the Phœnician agrees, for 'gain' in Phœnician is called mammon. Phœnician and Hebrew were near akin, and the ancients often included Aramaic in Hebrew. 'Mammon' is not found in OT Hebrew, but occurs in Rabbinical, in Syriac (Western Aramaic), and is used in the Aramaic Targums as the equivalent of Heb. terms for 'gain' or 'wealth.' Being a well-known Phœn. trade word, it is introduced without translation (unlike corban, etc.) into NT Greek, where the right spelling is mamōnas (Mt 6²⁴, Lk 16¹³ 11 12); with this agrees the Syriac form momāna. A Phœn. deity, Mamon, has been supposed. Though not improbable, the idea seems due to Milton (P.L. i. 679 ff.). 'Serve God and mammon' suggests personification, but compare the phraseology of Ph 3¹⁰. G. H. GWILLIAM.

MAMNITANEMUS (1 Es 9³⁴) corresponds to the two names Mattaniah, Mattenai in Ezr 10³⁷, of which it is a corruption.

MAMRE.—A name found several times in connexion with the history of Abraham. It occurs (a) in the expression 'terebinths of Mamre' in Gn 13¹⁸ 18¹ (both J), and 14¹³ (from an independent source) with the addition of 'the Amorite'; (b) in the expression 'which is before Mamre,' in descriptions of the cave of Machpelah, or of the field in which it was (Gn 23¹⁷ 19 25⁹ 49³⁰ 50¹³), and in 35²⁷, where Mamre is mentioned as the place of Isaac's death; (c) in Gn 14²⁴ as the name of one of Abraham's allies, in his expedition for the recovery of Lot. In (b) Mamre is an old name, either of Hebron or of a part of Hebron (cf. 23¹⁸ 35²⁷); in Gn 14²⁴ it is the name of a local sheik or chief (cf. v. 24), the owner of the terebinths called after him; in Gn 13¹⁸ 18¹ it is not clear whether it is the name of a person or of a place. The 'terebinths of Mamre' are the spot at which Abraham pitched his tent in Hebron. The site is uncertain, though, if the present mosque, on the N.E. edge of Hebron, is really built over the cave of Machpelah, and if 'before' has its usual topographical sense of 'east of,' it will have been to the W. of this, and at no great distance from it (for the terebinths are described as being 'in' Hebron, Gn 13¹⁸). From Josephus' time (BJ, iv. ix. 7) to the present day terebinths of oaks called by the name of Abraham have been shown at different spots near Hebron; but none has any real claim to mark the authentic site of the ancient 'Mamre.' The oak mentioned by Josephus was 6 stadia from the city; but he does not indicate in which direction it lay. Sozomen (HE ii. 4), in speaking of the 'Abraham's Oak' of Constantine's day (2 miles N. of Hebron), states that it was regarded as sacred, and that an annual fair and feast was held beside it, at which sacrifices were offered, and libations and other offerings cast into a well close by. Cf. OAK. S. R. DRIVER.

MAMUCHUS (1 Es 9³⁰) = Malluch, Ezr 10³⁹.

MAN.—The Bible is concerned with man only from the religious standpoint, with his relation to God. This article will deal only with the religious estimate of man, as other matters which might have been included will be found in other articles (CREATION, ESCHATOLOGY, FALL, SIN, PSYCHOLOGY). Man's dignity, as made by special resolve and distinct act of God in God's image and likeness (synonymous terms), with dominion over the other creatures, and for communion with God, as asserted in the double account of his Creation in Gn 1 and 2, and man's degradation by his own choice of evil, as presented figuratively in the story of his Fall in Gn 3, are the two aspects of man that are everywhere met with. The first is explicitly affirmed in Ps 8, an echo of Gn 1; the second, without any explicit reference to the story in Gn 3, is taken for granted in the OT (see esp. Ps 51), and is still more emphasized in the NT, with distinct allusion to the Fall and its consequences (see esp. Ro 5¹²⁻²¹ and 7¹⁻²⁵). While the OT recognizes man's relation to the world around him, his materiality and frailty as 'flesh' (wh. see), and describes him as 'dust and ashes' in comparison with God (Gn 2⁷ 3¹⁹ 18²⁷), yet as made in God's image it endows him with reason, conscience, affection, free will. Adam is capable of recognizing the qualities of, and so of naming, the living creatures (2¹⁹), cannot find a help meet among them (v. 20), is innocent (v. 2), and capable of moral obedience (v. 16 17) and religious communion (3⁹ 10). The Spirit of God is in man not only as life, but also as wisdom and understanding, counsel and might, skill and courage (see INSPIRATION). The Divine immanence in man as the Divine providence for man is affirmed (Pr 20²⁷).

In the NT man's dignity is represented as Divine sonship. In St. Luke's Gospel Adam is described as 'son of God' (3³⁸). St. Paul speaks of man as 'the image and glory of God' (1 Co 11⁷), approves the poet's words, 'we also are his offspring,' asserts the unity of the race, and God's guidance in its history (Ac 17²⁹⁻³⁰). In his argument in Romans regarding universal sinfulness, he assumes that even the Gentiles have the law of God written in their hearts, and thus can exercise moral judgment on themselves and others (2¹⁴). Jesus' testimony to the Fatherhood of God, including the care and bounty in Providence as well as the grace in Redemption, has as its counterpart His estimate of the absolute worth of the human soul (see Mt 10³⁰ 16²⁶, Lk 10³⁰ 15). While God's care and bounty are unlimited, yet Jesus does seem to limit the title 'child or son of God' to those who have religious fellowship and seek moral kinship with God (see Mt 5⁹ 44; cf. Jn 1¹²). St. Paul's doctrine of man's adoption by faith in God's grace does not contradict the teaching of Jesus. The writer of Hebrews sees the promise of man's dominion in Ps 8 fulfilled only in Christ (2⁶ 9). Man's history, according to the Fourth Evangelist, is consummated in the Incarnation (Jn 1¹⁴).

The Bible estimate of man's value is shown in its anticipation of his destiny—not merely continued existence, but a future life of weal or woe according to the moral quality, the relation to God, of the present life (see ESCHATOLOGY). The Biblical analysis of the nature of man is discussed in detail in art. PSYCHOLOGY.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

MAN OF SIN (or 'lawlessness').—Probably the equivalent in 2 Th 2¹⁰ of Antichrist (wh. see). According to the Pauline view, the Parousia would be preceded by an apostasy of believers and the appearance of the 'man of lawlessness,' who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God' (v.^{3f.}). The appearance of this evil one and his oppression of the believers were prevented by some force or person. In course of time, however, this restraint was to be removed. The wicked one would exercise his power until the Christ should come to destroy him (vv.⁶⁻⁸).

The precise references of this statement are beyond final discovery. It is, however, commonly believed that the reference is to some historical person, possibly the god-emperor of Rome. Such a reference is, however, very difficult if 2 Thess. was written by St. Paul, for at the time of its composition the Roman State had not become a persecutor. The 'one who restrains' is also difficult to identify if the 'man of lawlessness' be the Roman emperor. For that reason it may be best to refer the 'man of lawlessness' to the Jewish people or their expected Messiah, and 'he that restraineth' to the Roman power. This interpretation is supported by the fact that in his letters to the Thessalonians, St. Paul regards the Jews as persecutors, while throughout Acts the Roman State is presented as a protector of the Christians. This identification, however, does not satisfactorily explain the reference to 'sitting in the temple.' It is, therefore, probably better not to attempt a precise historical interpretation of either the 'man of lawlessness' or 'him that restraineth,' but to regard the former as a reference to the expected Antichrist, and the latter to some unidentified personal influence that led to the postponement of his appearance.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

MANAEN (=Menahem).—One of the Christian prophets and teachers at Antioch, and 'foster-brother' of Herod Antipas (Ac 13¹). Although individual non-official Christians prophesied (Ac 21¹⁰, 21⁹, 1 Co 14³¹), yet there was in NT a class of official prophets (Eph 2²⁰ 3⁵, Rev 18²⁰, perhaps 1 Th 2¹⁵); and so in the Didache (c. A.D. 120?) the prophets formed an official class above the local ministry. Manaen was clearly an official at Antioch. The phrase 'foster-brother of Herod' is thought by Deissmann to be a mere title of honour, like 'the king's friend' in 1 Ch 27¹, but more probably represents a literal fact. An older Manaen had been befriended by Herod the Great as having foretold his advancement; this one might be his grandson, brought up with Antipas. Another instance of the circle of Herod being reached by Christianity is Joanna, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (Lk 8³); and Antipas himself was touched by the Baptist's preaching (Mk 6³⁰).

A. J. MACLEAN.

MANAHATH.—1. Mentioned only in 1 Ch 8³ as the place to which certain Benjaminite clans were carried captive. The town is probably identical with that implied in Manahathites (wh. see), with the Manochd of the Gr. text of Jos 15²⁰, and if the text in Jg. is correct, with the Menuhah of Jg 20⁴ RVm. 2. Gn 36²³ (P), 1 Ch 1¹⁰ 'son of Shobal, son of Seir, the Horite,' i.e. eponymous ancestor of a clan of Edom, or of the earlier population conquered and absorbed by Edom.

MANAHATHITES (RV Menuhoth in 1 Ch 2²³), 1 Ch 2²⁴.—The genealogy in these two passages is to be interpreted as meaning that the city Manahath, occupied by portions of two sections of the Edomite clan Caleb, came to be reckoned to Judah.

MANASSEAS (1 Es 9²¹)—Manasseh, Ezr 10³⁰.

MANASSEH.—1. In MT and AV of Jg 18³⁰ Manasseh is a scribal change for dogmatic purposes, the original being Moses (see GERSHOM, 1). 2. A son of Pahath-moab (Ezr 10³⁰ [1 Es 9²¹ Manasseas]). 3. Son of Hashum (Ezr 10³³). 4. 5. See next two articles.

MANASSEH.—The firstborn son of Joseph, and full brother of Ephraim (Gn 41¹⁴). [E]. by Asenath, the daughter of Poti-phera, priest of On (v.¹⁸ [J]).

The popular etymology makes the name a Ptēl ptep. of the verb nāshāh, 'to forget.' Josephus (Ant. 11. vi. 1) adopts this without criticism, as do our Hebrew Lexicons. In the Assyrian inscriptions the name appears as Minsē, Menase. In Is 65¹ the god Meni (RV 'Destiny') is associated with Gad, the god of Fortune. Some scholars, consequently, equate Manasseh with Men-nasa = 'the god Men seized.' Apparently Manasseh succeeded in establishing friendly relations with the Canaanites at an early date. His name points to such influences' (Niebuhr, Gesch. d. Ebr. Zeit. p. 252; cf. Siegfried, 'Gad-Meni u. Gad-Manasse' in Ztschr. f. prot. Theol., 1875, p. 366 f.). Hogg, who in Ebi, s.v., discusses the name at length, appears to favour the participial form, but (following Land) connects it with the Arabic nāsā, 'to inflict an injury.' He thus brings it into relation with the story of Jacob's wrestling with the angel (Gn 32). 'It would appear,' so runs the conclusion, 'that in the original story the epithet Manasseh was a fitting title of Jacob himself, which might be borne by his worshippers as in the case of Gad.' But it is extremely unlikely that Jacob was originally regarded as a deity, as Luther (ZATW xxi. p. 68 ff.) also holds. The Babylonian form Ya'qub-ilu found in the contract tablets of the period of Hammurabi (23rd cent. B.C.) and Jacob-el (or -her) found on the scarab of an Egyptian king of the Hyksos period, is not to be translated 'Ya'kub is god.' As forms like Yakbar-ilu, Yamlik-ilu, etc., render probable, ilu is subject. Nevertheless, there may have been some original connexion between Manasseh and Jacob. Jacob's name, we are told, was afterwards changed to Israel, and Manasseh is said to have been the elder brother of Ephraim, the name which later became almost synonymous with Israel, and, finally, in Jg 17²⁷ Manasseh and Israel appear to be used as equivalents. But where no better data are obtainable, we must confess ignorance as frankly as we reject the etymologizing tales of our sources.

In our oldest source bearing upon the early tribal settlement (Jg 5) the name of Manasseh does not appear, though that of Ephraim does. Machir there (v.¹⁴) seems to take the place of Manasseh. In Gn 50²³ (E) he is the only son of Manasseh; so also Nu 26²⁹. 4 (P), but in Jos 17¹⁴ (perh. J) he is the firstborn of Manasseh. In Nu 32³⁹. 41. 42 (v.⁴⁰ is not original) we have an excerpt from JE added to P's story of Reuben's and Gad's settlement on the East Jordan, which tells us that the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, went to Gilead and took it. Jair, it is said, and Nobah, two other descendants of Manasseh, also took towns in Gilead, to which they gave their own names. But, according to Dt 3³, Moses, after completely exterminating the inhabitants, gave North Gilead, all Bashan, and Argob 'to the half tribe of Manasseh'; cf. Jos 13²⁶. 4 etc. In P's account of the settlement of Reuben and Gad (Nu 32) there was nothing said originally of this half-tribe being associated with them. The whole story is told before the Manassites are brought in in v.³³ (cf. Jos 13²⁵. and ch. 17). The story of their early settlement on the East side is discredited by many scholars, who hold that the East was later conquered from the West. As we have seen in Jg 5¹, where Machir takes the place of Manasseh, he appears to be in possession on the West; and Machir, the son of Manasseh, is said to have gone to Gilead and taken it (Nu 32³⁹), and if so, he must have operated from his original seat. In Jos 17¹⁴⁻¹⁸ we read of the complaint of the 'children of Joseph' to Joshua that he had given them ('him') only one lot, despite the fact that he was a great people. Nothing is said about any previous allotment by Moses on the East. Further, in Nu 32⁴¹ Bashan is conquered by Jair, who, according to Jg 10⁴, was a judge of Israel. The argument is strong but not cogent.

As we have already seen, the tribe on the West was represented by Machir (Jg 5). J., the next oldest document, includes Ephraim and Manasseh in the phrase 'sons of Joseph' (Jos 16¹⁻⁴), 'house of Joseph' (17¹⁷ ['Ephr. and Man.' is a gloss] 18¹, Jg 12²³⁻²⁵). One lot only is consequently assigned to them, the limits of which are roughly sketched in Jos 16¹⁻⁴. Jos 17 gives Gilead and Bashan to Machir (making no mention of Jair and Nobah), and v. 2 begins to tell of the assignments to the remainder of the Manassite clans, but fails to do so. But the 'clan' names, Abiezer, Shechem, and the names of the cities appended show that they were on the West. It is clear from what is said of the cities which were in Issachar and Asher (v. 11²) that they were only ideally in Manasseh's territory, and that the latter was confined on the north to the hill-country. Like the rest of the tribes, they 'were not able to drive out the Canaanites.' When they made their complaint to Joshua (vv. 14-18) that they were too cramped in their abode to better themselves, he sentimentally replied that being a great people as they boasted, they could clear out the mountain forests and develop in that way, and so ultimately get the upper hand of the Canaanites in the plains. It should be said that the names of the rest of the sons of Manasseh, Abiezer, Helek, Asriel, Shechem, Hephher, Shemida, as well as the five daughters of Zelophehad, the great-grandson of Machir, are probably all place-names, as some of them certainly are, and not personal names.

Whether Joseph was a tribe has been doubted, because there is no mention of it in Jg 5, and the fact that the name Machir appears to be from the root māchar, 'to sell,' has raised the question whether the story of Joseph's sale into Egypt did not arise in connexion with it.

For the clans see Jos 17¹⁵⁻² (J), Nu 26²⁸⁻³⁴ (P), 1 Ch 7¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 22¹⁻².

The tribe, owing to its situation, had much to endure during the Syrian wars (Am 1³, 2 K 10³³), and, according to 1 Ch 5²⁶, the eastern half was deported (B.C. 743) by Tiglath-pileser III. (see GAD). See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

JAMES A. CRAIG.

MANASSEH, son of Hezekiah, reigned longer than any king of his line—fifty-five years, according to our sources (2 K 21¹). His reign was remarkable for the religious reaction against the reforms which had been made by Hezekiah. The record (vv. 2¹⁻⁹) is that he built again the altars which Hezekiah had destroyed, and erected altars for Baal, and made an asherah, as Ahab king of Israel had done, and that he worshipped the host of heaven and served them. In restoring the old altars he doubtless thought he was returning to the early religion of the nation, and the Baal whom he worshipped was probably identified in the minds of the people with the national God Jahweh. The asherah was a well-known accompaniment of the altars of Jahweh down to the time of Hezekiah. In all this Manasseh's measures may be called conservative, while his worship of the 'host of heaven' was no doubt a State necessity owing to the Assyrian rule. The sacrifice of his son and the practice of witchcraft and magic, of which he is accused, were also sanctioned by ancient Israelitish custom. The reaction was accompanied by active persecution of the prophetic party, which can hardly surprise us, toleration being an unknown virtue. On account of these sins, Manasseh is represented by later writers as the man who filled the cup of Judah's iniquity to overflowing, and who thus made the final catastrophe of the nation inevitable.

H. P. SMITH.

MANASSEH.—1. 1 Es 9²³ = Manasseh, No. 3 (Ezr 10²³). 2. Judith's husband (Jth 8²). 3. An unknown person mentioned in the dying words of Tobit (To 14¹⁰). 4. For 'Prayer of Manasses' see APOCRYPHA, § 11.

MANDRAKE (dadd'm, Gn 30¹⁴, Ca 7¹³; RVm 'love apples,' cf. root dadd'm, 'love').—Although other plants have been suggested, the mandrake (Mandragora officinaria), of the Solanaceae or Potato order, is most probable. It is a common plant in all parts of S. Palestine. Its long and branched root is very deeply imbedded in the earth, and an old superstition survives to-day that he who digs it up will be childless—but at the same time the effort of pulling it up will cure a bad lumbo. When the last fibres give way and the root comes up, a semi-human scream is supposed to be emitted (cf. also Jos. BJ vii. vi. 3). Occasionally the root resembles a human figure, but most of those exhibited have been 'doctored' to heighten the resemblance. The leaves are dark green, arranged in a rosette, and the flowers dark purple. The fruit, which ripens about May, about the time of the wheat harvest, is somewhat like a small tomato, and orange or reddish in colour: it is called by the natives baid el-jinn, 'the eggs of the jinn.' It has a heavy narcotic smell and sweetish taste. It is still used medicinally, but is known to be poisonous, especially the seeds. The mandrake was known to the ancients as an aphrodisiac (see p. 569^b).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MANEH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, III.

MANES.—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives (1 Es 9²¹ [Ezr 10²¹ Maasseiah]).

MANGER (Lk 27. 12. 16 13¹⁵ RVm).—EV tr. of phalnē, the LXX equivalent of Heb. 'būs, 'a place where cattle are fattened' (Job 39² etc.). It also represents 'urwāh (2 Ch 32²⁹), and repheth (Hab 3¹⁷), EV stall. In Job 39², Pr 14¹ 'būs may mean the stall or shelter; in Is 1¹ it is probably the crib in which the food was placed. A like ambiguity attaches to 'urwāh or 'uryāh (2 Ch 32²⁸), lit. 'collecting place' or 'collected herd.' It probably came to mean a certain number of animals, as 'a pair' or 'team' (1 K 4²⁸, 2 Ch 9²⁵) [Gesenius]. The Heb. repheth (Hab 3¹⁷) clearly means 'stall'; marbēq is the place where the cattle are 'tied up' (1 S 28²⁴ 'fatted calf' = 'calf of the stall,' Jer 46²¹, Am 6⁴, Mal 4³); phalnē may therefore denote either the 'manger' or the 'stall.'

If kataluma (Lk 27) means 'guest chamber' (see art. HOSPITALITY, ad fin.), Joseph and Mary may have moved into the side of the house occupied by the cattle, from which the living-room is distinguished by a higher floor, with a little hollow in the edge, out of which the cattle eat. The present writer has seen a child laid in such a 'manger.' Or, in the crowded kān, only the animals' quarters may have afforded shelter. We do not now know. Ancient tradition places Jesus' birth in a cave near Bethlehem. Caves under the houses are extensively used in Palestine as stables. The midwād, 'manger,' cut in the side, is an excellent 'crib' for a baby.

W. EWING.

MANI (1 Es 9²⁰) = Bani of Ezr 10²⁰ and 1 Es 5¹².

MANIUS.—According to 2 Mac 11²⁴, Titus Manius was one of two Roman legates who, being on their way to Antioch after the campaign of Lysias against Judaea in the year B.C. 163, sent a letter to the Jews confirming the concessions of Lysias, and offering to undertake the charge of their interests at Antioch in concert with their own envoy. This action would be in accord with the policy the Romans were following towards the Syrian kingdom, and is probable enough. But we have no knowledge from any other source of the presence in the East of any legate called Titus Manius.

A. E. HILLARD.

MANNA.—The food of the Israelites during the wanderings (Ex 16¹⁻⁵, Jos 5¹²), but not the only food available. Documents of various dates speak of (a) cattle (Ex 17³ 19¹³ 34³, Nu 7³ 9¹), especially in connexion with sacrifice (Ex 24⁵ 32², Lv 8² 24⁵, 9⁴ 10⁴, Nu 7¹⁷); (b) flour (Nu 7¹³ 19¹³, etc., Lv 10¹³ 24⁵); (c) food in general (Dt 2², Jos 11¹).

1. The origin of the word is uncertain. In Ex 16⁴ the exclamation might be rendered, 'It is māni!' (note RvM). If so, the Israelites were reminded (but only vaguely, see v.¹⁴) of some known substance. The similar Arabic word means 'gift.' More probably the words are a question—'What is it?' Unaware of the proper term, they thus spoke of manna as 'the-what-is-it.'

2. The manna was flaky, small, and white (Ex 16¹⁴). It resembled the 'seed' (better 'fruit') of the coriander plant (Ex 16³¹, Nu 11⁷), and suggested bdellium (Nu 11⁷ [see § 3]). It could be ground, and was stewed or baked (Ex 16²⁹, Nu 11⁸). The taste is compared to that of honey-wafers (Ex 16³¹), or oil (Nu 11⁸). It was gathered fresh every morning early (but see § 4), for, if exposed to the sun, it melted (Ex 16²¹; cf. Wis 19²); if kept overnight (see § 4), it went bad (Ex 16¹⁹). Each person was entitled to a measured 'omer of manna (Ex 16¹⁹).

3. Many would identify manna with the juice of certain trees. The flowering ash (S. Europe) exudes a 'manna' (used in medicine); and a species of tamarisk found in the Sinai peninsula yields a substance containing sugar. The description of manna would not in every point support such an identification, but it is worth noting that manna is likened (see § 2) to bdellium, which is a resinous exudation. A more recent theory is that manna was an edible lichen like that found in Arabia, etc.

4. Manna would thus come under the category of 'special providences,' not 'miracles.' There can, however, be no doubt that the Biblical writers regarded it as miraculous. (a) There is enough for a host of '600,000 footmen.' (b) The quantity gathered proves exactly suited to the consumer's appetite (Ex 16¹⁸). (c) The Sabbath supply (gathered the previous day) retains its freshness (Ex 16²³). (d) An 'omer of it is kept as a sacred object near (Ex 16²³) but not within (1 K 8⁹; cf. He 9⁴, Rev 21⁷) the ark. (e) Allusions to it suggest the supernatural (Neh 9²⁰, Ps 78²⁴, 105⁴⁰, 2 Es 1¹⁹, Wis 16²⁰ 19²).

5. All this must lend significance to NT mention. Christ as the living bread is typified by manna (Jn 6³¹, 1 Co 10³; cf. 4); and secret spiritual sustenance is the reward for 'him that overcometh' (Rev 21⁷).

H. F. B. COMPTON.

MANOAH.—The father of Samson, of the town of Zorah, and of the family of the Danites (Jg 13²⁻²³ 14², 5, 6, 9, 10 16²¹). We learn but little of his character and occupation from the Bible narrative. He was a worshipper of Jehovah, and a man of reverent piety; he was hospitable, like his ancestor Abraham; he shared the dislike of his people for the alien surrounding tribes, and strongly deprecated an alliance between his son and the Philistines. The second narrative gives us the following information about him. His wife was barren, but she was warned by a Divine messenger that she was destined to bear a son who was to be a Nazirite and dedicated to Jehovah. The messenger appeared again when Manoah also was present, and repeated his prophecy (Jg 13²⁻²³). We hear of Manoah on four more occasions: we find him remonstrating with his son about the proposed Philistine marriage (14², 4); he accompanied his son on the preliminary visit to Timnah (vv.⁵, 6), and again to the marriage itself (vv.⁹, 10). He did not survive his son, who was buried by his side (16³¹). Cf. art. SAMSON.

These scanty details are somewhat amplified by Josephus (Ant. v. viii. 2, 3), who was apparently following some ancient Jewish tradition. T. A. MOXON.

MANSION.—The English word occurs in Scripture only in Jn 14², 'In my Father's house are many mansions' (RVm 'Or, abiding places'). Its retention is an archaism, for the modern connotation of a house of some dignity is quite lacking from the word as used by Tindale (1525), apparently from the Vulg. manstones, 'abiding places.' The Gr. word (monē), like the Latin, means (1) the act of abiding, (2) a place of abode. In the NT it occurs also in Jn 14²³, where 'make our abode' is Greek idiom for 'abide.' Hence the thought in Jn 14² is simply that there is ample room for the disciples in the Father's house. In the LXX the Gr. word occurs only once, viz. 1 Mac 7²⁴, 'give them no abiding place' (RV 'suffer them not to live any longer'). S. W. GREEN.

MAOCH.—The father of Achish king of Gath (1 S 27¹) He is probably to be identified with Maacah No. 3

MAON, MAONITES.—1. In Jg 10¹² the Maonites are mentioned together with the Zidonians and Amalekites as having oppressed Israel. They dwelt in Mt. Seir, south of the Dead Sea. According to 1 Ch 4¹¹, the Maonites (called Meunim in this passage) were, in the reign of Hezekiah, driven out of their pasture land by the Simeonites. The passage is interesting as showing how long the original Canaanites held their own in the land after the Israelite invasion. In 2 Ch 26⁷ they are mentioned as having been overcome by Uzziah (cf. 2 Ch 20¹, where 'Ammonites' should probably be 'Meunim').

2. A different place of the name of Maon is mentioned in Jos 15⁴⁸; this was a small town in the hill-country of Judæa. It was in the 'wilderness' of Maon that Nabal dwelt (1 S 25²), and in this district David sojourned on two occasions during the period of his outlaw life (23³⁴, 25²²). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

MARA.—The name which Naomi claimed for herself. 'Call me not Naomi ('pleasant'), call me Mara (i.e. 'bitter'); for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me' (Ru 1²⁰).

MARAH.—The first 'station' of the Israelites after crossing the sea (Ex 15²⁷, Nu 33⁸). If the passage was in the neighbourhood of Suez, Wady Hawarah, about 15 to 16 hours' camel-ride from 'the Wells of Moses' (nearly opposite Suez on the E. side of the Gulf of Suez) on the route to the convent of St. Katherine (the traditional Sinai), is a suitable identification.

MARALAH.—A place on the west border of Zebulun (Jos 19¹¹). The site is quite uncertain.

MARANATHA.—An Aram. expression which occurs in 1 Co 16²² in juxtaposition with 'anathema' ('If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema. Maran atha' [so RV]).

1. Meaning of the term.—The original meaning of the term has been disputed, but it is now generally agreed that it is a component of two distinct words (cf. RV above). Most moderns follow Bickell in holding that the two parts of which the expression is composed mean 'Our Lord, come!' (= Aram. mārand thā). This seems preferable to the older view, according to which the meaning would be 'Our Lord has come!' (= Aram. māran 'athā). The imperative sense is made probable by Rev 22²⁰ ('Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!'), from which it may perhaps be inferred that some such formula as 'O our Lord, or O Lord, come!' was in use in early Christian circles. A very early instance of the use of the term occurs in the Didache at the end of the Eucharistic prayer (ch. 10).

The passage runs as follows:—

'Let grace come, and this world pass away.
Hosanna to the God of David.

If any is holy, let him come: if any is not, let him repent.
Maranatha. Amen.'

Here the combination maranatha. Amen (= 'O our Lord, come! Amen') is strikingly parallel with the remarkable phrase in Rev 22²⁰ ('Amen. Come, Lord'). It is noticeable also that in both passages the expression is used as a concluding formula. Whether any similar formula was in use among the Jews is disputed. An old Jewish acrostic hymn, still extant in all types of the Jewish liturgy, the initial letters of the lines of which may be read 'Amen. Come' (Heb. āmēn bō) at least suggests the possibility of such a usage.

2. Original significance of the expression.—It is clear from the passage in the Didache cited above that 'maranatha' cannot be regarded as a formula of excommunication synonymous with 'anathema' (so Calvin, comparing 'Abba, Father'). It was rather a watchword of the earliest Christian community, embodying the thought in the form of a prayer that the 'Parousia,' or Second Advent of the Lord, might soon be consummated, in accordance with the ardent expectations current in the first generation.

3. Later usage.—In later usage, under the influence of false exegesis, the term acquired an imprecatory sense. It thus occurs in an early sepulchral inscription (4th or 5th cent.) from the island of Salamis. Its supposed correspondence with the Jewish shammatha (the 3rd or highest degree of excommunication) has, of course, nothing to substantiate it. Further details of this development will be found in Hastings' DB, s.v. 'Maranatha.' G. H. BOX.

MARESHAH.—1. The 'father' of Hebron (1 Ch 2²⁰). 2. A Judahite (1 Ch 4²). These genealogical data are really concerned with—3. An important city in the Shephelah of Judah (Jos 15⁴), fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁸; see also 2 Ch 14⁹ 10 20³⁷, Mic 1¹⁸). Later on, under the name Marissa, Josephus describes (Ant. xii. viii. 6 etc.) its extremely chequered history. The site of Maresah has now with certainty been identified as Tell Sandahanna. This tell was partially excavated by Bliss and Macalister, but the identity of the site was finally demonstrated by the finding, in 1902, of a tomb by Messrs. Peters and Tiersch, adorned with a number of interesting pictured animals, etc., and about 200 inscriptions recording the names of many Phœnician inhabitants of Marissa, about B.C. 200. The hill on which the ruins of Maresah stand is riddled with the most extraordinary caves, once human dwellings. The old name Maresah still lingers in Khurbit Merash, the name of some ruins about half a mile off. See also MARISA.

MARK (JOHN).—There are three groups of NT passages where the name Mark occurs.

(1) John Mark was a Jew and son of Mary, who was a leading Christian woman at Jerusalem. At her house the faithful assembled for prayer, and thither Peter went on his release from imprisonment, having perhaps previously lodged there (Ac 12¹²). An improbable conjecture makes Mark the son of the 'goodman of the house' in Mk 14⁴, and another, not so unlikely, identifies Mark himself with the 'young man' of Mk 14⁴; but the Muratorian Fragment (see next art. § 1) apparently denied that Mark had ever seen our Lord. Probably Mary was a widow. 'Mark' would be an added name such as the Jews often took, in Roman fashion; it was a Roman prænomen, much used among Greek-speaking people, but not common among the Jews. John Mark was chosen as companion of Barnabas and Saul when they left Jerusalem for Antioch (Ac 12²⁵—the reading of RVm is hardly possible), and taken by them on their first missionary journey (13⁶), not as chosen expressly by the Holy Ghost (ct. v. 2), and not as an equal; 'they had also John as their attendant (AV minister).' It has been suggested that Mark was a Levite (see below), and that the designation here used means 'a synagogue minister,' as in Lk 4²⁰ (Chase). But this would make the words 'they had' intolerably harsh. Probably Mark's work was to arrange the Apostles' journeys, perhaps also to baptize—a work not usually performed by St. Paul himself (1 Co 1¹⁴). Mark remained with the Apostles on their journey through Cyprus, but left them at Perga in Pamphylia (Ac 13¹³) either from cowardice, or, more probably, because the journey to Pisidian Antioch and beyond, involving work among distant Gentiles, was a change of plan which he did not approve (Ramsay). He had not yet grasped the idea of a worldwide Christianity, as St. Paul had. His departure to Jerusalem led later to the estrangement of Paul and Barnabas; the latter wished to take Mark with them on the Second Journey (15³⁷), but Paul refused, and separated from Barnabas, who then took Mark to Cyprus.

(2) The Mark of the Pauline Epistles was cousin of Barnabas (Col 4¹⁰ RV), probably of the Jewish colony of Cyprus, and a Levite (Ac 4³⁶). It is therefore generally agreed that he was the same as John Mark. If so, he became reconciled to St. Paul, and was his 'fellow-worker' and a 'comfort' to him (Col 4¹¹, Philm 24), and useful to him 'for ministering' (2 Ti 4¹¹)—this was Mark's special office, not to be an original organizer but a useful assistant (Swete). We learn that Mark was contemplating a visit to Colossæ, and perhaps that the Colossians had hesitated to receive him (Col 4¹⁰).

(3) The Petrine Mark.—St. Peter speaks of a Mark as his 'son' (1 P 5¹³), and as being with him at 'Babylon' when he wrote the First Epistle. It is usually held that 'Babylon' means Rome, as there seems not to have been a Jewish colony in the real Babylon at the time, and as all ecclesiastical tradition connects St. Peter's work with Rome. If this be so, we may safely identify all the three Marks as one person. [If not, the Petrine Mark is probably not the same as the Pauline.] The identification is made more likely by the fact that John Mark is connected with both Peter and Paul in Acts; and if 1 P 5¹³ refers to Rome, there is no reason why this double connexion should not have continued as long as both Apostles lived. And if, as is not impossible, St. Peter survived St. Paul for some time, we can well understand that Mark devoted himself exclusively to the former after the death of the latter, and that in this way the ecclesiastical tradition (see next art.), which almost unanimously attaches him to Peter, grew up. By that tradition Mark's activity is associated both with Rome and with Alexandria; and the Egyptian Church assigns its principal liturgy to his name. But the early Alexandrian Fathers, Clement and Origen, are silent as to Mark's residence in Egypt. The Acts of Mark (5th cent.?) makes him a martyr. A. J. MACLEAN.

MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—1. External testimony.—It is possible that the first reference to Mk. is the preface to Lk. (1¹⁻⁴), which implies that the narratives spoken of were, in St. Luke's opinion, incomplete and not in the best order. Mk. is certainly incomplete from the point of view of one who wished to begin 'from the beginning.' From internal evidence it is probable that St. Luke used Mk. (see §§ 3-5). Papias (quoted by Eusebius, HE iii. 39) gives the following account (c. A.D. 140 or earlier), as derived from 'the Elder' from whom he gleaned traditions:

'Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately everything that he remembered, without, however, recording in order what was either said or done by Christ [cf. the Lukan preface]. For neither did he hear the Lord, nor did he follow Him, but afterwards, as I said, (attended) Peter, who adapted his instructions to the needs (of his hearers), but had no design of giving a connected account of the Lord's oracles [or words]. So then Mark made no mistake while he thus wrote down some things as he remembered them; for he made it his one care not to omit anything that he heard, nor to set down any false statement therein.'

Here Papias vindicates Mark from inaccuracy and from errors of omission as far as his knowledge went, but finds fault with his chronological order, which was due to his being dependent only on Peter's oral teaching. He was Peter's 'interpreter'—a phrase which may mean that he translated Peter's words into a foreign tongue during the Apostle's lifetime, as a dragoman, or that, being Peter's disciple, he made the Apostle's teaching widely known through his written Gospel.—Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150) says (Dial. 106) that Christ changed Simon's name to Peter, and that this is written 'in his Memoirs,' and also that He changed the name of the sons of Zebedee to 'Boanerges, which is Sons of Thunder.' But the last words occur only in Mk 3¹⁷, where also we read of Simon's new name. It is reasonable (in spite of Harnack and Sanday's opinion that Justin is here quoting the apocryphal Gospel of pseudo-Peter, which, as far as we know, did not contain these words—it is only a fragment) to suppose that Justin by Peter's 'Memoirs' means our Second Gospel; he elsewhere speaks of 'Memoirs'—'the Memoirs composed by [the Apostles] which are called Gospels' (Apol. I. 66, cf. also Dial. 103, where he uses the same name for the narratives written by followers of the Apostles).—Tatian included Mk. in his Diatessaron, or Harmony of the four Gospels.—Irenaeus (Har. iii. 1. 1 and 10. 6) speaks of Mark as 'Peter's interpreter and disciple' (cf. Papias), and says that he handed on to us in writing the things preached by Peter after the departure of Peter and Paul (note the indication of date).—Tertullian calls Mark 'Peter's interpreter.'—The Muratorian Fragment (c. 170–200?) begins in the middle of a sentence which is generally believed to refer to Mk., and which may mean that the Evangelist was present at some of Peter's discourses only, or perhaps that he heard some of our Lord's discourses; but the latter interpretation is against the words that follow, which say of Luke: 'Neither did he himself see the Lord in the flesh.' The writer probably therefore had said that Mark had never seen our Lord.—Clement of Alexandria (c. A.D. 200) says that while Peter was preaching the Gospel at Rome (cf. Irenaeus above), Mark wrote down what he said at the request of the hearers, Peter neither forbidding it nor urging it.—Origen seems to bear this out, but in the Muratorian Fragment there is a similar story about John.—Of later writers only Augustine need be quoted. He calls Mark 'Matthew's follower and abbreviator.' This saying, which is probably widely removed from the truth, has had great influence on ecclesiastical opinion, and to a great extent brought about the comparative neglect into which the Second Gospel fell for many centuries.—There are probable allusions to Mk. in Polycarp (c. A.D. 111) and pseudo-Clement of Rome ('2 Clem. ad Cor.'). and Hermas, all early in the 2nd cent.; it was used by Heracleon, the Valentinians, and the authors of the Gospel of (pseudo-) Peter and the Clementine Homilies, and is found in all the old versions. We conclude that there is valid evidence that Mk. was in circulation before the middle of the 2nd century. By ecclesiastical writers Mark is connected almost uniformly with Peter, but (see above) there is a difference of tradition as to whether he wrote before or after Peter's death. Some make him go from Rome to Alexandria and take his Gospel there; but it is remarkable that the Alexandrian Fathers Clement and Origen do not mention this.

2. The Second Gospel and the 'Petrine tradition.'—Internal evidence to a considerable extent confirms, however indirectly, the Patristic evidence (§ 1) that Mark wrote down the preaching of Peter. Mk. tells us the facts of which Peter was an eye-witness. The vividness of description (especially in Mk.) in the scenes common to the Synoptics where only Peter, John, and James were present, suggests that one of them was the authority on which the common source rests—such as the raising of Jairus' daughter (5³⁷⁻⁴²), the Transfiguration (9²⁻¹³); the story in Mk. is told from the point of view of one of the three: cf. 9¹⁴ 'they saw'), and Gethsemane (14³³⁻⁴²). The authority could hardly be James, who was martyred early (Ac 12²), or John, on whom another account depends (even if he were not the author of the Fourth Gospel, we might probably say this). Peter therefore remains, and he alone would be likely to remember the confused words which he spoke on awakening at the Transfiguration (9²; cf. Lk 9^{22f.}). Other passages suggesting a Petrine source are: Mk 1³⁶ 11²¹ 13³ (these are found only in Mk.); and the accounts of Peter's denials (14⁶⁴⁻⁶⁶⁻⁷²). As Eusebius noticed, Mk. is silent on matters which reflect credit on Peter. These facts and the autotypic character of the Gospel (§ 4) lead us to the conclusion that we have in Mk. the 'Petrine tradition' in a far more exact form than in the other Synoptics.

3. Presentation of Christ's Person and work.—The Second Gospel describes shortly the Baptist's preaching and the baptism of our Lord, and then records at length the Galilean ministry. It is noteworthy that in this account the proclamation of Jesus' Messiahship in Galilee is very gradual (see art. GOSPELS, § 3). Even in the discourses to the Apostles there is great reserve. After the Transfiguration, the future glory and the Passion of our Lord are unfolded (8³¹. 28 9¹². 31 etc.), but it is only after the short account (ch. 10) of the journeys in Judæa and Peræa, and on the final approach to Jerusalem, that this reserve passes away. In describing our Lord's Person, the Evangelist lays great emphasis on His Divinity, but still more on His true humanity. (a) For the former we note how in Mk. Jesus claims superhuman authority, especially to forgive sins (2^{28f.}. 28 8³⁸ 12^{28f.} 14⁶²); He is described as a Supernatural Person (11¹⁹. 24 31¹ 5⁷ 9⁷ 15²⁹); He knows the thoughts of man (2⁸ 8¹⁷ 12¹⁵), and what is to happen in the future (2²⁰ 8³¹. 28 9³¹ 10³⁹ 13². 10 14²⁷); His death has an atoning efficacy (10⁴⁵ 14²⁴). (b) For the latter we note not only (as with the other Evangelists) the references to Jesus' human body—weariness and sleep (4²⁸), eating and drinking (14² 15³⁶), etc.—but especially the description of His human soul and spirit (2⁸ 14³⁴. 35). His human compassion (14¹) and love (10²¹), and the more painful emotions which Mk. has in a pre-eminent degree, while in the parallels in Mt. and Lk. the phrases are almost uniformly altered or omitted. Instances are 1⁴⁰ RvM (the word denotes sternness, not necessarily anger but deep feeling), 3⁶ 6⁸ 10¹⁴; note especially 14^{33f.} where St. Mark alone speaks of the surprise, added to the distraction from grief, of Jesus' human soul in the Agony. St. Mark also refers to the sinless limitations of Jesus' human nature. Questions are asked, apparently for information (5³⁰ 8⁴ 9¹⁶). St. Mark relates the one perfectly certain instance of Jesus' human ignorance, as to the Day of Judgment (13³², so || Mt.). It is because so much stress is laid in Mk. on the true humanity of our Lord that Augustine assigns to the Second Evangelist the symbol of the man; by other Fathers the other Evangelic symbols are assigned to him. The Second Gospel represents an early stage of the Gospel narrative; it shows an almost childlike boldness in speaking of our Lord, without regard to possible misconceptions. An example of this is seen in passages where Mark tells us that Jesus could not' do a thing (1^a 6^b 7^a). The inability is doubtless relative and conditional. Jesus 'could not' do that which was inconsistent with His plan of salvation. Yet here the other Synoptists, feeling that the phrase might be misunderstood as taking from the Master's glory, have altered or omitted it.

4. Autoptic character.—Whereas Mk. was for centuries depreciated as telling us little that is not found in the other Gospels, we have now learned to see in it a priceless presentation of the story of our Lord's life, inasmuch as no historical narrative in the Bible, except Jn., gives such clear signs of first-hand knowledge. Many of the instances lose much point in a translation, but even in English the fact is noticeable. An eye-witness is betrayed in such little details as the heavens 'in the act of opening' (11^a—the present participle is used), the incoherent remarks of the crowd at the healing of the Capernaum demoniac (12^a RV—they are softened down by later scribes of Mk. and in Lk.), the breaking up of the mud roof in 2^a (see art. LUKE [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 6), the single pillow, probably a wooden head-rest, in the boat (4^a RV), the five thousand arranged on the green grass 'like garden beds' (6^a; this is the literal translation; the coloured dresses on the 'green grass'—another autoptic touch—had to the eye-witness the appearance of flowers), the taking of the children by Jesus into His arms (9^a 10^a), and His fervent blessing (10^a; this is the force of the Greek), the searching glance of love cast by Jesus on the rich young man, and the clouding over of the young man's brow (10^a RV). All these details, and many others, are found in Mk. only; many of the signs of an eye-witness throughout the Gospel are removed by the alterations introduced in Mt. and Lk. For the vividness of the scenes at the Transfiguration, the raising of Jairus' daughter, and the Agony, see § 2. Notice also the evidence of exceptional knowledge of facts in 1^a (Andrew and Peter living together, though the latter was married; Andrew omitted in || Mt. Lk.), and in the mention of some names not found elsewhere (2^a 10^a 15^a). We have then an eye-witness here; in this case we need not look for him in the writer, but the facts show that the latter was in the closest touch with one who had seen what is described.

5. Comparison with the other Synoptics.—The facts which follow appear to prove that Mk., either in the form in which we have it, or at least in a form very closely resembling our present Gospel, was before the other Synoptists when they wrote. (a) Scope.—Except about 30 verses, all the narrative of Mk. is found in either Mt. or Lk. or in both, and (especially as regards Lk.) in nearly the same order; though the other Synoptists interpolate matter from other sources. (b) Parallel passages.—If we compare these, we see that though Mk. is as a whole shorter than Mt. and Lk., yet in the parallels it is longer. St. Mark's style is diffuse, and it was necessary for the other Synoptists, in order to make room for the matter which they were to introduce from other sources, to prune Mk. considerably. (c) Correction of Markan details in Mt. and Lk.—As we have seen, Mark describes our Lord's painful emotions; these passages are softened down in Mt. and Lk. Sometimes a slip of the pen is corrected; e.g. Mk 12^a RV quotes as from Isaiah a passage which is a cento of Mal 3^a, Is 40^a, but the others silently avoid this by omitting the Malachi passage here, though they give it elsewhere (Mt 11^a, Lk 7^a); the words in Mk 2^a RV, 'when Abiathar was high priest,' are omitted in Mt. and Lk., for Abiathar was not yet high priest at the time in question. The alteration of 'abomination of desolation' (Mk 13^a, so Mt 24^a) into 'Jerusalem compassed with armies' (Lk 21^a) is clearly an explanation of a writer later than Mk.; and so the change from 'Son of God' (Mk 15^a, so Mt 27^a) to 'a righteous man' (Lk 23^a). In some cases, by the turn of a phrase the accuracy of Mk. in minute points is lost by the other Synoptists. Thus cf. Mk. 4^a; our Lord was already in the boat (4^a); in || Mt. Lk. He is described by an oversight as embarking here. In Mk 10^a Jesus comes 'into the borders of Judæa and beyond Jordan'; the parallel Mt 19^a omits 'and,' but doubtless Mk. is right here, and Jesus went both into Judæa and into Perea. But the most striking corrections of Mk. in Mt. Lk. are found in the phraseology. The Markan style is rough and unpolished, reflecting the Greek commonly spoken by the Jews of the 1st cent.; many diminutives and colloquialisms are found, but are usually corrected in Mt. or in Lk. or in both. In Mk. there are many awkward and difficult phrases—sometimes smoothed over in a translation like ours, and usually corrected in Mt. or Lk. or both: e.g. 3^a 4^a 7^a (see Lk. 8^a) 4^a 12^a (the 'yet' of RV is 'and' in Gr.) 7^a (grammatical but harsh) 9^a 13^a 14^a (note RV in these cases). These facts are most significant, and appear to be conclusive as to the priority of Mk. For no writer having before him a smooth text would gratuitously introduce harsh or difficult phraseology, whereas the converse change is natural and common.

There are also some changes made for greater precision, especially in Lk.; thus in Mk. (e.g. 1^a) and Mt. we read of the 'Sea' of Galilee, but St. Luke with his superior nautical knowledge calls it a 'lake'; Herod Antipas in Mk 6^a is called 'king,' but in Mt. Lk. more commonly 'tetrarch' ('king' is retained in Mt. 14^a); in Mk 15^a (so Mt.) we read that 'they that were crucified with him reproached him,' but St. Luke, who had independent knowledge of this incident (for only he relates the penitence of the robber), emphatically corrects this to 'one of the malefactors' (Lk 23^a).—In two or three cases it is possible that the priority lies the other way. Thus in Mk 6^a 'the carpenter'—Mt 13^a 'the son of the carpenter'—Lk 4^a 'the son of Joseph,' the correction may be in Mt. Lk., the giving of the name 'the carpenter' to Jesus not being liked; or it may be in Mk., the phrase 'son of Joseph' being altered as capable of misconception by those who had not the Birth story before them. But as the phrases in Mt. and Lk. are not the same, the priority probably lies with Mk. Also the Second Evangelist alone relates the two cock-crowings (14^a 15^a 72), though the state of the text suggests that perhaps originally only one was mentioned in Mk., but in a different place from that of Mt. Lk. It is hard to see why a later writer should have omitted one cock-crowing and it is suggested that therefore our Mk. is later than Mt. Lk. in this respect. It is, however, equally hard to see why St. Mark, if he wrote after the others, should have added a cock-crowing. If in two or three such cases the priority be decided to lie with Mt. and Lk., the meaning would be that our Mk. had received some editorial additions (see § 9). But this does not seem to be very likely.

The general conclusion is that Mk. as we have it now, or at least a Gospel which differs from our Mk. only in unessential particulars, lay before the First and Third Evangelists when they wrote.

The matter peculiar to Mk. is small:—the parable of the seed growing silently (4^a), the healing of the deaf stammerer (7^a), of the blind man at Bethsaida (8^a), the questions about the dullness of the disciples when they forgot to take bread (8^a), about the dispute of the disciples (9^a), the incidents of the young man with the linen cloth (14^a), of the smiting of Jesus by the servants of the high priest (14^a), of Pilate's wonder, and of his question put to the centurion (15^a).

6. Authorship, purpose, date, and place of writing.—There is no reason to dispute the Patristic statements (§ 1) that John Mark was the author of the Second Gospel. Clement of Alexandria states that he wrote in Rome; Chrysostom (two centuries later) that he wrote in Egypt. The former statement, both as being earlier and as agreeing with the negative testimony of the Alexandrian Fathers, is more probable, though some moderns have supposed a double publication, one in Rome and one in Alexandria. In either case it is probable that, as in the case of the Third Gospel, Gentiles are specially addressed, though St. Mark as a Jew writes (unlike St. Luke) from a Jewish point of view. There is a general absence of OT quotations except when our Lord's words are cited (12^a is an exception; 15^a must almost certainly be expunged, with RV, from the text).

MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

The Aramaic transliterations like Talitha cum(i) are interpreted, and Jewish customs and geography are explained [7²², 12⁴² (the 'mite' was a Jewish coin) 13³ 14⁹]. The absence of mention of the Jewish Law points in the same direction.

The date is probably before the Fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. (For the argument from the Discourse on the End, see art. MATTHEW [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 5, and note especially Mk 13³¹, 24, 30, 32, which point to the fulfilment of the prophecy being, at the time of writing, only in prospect.) The reference to the shewbread (2², 'it is not lawful') suggests that the Temple still stood when Mark wrote. The characteristics already mentioned, the description of Jesus' inner feelings, the style and details of the Gospel, give the same indications. If the early date of Acts be adopted (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 9), Lk. and therefore Mk. must be earlier still. The external testimony, however, raises some difficulty when we consider the date of 1 Peter. For Papias by implication and Irenaeus explicitly say that Mark wrote after Peter's death, while Clement of Alexandria and Origen say that he wrote in Peter's lifetime (see § 1). If the former statement be correct, and if 1 Peter be authentic, the Epistle must have preceded Mk.; but it is not easy to assign a very early date to it (e.g. 1 P 4¹⁶ 'suffer as a Christian'; though Dr. Bigg disputes this inference and thinks that 1 Peter was written before the Neronian persecution in A.D. 64). There is no need to dispute the authenticity of 1 Peter because of supposed references to late persecutions, for there is no good reason for saying that St. Peter died in the same year as St. Paul, and it is quite possible that he survived him for some considerable time, during which Mark acted as his 'interpreter.' If, then, we are led by internal evidence so strongly to prefer an early date for Mk., we must either choose an early date for 1 Peter, or else prefer the Alexandrian tradition that Mark wrote in Peter's lifetime [Dr. Swete gives c. 69 for Mk., Dean Robinson c. 65].

7. Was Mk. written in Greek or Aramaic?—The Second Gospel is more strongly tinged with Aramaisms than any other. It retains several Aramaic words transliterated into Greek:—Houerges 3¹, Talitha cum(i) 5⁴, Corban 7¹¹, Ephphatha 7¹² (these Mk. only), Abba 14³⁶ (so Ro 8¹⁵, Gal 4⁶), Rabbi 9⁵ 11² 14³, Hosanna 11⁹ (these two also in Mt. and Jn.), Papas 10⁴ (Jn. also), Eloi Eloi lama sabachthani 15³⁴ (or as Mt. Eli); and several Aramaic proper names are noticeable: Barthimaeus 10⁴⁶ (a patronymic), Cananæan 3¹⁸, Isariot 3¹⁹, Beelzebub 3²², Golgotha 15²². Aramaisms are also found freely in the grammar of Mk. and in several phrases. From these facts it is argued (Blass, Allen) that Aramaic was the original language. Dr. Blass also suggests that St. Luke in Ac 1-12 used an Aramaic source, while the rest of that book was his own independent work. In these twelve chapters, unlike the rest, Aramaisms abound, and the style is rough. The argument is that Mark, the son of a prominent lady in Jerusalem, wrote the Aramaic source of Ac 1-12, and that if so his former work (our Second Gospel) would be in Aramaic also. This argument will probably be thought to be too unsubstantial for acceptance. There is no reason for saying that Mark wrote the supposed Aramaic source of Ac 1-12, and even if he did, he might, being confessedly bilingual, have written his Gospel equally well in Greek as in Aramaic. The Aramaic tinge is probably best explained by the fact that Mark thought in Aramaic. If our Greek were a translation, the Aramaic phrases like Talitha cum(i) might have been bodily incorporated by transliteration, or else translated; but they never would have been transliterated and then interpreted, as is actually the case. The Fathers, from Papias downwards, had clearly never heard of an Aramaic original. The most fatal objection to the theory, however, is the freshness of the style of the Gospel. Even the best translation loses freshness. The Greek of Mk. reads as if it were original; and we may safely say that this is really the language in which the Evangelist wrote.

8. The last twelve verses.—The MSS and versions have three different ways of ending the Gospel. The vast majority have the ending of our ordinary Bibles, which is explicitly quoted by Irenaeus as a genuine work of St. Mark, is probably quoted by Justin Martyr, possibly earlier still by 'Barnabas' and Hermas, but in the last three cases we are not certain that the writer knew it as part of the Gospel. The two oldest Greek MSS (the Vatican and the Sinaitic), the old Syriac version (Sinaitic), and the oldest MSS of the Armenian and Ethiopic versions, end at 16⁸, as Eusebius tells us that the most accurate copies of his day did. An intermediate ending is found in some Greek MSS (the earliest of the 7th cent.), in addition to the ordinary ending; and in a MS of the Old Latin (pre-Hieronymian) version, standing alone. It is as follows:—'And they immediately (or briefly) made known all things that had been commanded (them) to those about Peter. And after this Jesus himself [appeared to them and] sent out by means of them from the East even to the West the holy and incorruptible preaching of the eternal salvation.' This intermediate ending is certainly not genuine; it was written as a conclusion to the Gospel by some one who had the ordinary ending before him and objected to it as unauthentic, or who had a MS before him ending at 16⁸ and thought this abrupt. It appears that the copy from which most of these MSS with the intermediate ending were made, ended at 16⁸.

Now it is confessed that the style of the last twelve verses is not that of the Gospel. There are, then, two possible explanations. One is that Mark, writing at a comparatively late date, took the 'Petrine tradition,' a written work, as his basis, incorporated it almost intact into his own work, and added the verses 11-16⁸, and a few editorial touches such as 3⁶, 32, which are not found in the other Synoptics, and which resemble phrases in the last twelve verses (16¹¹, 13¹). This was Dr. Salmon's solution. There are various objections to it; two seem fatal—(1) that ecclesiastical writers never represent Peter as writing a Gospel either by himself or by any scribe or interpreter except Mark, and yet this theory supposes that the 'Petrine tradition' was not first written down by Mark; and (2) that the last twelve verses seem not to have been written as an end to the Gospel at all, being apparently a fragment of some other work, probably a summary of the Gospel story. For the beginning of 16⁹ is not continuous with 16⁸; the subject of the verb 'appeared' had evidently been indicated in the sentence which had preceded; yet the necessary 'Jesus' cannot be understood from anything in v. 8. Further, Mary Magdalene is introduced in v. 9 as a new person although she had just been mentioned by name in 15⁴⁰, 47 16¹, and was one of the women spoken of throughout vv. 1-8.—On the other hand, it is inconceivable that 16⁹ with its abrupt and inauspicious 'they were afraid' could be the conclusion of a Gospel,—that the book should deliberately end without any incident of the risen life of our Lord, and with a note of terror. The other possible explanation, therefore, is that some verses have been lost. Probably the last leaf of the original, or at least of the copy from which all the MSS existing in the 2nd cent. were taken, has disappeared. This is conceivable, the last leaf of a MS being that which is most likely to drop; and the difficulty that the original MS of Mk. must have been copied before it got so old that the last leaf fell may perhaps be satisfactorily met by supposing that (as we know was the case later) the Second Gospel was not highly prized in its youth, as not giving us much additional information, and as being almost entirely contained in Mt. and Lk. On the other hand, the last twelve verses are extremely ancient. Most scholars look on them as belonging to the first few years of the 2nd cent., and Arishti has been suggested as the writer, on the strength of a late Armenian MS. But it is quite possible that they are part of an even earlier summary of the Gospel story; and, like the passage about the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7⁵³⁻⁸¹), they are to be revered as a very ancient and authoritative record.

9. Have we the original Mark?—This has been denied from two different and incompatible points of view. (a) Papias speaks of Mk. being 'not in order' and of Matthew writing the 'oracles' or 'logia' (see § 1 above, and art. MATTHEW [GOSPEL ACC. TO]). It is objected that our Second Gospel is an orderly narrative, and cannot be that mentioned by Papias. Renan maintained that Mark wrote a disconnected series of anecdotes about Christ, and Matthew a collection of discourses, and that our present First and Second Gospels took their present form by a process of assimilation, the former assimilating the anecdotes and adding them to the discourses, the latter adopting the reverse process,

This rests on the unproved assumption that Matthew's original work consisted of Jesus' sayings only, which is very improbable. But as a matter of fact there is no time for the process imagined by Renan to have taken place, and the result, moreover, would have been a large number of variant Gospels—a given passage appearing in some MSS in one Gospel, in others in another, as is the case with the story of the woman taken in adultery. [For a more probable interpretation of Papias' words, see § 1.]—(b) It is sometimes argued that our present Mk. is an 'edited' form of the original Mk., being very like it, but differing from it by the insertion of some editorial touches and additions. [For Salmon's form of this theory, see above, § 8; but the theory is held by many (e.g. Schmiedel) who reject the last twelve verses as Markan.]

The only argument of real importance urged by those who hold this theory is that Mt. and Lk. occasionally agree together against Mk. To take one example only, Mk 1⁹ has 'with the Holy Ghost' where Mt 3¹² and Lk 3¹⁶ have 'with the Holy Ghost and fire.' If Mt. and Lk. are later than Mk.,—unless the First Evangelist knew the Third Gospel or the Third Evangelist the First, both of which suppositions are confessedly improbable,—we cannot, it is said, explain their agreements against Mk. Therefore we must suppose, it is urged, that these phrases where they agree were in the original Mk., but have been altered in our Mk. This idea in itself is grossly improbable, for it means in some cases that a later editor (our Mark) altered a smooth construction into a hard or a difficult one not found in Mt. or Lk. (see § 5 (c)), which is hardly to be conceived. But this difficulty rests on the unproved assumption noticed just now, that the 'non-Markan document' contained discourses only. If, as is almost certain, it contained narrative also, and if this narrative (as it is only reasonable to suppose) sometimes overlapped the 'Petrine tradition,' the result is exactly what we should expect. Mt. and Lk. sometimes follow Mk. rather than the non-Markan source; sometimes one follows the one and the other the other; and sometimes both follow the non-Markan source. This fully accounts for their agreements against Mk.

It is indeed possible, as many think, that a very few phrases in our Mk. are later editorial additions; but even this hypothesis is unnecessary, and it seems on the whole most probable that our Mk. is the original Mk., and that it was used by the First and Third Evangelists.

MARKET, MARKETPLACE.—The former is found in OT in Ezk 27^{15, 17} etc., as the rendering of a collective noun signifying 'articles of exchange,' hence RV throughout 'merchandise,' this last in v.¹⁵ being AV rendering of another word for which RV gives 'mart.' In NT 'market' has disappeared from RV in favour of the uniform 'marketplace' (Gr. agora). Here we must distinguish between the 'markets' of Jerusalem (Mt 11¹⁶, Mk 7⁴ etc.), which were simply streets of shops—the 'bazaars' of a modern Eastern city,—and the 'market' (AV) or 'marketplace' (RV) of a Greek city (Ac 16¹⁹ 17¹⁷). The latter was the centre of the public life of the city, and was a large open space adorned with colonnades and statues, and surrounded by temples and other public buildings.

MARKS.—1. The mark of circumcision.—This is an instance (among many) of the taking-over of a pre-existing rite, and adapting it to Jahweh-worship; whatever it may have meant in its origin—and opinions differ very widely on this point—it became among the Israelites the mark par excellence of a Jahweh-worshipper (cf. Gn. 17¹⁴), the symbol of the covenant between Him and His people (see, further, CIRCUMCISION).

2. The mark of Cain (Gn 4¹⁶).—In seeking to discover the character of this sign or mark, the first question that obviously suggests itself is, why should there be any protective efficacy in such a sign? On the assumption of its being a tribal mark (so Robertson Smith, Gunkel, and others), men would know that any injury done to its bearer would be avenged by the other members of the tribe (see art. CAIN). But this answer is unsatisfactory, because, if it was a tribal mark, it would be common to all the members of the tribe, whereas this one is spoken of as being specifically for Cain's benefit, and as having been given to protect him qua manslayer; a tribal mark would have been on him before the murder of Abel. But then again, any mark designed to protect him on account of his being a murderer, would, as proclaiming his guilt, rather have the opposite effect. Another point to bear in mind is that from the writer's point of view (if the narrative is a unity) there really was nobody to hurt Cain except his parents. It is clear, therefore, that the contradictory elements in the narrative show that it has no basis in fact; it is more reasonable to regard it as one of the 'ætiological' stories with which the Book of Genesis abounds, i.e. it purports to give the cause of some custom the real reason for which had long been forgotten. One can, of course, only conjecture what custom it was of which this story gave the supposed origin; but, taking all its elements into consideration, it was very probably the answer to the inquiry: 'Why do man-slayers within the tribe bear a special mark, even after the blood-wit has been furnished?' The reason given was quite wrong, but it accounted satisfactorily for a custom of which the origin had been forgotten, and that was sufficient.

3. The mark of the prophet.—In 1 K 20³⁰⁻⁴³ there is the account of how one of the prophets 'disguised himself with a headband over his eyes'; the king does not recognize the man as a prophet until the latter takes away this covering from his face, whereupon the king 'discovered him as one of the prophets.' Clearly there must have been some distinguishing mark on the forehead of the man whereby he was recognized as belonging to the prophetic order. This conclusion is strengthened by several other considerations. (1) It is a fact that among other races the class of men corresponding to the prophetic order of the Israelites are distinguished by incisions made on their persons. (2) There is the analogy of circumcision; just as among the Israelites this was the distinguishing mark of the people of Jahweh, so those who, like the prophets, were more especially His close followers also had a special mark, a distinctive sign, which differentiated them from other men. (3) The custom of putting a mark upon cattle to denote ownership, and for the purpose of differentiating from other herds, was evidently well known in early Israel. When one remembers how rife anthropomorphisms were among the Israelites, it is perhaps not fanciful to see here an analogy: just as the owners of herds marked their own property, so Jahweh marked His own people; and as the prophets were differentiated from the ordinary people, so they would have their special mark. (4) There is the passage Zec 13⁴⁻⁶. These considerations point distinctly to marks of some kind or other which, either on the forehead or on the hand—possibly on both—were distinctive characteristics of a prophet among the Israelites.

4. Cuttings for the dead.—The custom of making cuttings in the flesh and other marks upon the body for the dead (Lv 19²⁸; cf. 21⁵, Dt 14¹) was practised by the Israelites, but forbidden on account of its being a heathen rite. This was not a sign of mourning, as is often, but erroneously, supposed; it was an act of homage done to the departed, with the object of inducing the spirit not to molest those left behind. In Dt 14¹ the prohibition runs, 'Ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness (the cognate Arabic root means 'wound') between your eyes for the dead.' This was done in order the more easily to be seen by the spirit.

5. Marks connected with Jahweh-worship.—There can be little doubt that originally the signs on the hand and the memorial between the eyes (Ex 13^{9, 16}) were marks cut into hand and forehead; this custom was taken over by the Israelites from non-Jahweh-worshipping ancestors, and was regarded as effectual against demoniacal onslaughts; hence in later days the use and name of

'phylacteries,' which took the place of the actual cuttings in hand and forehead (Dt 6⁸ 11¹⁸ etc.). Reference to an early custom is perhaps (but cf. RV) contained in the words: 'Lo, here is my mark, let the Almighty answer me'; the word used for 'mark' comes from a root meaning 'to wound,' and it is the same as that used in Ezk 9⁴ 9; the reference is to those who are true to God.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

6. 'Stigmata.'—The rendering of St. Paul's strongly figurative words in Gal 6¹⁷ adopted by RV reads thus: 'From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear branded on my body the marks (stigmata) of Jesus.' This rendering accords with the interpretation of this difficult passage adopted by most recent scholars. The Apostle warns his Galatian converts against further attempts to 'trouble' him, for he is under the special protection of Jesus, whose 'marks' he bears in the scars and other evidence of the scourgings and other ills he has borne for His sake (see 2 Co 11²³). St. Paul here emphasizes his consecration of himself to his Lord by using a figure, familiar to his readers, taken from the practice of branding a slave with the name or symbol of the deity to whose service he was devoted. Thus Herodotus (ii. 113) tells of a temple of Heracles, 'in which if any man's slave take refuge and have the sacred marks (stigmata as here) set upon him, giving himself over to the god, it is not lawful to lay hands upon him.' A still more apposite illustration is afforded by the branding of certain Jews of Alexandria with an ivy leaf—the symbol of Dionysus—by Ptolemy Philopator (3 Mac 2⁹).

MARMOTH (1 Es 8⁶²) = Meremoth, Ezr 8³⁸.

MAROTH.—An unknown town (Mic 1¹² only). There is a play upon the name, which means 'bitternesses.'

MARRIAGE.—1. Forms of Marriage.—There are two forms of marriage among primitive races: (1) where the husband becomes part of his wife's tribe, (2) where the wife becomes part of her husband's tribe.

(1) W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia) gives to this form the name sadika, from the sadac or 'gift' given to the wife. (a) The union may be confined to an occasional visit to the wife in her home (motu marriage). This is distinguished from mere prostitution, in that no disgrace is attached, and the children are recognized by the tribe; cf. Samson's marriage. (b) The husband may be definitely incorporated into his wife's tribe (beena marriage). The wife meets her husband on equal terms; children belong to her tribe, and descent is reckoned on the mother's side. Women could inherit in Arabia under this system (op. cit. p. 94). Possible traces in OT are the marriages of Jacob (Laban claims wives and children as his own, Gn 31³¹⁻⁴³), Moses (Ex 2²¹ 4¹⁸), Samson (Jg 14. 15. 16; there is no hint that he meant to take his wife home; his kid seems to be the sadac or customary present). So the Shechemites must be circumcised (Gn 34²⁴); Joseph's sons born in Egypt are adopted by Jacob (48⁵); Abimelech, the son of Gideon's Shechemite concubine (Jg 8³¹), is a Shechemite (9¹⁻⁴). The words of Gn 2²⁴ may have originally referred to this custom, though they are evidently not intended to do so by the narrator, since beena marriages were already out of date when they were written. Many of the instances quoted can be explained as due to special circumstances, but the admitted existence of such marriages in Arabia makes it probable that we should find traces of them among the Semites in general. They make it easier to understand the existence of the primitive custom of the 'matriarchate,' or reckoning of descent through females. In addition to the cases already quoted, we may add the closeness of maternal as compared with paternal relationships, evidenced in bars of marriage (see below, § 3), and the special responsibility of the maternal uncle or brother (Gn 24²⁹ 34², 2 S 13²¹). It is evident that the influence of polygamy would be in the same direction, subdividing the family into smaller groups connected with each wife.

(2) The normal type is where the wife becomes the property of her husband, who is her 'Baal' or possessor (Hos 2¹⁶), she herself being 'Beulah' (Is 62¹⁷). She and her children belong to his tribe, and he alone has right of divorce. (a) In unsettled times the wife will be acquired by war (Jg 5³⁰). She is not merely a temporary means of pleasure, or even a future mother, but a slave and an addition to a man's wealth. Dt 21¹⁰⁻¹⁴ regulates the procedure in cases of capture; in Jg 19-21 we have an instance of the custom. Traces may remain in later marriage procedure, e.g. in the band of the bridegroom's friends escorting, i.e. 'capturing,' the bride, and in her feigned resistance, as among the Bedouin (W. R. Smith, op. cit. p. 81). (b) Capture gives place to purchase and ultimately to contract. The daughter is valuable to the clan as a possible mother of warriors, and cannot be parted with except for a consideration. Hence the 'dowry' (see below, § 5) paid to the bride's parents.

2. Polygamy among the Hebrews was confined to a plurality of wives (polygyny). There is no certain trace in OT of a plurality of husbands (polyandry), though the Levirate marriage is sometimes supposed to be a survival. The chief causes of polygyny were—(a) the desire for a numerous offspring, or the barrenness of first wife (Abraham's case is directly ascribed to this, and among many peoples it is permitted on this ground alone); (b) the position and importance offered by numerous alliances (e.g. Solomon); (c) the existence of slavery, which almost implies it. It can obviously be prevalent only where there is a disproportionate number of females, and, except in a state of war, is possible only to those wealthy enough to provide the necessary 'dowry.' A further limitation is implied in the fact that in more advanced stages, when the harem is established, the wife when secured is a source, not of wealth, but of expense.

Polygamy meets us as a fact: e.g. Abraham, Jacob, the Judges, David, Solomon; 1 Ch 7⁴ is evidence of its prevalence in Issachar; Elkanah (1 S 1¹¹) is significant as belonging to the middle class; Jehoiada (2 Ch 24¹) as a priest. But it is always treated with suspicion; it is incompatible with the ideal of Gn 2²⁴, and its origin is ascribed to Lamech, the Cainite (4¹⁹). In Dt 17¹⁷ the king is warned not to multiply wives; later regulations fixed the number at eighteen for a king and four for an ordinary man. The quarrels and jealousies of such a narrative as Gn 29³¹⁻³⁰ are clearly intended to illustrate its evils, and it is in part the cause of the troubles of the reigns of David and Solomon. Legislation (see below, § 6) safeguarded the rights of various wives, slave or free; and according to the Rabbinic interpretation of Lv 21¹³ the high priest was not allowed to be a bigamist. Noah, Isaac, and Joseph had only one wife, and domestic happiness in the Bible is always connected with monogamy (2 K 4, Ps 128, Pr 31, Sir 25¹ 26¹⁻¹³). The marriage figure applied to the union of God and Israel (§ 10) implied monogamy as the ideal state. Polygamy is, in fact, always an unnatural development from the point of view both of religion and of anthropology; 'monogamy is by far the most common form of human marriage; it was so also amongst the ancient peoples of whom we have any direct knowledge' (Westermarck, Hum. Marr. p. 459). Being, however, apparently legalized, and having the advantage of precedent, it was long before polygamy was formally forbidden in Hebrew society, though practically it fell into disuse; the feeling of the Rabbis was strongly against it. Herod had nine wives at once (Jos. Ant. xvii. i. 3, cf. 2). Its possibility is implied by the technical continuance of the Levirate law, and is proved by the early interpretation of 1 Ti 3², whether correct or not (§ 8). Justin (Dial. 134, 141) reproaches the Jews of his day with having 'four or even five wives,' and marrying 'as they wish, or as many as they wish.' The evidence of the Talmud shows that in this case at least the reproach had some foundation. Polygamy was not definitely forbidden among the Jews till the time of R. Gershom (c. A.D. 1000), and then at first only for France and Germany. In Spain, Italy, and the East it persisted for some time longer, as it does still among the Jews in Mohammedan countries.

3. Bars to Marriage.—(1) Prohibited degrees.—Their range varies extraordinarily among different peoples, but on the whole it is wider among uncivilized than among civilized races (Westermarck, op. cit. p. 297), often embracing the whole tribe. The instinctive impulse was not against marriage with a near relative qua relative, but against marriage where there was early familiarity. 'Whatever is the origin of bars to marriage, they are certainly early associated with the feeling that it is indecent for housemates to intermarry' (W. R. Smith, op. cit. p. 170). The origin of the instinct is natural selection, consanguineous marriages being on the whole unfavourable to the species, in man as among animals. This, of course, was not consciously realized; the instinct took the form of a repulsion to union with those among whom one had lived; as these would usually be blood relations, that which we recognize as horror of incest was naturally developed (Westermarck, p. 352). We find in OT no trace of dislike to marriage within the tribe (i.e. endogamy), though, judging by Arab analogies, it may have originally existed; on the contrary, the Hebrews were strongly endogamous, marrying within the nation. The objection, however, to incestuous marriages was strong, though in early times there was laxity with regard to intermarriage with relatives on the father's side, a natural result of the 'matriarchate' and of polygamy, where each wife with her family formed a separate group in her own tent. Abram married his half-sister (Gn 20¹²); 2 S 13¹³, Ezk 22¹¹ imply the continuance of the practice. Nahor married his niece (Gn 11²⁹), and Amram his paternal aunt (Ex 5²⁰). On marriage with a stepmother see below, § 6. Jacob married two sisters (cf. Jg 15²). Legislation is found in Lv 18⁷⁻¹⁷ 20¹¹ (cf. Dt 27¹⁰ 21²²); for details see the commentaries. We note the omission of prohibition of marriage with a niece, and with widow of maternal uncle. Lv 18¹⁸ forbids marriage not with a deceased but with a living wife's sister, i.e. a special form of polygamy. The 'bastard' of Dt 23² is probably the offspring of an incestuous marriage. An heiress was not allowed to marry outside her tribe (Nu 36⁴; cf. 27⁴, To 6¹⁴ 7¹²). For restrictions on priests see Lv 21⁷⁻¹⁴. There were no caste restrictions, though difference in rank would naturally be an objection (1 S 18¹⁸ 22). Outside the prohibited degrees consanguineous marriages were common (Gn 24⁴, To 4¹²); in Jg 14³ the best marriage is 'from thy brethren.' Jubilees 4 maintains that all the patriarchs from Adam to Noah married near relatives. Cousin marriages among the Jews are said to occur now three times more often than among other civilized peoples (Westermarck, p. 481).

(2) Racial bars arose from religious and historical causes. Gn 24. 28. 34, Nu 12¹, Jg 14³ illustrate the objection to foreign marriages; Esau's Hittite wives are a grief to his parents (Gn 26³⁴ 27⁴⁶); cf. Lv 24¹⁰. The marriage of Joseph (Gn 41⁴⁴) is due to stress of circumstances, but David (2 S 3³) and Solomon (1 K 3¹ 11¹) set a deliberate example which was readily imitated (16³¹). Among the common people there must have been other cases similar to Naomi's (Ru 1⁴): Bathsheba (2 S 11⁴), Hiram (1 K 7¹⁴), Amasa (1 Ch 2¹⁷), Jehozabad (2 Ch 24²⁸) are the children of mixed marriages. They are forbidden with the inhabitants of Canaan (Ex 34¹⁶, Dt 7¹), but tolerated with Moabites and Egyptians (23⁷). Their prevalence was a trouble to Ezra (9. 10) and to Nehemiah (10³⁰ 13²³). To 4¹² 6¹⁸,

1 Mac 14⁶ renew the protest against them. In the Diaspora they were permitted on condition of proselytism, but Jubilees 30 forbids them absolutely; they are 'fornication.' Jewish strictness in this respect was notorious (Tac. Hist. v. 5; cf. Ac 10²⁸). The case of Timothy's parents (Ac 16¹⁻³) is an example of the greater laxity which prevailed in central Asia Minor. It is said that now the proportion of mixed to pure marriages among the Jews is about 1 to 500 (Westermarck, p. 375), though it varies greatly in different countries. 1 Co 7³⁹ probably discourages marriage with a heathen (cf. v. 12² 9³), but the general teaching of the Epp. would remove any religious bar to intermarriage between Christians of different race, though it does not touch the social or physiological advisability.

4. Levirate Marriage (Lat. levir, 'a brother-in-law').—In Dt 25⁵⁻¹⁰ (no || in other codes of OT) it is enacted that if a man die leaving no son ('child' LXX, Josephus, Mt 22²⁴), his brother, if he lives on the same estate, is to take his widow, and the eldest child is to succeed to the name and inheritance of the deceased (cf. Gn 38⁹). If the survivor refuses, a formal declaration is to be made before the elders of the city, and the widow is to express her contempt by loosing his sandal and spitting in his face. The law is a codification, possibly a restriction, of an existing custom. (a) It is presupposed for the patriarchal age in Gn 38, the object of this narrative being to insist on the duty of the survivor; (b) Heb. has a special word—'to perform the duty of a husband's brother'; (c) the custom is found with variations in different parts of the world—India, Tibet, Madagascar, etc. In India it is confined to the case where there is no child, and lasts only till an heir is born; sometimes it is only permissive. In other cases it operates without restriction, and may be connected with the form of polyandry where the wife is the common property of all the brothers. But it does not necessarily imply polyandry, of which indeed there is no trace in OT. Among the Indians, Persians, and Afghans it is connected with ancestor worship, the object being to ensure that there shall be some one to perform the sacrificial rites; the supposed indications of this among the Hebrews are very doubtful. In OT it is more probably connected with the desire to preserve the family name (a man lived through his children), and to prevent a division or alienation of property. On the other hand, the story of Ru 4 seems to belong to the circle of ideas according to which the wife is inherited as part of a man's property. Boaz marries Ruth as god, not as levir, and the marriage is legally only a subordinate element in the redemption of the property. There is no stigma attached to the refusal of the nearer kinsman, and the son ranks as belonging to Boaz. The prohibited degrees in Lv 18 (P) make no exception in favour of the Levirate marriage, whether repealing or presupposing it is uncertain. In later times we have the Sadducees' question in Mk 12¹⁹. It does not imply the continuance of the practice. It had fallen into disuse, and the Mishna invents many limitations to avoid the necessity of compliance. It was agreed that the woman must have no child (Dt. 'son'), and the school both of Shammai and of the Sadducees apparently confined the law to the case of a betrothed, not a wedded, wife. If so, the difficulty was twofold, striking at the Levirate custom as well as at the belief in the Resurrection (Edersheim, LT ii. 400).

5. Marriage Customs.—(1) The arranging of a marriage was normally in the hands of the parents (Gn 21² 24³ 28¹ 34⁴, Jg 14³, 2 Es 9¹⁷); there are, in fact, few nations or periods where the children have a free choice. But (a) infant or child marriages were unknown; (b) the consent of the parties was, sometimes at least, sought (Gn 24⁸); (c) the rule was not absolute; it might be broken wilfully (26⁴), or under stress of circumstances (Ex 2²¹); (d) natural feeling will always make itself felt in spite of the restrictions of custom; the sexes met freely, and romantic attachments were not unto own (Gn 29¹⁰ 34¹, Jg 14¹, 1 S 18²⁰); in these cases the initiative was taken by the parties. One view of Oracles is that it is a drama celebrating the victory of a village maiden's faithfulness to her shepherd lover, in face of the attractions of a royal rival. It was a disgrace if a daughter remained unmarried (Sir 42⁹); this fact is the key to 1 Co 7²⁶. (2) The betrothal was of a more formal and binding nature than our 'engagement'; among the Arabs it is the only legal ceremony connected with a marriage. Gn 24⁶⁵.⁶⁰ may preserve an ancient formula and blessing. Its central feature was the dowry (mohar) paid to the parents or representatives of the bride, the daughter being a valuable possession. Dt 22²⁹ (cf. Ex 22¹⁶) orders its payment in a case of seduction, and 50 shekels is named as the average. In Gn 34¹² Hamor offers 'never so much dowry'; cf. the presents of ch. 24. It might take the form of service (Gn 29, Jacob; 1 S 18²⁵, David). Dowry, in our sense of provision for the wife, arose in two ways. (a) The parents provided for her, perhaps originally giving her a portion of the purchase money (Gn 24⁴² 29¹⁴). Caleb gives his daughter a field (Jos 15¹⁹ = Jg 1¹⁵); Solomon's princess brings a dowry of a city (1 K 9¹⁶); Raguel gives his daughter half his goods (To 8²¹ 10¹⁰). This dowry was retained by the wife if divorced, except in case of adultery. (b) The husband naturally signified his generosity and affection by gifts to his bride (Gn 24⁴³ 34¹² [where gift is distinct from 'dowry'], Est 2⁹). According to the Mishna, the later ceremony of betrothal consisted in payment of a piece of money, or a gift, or the conveyance of a writing, in presence of two witnesses. A third method (by cohabitation) was strongly discountenanced. After betrothal the parties were legally in the position of a married couple. Unfaithfulness was adultery (Dt 22²², Mt 1⁹). The bridegroom was exempt from military service (Dt 20⁷). Non-fulfilment of the marriage was a serious slight (1 S 18²⁶, Jg 14¹⁹), but concealable under certain circumstances (Gn 29²⁷).

(2) Wedding ceremonies.—Great uncertainty attaches to the proceedings in Biblical times. We have to construct our picture from passing notices, combined with what we know of Arabic and Jewish customs. In some cases there seems to have been nothing beyond the betrothal (Gn 24⁴³⁻⁴⁷); or the wedding festivities followed it at once; but in later times there was a distinct interval, not exceeding a year in case of a virgin. Tobit 7¹⁴ mentions a 'contract' (cf. Mal 2¹⁴), which became a universal feature. The first ceremony was the wedding procession (Ps 45¹, 1 Mac 9²⁷), which may be a relic of 'marriage by capture,' the bridegroom's friends (Mt 9¹⁵, Jn 3²⁹; cf. '60 mighty men' of Ca 3⁷) going, often by night, to fetch the bride and her attendants; in Jg 14¹¹.¹⁵.²⁰ Samson's comrades are necessarily taken from the bride's people. The rejoicings are evidenced by the proverbial 'voice of the bridegroom,' etc. (Jer 7³⁴ etc., Rev 18²³). Gn 24⁴³, Ps 45¹⁻¹⁵, Jer 2³, Rev 19⁸ 21¹ speak of the magnificence of the bridal attire; Is 61¹⁰, of the garland of the bridegroom and jewels of the bride (cf. 49¹³); the veil is mentioned in Gn 24⁴⁶ 29²³; the supposed allusions to the lustral bath of the Greeks (Ru 3³, Ezk 32¹⁰, Eph 5²) are very doubtful. The situation in Mt 25¹ is not clear. Are the 'virgins' friends of the bridegroom waiting for his return with his bride, or friends of the bride waiting with her for him? All that it is possible to say is that the general conception is that of the wedding procession by night in which lights and torches have always played a large part. Another feature was the scattering of flowers and nuts; all who met the procession were expected to join in it or to salute it.

The marriage supper followed, usually in the home of the bridegroom (2 Es 9⁴⁷); Gn 29²², Jg 14¹⁰, To 8¹⁰ are easily explained exceptions. Hospitality was a sacred duty; 'he who does not invite me to his marriage will not have me to his funeral.' To refuse the invitation was a grave insult (Mt 22). Nothing is known of the custom, apparently implied in this passage, of providing a wedding garment for guests. Jn 2 gives us a picture of the feast in a middle-class home, where the resources are strained to the uttermost. It is doubtful whether the 'ruler of the feast' (cf. Sir 32¹⁻²) is 'the best man' (3²⁹, Jg 14²⁰), the office being unusual in the simple life of Galilee (Edersheim, LT i. 355). There is nowhere any hint of a religious ceremony, though marriage was regarded with great reverence as symbolizing the union of God with Israel (ib. 353). The feast was no doubt quasi-sacramental (cf. the Latin 'conferreatio'), and the marriage was consummated by the entry into the 'chamber' (huppah). W. R. Smith (op. cit. p. 168) finds in this a relic of 'beena' marriage (see above, § 1), the huppah or canopy (Jl 2¹⁶) being originally the wife's tent (Gn 24⁴⁷, Jg 4¹⁷); cf. the tent pitched for Absalom (2 S 16²²). In Arab., Syr., and Heb. the bridegroom is said to 'go in' to the bride. Ps 19⁸ speaks of his exultant 'coming forth' on the following morning; 'the chamber' can hardly refer there to the 'canopy' under which in modern weddings the pair stand during the ceremony, though this has no doubt been evolved from the old tent.

The wedding festivities were not confined to the 'supper' of the first night, at any rate in OT times. As now in Syria, the feast lasted for 7 days (Gn 29²⁷, To 11¹⁹ 8¹⁹ [a fortnight]). The best picture is in Jg 14, with its eating and drinking and not very refined merriment. Canticles is generally supposed to contain songs sung during these festivities; those now sung in Syria show a remarkable similarity. 7¹⁻⁷ in particular would seem to be the chorus in praise of the bride's beauty, such as is now chanted, while she herself in a sword dance displays the charms of her person by the flashing fire-light. During the week the pair are 'king and queen,' enthroned on the threshing-board of the village. It is suggested that 'Solomon' (3⁷) had become the nickname for this village king. Dt 24¹ exempts the bridegroom from military service for a year (cf. 20⁷).

6. Position of the wife.—The practically universal form of marriage was the 'Baal' type, where the wife passed under the dominion of her 'lord' (Gn 3⁹, Tenth Com.). Side by side with this was the ideal principle, according to which she was a 'help meet for him' (Gn 2¹⁸), and the legal theory was always modified in practice by the affection of the husband or the strong personality of the wife; cf. the position of the patriarchs' wives, of women in Jg. or in Pr. (esp. 31); cf. 1 S 25¹⁴, 2 K 4¹. But her value was largely that of a mother of children, and the position of a childless wife was unpleasant (Gn 16⁴ 30¹⁻⁴, 1 S 1⁵, 2 Es 9⁴⁴). Polygamy led to favouritism; the fellow-wife is a 'rival' (1 S 1⁵)—a technical term. Dt 21¹⁶ safeguards the right of the firstborn of a 'hated' wife; Ex 21¹⁰ provides for the rendering of the duties of marriage to a first wife, even if a purchased concubine; if they are withheld she is to go free (cf. Dt 21¹⁴ of a captive). The difference between a wife and a concubine depended on the wife's higher position and birth, usually backed by relatives ready to defend her. She might claim the inheritance for her children (Gn 21¹⁰); her slave could not be taken as concubine without her consent (16³). As part of a man's chattels his wives were in certain cases inherited by his heir, with the limitation that a man could not take his own mother. The custom lasted in Arabia till forbidden by the Koran (ch. iv.). In OT there is the case of Reuben and Bilhah (Gn 35²² 49¹), perhaps implying the continuance of the custom in the tribe of Reuben, after it had been proscribed elsewhere (Driver, ad loc.). It is presupposed in 2 S 3⁷, where Ishbosheth reproaches Abner for encroaching on his birthright, and in 18², where Absalom thus publishes his claim to the kingdom. In 1 K 2²² Adonijah, in asking for Abishag, is claiming the eldest brother's inheritance. Ezk 22¹⁰ finds it still necessary to condemn the practice; cf. Dt 22³⁰, Lv 18¹⁷. Ru 4 shows how the wife is regarded as part of the inheritance. A widow normally remained unmarried. If poor, her position was bad; cf. the injunctions in Dt., the prophets, and the Pastoral Epp. In royal houses her influence might be greater than that of the wife; e.g. the difference in the attitude of Bathsheba in 1 K 1¹⁰ and in 2¹⁹, and the power of the queen-mother (1 K 15¹³, 2 K 11). There was a strong prejudice in later times against her re-marrying (Lk 2²⁶; Jos. Ant. xvii. xiii. 4, xviii. vi. 6). There is no instance of a corresponding dislike to the marriage of a widower, but the wife was regarded as a man's property even after his death. St. Paul, however, permits re-marriage (1 Co 7²⁹), and even enjoins it for younger widows (1 Ti 5¹⁴).

7. Adultery.—If a bride was found not to be a virgin, she was to be stoned (Dt 22¹³⁻²¹). A man who violated an unmarried girl was compelled to marry her with payment of 'dowry' (v. 23, cf. Ex 22¹⁶). A priest's daughter playing the harlot was to be burnt (Lv 21⁹). Adultery holds a prominent place among social sins (Seventh and Tenth Com., Ezk 18¹¹). If committed with a married or betrothed woman, the penalty was stoning for both parties, a betrothed damsel being spared if forced (Dt 22²²⁻²⁷, Lv 20¹⁰, Ezk 16¹⁰ 23¹⁵). The earlier penalty was burning, as in Egypt (Gn 38²⁴; Tamar is virtually betrothed). In Nu 5¹¹⁻³¹ the fact of adultery is to be established by ordeal, a custom found in many nations. It is to be noted that the test is not poison, but holy water; i.e. the chances are in favour of the accused. The general point of view is that adultery with a married woman is an offence against a neighbour's property; the adultery of a wife is an offence against her husband, but she has no concern with his fidelity. It is not probable that the extreme penalty was ever carried out (2 S 11, Hos 3). The frequent denunciations in the prophets and Pr. (2¹⁸ 5⁸ 6²⁶) show the prevalence of the crime; the usual penalty was divorce with loss of dowry (cf. Mt 5³¹). In the 'pericope' of Jn 8, part of the test is whether Christ will set Himself against Moses by sanctioning the abrogation of the Law; it is not implied that the punishment was ever actually inflicted; in fact, no instance of it is known. The answer (v. 11) pardons the sinner, but by no means condones the sin: 'dammavit, sed peccatum non hominem' (Aug.); cf. the treatment of 'the woman who was a sinner' (Lk 7⁴⁷). The NT is uncompromising in its attitude towards this sin, including in its view all acts of unchastity as offences against God and the true self, as sanctified by His indwelling, no less than against one's neighbour (Mt 5²⁷, Ac 15²⁹, 1 Co 5¹¹ 6⁹ 12-20, Gal 5¹⁹, 1 Th 4³). The blessing on the 'virgins' of Rev 14 probably refers to chastity, not celibacy; cf. 'the bed undefiled' of He 13⁴. The laxity of the age made it necessary to insist on purity as a primary Christian virtue (see Swete, ad loc.).

8. Divorce is taken for granted in OT (Lv 21⁷ 14 22¹³, Nu 30⁹), it being the traditional right of the husband, as in Arabia, to 'put away his wife' (Gn 21¹⁴). The story of Hosea probably embodies the older procedure, which is regulated by the law of Dt 24¹. There must be a bill of divorcement (Is 50¹, Jer 3⁸), prepared on a definite charge, and therefore presumably before some public official, and formally given to the woman. (But cf. Mt 1¹⁹, where possibility of private divorce is contemplated [for repudiation of betrothal?].) The time and expense thus involved would act as a check. Further, if the divorcée re-marries, she may not return to her former husband—a deterrent on hasty divorce, also on re-marriage—, if there is any prospect of reconciliation. The right of divorce is withheld in two cases (Dt 22¹⁹, 29). There was great divergence of opinion as regards the ground 'if she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found in her the nakedness of a thing.' The school of Hillel emphasized the first clause, and interpreted it of the most trivial things, practically 'for any cause' (Mt 19³); that of Shammai laid stress rightly on the second clause, and confined it to unchastity.

But the vague nature of the expression (cf. Dt 23¹⁴), and the fact that 22²² enacts death for unchastity, show that something wider must be meant, probably 'immodest or indecent behaviour' (Driver, ad loc.). In spite of the prohibition of Mal 2¹³⁻¹⁶ and the stern attitude of many Rabbis, divorce continued to be frequent; Ezr 9. 10 encouraged it. The Mishna allows it for violation of the Law or of Jewish customs, e.g. breaking a vow, appearing in public with dishevelled hair, or conversing indiscriminately with men. Practically the freedom was almost unlimited; the question was not what was lawful, but on what grounds a man ought to exercise the right the Law gave him. It was, of course, confined to the husband (1 S 25¹⁴ is simply an outrage on the part of Saul). Women of rank such as Salome (Jos. Ant. xv. vii. 10) or Herodias (xviii. v. 4) might arrogate it, but it is condemned as a breach of Jewish law. Christ contemplates its possibility in Mk 10¹², perhaps having in view the Greek and Roman world, where it was legal. But the words caused a difficulty to the early versions, which substitute desertion for divorce, and may be a later insertion, added for the sake of completeness. In a later period the Talmud allowed a wife to claim a divorce in certain cases, e.g. if her husband had a loathsome disease.

In the NT divorce seems to be forbidden absolutely (Mk 10¹⁰, Lk 16⁴, 1 Co 7¹⁰ 39). Our Lord teaches that the OT permission was a concession to a low moral standard, and was opposed to the ideal of marriage as an inseparable union of body and soul (Gn 2²⁴). But in Mt 5²⁷ 19⁹ He seems to allow it for 'fornication,' an exception which finds no place in the parallels (cf. 1 Co 7¹⁰, which allows re-marriage where a Christian partner is deserted by a heathen). (a) Fornication cannot here be sin before marriage; the sense of the passage demands that the word shall be taken in its wider sense (cf. Hos 2⁵ Am 7¹⁷, 1 Co 5¹); it defines the 'uncleanliness' of Dt 24¹ as illicit sexual intercourse. (b) Divorce cannot be limited to separation 'from bed and board,' as by R.C. commentators (1 Co 7 uses quite different words). To a Jew it always carried with it the right of re-marriage, and the words 'causeth her to commit adultery' (Mt 5²⁷) show that our Lord assumed that the divorcée would marry again. Hence if He allowed divorce under certain conditions, He allowed re-marriage. (c) It follows that Mt 19⁹, as it stands, gives to an injured husband the right of divorce, and therefore of re-marriage, even if it be supposed that the words 'except for fornication' qualify only the first clause, or if 'shall marry another' be omitted with B. A right given to an injured husband must on Christian principles be allowed to an injured wife. Further, re-marriage, if permitted to either party, is logically permitted both to innocent and to guilty, so far as the dissolution of the marriage bond is concerned, though it may well be forbidden to the latter as a matter of discipline and penalty. Mt 5²⁷ apparently allows the re-marriage of the justifiably divorced, i.e. guilty wife, though the interpretation of this verse is more doubtful than that of 19⁹. (d) The view implied by the exception is that adultery ipso facto dissolves the union, and so opens the way to re-marriage. But re-marriage also closes the door to reconciliation, which on Christian principles ought always to be possible; cf. the teaching of Hosea and Jer 3; Hermas (Mand. iv. 1) allows no re-marriage, and lays great stress on the taking back of a repentant wife. (e) Hence much is to be said for the view which is steadily gaining ground, that the exception in Mt. is an editorial addition from the Judaic standpoint, or under the pressure of practical necessity, the absolute rule being found too hard. (For the authorities, see Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. p. 27^b, and add Wright's Synopsis and Allen's St. Mat.) It is true that though the textual variations in both passages of Mt. are numerous, there is no MS authority for the entire omission of the words. But there is no hint of the exception in Mk., Lk., or 1 Cor.; Mt 19⁹ alters the question of Mk 10², adding the qualification 'for every cause,' which thus prepares the way for the qualified answer of v.⁸. This answer really admits the validity of the law of Dt 24¹, with its stricter interpretation (see p. 586^b), whilst the language of v.⁸ leads us to expect its abrogation. The introduction of the exception upsets the argument, which in Mk. is clear and logical. Again, is it not contrary to Christ's method that He should legislate in detail? He rather lays down universal principles, the practical application of which He left to His Church (see below, § 11).

(f) The requirement in 1 Ti 3^{2, 12}, Tit 1⁶, that the 'bishop' and 'deacon' shall be the 'husband of one wife,' is probably to be understood as a prohibition of divorce and other sins against the chastity of marriage (cf. He 13⁴), made necessary by the low standard of the age. Of course, no greater laxity is allowed to the layman, any more than he is allowed to be 'a brawler or striker'; but sins of this type are mentioned as peculiarly inconsistent with the ministry. Other views of the passage are that it forbids polygamy (a prohibition which could hardly be necessary in Christian circles) or a second marriage. But there was no feeling against the remarriage of men (see above, § 6), and St. Paul himself saw in a second marriage nothing per se inconsistent with the Christian ideal (1 Ti 5¹⁴), so that it is hard to see on what grounds the supposed prohibition could rest.

9. The Teaching of NT.—(1) Marriage and celibacy. The prevalent Jewish conception was that marriage was the proper and honourable estate for all men. 'Any Jew who has not a wife is no man' (Talmud). The Essene, on the other hand, avoided it as unclean and a degradation. Of this view there is no sign in NT (1 Ti 4³). Christ does, however, emphasize the propriety of the unmarried state in certain circumstances (Mt 19¹² [? Rev 14⁴]). The views of St. Paul undoubtedly changed. In 1 Th 4⁸ he regards marriage merely as a safeguard against immorality. The subject is prominent in 1 Cor. In 7^{1, 2, 8, 38} he prefers the unmarried state, allowing marriage for the same reason as in 1 Th. (1 Co 7^{2, 9, 36}). He gives three reasons for his attitude, the one purely temporary, the others valid under certain conditions. (a) It is connected with the view he afterwards abandoned, of the nearness of the Parousia (v.³¹); there would be no need to provide for the continuance of the race. (b) It was a time of 'distress,' i.e. hardship and persecution (v.³⁶). (c) Marriage brings distractions and cares (v.³²). The one-sidedness of this view may be corrected by his later teaching as to (2) the sanctity of the marriage state. The keynote is struck by our Lord's action. The significance of the Cana miracle can hardly be exaggerated (Jn 2). It corresponds with His teaching that marriage is a Divine institution (Mt 19⁶). So Eph 5², Col 3¹⁸, and the Pastoral Epp. assume the married state as normal in the Christian Church. It is raised to the highest pinnacle as the type of 'the union between Christ and His Church.' This conception emphasizes both the honourableness of the estate and the heinousness of all sins against it; husband and wife are one flesh (Eph 5; cf. He 13⁴). (3) As regards relations between husband and wife, it cannot be said that St. Paul has entirely shaken himself free from the influences of his Jewish training (§ 6). The duty of the husband is love (Eph 5²⁵), of the wife obedience and fear, or reverence (v.^{22, 33}, Col 3¹⁸), the husband being the head of the wife (v.^{22, 1 Co 11^{3, 7-11}}); she is saved 'through her childbearing' (1 Ti 2¹¹⁻¹⁵). The view of 1 P 3¹⁻⁷ is similar. It adds the idea that each must help the other as 'joint heirs of the grace of life,' their common prayers being hindered by any misunderstanding. Whether the subordination of the wife can be maintained as ultimate may be questioned in view of such passages as Gal 3²⁸.

10. Spiritual applications of the Marriage Figure.—In OT the god was regarded as baal, 'husband' or 'owner,' of his land, which was the 'mother' of its inhabitants. Hence 'it lay very near to think of the god as the husband of the worshipping nationality, or mother land' (W. R. Smith, Prophets, 171); the idea was probably not peculiar to Israel. Its most striking development is found in Hosea. Led, as it seems, by the experience of his own married life, he emphasizes the following points. (1) Israel's idolatry is whoredom, adultery, the following of strange lovers (note the connexion of idolatry with literal fornication). (2) J^h still loves her, as Hosea has loved his erring wife, and redeems her from slavery. (3) Hosea's own unquenchable love is but a faint shadow of J^h's. A similar idea is found in Is 54⁴; in spite of her unfaithfulness, Israel has not been irrevocably divorced (50¹). Cf. Jer 3. 31², Ezk 16, Mal 2¹. The direct spiritual or mystical application of Ca. is now generally abandoned.

In NT, Christ is the bridegroom (Mk 2¹⁹, Jn 3²⁹), the Church His bride. His love is emphasized, as in OT (Eph 5²⁵), and His bride too must be holy and without blemish (v.²⁷, 2 Co 11²). In OT the stress is laid on the ingratitude and misery of sin as 'adultery,' in NT on the need of positive holiness and purity. Rev 19⁷ develops the figure, the dazzling white of the bride's array being contrasted with the harlot's scarlet. In 21²⁻³ she is further identified with the New Jerusalem, two OT figures being combined, as in 2 Es 7²⁶. For the coming of her Bridegroom she is now waiting (Rev 22¹⁷, cf. Mt 25¹), and the final joy is represented under the symbol of the marriage feast (22², Rev 19⁹).

11. A general survey of the marriage laws and customs of the Jews shows that they cannot be regarded as a peculiar creation, apart from those of other nations. As already appears, they possess a remarkable affinity to those of other branches of the Semitic race; we may add the striking parallels found in the Code of Hammurabi, e.g. with regard to betrothal, dowry, and divorce. Anthropological researches have disclosed a wide general resemblance to the customs of more distant races. They have also emphasized the relative purity of OT sexual morality; in this, as in other respects, the Jews had their message for the world. But, of course, we shall not expect to find there the Christian standard. 'In the beginning' represents not the historical fact, but the ideal purpose. Gn 2 is an allegory of what marriage was intended to be, and of what it was understood to be in the best thought of the nation. This ideal was, however, seldom realized. Hence we cannot apply the letter of the Bible, or go to it for detailed rules. Where its rules are not obviously unsuited to modern conditions, or below the Christian level, a strange uncertainty obscures their exact interpretation, e.g. with regard to the prohibited degrees, divorce, or 'the husband of one wife'; there is even no direct condemnation of polygamy. On the other hand, the principle as expanded in NT is clear. It is the duty of the Christian to keep it steadily before him as the ideal of his own life. How far that ideal can be embodied in legislation and applied to the community as a whole must depend upon social conditions, and the general moral environment. C. W. EMMET.

MARSENA.—One of the seven princes who had the right of access to the royal presence (Est 1¹⁶).

MARSHAL.—1. For AV 'scribe' RV of Jg 5¹⁴ has 'marshal.' It was the duty of this officer to muster the men available for a campaign. In later times he kept a register of their names (2 K 25¹⁹, Jer 52²⁵, 2 Ch 26¹¹, where the same Heb. word is used; see also 1 Mac 5⁴). The staff (not 'pen') in his hand was an emblem of authority (Jg 5¹⁴; cf. Nu 21¹⁸). 2. The Heb. tiphsar is identified with the Assy. dupšarru, 'tablet-writer,' 'scribe.' In Jer 51²⁷ and Nah 3¹⁷ it denotes a military officer of high rank (AV 'captain,' RV 'marshal.' [The alteration was not imperatively necessary]).

MART.—See MARKET.

MARTHA

MARTHA is first mentioned (Lk 10³⁸⁻⁴²) as living in 'a certain village' with her sister Mary, and as receiving our Lord as He passed on His way. We know from Jn 11¹ and 12¹ that they afterwards lived with Lazarus, their brother, in Bethany; the village, then, may be either Bethany or where they lived before moving there. The characters of the two sisters are strongly marked and rendered vivid by their contrast; we shall therefore deal with the characteristics of both in this article.

Martha is over-anxious, and distracted with household duties; while Mary, as a disciple, sits 'at the feet' (cf. Ac 22³) of Jesus. Martha complained to our Lord of Mary's inactivity, and showed some temper, perhaps jealousy, by speaking of the matter to Him rather than to her. Jesus commenced His reply with 'Martha, Martha,' repeating the name as He did on another occasion of loving correction ('Simon, Simon,' Lk 22⁶), and blamed her for her outward agitation ('troubled') and inward anxiety ('careful,' RV 'anxious'), telling her that she lacked 'the one thing needful.' (For various readings see R.Vm.) He then praised Mary for having 'chosen that good part' which from its nature was everlasting, and so would 'not be taken from her.' He blamed Martha, not for her attentive service of love, but for allowing that service to irritate, agitate, and absorb her. Martha's character here is loving, active, self-reliant, practical, hasty; Mary's also loving, but thoughtful, humble, receptive, dependent, devoted. We find the same distinguishing marks in Jn 11, where the two sisters again appear in the narrative of the raising of Lazarus. When Jesus, after delaying for four days (v. 17) to come in response to their joint request (v. 2), arrived, Martha was the first to hear of His arrival, and at once went to meet Him. Mary, on the other hand, removed by her grief from the activities of life engaged in by her sister, was unaware of His coming. The moment, however, that she was sent for by Him (v. 28) she hurried to His presence, and fell down at His feet. The contrast of character seen in Lk 10 is here markedly present.

'Martha holds a conversation, argues with Him, remonstrates with Him, and in the very crisis of their grief shows her practical common sense in deprecating the removal of the stone. It is Mary who goes forth silently to meet Him, silently and tearfully, so that the bystanders suppose her to be going to weep at her brother's tomb; who, when she sees Jesus, falls down at His feet; who, uttering the same words of faith in His power as Martha (vv. 21-22), does not qualify them with the same reservation; who infects all the bystanders with the intensity of her sorrow, and crushes the human spirit of our Lord Himself with sympathetic grief' (Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 37).

The sisters appear again, and finally, in Jn 12, at the Supper given to our Lord at Bethany (see art. MARY, No. 2); and again their contrast of disposition is seen. Martha, as presumably the elder sister, 'served,' while Mary poured the precious ointment on the Saviour's head and feet. A comparison between this passage and Lk 10³⁸⁻⁴² shows, indeed, the same Martha, but now there is no record of her over-anxiety or distraction, or of any complaint of her sister's absorption in devotion to the Saviour; for doubtless she had herself now chosen that good part which would not be taken from her.

MARY.—The Gr. form of Heb. Miriam.

1. Mary, mother of James and Joseph, was one of the company of women who followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto Him, and who beheld from afar the crucifixion (Mt 27⁵⁶); she is spoken of as 'the other Mary' (27⁸¹ 28¹), as 'the mother of James the little and Joseph' (Mk 15⁴⁰), as 'Mary the [mother] of Joseph' (Mk 15⁴⁷), and as 'Mary the [mother] of James' (Mk 16¹, Lk 24¹⁰). That she is identical with 'Mary the [wife] of Clopas' (Jn 19²⁵) is almost, though not absolutely, certain; the uncertainty arising from the fact that as

'many women' (Mt 27⁵⁶) were present, St. John may have mentioned a Mary who was distinct from the Mary mentioned as present by the Synoptists. It is very doubtful whether this 'Mary of Clopas' was sister to the Virgin Mary. The words of St. John, 'There were standing by the cross of Jesus his mother and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene,' are ambiguous; for He may have intended to name four women as present—the Virgin's sister being one, and Mary of Clopas another—or only three, the Virgin's sister being described as 'Mary of Clopas.' Certain decision on the point seems impossible. Cf. BRETHREN OF THE LORD, ad fin.

2. Mary, the sister of Martha, is mentioned thrice in the Gospels—(1) as sitting at the feet of Jesus, while her sister served (Lk 10³⁸⁻⁴²); (2) as falling at His feet on His arrival to raise Lazarus from the grave (Jn 11²⁸⁻³²); (3) as anointing His feet during the feast at Bethany before the Passion (Mt 26⁷⁻¹⁰, Mk 14³⁻¹¹, Jn 12¹⁻⁸). The first and second of these occasions are dealt with in art. MARTHA, where the character of Mary is also treated of. It remains, therefore, for us only to consider the last.

The accounts of this incident as given in the first two Gospels and by St. John have been thought to disagree both as to where and when the feast was held. As regards the place, the Fourth Gospel mentions Martha as serving, and it has therefore been assumed that the gathering was in her house—a fact held to be in contradiction to the statement of Mt. and Mk. that it took place in the house of Simon the leper. But even if St. John's words do bear this meaning, there is not necessarily any disagreement, for her house might also be known as the house of Simon the leper. Her husband or her father may have been named Simon, and may have been a leper. In fact, we know far too little of the circumstances to be justified in charging the writers with inaccuracy. A careful study of St. John's statement, however, seems to show that the gathering was not in Martha's house; for the words 'Jesus came to Bethany, where Lazarus was, whom Jesus raised from the dead. So they made a supper there; and Martha served,' imply that the people of Bethany as a whole honoured our Lord, who had shown His power notably by raising their fellow-townsmen, with a public feast. At such a feast Lazarus would be one of those that would sit at meat with Him, and Martha assuredly would serve. The reason why they selected the house known as that of Simon the leper cannot be determined; but it may have been simply because it was the most suitable building.

As regards the date of the feast, John distinctly places our Lord's arrival as 'six days before the passover,' and implies that the feast was then held immediately. Mt. and Mk., however, first record the words of our Lord, in which He foretells His betrayal as about to occur 'after two days,' and then add their account of the feast in Bethany. If the Fourth Gospel be taken as definitely fixing the date as six days before the Passover, then the Synoptists must have placed their account of the incident later than it really happened. Probably this is what they did; and their reason for so doing is evidently to connect our Lord's rebuke of Judas (Mt 26¹³⁻¹⁴, Jn 12⁴) with the traitor's decision to betray Him. With this object in view they place the anointing by Mary immediately before the betrayal, introducing it with a vagueness of language which avoids any definite statement of time (Mt 26⁸ 'Now when Jesus was in Bethany'; Mk 14³ 'And while he was in Bethany'). There is really no contradiction in the records, but rather a change in the order of events, of deliberate purpose, by Mt. and Mk. for the purpose of elucidating the treachery of Judas.

Mary's act of devotion in anointing the head (Mt 26⁷) and feet (Jn 12³) of our Lord, and in wiping His feet with her hair, is in perfect keeping with her character as seen in Lk 10 and Jn 11—as she sat at His feet as a disciple, and fell at His feet in grief, so now in humble adoration she anoints His feet with the precious ointment, and wipes them with the hair of her head. The act called forth the hypocritical indignation of Judas. But Jesus at once silenced him, accepting the anointing as for His burial, and predicting that wherever His Gospel should be preached, there should her deed of love be remembered.

This act of Mary bears a strong resemblance to that recorded in Lk 7³⁶, and so similar is the general picture presented by the two narratives that many have thought them different accounts of the same event. The agreement between the narratives is striking; in both are presented to us acts of love on the part of devoted women; in both the house is said to belong to a 'Simon'; in both the depth of the devotion is shown by the feet being anointed, and being wiped with the loosened hair. On the other hand, however, many differences are to be noted. The hosts, though both named Simon, are distinct, the one being described as a Pharisee, the other as a leper; the scene is different, for in one case it is laid in Galilee, in the other in Judaea; the women are different, for one is Mary 'whom Jesus loved,' the other is an unnamed notorious sinner, such as we cannot suppose Mary ever to have been. The lessons drawn from the incidents by our Lord are different; in the one case He teaches love to God based on His forgiving mercy, in the other He foretells that the deed which Judas had described as 'waste' would for all time be an object of universal praise.

It must further be borne in mind that anointing was a usual courtesy; and that not unnaturally two deeply loving women would very probably at different times be impelled to show their devotion by humbly outpouring their precious gifts upon His sacred feet. Very possibly Mary never had heard of the poor sinful woman's act, occurring as it did probably two years previously and many miles away in Galilee; but even if she had, why should she not act similarly when her heart impelled her to a like act of devotion?

3. Mary Magdalene, probably so called as belonging to Magdala (possibly el-Mejdel, 3 miles north-west of Tiberias), a place not mentioned in NT, as Magadan is the correct reading of Mt 15³⁹. She is first mentioned in Lk 8³ as one of the women who, having been 'healed of evil spirits and infirmities, . . . ministered unto them (i.e. Jesus and the Apostles) of their substance.' Seven demons had been cast out of her (cf. Mk 16⁹)—a fact showing her affliction to have been of more than ordinary malignity (cf. Mt 12⁴, Mk 5⁹).

An unfortunate tradition identifies her with the unnamed sinful woman who anointed our Lord (Lk 7³⁷); and she has been thus regarded as the typical reformed 'fallen woman.' But St. Luke, though he placed them consecutively in his narrative, did not identify them; and as possession did not necessarily presuppose moral failing in the victim's character, we need not do so.

With the other women she accompanied Jesus on His last journey to Jerusalem; with them she beheld the crucifixion, at first 'from afar,' but afterwards standing by the Cross itself (Mt 27⁸, Jn 19²⁵); she followed the body to the burial (Mk 15⁴⁷), and then returned to prepare spices, resting on the Sabbath. On the first day of the week, while it was yet dark, she visited the sepulchre (Jn 20¹⁵). Finding the grave empty, she assumed that the body had been removed, and that she was thus deprived of the opportunity of paying her last tribute of love. She ran at once to Peter and John and said, 'They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid him.' They all three returned to the tomb, she remaining after they had left. Weeping she looked into the sepulchre, and saw two angels guarding the spot where Jesus had lain. To their question, 'Why weepest thou?' she repeated the words she had said to Peter and John. Apparently feeling that someone was standing behind her, she turned, and saw Jesus, and mistook Him for the gardener. The utterance of her name from His lips awoke her to the truth. She cried, 'Rabboni,' ('my Master')—and would have clasped His feet. But Jesus forbade her, saying, 'Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended unto the Father.' She must no longer know Him 'after the flesh' (2 Co 5¹⁶), but possess Him in spiritual communion. This, the first appearance of our Lord after His resurrection (Mk 16⁹), conferred a special honour on one whose life of loving ministry had proved the reality and depth of her devotion. She has been identified with Mary the sister of Lazarus, but without any grounds.

4. Mary the Virgin.—(1) Scripture data.—The NT gives but little information regarding her. In the Gospels she is directly mentioned only three times during Christ's ministry (Jn 2, Mk 3³¹⁻³⁵, Jn 19²⁵), and indirectly twice (Mk 6³, Lk 11²⁷). Outside the Gospels she is mentioned only once (Ac 1¹⁴).

The Apocryphal Gospels are full of legendary stories connected with her childhood and after-life. In them we are told that she was miraculously granted to her aged and childless parents, Joachim and Anna; that at the age of three she was dedicated to God at the Temple, where she remained until she was twelve; that during these years she increased in virtue, angels ministering unto her; that at twelve she was betrothed to Joseph, an aged widower, who was selected for her by a miraculous sign. The visit of Gabriel, the journey to Bethlehem, and the Saviour's birth in a cave are mentioned. It is added that at the moment of the birth of Jesus all nature was stilled; the fowls of the air stopped in their flight, men with uplifted arms drew them not down, dispersing sheep stood still, and kids with their lips to the water refrained from drinking.

The legendary character of the apocryphal records renders them worthless as evidence of the events that centre round the birth of our Lord, and we are therefore confined to the opening chapters of the First and Third Gospels. It has been felt that more evidence than two Gospels can supply might reasonably be expected for such a transcendent miracle. But consideration will show that the evidence could not be essentially greater than it is. For from the nature of the case the circumstances would be known only to Mary and Joseph. Mary must have known; and Joseph must also have known, if he were to continue to act as protector of his espoused wife. Now, the First Gospel narrates the events of the miraculous birth from the point of view of Joseph; while the narrative of the Third Gospel, with its intimate knowledge of the events which it so calmly, delicately, and yet clearly, sets forth, must, in the first instance, have been obtained from the Virgin herself. St. Luke has been proved to be a writer of great historical accuracy, and we may be certain that he admitted nothing within his record of which he had not thoroughly tested the truth; and it is difficult to believe that he would open his Gospel with a statement that he had accurately traced the course of the Gospel history from the first (1³), and then immediately proceed to insert untrustworthy information. Indeed, the wide-spread belief of the early Church in the Virgin-birth can be reasonably accounted for only by the occurrence of the fact itself. The date of St. Luke's Gospel is too early to allow of ideas of a Virgin-birth to pass into the Church from Gentile Christians; while to Jewish Christians the whole idea would be alien. To the Jew maternity, not virginity, was praiseworthy, and to him the thought of Jehovah becoming incarnate would be incredible; in fact, the Virgin-birth, so far from being an invention of Jewish Christians, must have been a severe stumbling-block to them in accepting their new faith.

The angel Gabriel, when sent to announce to Mary that she was to be the mother of our Lord, greeted her with the words, 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured,' or 'thou that art endued with grace' (Lk 1²⁸). (The Rhemish Version, following the Vulgate, renders 'full of grace'; a translation correct enough if meaning 'fully endowed with grace,' but incorrect if meaning 'fully bestowing grace'—a rendering the Gr. word cannot bear.) With absolute submission she received the announcement, merely replying, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word' (Lk 1³⁸). Soon she hastened to her 'kinswoman' (v.²⁸) Elisabeth, who greeted her with inspired utterance (vv.⁴²⁻⁴⁵). The Virgin then in reply uttered her noble hymn of exaltation. The Magnificat is largely based on the song of Hannah (1 S 2). Naturally at such a time of deep spiritual emotion she fell back on the OT Scriptures, which she had known since childhood. She remained with Elisabeth until the birth of the Baptist, and then returned to Nazareth. Having accompanied Joseph on his journey to be enrolled at Bethlehem, she was there delivered of her Son. When the forty days of purification were ended, they brought the Child to Jerusalem 'to present him to the Lord,' and to offer the necessary sacrifice. Being poor, they offered 'a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons' (Ex 12). Then was it that Simeon took the Child in his arms, and, blessing God, uttered his Nunc Dimittis, and foretold to Mary that a sword would yet pierce through her soul: a prophecy fulfilled during the period of her Son's ministry, and specially by His death. From the Temple they returned to Bethlehem, whence they fled to Egypt from the cruelty of Herod, on whose death they returned, and settled in Nazareth.

We next find the Virgin in Jerusalem, whither she had gone with Jesus, now aged twelve. When she discovered Him in the Temple she remonstrated, saying, 'Thy father and I have sought thee . . .' His reply, 'I must be in my Father's house' (Lk 2⁴⁹), shows that He had begun to feel, and expected His mother to realize, the gulf of Divine parentage that separated Him from all others. It taught her, perhaps for the first time, that her Son felt God to be in an especial sense His Father.

For the next eighteen years our Lord was subject to home-authority at Nazareth. During this time His mother lost the protection of Joseph; for, if he were alive, he certainly would have been mentioned in Jn 2¹, Mk 3³, Jn 19²⁶. Doubtless Joseph's place in the home was filled in a measure by our Lord; and these must have been years of wonderful peace to the Virgin.

When, however, Jesus once entered upon His ministry, a time of real difficulty to her began. She, with the secret of His birth ever present, must have anticipated for Him a career of Messianic success; whereas He, with the knowledge of His Divine Sonship, was compelled to sever Himself once and for all from her control. We are not, then, surprised to find that each of the three recorded incidents which bring our Lord and the Virgin together during the years of ministry centre round the question of His absolute independence of her authority. Thus His first miracle (Jn 2) gave Him an occasion for definitely teaching her that she must no longer impress her will upon Him. His reply, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee?' has assuredly no roughness in it (see Jn 19²⁶); yet the fact that He does not address her as 'mother' can have but one meaning. Again, when the pressure of His ministry leads to His neglect of food, His friends said, 'He is beside himself' (Mk 3²¹). 'His friends' were His mother and brethren (v. 31); and when their message reached Him through the crowd He stretched forth His hand (Mt 12⁴⁹), and said, 'Behold my mother and brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother'—words which amount to, 'I, in working out the world's redemption, can acknowledge only spiritual relationships.' Similarly, as He hung on the Cross, and looked down upon His broken-hearted mother, He tenderly provided for her future, and entrusted her to the care of the Apostle of love. Still, even then He was unable to name her as His own mother, but gave her, in the person of St. John, the protection of a son. 'Woman (not 'mother'), behold thy son.' 'Son, behold thy mother' (Jn 19²⁶⁻²⁷). Exactly parallel to these is His answer to the exclamation of the unknown woman, 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee'—'Yea 'ather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it' (Lk 11²⁷⁻²⁸).

It is, we think, impossible to exaggerate the bitter trial of these years to the Virgin Mary; but God's grace kept her throughout submissive, patient, and trustful.

And it is a happy thing that the last mention we have of her in the NT is when she is gathered with the infant Church after the Ascension praying in the upper room.

(2) Place of the Virgin in the Christian Church.—The position she ought to hold is clear from the NT, and has been well described as follows: 'So far as St. Mary is portrayed to us in the Scripture she is, as we should have expected, the most tender, the most faithful, humble, patient, and loving woman, but a woman still.' Certain sections of the Church, however, have not been satisfied with granting her this limited reverence, but have done her the questionable honour of claiming for her the worship of the Church. Epiphanius (A.D. 370) mentions heretics, called Collyridians, who worshipped the Virgin, and he strongly reproves them. But before long the error found too ready a welcome within the Church, and a considerable impulse was given to it at the time of the Nestorian Controversy (A.D. 431). In meeting the error of Nestorius the Church insisted that our Lord had, with His human and Divine natures, but one personality, and that Divine; and therefore it emphasized the fact that He who was born of the Virgin was very God. It thus became customary to give the Virgin the title Theotokos. This title seems to have been specially chosen to emphasize the fact that, by being the mother of our Lord, she brought the incarnate God into life, and, at the same time, to avoid calling her 'mother of God.' This latter title would convey ideas of authority and right of control on the part of the parent, and of duty and obedience on the part of the child—ideas which were rightly felt to have no place in the relationship between Christ and His mother; therefore it was avoided. It would have been easy for the Church then to call her 'mother of God,' but it did not. Notwithstanding this cautious treatment, undue reverence towards her rapidly increased, and 'mother of God' became largely applied to her, and her worship gained much ground.

With the worship of the Virgin there gradually arose a belief in her sinlessness. The early Fathers, while claiming for her the perfection of womanhood, state distinctly their belief that she shared in man's fallen nature and that she had committed actual sin. But Augustine, though not denying her participation in original sin, suggested her freedom through grace from actual transgression. Ultimately her freedom from all taint of sin, whether original or actual, was officially declared an article of faith in the Roman Church by the dogma of the Immaculate Conception decreed by Pius IX. (1854). Similar to this erroneous development was the growth of the belief in the miraculous translation of her body after death. The fanciful legends found in the Apocryphal Gospels regarding her death were readily seized upon as if supplying the requisite evidence; and in due course it became the authoritative doctrine of both the Roman and Greek Churches. The Festival of her Assumption is held on the 15th of August.

(3) The perpetual Virginity of Mary is a matter incapable of proof with the evidence available. With the Church of Rome and the Greek Church it is an essential dogma; but with the other branches of Christendom it is left undefined. In forming a decision on the point many feel the great weight of the undeniable sentiment of the Church for centuries, while others see in this very sentiment an unwholesome view, which overestimated the sanctity of virginity, and depreciated the sanctity of matrimony. From the NT we receive no certain guidance; for the 'till' of Mt 1² is undecisive, as its use shows (e.g. Gn 28¹⁸, Dt 34¹, 1 S 15²⁵, 2 S 6²²), while 'the brethren' of our Lord may mean either the children of Joseph and Mary, or the children of Joseph by a former marriage, or even the cousins of Jesus. The first of these views is specially associated with the name of Helvidius, the second with that of Epiphanius, the third with that of Jerome. See BRETHEREN OF THE LORD.

MASCHIL.—See PSALMS, p. 772^a.

MASH.—One of the sons of Aram, Gn 10²¹. The parallel passage, 1 Ch 1¹⁷, gives Meshech (wh. see), as also does LXX in both passages. But this is wrong, as Meshech was Japhetic. Either Mons Massius is meant, or a region and people in the Syro-Arabian desert corresponding to the 'desert of Mash' of the Assyrian inscriptions. J. F. M'CURDY.

MASHAL (1 Ch 6⁷⁴).—See MISHAL.

MASIAS.—One of 'Solomon's servants' (1 Es 5³⁴); is absent from the parallel list in Ezra.

MASON.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 3.

MASRE KAH.—Mentioned as the home of an Edomite king, Samlah (Gn 36³⁶ = 1 Ch 1⁴⁷). The locality has not been identified.

MASSA.—A son of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁴ = 1 Ch 1³⁰), representing a North Arabian tribe. Its exact location is unknown, but it seems to be mentioned in an inscription containing a report to king Ashurbanipal of Assyria (b.c. 668–626) of an attack made by the Massorites upon the people of Nebaioth (wh. see). The tribe of Massa would therefore seem to have lived not very far east of Palestine. This view is confirmed by the fact that Pr 31¹⁰ is addressed to 'Lemuel, king of Massa' (see RVm), since Pr 30 and 31 belong to the border-land wisdom of Israel. It is probably not to be read in Pr 30¹, where the word 'Massa' (RVm) is presumably a gloss. Cf. MESHA, p. 607^a. J. F. M'CURDY.

MASSAH AND MERIBAH.—Ex 17⁷ (JE) tells of a miraculous gift of water at a spot near Horeb, which was called Massah and Meribah ('testing' and 'contention') because the people tested Jahweh by doubting His providence and contended with Moses. It is implied that this occurred about a year after the Exodus. Nu 20¹³, a later narrative (P), gives a similar account, but puts it thirty-seven years later, and with important variations. The scene is now laid at Kadesh, which receives the name Meribah from the contention of Israel with Jahweh. Moses and Aaron also sin against Him. There are references to the first passage in Dt 6¹⁶ 9²², Ps 95⁸; and to the second in Dt 32²⁴, Ps 106²⁵; in Ps 81⁷ the two are apparently confused. Dt 33⁸ regards the events at Kadesh in a peculiar light: here Jahweh proves Levi at Massah and strives with (or for) him at Meribah. The tendency of recent criticism is to consider Ex 17 and Nu 20 as duplicate records of the same event, the locality of which must be fixed at Kadesh, where the spring 'Ain Kadis' creates a fertile oasis. There the tribes were blended into a strong unity. Meribah, on this interpretation, originally signified 'the place of judgment,' because Moses delivered there his oracular sentences; cf. 'waters of Meribah' and 'En-mishpat' (Gn 14⁷).

Massah never stands alone, save at Dt 6¹⁶ 9²². As variants of 'Meribah' we find 'waters of Meribah,' 'waters of Meribah-kadesh,' and, at Ezk 47¹⁹, 'waters of Meriboth-kadesh,' if the reading be correct. Ezk 47¹⁹ 48²⁸ place Meribah on the southern border of the restored nation. It has been plausibly suggested that Meriboth-kadesh is the correct reading instead of 'ten thousands of holy ones' in Dt 33². J. TAYLOR.

MASSIAS (1 Es 9²⁷) = Maaseiah Ezr 10²².

MASSORAH, MASSORETES.—See TEXT OF OT.

MASTER.—The Greek word for teacher is tr. 'master' in 2 Mac 1¹⁰, Ja 3¹, and in all its occurrences in the Gospels except Lk 2⁴⁶, where it is 'doctor,' and Jn 3² 'teacher.' See LORD and SLAVE.

MASTIC (Isort, Gn 37²⁸ RVm, EV 'balm' (wh. see), schinos, Sus 5⁴).—A dicaceous shrub (the pistacia lentiscus L.), found in thickets on the Mediterranean seaboard. The gum obtained through cuttings in the bark is chewed as a dentifrice, and also for its pleasant taste and perfume. It is sometimes used as a flavouring by confectioners.

MATHELAS (1 Es 9¹¹) = Maaseiah, Ezr 10¹⁸.

MATRED.—The mother-in-law (?) of Hadar (Gn.) or Hadad (Ch.), one of the kings of Edom, Gn 36³⁹ = 1 Ch 1⁴⁰. In Gn. the LXX and Pesh. make Matred the son not the daughter of Me-zahab (wh. see).

MATRITES.—A family of the tribe of Benjamin to which Saul belonged (1 S 10²¹).

MATTAN.—1. Priest of Baal (2 K 11¹⁸, 2 Ch 23¹⁷). 2. Father of Shephatiah, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer 38¹).

MATTANAH.—A 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 21¹⁸, 19). No satisfactory identification has been made.

MATTANIAH.—1. The original name of king Zedekiah (2 K 24¹⁷). 2. An Asaphite (1 Ch 9¹⁵), leader of the Temple choir (Neh 11¹⁷ 12⁸), door-keeper (12²⁵, 35). 3. Mattaniah in 2 Ch 20¹⁴ should probably be identified with the preceding. 4. 5. 6. 7. Four of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10²⁸ (called in 1 Es 9²⁷ Matthanias), v. 27 (called in 1 Es 9²⁸ Othonias), v. 30 (called in 1 Es 9³¹ Matthanias), v. 32 (combined in 1 Es 9³⁴ with the following Mattanai into Mamnitanemus). 8. A Levite who had charge of the off-rings (Neh 13¹³). 9. A Hemanite (1 Ch 25¹⁶). 10. An Asaphite (2 Ch 29¹³).

MATTATHA.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³¹).

MATTATHIAS.—1. A Jew, who had married a foreign wife (1 Es 9³³); called in Ezr 10²⁸ Mattattah. 2. One of the men who stood at the right hand of Ezra during the reading of the Law (1 Es 9⁴³); in Neh 8⁴ Mattithiah. 3. The father of the five Maccabean brothers (1 Mac 2¹, 14, 16¹, 19, 24, 27, 39, 46, 49 14²⁰). See MACCABEES, § 1. 4. A captain in the army of Jonathan the Maccabean (1 Mac 11⁷⁰). 5. A son of Simon the high priest, who was murdered, together with his father and brother Judas, at a banquet at Dok, by Ptolemy the son of Abubus (1 Mac 16¹⁴⁻¹⁶). 6. One of three envoys sent by Nicanor to treat with Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 14¹⁹). 7. 8. Two ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3²⁸, 29).

MATTATTAH.—See MATTATHIAS, No. 1.

MATTENAI.—1. 2. Two of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10²⁸ (called in 1 Es 9³³ Maltanneus), v. 32 (combined in 1 Es 9³⁴ with the preceding Mattaniah into Mamnitanemus). 3. Representative of the priestly house of Joiarib in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12¹⁹).

MATTAN.—Grandfather of Joseph (Mt 1¹⁴); perhaps to be identified with Matthai, who occupies the same place in Lk 3³⁴.

MATTANIAS.—1. 1 Es 9²⁷ = Mattaniah, Ezr 10²². 2. 1 Es 9³¹ = Mattaniah, Ezr 10²⁰.

MATTATH.—1. See MATTAN. 2. Another ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3²⁸, 29).

MATTHEW (APOSTLE).—Two sets of parallel passages, both from the Petrine tradition, tell us of this chosen companion of our Lord. The first (Mt 9¹, Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁷) narrates his call. He was named both 'Matthew' (Mt.) and 'Levi' (Mk. [where some Western MSS read 'James'] and Lk.), and was the son of Alphaeus (Mk.). He was a publican (Lk.), and was 'sitting at the place of toll' (Mt., Mk., Lk.) near Capernaum, which lay on the road from Damascus to the Mediterranean; here he collected dues for Herod the tetrarch. No doubt he was only an agent, not one of the wealthy farmers of the taxes. Nevertheless he must have been fairly rich, and had much to give up in following Jesus. The call is followed by a meal (Mt., Mk.), a great feast given to Jesus by Matthew himself (Lk.), which roused the anger of the 'scribes of the Pharisees.' The name 'Matthew' probably means 'Gift of Jahweh' (cf. 'Theodore'), and is another form of 'Matthias'; though some take it as meaning 'strong,' 'manly.' It was doubtless given to Levi as an additional name, perhaps (like 'Peter') by our Lord Himself.

The second set of passages gives the list of the Twelve (Mt 10¹, Mk 3¹⁸, Lk 6¹⁵, Ac 1¹³). In all these the surname 'Matthew' is given, not 'Levi,' just as 'Bartholomew' and 'Thomas' are surnames; and in all four Bartholomew, Matthew, Thomas, and James the (son) of Alphaeus are mentioned together, though not always in the same order. In two lists (Mt., Ac.) Matthew comes next to James (though they are not joined together as a pair); in the other two, next but one. If then we take the view that this James is neither the brother of our Lord, nor yet the same as James the Little (Mk 15⁴⁰), and if we negative the idea that 'Alphæus' (Aram. Khalphai) and 'Clopas' are one name, there is perhaps something to be said for the opinion that Matthew and James were brothers. But they are not mentioned together elsewhere. Only in the Mt. list is the designation 'the publican' added. For Matthew's connexion with the First Gospel, see the next article. We have no trustworthy information as to his later career.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—1. The First Gospel in the Early Church.—Papias (c. A.D. 140 or earlier), as quoted by Eusebius (HE iii. 39), says: 'Matthew, however, composed the logia in the Hebrew dialect, but each one interpreted them as he was able.' This remark occurs in his work The Exposition of the Lord's logia, and is practically all the external information that we have about the Matthaean Gospel, except that Irenæus says: 'Matthew among the Hebrews published a Gospel in their own dialect, when Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome and founding the Church' (Hæc. iii. 1). Irenæus is probably quoting from Papias. In the 4th cent., Eusebius tells a story of Pantænus finding in the 2nd cent. the original Aramaic Mt. in India, but the story is very uncertain; Epiphanius says that the Aramaic Gospel of Matthew existed in his day, in the possession of an Ebionite sect (distinguished in modern times as Elkesaites), and describes it; and Jerome describes what he alleges to be the original of Mt. as in use among the Nazarenes, and says that he translated it into Greek. We have therefore first to interpret Papias, and then to deal with the later testimonies.

(a) What does Papias mean by the 'logia'?—The word may be translated 'oracles' or 'discourses,' and it is much disputed which sense we should take here. The interpretation of many (Westcott, Lightfoot, etc.), who choose the translation 'oracles' is that it is an early word for the Gospels. The 'Lord's logia' which Papias expounded would be the story of our Lord's life and teaching, and Papias would mean that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew (cf. Ro 3² where 'oracles' may mean only God's sayings, but more naturally may be taken to mean the whole of the OT). Certainly the word in the 1st cent. was used of any sacred writing, whether discourse or narrative. Others deny that at so early a date a NT writing as such could be called 'the Lord's oracles,' and take logia to mean 'discourses.' But from this point critics have diverged. Many understand Papias to mean that Matthew wrote our Lord's sayings only; but this does not appear from his words. The argument against the translation 'oracles' is deprived of force if we understand the reference to be, not necessarily to a written record, but to the Gospel story pure and simple, whether written or oral. Papias would then mean that Matthew wrote down the Gospel story in Hebrew. Even if we take the translation 'discourses' or 'sayings,' it is extremely unlikely that Papias meant that Matthew's Gospel contained no narrative, though it is quite likely that discourse predominated in it. (For Renan's theory, see art. MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO]).

(b) What does Papias mean about the original language of Matthew?—All the testimony as to its being Aramaic ['Hebrew'] probably reduces itself to this one sentence. One interpretation is that Matthew wrote down Jesus' sayings in Aramaic, but did not expound them, and that Papias' own book had this object. But most writers understand Papias to mean that individuals translated Matthew's work into their own language for themselves. If so, this period must have been over in Papias' time, for he uses the past tense 'interpreted'; he must have had a Greek Matthew before him. And our Mt. is clearly an original composition, derived from Greek sources, such as Mk. and other documents, at any rate for the most part (see art. GOSPELS), and is not a translation from Aramaic. There is no reason for thinking that the Matthaean Gospel actually used by Papias was other than ours. We have then to ask, Did Papias make a mistake about the original language? We know that there was a 'Gospel of the Hebrews' current early in the 2nd cent., known to Hegesippus, probably to the writer of the Clementine Homilies, perhaps to Ignatius. Jerome knew of it and gives us extracts from it; and Epiphanius knew of a derived or kindred Gospel, used by the sect of the Nazarenes and containing several episodes different from our canonical narrative, e.g. in connexion with our Lord's baptism, and His appearance to James after the Resurrection (cf. 1 Co 15⁷). In this Gospel the Holy Spirit is called the 'Mother' of Christ, the word 'Spirit' being feminine in Aramaic. Most critics (but Hilgenfeld and Harnack are exceptions) agree that this Gospel is later than our canonical four; Zahn gives good reasons for thinking that it is derived directly from our Mt.; and it is possible that Papias made the mistake fallen into later by Jerome, and, knowing that there was an Aramaic Gospel in existence purporting to be by Matthew (though he had apparently never seen it), thought that it was St. Matthew's in reality. Eusebius says that he was a man of not much understanding. He may, then, have erroneously thought that St. Matthew, writing in Palestine for Jewish Christians, must have written in Aramaic (Salmon). Another solution, however, is more commonly received. Papias is our only authority before Irenæus for attributing a Gospel to St. Matthew. Possibly then the Apostle Matthew may have written in Aramaic a document incorporated in, or largely drawn upon by, our First Gospel—e.g. the original of the Greek 'non-Markan document' (see art. GOSPELS); and this fact may account for his name being attached even early in the 2nd cent. to the First Gospel. Both these solutions seem to be quite possible; but it is not possible to suppose that our First Gospel was originally written in Aramaic.

Quotations from Mt. are found in the Epistle of 'Barnabas' (c. A.D. 100?), one with the formula 'as it is written.'

2. Contents, sources, and characteristics of the Gospel. The Birth narrative (chs. 1. 2) rests on an unknown source (see LUKE [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 3), and is independent of the other Synoptics. The Baptist's preaching, Jesus' baptism and temptation, the early ministry, and the calling of Simon, Andrew, James, and John (chs. 3. 4) follow the 'Petrine tradition' with additions from the non-Markan source (esp. in the Baptism and Temptation), from which also the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7) comes. The narrative of the Galilaean ministry (which extends from 4¹² to 16³⁰) is taken mainly from these two sources, but the order of neither is strictly adhered to. It includes the Charge to the Twelve (ch. 10), a large number of parables (ch. 13), and many miracles, some peculiar to Mt. From 16¹ to the end of the book is the story of the Passion with the preparation for it, including the Transfiguration (17¹⁻⁸), the Discourse on the End (ch. 24), the parables which specially speak of the Passion and of the End of the World (20¹, 21¹⁻²², 22¹⁻²⁵, 25¹⁻¹³), and warnings against Pharisaism (esp. ch. 23). In the story of the Passion itself Mt. follows Mk. very closely, but has some additions.

We may now consider the manner in which the First Evangelist has treated his sources. We are at once struck with a great difference of order. Incidents are grouped together according to subject rather than to chronology. The Sermon on the Mount is a collection of sayings which were uttered at different times, as we see from Lk., where they occur in various contexts (Lk 6²⁰⁻⁴⁹ 11²⁻⁴ 12²²⁻³⁷, etc.). It contains a passage (Mt 5²⁰) which would suggest (if Mt. were a chronological work) that the breach with the Pharisees had already, at that early stage, taken place; whereas Mk. shows how gradual the breach was (see the various stages in Mk. 2¹⁻²⁸, 24 3²² 7⁶). At first Jesus treats the Pharisees gently, and gives them explanations of difficulties; only when they are obstinate does He denounce them. This shows that Mt 5²⁰ is not in its chronological order. Then, again, many of the parables in Mt. are grouped together (see ch. 13), but they would not have been spoken all at one time. The Charge to the Twelve (ch. 10) includes much of the Charge to the Seventy and other sayings to the disciples in Lk 6, 12-14, 17. The Discourse on the End in Mt. is grouped (see § 5). The groups in Mt. are often closed with a formula taken from Dt 31¹ [LXX]; thus—7²⁸ (Sermon on the Mount), 11¹ (Charge to the Twelve), 13⁴³ (group of parables), 19¹ 26¹ (groups of warnings). In fact, the First Evangelist aims at a synoptic view of Christ's teaching as a whole rather than at a chronological statement. In one or two particulars only, Mt. seems to borrow the grouping tendency from Mk., as in the case of the anointing at Bethany (Mt 26⁶, Mk 14³), which is related in close connexion with Judas' compact with the chief priests (the Evangelists seem to mean that the 'waste' of the ointment greatly influenced the traitor's action), whereas Jn. (12¹) gives the more chronologically correct position of the incident, 'six days before the passover.'

Another feature of Mt. is the frequency of quotations from the OT, and the mystical interpretations given. The interests of the First Evangelist lie largely in the fulfilment of prophecy (5¹⁷). The principles of interpretation common among the Jews are applied; a text, for example, which in its literal sense applies to the Exodus, is taken to refer to the departure of the Child Jesus from Egypt (2¹⁴, Hos 11¹), and receives of events as coming to pass that fulfilled (12¹⁷; cf. 21⁵, 17¹, 23⁴ 41⁷ 12¹⁷). It is thought that the second ass, which is found only in the Matthean narrative of the Triumphal Entry (21⁵), the ass and 'a colt the foal of an ass'), is due to the influence of the words of the prophecy, Zec 9⁹; for the narrative is taken closely from the Petrine tradition, but the second ass of Mt. is an addition to it. So the 'wine mingled with gall' (27³⁴) for the 'wine mingled with myrrh' (lit. 'myrrh wine') of the Petrine tradition (Mk 15²³) seems to be due to Ps 69²¹. The treatment of the non-Markan source is similar. In Lk 11²⁹ Jesus refers to the sign of Jonah and to the repentance of the Ninevites, to whom, by his preaching, Jonah was a sign; but the First Evangelist sees (with justice) a type of our Lord's Resurrection in the story of Jonah in the belly of the whale (Mt 12⁴⁰); see, further, Robinson, Study of the Gospels, p. 96 f.). The matter peculiar to Mt. is large in amount. Besides the Birth narratives we have the healing of the two blind men (9²⁷), and of the blind and dumb demoniacs (9³², 12²¹), thought by some to be one incident), the walking of St. Peter on the water (14²⁸), the coin in the fish's mouth (17²⁴), Pilate's wife's dream and Pilate's washing of his hands (27¹⁹ 24), and some other incidents, especially in the Passion; also many sayings, and part of the Sermon on the Mount.

3. Purpose of the Gospel.—That it was written for Jewish Christians appears from the frequency of OT quotations, from the mystical interpretations, and from the absence of explanations of Jewish customs. Yet the author was no Judaizer. He alone tells us of the visit of the Gentile Magi; with Lk. he relates the healing of the Gentile centurion's servant (8¹); and the admission of the Gentiles to the Kingdom and the rejection of some of the Jews is announced in 8¹⁴ (cf. 21⁴³). The Gospel is to be preached, and baptism and discipleship are to be given, to all nations (28¹⁹).

4. Author.—The question of authorship has partly been anticipated in § 1. The earliest MSS give the title simply as 'According to Matthew,' and similar titles to the other Gospels. The titles need not be, indeed almost certainly are not, those of the original authors, but they must have been applied at a very early date. What do they imply? It has been thought that they meant merely that the Gospels reflected the preaching of the persons named (so Bartlett in Hastings' DB iii. 297). But in that case the Second Gospel would be entitled 'According to Peter,' a title very close to Justin Martyr's 'Memoirs of Peter,' which probably refers to Mk. (see art. MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 1). There can be little doubt that those who used the title in the second half of the 2nd cent. meant it to imply authorship. It is a question, however, whether at the first the phrase actually meant that the Gospel in its latest form was the work of the author named. For lack of external information as to the First Gospel, we are driven to internal evidence. But this would not lead us to think of the author or (if the phrase be preferred) the editor who brought the Gospel into its present form as an Apostle and eye-witness. Unlike Jn., which claims to be written by an eye-witness (Jn. 1¹⁴ 19³⁴),—a claim fully borne out by internal evidence,—and unlike Mk., which abounds in autoptic characteristics,—though in that case we have reason to think that they come not from the writer, but from the writer's teacher,—the First Gospel has none of the marks of an eye-witness. The autoptic characteristics of the Petrine tradition have in many cases been taken away by the alterations introduced by the First Evangelist (see art. MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 4). The conclusion is that it was not the Apostle Matthew who gave us the Gospel in its present form. The name comes simply from ecclesiastical testimony of the 2nd cent., and not from the sacred writings themselves. Yet the Matthean tradition is strong. Even Papias, apparently, thought that the Greek Matthean Gospel which he used was a translation of the Apostle's work. And there is no rival claimant to the authorship. On the other hand, Matthew, as an Apostle, was a sufficiently prominent person for an anonymous work to be assigned to him, especially if he had written a work which was one of its sources. These considerations may lead us to prefer the second solution mentioned above, in § 1 (b)—that Matthew the Apostle composed the Aramaic original of the Greek 'non-Markan document,' the 'Logia' (not consisting of sayings only, but of sayings and narrative combined), and that in this way his name became attached to the First Gospel. The real author must remain unknown. That the work of an Apostle should have entirely disappeared is not a very serious difficulty when we reflect on the number of St. Paul's Epistles that have perished.

5. Date.—Irenæus (Hær. iii. 1. 1) explicitly states that Matthew wrote first, 'while Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel in Rome,' but that Mark wrote 'after their departure.' In the Muratorian Fragment (c. 180-200?), a list of NT books, Mt. seems to have come before the rest, though, as it is incomplete at the beginning, this is not certain. This probably was also the general opinion of the succeeding ages, and finds an echo in Augustine's dictum that Mk. is an abbreviation of Mt. But internal evidence strongly negatives the idea of the priority of Mt. (see MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO]). Though it is possible to make some reservations as to editorial touches, Mk. is seen to have been in the hands of the Matthean writer; and whatever date we fix for it must be the earliest limit for Mt. We can get a further indication from the Discourse on the End (Mt. 24¹⁴). Both in Mt. and Mk. (whatever be thought of Lk.) the discourse is reported as if the fulfilment were only in prospect, and in a manner that would be unlikely if the siege of Titus had already taken place. This conclusion becomes still more likely when we compare the three Synoptics together. They all three begin with the destruction of the Temple (Mk 13¹⁻² and || Mt. Lk.). In Mk. and Lk. there follows a discourse which apparently speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem (Mk 13³⁴⁻⁴⁰), and then there comes in Mk. and partly in Lk. a passage which seems to refer to the end of the world (Mk 13³⁷⁻³⁷). But the First Evangelist, as so often, weaves together the sayings of Jesus which in Mk. are distinct, and makes the two events apparently one. (Cf. Mt 24² with Mk 13³⁴, Lk 21⁷). Thus the writer must have thought that both events would be synchronous, and therefore must have written his account of the prophecy before the Fall of Jerusalem. That this is so we may see by a contrast. The Fourth Evangelist gives a prophecy of our Lord which had been fulfilled when he wrote; but he refers to the fulfilment (Jn 21¹⁸, the death of St. Peter). It is, of course, possible that the Discourse was written down as we have it in Mt. before A.D. 70, and that a later writer incorporated it unchanged. But would not the later writer have betrayed some consciousness of the fulfilment of the prophecy? For these reasons a date before A.D. 70 is probable. But this conclusion is much disputed, and in any case we must acknowledge that the authorship and date of the First Gospel are among the most perplexing of all NT problems.

MATTHEW'S BIBLE.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS, § 20.

MATTHIAS ('gift of Jehovah').—The disciple who was nominated against Joseph Barsabbas (see JOSEPH [in NT], No. 6) and chosen to fill the place of Judas. Of his antecedents the NT records nothing beyond the fact that he had been a disciple from the beginning of the Lord's ministry; and of his subsequent career it tells nothing whatsoever.

Tradition is more lavish of information. Matthias, it is said, had been one of the Seventy (cf. Lk 10¹), and he justified his election by evangelizing the savages of Ethiopia and writing two books—a Gospel and a work entitled 'Traditions' (Paradoxeis). From the latter Clement of Alexandria quotes two sayings: (1) 'Wonder at the things before you' ('making this,' he explains, 'the first step to the knowledge beyond.' Cf. Plato's doctrine that wonder is the beginning of philosophy); (2) 'If an elect man's neighbour sin, the elect man has sinned.'

It is thought by some that the election of Matthias was a blunder, due to the impetuosity of St. Peter; and there is reason for the opinion. (1) It was a hasty step. It was taken during the season when the disciples were waiting, according to the Lord's command (Ac 1⁴), for 'the promise of the Father,' the Baptism of the Spirit. (2) The method was objectionable. (a) The qualification required in the new Apostle was not a spiritual one: he must be a man who had been with Jesus all along. It was his lack of this qualification that made the Jewish Christians deny St. Paul's Apostleship. (b) They prayed for guidance, and then, instead of trusting to Divine direction, they had recourse to the superstitious practice of casting lots—a practice nowhere else observed in the Apostolic Church. Had they waited until they were endued with power from on high, they would have acted otherwise. As a matter of fact the election of Matthias was set aside by God. The true successor to the vacant office was St. Paul.

DAVID SMITH.

MATTITHIAH.—1. One of the sons of Nebo who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²); called in 1 Es 9³⁶ Masithas. 2. A Korahite Levite (1 Ch 9³¹). 3. A Levite of the guild of Jeduthun (1 Ch 15¹⁸ = 25²¹). 4. An Asaphite Levite (1 Ch 16⁵). 5. See Matthias, No. 2.

MATTOCK.—The mattock of Is 7²⁵ is rather the hoe with which land inaccessible to the plough was hoed—noun and verb being the same here, cf. 5⁸ RV 'hoed' for AV 'dugged.' For descriptions and illustrations of the triangular hoe and the mattock, or pick, of modern Palestine, see PEFSI, 1901, p. 110 f., and Hastings' DB iii. 306. The passage 1 S 13³⁰ is very corrupt, and in v. 29 at least 'mattock' should probably be 'goat.' The same applies to 2 Ch 34⁶, where Avm suggests 'mauls,' and RV has 'ruins.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MAUL.—See ARMOUR AND ARMS, § 1 (f).

MAUZZIM.—The Heb. phrase ʿēdōh māʿuzzīm (Dn 11²³) has been very variously understood. We need not discuss the different renderings that have been proposed, as there is now practical agreement to tr. with RV 'god of fortresses,' and 'fortresses' for māʿuzzīm again in v. 29. It is not so easy to decide which god is intended. Antiochus Epiphanes is the king referred to. He had begun to build a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in Antioch (Livy, xli. 20). Holtzmann (Guthe's Bibelwörterbuch, s.v.), and others, therefore, conclude that he is the god meant. But Antiochus also sent 'an old man from Athens' to 'pollute the temple in Jerusalem, and to call it the temple of Jupiter Olympius' (2 Mac 6²). Hence some have claimed consideration for the Olympian Jupiter. On the available data, no certain decision is possible.

W. EWING.

MAW.—This Old Eng. word for the stomach is used by AV in Dt 18³, and by RV in Jer 51¹⁴. Coverdale tr. 1 K 22²⁴, 'A certayne man bended his bowe harde and shott the kyng of Israel betwene the mawe and the longes.'

MAZITIAS (1 Es 9³⁶) = Mattithiah, Ezr 10².

MAZZALOTH, MAZZAROTH.—See STARS.

MAZZEBAH.—See PILLAR.

MAZZOTH.—See LEAVEN, PASSOVER.

MEADOW.—This word disappears from RV in the only two places where it is found in AV (Gn 41² = 18, Jg 20²³). In the former passages the Heb. reads āchā, an Egyptian word which probably means 'reed grass' (RV), and may possibly cover the natural pasture lands of old Egypt. It occurs again in Job 8¹¹ (EV 'rush,' RVm 'papyrus'). In Jg 20²³, where RV simply transliterates 'Maareh-geba,' it is practically certain that we should read maʿarab, and translate 'from the west of Gibeah'; see GIBEAH, No. 2. In RV 'meadows' stands for 'ārōth (Is 19⁷, AV 'paper reeds'), where it is possible that 'ārōth may be a misreading for āchōth. W. EWING.

MEAL.—See FOOD, § 2.

MEAL-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE, § 11.

MEALS.—In the art. FOOD attention was confined to the various articles of diet supplied by the vegetable and animal kingdoms. It now remains to study the methods by which these were prepared for the table, the times at which, and the manner in which, they were served.

1. Preparation of food.—The preparation of the food of the household was the task of the women thereof, from the days of Sarah (Gn 18⁶) to those of Martha. Only the houses of royalty and the great nobles had apartments specially adapted for use as kitchens, with professional cooks, male (1 S 9²) and female (8¹³). At the chief sanctuaries, also, there must have been some provision for the cooking of the sacrificial meals (1 S 2³⁶), although Ezekiel (40²⁴ RV) is the first to mention 'boiling-houses' in this connexion (cf. Ex 29¹¹, Lv 8³).

The usual method of cooking and serving meat can have differed but little from that most commonly observed at the present day in Syria. The meat is cut into larger or smaller pieces (1 S 2¹³, Ezk 24²⁷; cf. Micah's telling metaphor 3²), and put into the cooking-pot with water. It is then left to stew, vegetables and rice being added. Such a stew—with perhaps crushed wheat in place of rice—was the 'savory meat' which Rebekah prepared for her husband from 'two kids of the goats' (Gn 27⁹). When meat was boiled in a larger quantity of water than was required for the more usual stew, the result was the broth of Jg 6¹⁹, from which we learn that the meat and the broth might be served separately. The cooking-pots were of earthenware and bronze (Lv 6²⁸). For an account of cooking utensils generally, with references to illustrations, see HOUSE, § 9.

In addition to boiling, or, as in EV more frequently, seething ('sod,' 'sodden,' Gn 25²⁹, Ex 12⁹ etc.; but Amer. RV has 'boil' throughout), roasting was much in vogue, and is, indeed, the oldest of all methods of preparing meat. Originally the meat was simply laid upon hot stones from which the embers had been removed, as in the parallel case of the 'cake baked on the coals' (1 K 19⁶ RVm). The fish of which the disciples partook by the Sea of Galilee was cooked on the charcoal itself. A more refined mode of roasting was by means of a spit of iron or wood. In NT times the Passover lamb had always to be roasted in an oven, suspended by a spit of pomegranate laid across the mouth.

Eggs (Job 6⁵, Lk 11¹²), we read in the Mishna, might be cooked by being boiled in the shell, or broken and fried, or mixed with oil and fried in a saucepan.

As regards the important group of the cereals, wheat and barley ears were roasted on an iron plate or in a pan, producing the 'parched corn' (Amer. RV 'parched grain') of OT. A porridge of coarse wheat or barley meal has also been referred to under Food, § 2. The seeds of the leguminous plants were mostly boiled (Gn 25²⁹; cf. 2 K 4³⁸). A 'good savour' (1 Es 1¹²) was imparted to the stew by the addition of other vegetables of a more pungent character, such as onions. In short, it may be affirmed that the Hebrew housewives were in no way behind their modern kinsfolk of the desert, of whom Doughty testifies that 'the Arab housewives make savoury messes of any grain, seething it and putting thereto only a little salt and samn [clarified butter].'

The direction in which Hebrew, like most Eastern, cooking diverged most widely from that of our northern climate was in the more extensive use of olive oil, which served many of the purposes of butter and fat among ourselves. Not only was oil mixed with vegetables, but it was largely used in cooking fish and eggs (as we have just seen), and in the finer sorts of baking. The poor widow of Zarephath's 'little oil' was not intended for her lamps, but to bake her 'handful of meal' withal (1 K 17¹²). The flour was first mixed with oil, then shaped into cakes and afterwards baked in the oven (Lv 2⁹); or a species of thin flat cake might first be baked in the usual way and then smeared with oil. The latter are the 'wafers anointed with oil' of Ex 29² etc. Honey and oil were also used together in the baking of sweet cakes (Ezk 16^{13, 19}). In this connexion it is interesting to note that while Ex 16³¹ compares the taste of manna to that of 'wafers made with honey,' the parallel passage, Nu 11⁸, compares it to 'the taste of cakes baked with oil' (RVm).

2. The two chief meals.—Among the Hebrews, as among their contemporaries in classical lands, it was usual to have but two meals, properly so called, in the day. Before beginning the work of the day the farmer in the country and the artisan in the city might 'break their fast' (Jn 21^{12, 13} RV) by eating a morsel of bread—the 'morning morsel' as it is called in the Talmud—with some simple relish, such as a few olives; but this was in no sense a meal. Indeed, to 'eat [a full meal] in the morning' was a matter for grave reproach (Ec 10¹⁶).

The first meal-time (Ru 2¹⁴ RV), speaking generally, was at an hour when the climate demanded a rest from strenuous exertion, namely, about noon; the second and more important meal of the two was taken a little before or after sunset, when the labourers had 'come in from the field' (Lk 17¹). This was the 'supper time' of 14¹⁷. The former, the ariston of the Greeks—in EV rendered dinner, Mt 22⁴, also Lk 11³⁸ but RVm here breakfast—was in most cases a very simple meal. 'A servant plowing or keeping sheep' or harvesting would make his midday meal of bread soaked in light wine with a handful of parched corn (Ru 2¹⁴), or of 'pottage and bread broken into a bowl' (Be¹ 2²), or of bread and boiled fish (Jn 21¹³). All the evidence, including that of Josephus, goes to show that the second or evening meal was the principal meal of the day.

3. Position at meals.—Within the period covered by OT the posture of the Hebrews at meals, in so far as the men were concerned, was changed from sitting to reclining. In the earliest period of all, the Hebrews took their meals sitting, or more probably, squatting on the ground (Gn 37²⁵ etc.), like the Bedouin and fellahin of the present day, among whom squatting 'with both knees downwards, and with the legs gathered tailor-fashion, alone is the approved fashion when at table'

MEALS

(PEFSI, 1905, 124). The food was served in a large wooden bowl placed upon a mat of leather or plaited grass, round which the company gathered. The first advance on this primitive practice was to present the food on a wooden or other tray, set upon a low stand raised but a few inches from the ground. The next step was the introduction of seats, which would naturally follow upon the change from nomadic to agricultural life after the conquest of Canaan. Saul and his messmates sat upon 'seats' (1 S 20²⁵), the precise form of which is not specified, as did Solomon and the high officials of his court (1 K 10⁵, where the queen of Sheba admires the 'sitting,' i.e. the seated company of his servants; cf. 13³⁰ etc.).

With the growth of wealth and luxury under the monarchy, the Syrian custom of reclining at meals gradually gained ground. In Amos' time it was still looked upon as an innovation peculiar to the wealthy nobles (Am 3¹² 6⁴). Two centuries later, Ezekiel is familiar with 'a stately bed' or couch (as Est 1⁴ RV) with 'a table prepared before it' (Ezk 23⁴). In the post-exilic period the custom must have taken firm root, for by the end of the 3rd cent. B.C. it was probably universal save among the very poor (Jth 12¹⁵, To 2¹). In NT, accordingly, whenever 'sitting at meat' is mentioned, we are to understand 'reclining,' as the margin of RV everywhere reminds us. At table, that is to say, the men—for women and children still sat—reclined on couches with wooden frames, upholstered with mattresses and provided with cushions, on which they leaned the left elbow (see Sir 41¹⁹), using only the right hand to eat with (see § 5 below).

4. From the Mishna we learn that in NT times the tables were chiefly of wood, and furnished with three or four feet. They were lower and smaller than with us. The couches or divans were as a rule capable of accommodating several people. In the houses of the great each guest at a banquet might have a couch and table for himself. The Greek custom was to assign two, the Roman three, guests to each couch. As each guest reclined on his left elbow, the person next on his right on the same couch could be said to 'recline in the bosom' of his fellow-guest. Such were the relative positions of John and Jesus at the Last Supper (Jn 13²³ RV).

5. Procedure at meals, etc. In our Lord's day, as we learn from the Gospels, great importance was attached by the Jewish authorities to the 'washing of hands' before meals. This consisted of pouring water (which had been kept from possible defilement in large closed jars, the 'waterpots of stone' of Jn 2⁶) over the hands and allowing it to run to the wrist (cf. Mk 7³ RVm and commentaries).

This washing over, the food was brought in by the women of the household (Mk 1³, Lk 10⁴⁰); in wealthy families by male slaves, the 'ministers' of 1 K 10⁸, 'waiters' of Jth 13¹, 'servants' of Jn 2^{5, 9}. At this stage grace was said. The date of the introduction of this custom is unknown, for 1 S 9¹³ is not a case in point. In NT the blessing before a meal has the repeated sanction of our Lord's example (Mt 15³⁶ 26²⁶ etc.; cf. Ac 27³⁶ for Paul).

As to what may be termed, with the Mishna, 'the vessels for the service' of the table, these naturally varied with the social position of the household, and more or less with the progress of the centuries. In early times earthenware vessels would be used, for which, as civilization advanced, bronze would be substituted, and even in special cases, silver and gold (see House, § 9). Bread, we know, was usually served in shallow wicker baskets (Ex 29²⁵). The main part of the meal in the homes of the people will have been served in one or more large bowls or basins, of earthenware or bronze, according to circumstances. Such was the 'dish' into which our Lord dipped the 'sop' (Mt 26²⁶, Mk 14²⁰). A shallower dish is that rendered 'charger' in Mt 14^{13, 11}, and 'platter,' Lk 11³⁰.

In the case of a typical dish of meat and vegetables, prepared as described above, those partaking of the meal helped themselves with the fingers of the right hand (Pr 19²⁴—26¹⁵ RV, Mt 26²⁵),—knives and forks being, of course, unknown at table,—while the more liquid parts were secured, as at the present day, by using pieces of thin wafer-like bread as improvised spoons, or simply by dipping a morsel of bread, the sop of Jn 13²⁶, into the dish. It was customary, as this passage shows, for the head of the family to hand pieces of food to various members; these are the portions of 1 S 1⁴.

6. In the event of a Jew of some position resolving to entertain his friends at dinner, it was usual to send the invitations by his servants (Mt 22⁹), and later to send them again with a reminder on the appointed day (v. 4, Lk 14¹⁷). Arrived at his host's residence, the guest is received with a kiss (Lk 7⁴⁰), his feet are washed (v. 4⁴), and his head is anointed with perfumed oil (v. 30; cf. Ps 23⁵). He himself is dressed in white gala costume (Ec 9⁹; see DRESS, § 7), for to come to such a feast in one's everyday garments would be an insult to one's host (cf. Mt 22¹¹). After the 'chief places' (Mt 23⁶ RV; AV 'uppermost rooms') on the various couches had been assigned to the principal guests, the hands duly washed, and the blessing said, the meal began. This would consist of several courses, beginning with light appetizing dishes, such as salted fish, pickled olives, etc. During the course of the dinner those whom the host wished to single out for special distinction would receive, as a mark of favour, some dainty portion, such as Samuel had reserved for Saul (1 S 9²³). These were the messes sent by Joseph to his brethren (Gn 43³⁴—for a list of the parts of an animal in order of merit, so to say, used for this purpose at a fellahin banquet to-day, see PEFS, 1905, 123).

At the close of the dinner the hands were again washed, the attendants bringing round the wherewithal, and tables with all sorts of fruit were brought in, over which a second blessing was said. Although wine was served in the first part of the banquet as well, it was at this second stage that the 'fruit of the vine' was chiefly enjoyed. The wine-cups were filled from the large mixing bowls (Jer 35⁵) in which the wine had been diluted with water and perfumed with aromatic herbs. It was usual, also, to appoint a 'ruler of the feast' (Jn 2⁸ RV; cf. Sir 32¹) to regulate the manner and the quantity of the drinking, and to enforce penalties in the case of any breach of etiquette. 'Music and dancing' (Lk 15²⁵) and other forms of entertainment, such as the guessing of riddles (Jg 14¹²), were features of this part of the banquet. For instruction in the 'minor morals' of the dinner-table, Jesus ben-Sira has provided the classical passages, Sir 31¹²⁻¹⁸ 32¹²⁻¹⁸, expanding the wise counsel of the canonical author of Pr 23¹⁶.

MEARAH.—Mentioned amongst the districts of Palestine that had yet to be possessed (Jos 13⁴). The text is doubtful.

MEASURES.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEASURING LINE, MEASURING REED.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 1. 3.

MEAT.—This word is used in AV for food in general, as it is in Scotland still. Thus 2 Es 12²⁴ 'I had my meat of the herbs'; cf. Hall, Works i. 806, 'There was never any meat, except the forbidden fruit, so deare bought as this broth of Jacob.'

MEAT-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE, § 11.

MEBUNAI.—The name in 2 S 23²⁷ of one of David's thirty heroes. It is a scribal error for Sibbecai, the form which has been preserved in the parallel lists, 1 Ch 11³⁹ 27¹¹, and also 2 S 21¹⁸—1 Ch 20⁴.

MECHERATHITE.—1 Ch 11³⁴, prob. for 'Maachathite.'

MECONAH.—See MEKONAH.

MEDABA (1 Mac 9²⁶)—Medeba (wh. see).

MEDES, MEDIA

MEDAD.—See ELDAD.

MEDAN.—One of the sons of Abnan and Keturah (Gn 25³—1 Ch 1²). The existence of such a tribe, however, is very doubtful. In Gn 37³⁶ 'Medianites' is miswritten for Midianites (see RVm), and there is every likelihood that in the former passage 'Medan' is a doublet of 'Midian,' the next word in the verse. Medan is unknown elsewhere in the Bible, nor is it represented by the name of any people in any extra-Biblical document. To connect it with the name of an Arabian god Madān, or with the similar name of a wady in N.W. Arabia, is very hazardous, both because the associations are remote, and because the word-form is common in Semitic, and is liable to occur in various relations.

MEDEBA (Nu 21³⁰, Jos 13³⁶, 1 Ch 19⁷, Is 15²).—A town in the Mishor, or 'plain' E. of Jordan, an hour and a half S. of Heshbon on the Roman road from Heshbon to Kerak. It was taken from Moab by Sihon and then conquered by Israel (Nu 21³⁰⁻³²) and assigned to Reuben (Jos 13¹⁶⁻¹⁸ [v. 9 'all the tableland—Medeba to Dibon'; v. 16 'all the tableland to Medeba']). The Syrians who came to assist Ammon (1 Ch 19⁶⁻¹⁵) pitched at Medeba, which was apparently then Ammonite. Later, Moab regained Medeba, for Omri, according to the Moabite Stone, l. 8, took Mehedeba, and Israel held it forty years, till Mesha recovered it and rebuilt the cities held by Omri and Ahab. Joram and Jehoshaphat made an unsuccessful attempt to retake these cities (2 K 3), but Jeroboam II. drove out the Moabites. Moab again held Medeba (Is 15², and probably also Jer 48²; but see MADMEN). In Maccabean times it was the stronghold of a robber clan, Jambri, which killed John, eldest son of Mattathias. Jonathan avenged this (1 Mac 9³⁶⁻⁴²; Jos. Ant. xiii. 1. 2, 4). John Hyrcanus besieged Medeba (Jos. Ant. xiii. 1. 1). Alexander Jannæus took it from the Arabians, and Hyrcanus II. promised to restore it to Aretas (ib. xiii. xv. 4, xiv. i. 4). During the Byzantine period Medeba was a flourishing Christian centre, the seat of a bishopric, and represented at the Council of Chalcedon. In 1880 a colony of Christians from Kerak settled there. Many ancient remains have come to light,—a large pool with solid walls, remains of gates, towers, four churches, some fine mosaics, especially a deeply interesting and important mosaic map of Christian Palestine and Egypt.

MEDES, MEDIA.—A people and country called by the same word, Madai—in Hebrew and Assyrian. The Medes were the first of the Iranian immigrants to form a settled government on the borders of the old Semitic realm. As early as the 9th cent. b.c. they began to occupy the mountainous country south and south-east of the Caspian Sea, and by the middle of the 7th cent. their territory extended southward to the borders of Elam. Their chief city was Ecbatana, the Achmetha of Ezr 6² and the modern Hamadān. The Assyrians opposed them, and finally subdued them under Tiglath-pileser III. and Sargon, and the latter deported (b.c. 721) some of them as captives to Samaria (2 K 17⁶ 18¹¹). In the later years of the Assyrian empire they regained their independence, and under their king, Cyaxares, who had formed an alliance with the rising Chaldean power, they destroyed the city of Nineveh (b.c. 607), and therewith the Assyrian dominion itself. By agreement with the Chaldeans, who restricted themselves to the lowlands, they speedily occupied the northern highlands as far as Cappadocia. Meanwhile the southern immigration from eastern Iran had settled to the east of the Persian Gulf and founded the Persian community. The southern portion of Elam soon fell to them, but they became vassals of their Median kindred. Under Cyrus the Great, Astyages, king of the Medes, yielded his throne to the Persians (b.c. 550), who henceforth held the hegemony of the Iranian race.

Among the Semitic peoples, however, the name of the Medes continued long to be more familiar than that of the Persians, partly by reason of their greater antiquity, and partly because the Medes formed the principal portion of the Iranian population. Hence the word is more frequent than 'Persia,' except in the later books of the OT. Madai is mentioned in Gn 10² among the sons of Japheth, with no allusion to the Persians. So the Medes and not the Persians are mentioned in prophecy as the prospective destroyers of Babylon (Is 13¹⁷ 21², Jer 25²⁵ 51¹¹; cf. ELAM, p. 211b). In Ac 2⁹ the Medes are vaguely mentioned, where the reference is to Jews or proselytes living in Media and using the language of the country. Media was of great importance in the history of religion, since it was there, probably in the early years of the 7th cent. B.C., that Zoroaster lived and taught. J. F. M'CURDY.

MEDIATOR, MEDIATION.—The word 'mediator' (Gr. mesitēs) occurs in the NT, once of Moses as the mediator of the Law (Gal 3¹⁹ 20), in the other instances of Christ as the 'one mediator between God and man' (1 Ti 2⁵), and the mediator of a 'better' (He 8⁶), or 'new' (9¹⁵ 12²⁴, in latter passage 'new' in sense of 'recent') covenant. The verbal form occurs in He 6¹⁷ [RV 'interposed' (Gr. mediatē) with an oath']. The LXX has the term once in Job 9³³ (EV 'daysman'). But the idea of mediation, that is, of God dealing with man, or man with God, not directly but through the interposition of another, has a leading place throughout Scripture. Different aspects of mediation, however, need to be distinguished. As regards the fundamental relation of man to God, Jesus, in the NT, is the one and sole Mediator.

1. The most general form of mediation is intercessory prayer. This is the privilege of all (cf. Ja 5¹⁶). Well-known Scripture examples are the intercession of Abraham for Sodom (Gn 18²²⁻²³), of Moses for Israel (Ex 32³⁰⁻³⁴), of Samuel for Israel (1 S 7⁸⁻¹²). Jeremiah (15¹) singles out Moses and Samuel as the chief representatives of this form of prayer. Probably an element of intercession enters into all effective mediation. St. John (ch. 17) preserves the great intercessory prayer of Jesus after the Last Supper, and intercession is declared to be a chief exercise of Christ's mediatorial function in heaven (Ro 8³⁴, He 7²⁵, 1 Jn 1¹). Intercessory prayer is a duty of the Christian (1 Ti 2¹⁻²), but always and only in the name of Christ, who in the same context is declared to be the 'one mediator' (v. 5).

2. Mediation has a peculiar place in the formation of the great covenants. It is the singular fact in connexion with the covenant with Abraham of which St. Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews in different ways take notice, that it involved no mediator (Gn 12¹⁻³ 15. 17). It was a covenant of promise absolutely (Gal 3¹⁵⁻¹⁸). This seems to be the force of St. Paul's peculiar saying, 'Now a mediator is not a mediator of one; but God is one' (Gal 3²⁰; there were not, as in the covenant through Moses, two contracting parties; the covenant proceeded solely from God, and was unconditional). In He 6¹⁸⁻¹⁹ this is carried further. God himself took the place of Mediator in this covenant, and because He could swear by no higher than Himself, 'interposed (mediated) with an oath' in ratification of His promise (cf. Gn 22¹⁶⁻¹⁸). It is different in the covenant with Israel at Sinai, where Moses is throughout (by God's appointment and the people's own desire, Ex 19¹⁰⁻²⁵ 20¹⁵⁻²¹) the mediator between God and the people (Gal 3¹⁹, point of contrast between law and promise). Finally, mediation is the law in the 'new' and 'better' covenant, as the passages in Hebrews declare. The reason is that this perfect and eternal covenant, procuring forgiveness of sins, and removing all barriers to access to God, could be formed only on the basis of a reconciling sacrifice; and this Jesus alone, the Son of God, had the qualification to offer. It is noticeable, therefore, that all the passages that speak of Jesus as 'Mediator' do it in direct connexion with His sacrificial death; 1 Ti 2⁵ 'one mediator between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus' connects with v. 6 'who gave himself a ransom for all'; He 9¹⁴ declares: 'For this cause he is the mediator of a new covenant, that a death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant' (cf. Ro 3²⁵); 12²⁴, where to come 'to Jesus the mediator of a new covenant' is to come 'to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better than that of Abel'; so also 8⁶ (cf. the context, v. 3). It is this fact, that Jesus has made the perfect sacrifice for sin, coupled with His unique dignity, as Son of God, which constitutes Him the Mediator sui generis.

3. Here, accordingly, is brought to consummation the last great aspect of mediation in the OT—the mediation of a sacrificing priesthood. Prophets also might be called mediators, as commissioned revealers of the will of God to the people; but mediation is peculiarly connected with the functions of the priest. In earlier times the head of the family was the priest; an interesting example of patriarchal mediation is given in the Book of Job (1⁵ for his sons; cf. 42⁷⁻⁹ for his friends). Under the Law the people could approach God only through the Aaronic priesthood; but the mediatorial function was peculiarly vested in, and exemplified by, the high priest. To him it pertained, on the one hand, to represent the people before God (cf. the ephod and breastplate, with their precious stones graven with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, Ex 39⁶⁻¹⁴), and to offer sacrifices for their sins (He 2¹⁷ 8³; he alone had the right of entry into the Holiest of all on the great annual Day of Atonement, He 9⁷); and, on the other, to represent God to the people, in declaring His will by the Urim and Thummim, and blessing in His name (cf. Dt 10⁸ 33⁸, prerogatives of the high priest). This twofold aspect of the high-priestly function, as the Epistle to the Hebrews seeks to show, is in a perfect and abiding way realized in Christ, who is thus the one true Mediator, our 'great high priest, who hath passed through the heavens' (4¹⁴). See ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION, RECONCILIATION.

JAMES ORR.

MEDICINE.—Palestine was probably a comparatively healthy country in Bible times, as it is now. Its natural features in most localities would protect it from the usual endemic diseases of Oriental lands, and its want of harbours would to a great extent prevent the importation of epidemics (contrast the reputation of Egypt, as attested by Dt 7¹⁵ 28⁴⁰, Am 4¹⁰); moreover, the legislation of the Priestly Code, if it was ever observed, would have operated to prevent the spread of disease, and the existence of far-reaching destitution. These provisions, and the common occurrence of external and internal warfare, must also have tended to eliminate overcrowding as a cause of disease; but the ratio of population to area in ancient times is very difficult to estimate; the figures in 1 Ch 21⁴ and 2 S 4⁴ are clearly untrustworthy.

1. Jews believed in a definite connexion between health and virtue (cf. Is 58³, Jer 8¹⁵ 22). Disease was popularly regarded as penal (Jn 9²), and as sent by God either directly (Ex 4¹¹, Dt 32²⁹) or permissively by means of others (Job 2⁷, Mk 9¹⁷ 25). It might also be caused by human envy (Job 5²), or by bodily excess (Sir 37²⁰ 21), but even so its vera causa was God's direct authorization.

Under these circumstances healing was treated as a token of Divine forgiveness (Ex 15²⁶). And the connexion of priest with physician was correspondingly close. On the whole, the medical knowledge of the Bible peoples was very defective; nor are there any traces of medical education in Palestine. Jacob was embalmed by Egyptian physicians (Gn 50²), but there must probably have been some Jewish practitioners at the time when Ex 21¹⁹ was compiled. The word in Jer 8² means a 'bandager.' The writer of 2 Ch 16¹ seems to take the extreme view that it was a sin to consult physicians, but saner ideas are represented in Sir 38². Still, it may be doubted whether medical duties were not usually performed by priests (as in early Egypt), at any rate in the earlier OT times; certainly the priests had the supervision in the case of certain diseases, e.g. leprosy; and prophets also were applied to for medical advice (cf. 1 K 14² 17¹⁸, 2 K 4² 20⁷). And even in Sir 38¹ the physician is regarded as having certain priestly duties, and the connexion between religion and medicine is seen in the counsel, given in that same chapter, that repentance and an offering shall precede the visit of the physician. In the NT we have St. Luke described as a physician (Col 4¹⁴), and a somewhat depreciatory remark on physicians in Mt 5², which, however, is much toned down in Lk 8⁴.

It is therefore probable that up till late times medicine was in the charge of the priests, whose knowledge must have been largely traditional and empirical. The sacrificial ritual would give them some knowledge of animal morphology, but human anatomy can scarcely have existed as a science at all, since up to about A.D. 100 the ceremonial objections to touching or dissecting the dead prevailed. Thus Bible references to facts of anatomy and physiology are very few in number. Blood was tabooed as food (Gn 9⁴, Lv 17¹¹)—a highly important sanitary precaution, considering the facility with which blood carries microbes and parasites. A rudimentary embryology can be traced in Job 10¹⁰, Ps 139¹⁵, 16 (cf. Ec 11⁵). But most of the physiological theories adverted to in the Bible are expressed in language of poetry and metaphor. On the whole, however, we may infer that the Jews (like other ancient peoples) regarded the heart as the seat of mental and moral activity (exceptions to this view are Dn 2²⁸ 4³ 7¹), the reins or kidneys as the seats of impulse, affection, conscience (Jer 11²⁰ 12³, Ps 7⁹), the bowels as the organs of sympathy (Ps 40⁴, Job 30²⁷). Proverbs about physicians seem to be alluded to in Mt 9¹², Lk 4²², Sir 38¹. Except in the case of certain diseases, visitation of the sick is enjoined in the Talmud (though not in the OT), and enforced by Christ in Mt 25³⁶.

2. General terms for disease.—The words 'sick,' 'sickness,' 'sicknesses,' 'disease,' 'diseased,' 'diseases,' are of the most frequent occurrence, though they are not always used as the tr. of the same words in the original. Sometimes the term is qualified, e.g. 'sickness unto death' (Is 38¹), 'sore sickness' (1 K 17¹⁷), 'evil disease' (Ps 41⁵), 'incurable disease' (2 Ch 21²⁸). We also have 'infirmity' three times in the OT, in Lv 12² meaning periodic sickness, in Ps 77¹⁹ as weakness from sickness, in Pr 18¹⁴ as weakness generally. The term plague is sometimes used of a specific epidemic, at other times of sickness in general. There are also various figurative expressions for disease, and in some places it is described as inflicted by the angel of God, e.g. 2 S 24¹⁶. In the NT, again, various Gr. words are translated by 'sickness,' 'disease,' 'infirmity'; the allusion in 1 Co 11³⁰ may be to mental weakness, and in Ro 15¹ to weakness of conscience.

Some diseases, e.g. leprosy, were regarded as unclean, and those suffering from them were excluded from cities. But in general the sick were treated at home. As to the treatment we know very little. It is possible that in earlier times bleeding was not resorted to because of the taboo on blood, though in later times the Jews followed the universal practice. Pr 30¹⁵ has been supposed to show a knowledge of the medicinal use of leeches; but this inference can by no means be drawn with any certainty from the context.

3. Specific diseases.—As a rule the Bible references to specific diseases are general and vague; and even where we find concrete mention of particular ailments, it is not always easy to decide what the exact nature of the maladies was. In some cases the symptoms are given, though sometimes very indefinitely.

In Dt 28²² a group of terms is used for diseases which appear to resemble each other in the fact that they are sudden, severe, epidemic, and fatal. The first is called consumption. This may be phthisis, but more probable it means a kind of wasting fever, characterized by weakness and anæmia, often of long duration, and perhaps not unlike Mediterranean or Malta fever. The same word is used in Lv 26¹⁶. The 'consumption' mentioned in Is 10²² 28²² AV does not appear to be a specific disease at all. This is followed in Deut. by fever; the same word in Lv 26¹⁶ is rendered 'burning ague' by the AV, and the LXX translates it by the Greek word for 'jaundice.' Its symptoms are given in the passage of Lv.; it may be a sort of malarial fever which occurs in certain parts of Palestine, and is occasionally accompanied by jaundice. This may be the disease alluded to in Ju 4²⁶ and Lk 4³⁸, both instances at Capernaum. Then comes inflammation (Dt 28²² EV, LXX ague). This may be ague, or even typhoid, which is common in Palestine. Next we have 'extreme burning' (Dt 28²² AV, RV 'fiery heat,' LXX 'irritation'); either some unspecified kind of irritating disease, or erysipelas; but this latter disease is not of frequent occurrence in Palestine. The 'sword' (Dt 28²² AV, RV 'drought') may be a form of disease, or more probably, like the next two words, may refer to a destruction of the earth's fruits. The same word 'sword' in Zec 11¹⁷ seems, from the symptoms described, to refer to a wasting paralysis. The descriptions given in Ps 39¹¹, Zec 14¹², Lv 26¹⁶, Ezk 24²² 33¹⁰, Ps 38³ are largely figurative; but the imagery may be taken from an attack of confluent smallpox, with its disfiguring and repulsive effects. It seems highly probable that smallpox was a disease of antiquity; perhaps the sixth plague of Egypt was of this character.

Allusions to pestilence or plague are exceedingly common in the OT. Thus at least four outbreaks took place among the Israelites during their wanderings in the wilderness, viz. Nu 11²² (it has been suggested that the quails here mentioned may have come from a plague-stricken district) 14⁷ 16⁴⁶ 25⁹ (in this last case it may have been communicated by the Moabites). For other references to plague, cf. 2 S 24¹⁵, 2 Ch 21¹⁴, Ps 91⁵, Jer 21⁹ 42¹⁷, perhaps 2 K 19³⁵. The bubonic plague was the periodic scourge of Bible lands. It has but a short period of incubation, spreads rapidly and generally, and is very fatal, death ensuing in a large proportion of cases, and nearly always within three days. No precautions against it are prescribed in the Levitical Code, because it was regarded as a special visitation of God. As the plague is not endemic in Palestine, the Jews probably incurred it by mixing with their neighbours. The emerods of 1 S 5⁶ were tumours of a definite shape, and may therefore be the buboes of the plague. The tumours appeared somewhere in the lower part of the abdomen. Some have supposed them to be hæmorrhoids, by comparison with the phrase in Ps 78²⁸, but this is doubtful. The same word occurs in Dt 28²⁷.

Of diseases in the digestive organs the case in 2 Ch 21¹⁹ is one of chronic dysentery in its worst form. That in Ac 28³ (AV bloody flux) is also dysentery, which is very prevalent in Malta. The mention of hæmorrhage in this case shows that it was of the ulcerative or gangrenous type, which is very dangerous.

The results of intemperance are mentioned in Pr 23³⁰, Is 19¹⁴.

The liver. The Hebrew physicians regarded many disorders as due to an alteration in the bile (cf. Job 18¹⁴, Pr 7²², La 2¹¹). The disorders alluded to in 1 Ti 5²³ were probably some kind of dyspepsia, apparently producing lack of energy (cf. 1 Ti 4¹³⁻¹⁶); the symptoms are often temporarily relieved by the use of alcohol. In Ps 69³ allusion is made to the dryness of throat produced by mental emotions of a lowering character; and in Is 16¹¹, Jer 4¹⁹ to the flatulent distension of the color due to the same cause.

Heart. There are few references to physical diseases affecting it. Pr 14³⁰ may be one. Cases of syncope seem to be recorded in Gn 45², 1 S 41⁸ 28³⁰, Dn 8²⁷. The allusions to a 'broken heart' in Scripture are always metaphorical, but the theory that our Lord's death was due to rupture of the heart deserves mention.

Paralysis or palsy. This is a disease of the central nervous system, which comes on rapidly as a rule, and disappears slowly, if at all. Such cases are mentioned in the NT, e.g. Mt 4²⁴, Lk 5¹⁸, perhaps Ac 9³³. The case in Mt 8⁶ may have been one of acute spinal meningitis, or some other form of especially painful paralysis. In the case of the withered hand of Mt 12¹⁰, Mk 3¹, Lk 6⁶ a complete atrophy of the bones and muscles was probably the cause. The case in Ac 3² was possibly of the same nature. Such cases are probably intended also in Jn 5¹. The man in Jn 5⁷ can hardly have been suffering from locomotor ataxia, as he could move himself, and his disease had lasted 38 years. Therefore this also was, in all likelihood, a case of withered limbs. The sudden attack mentioned in 1 K 13⁹ was probably due to sudden hemorrhage affecting some part of the brain, which may under certain circumstances be only temporary.

Apoplexy. A typical seizure is described in 1 S 25³⁷, due to hemorrhage in the brain produced by excitement, supervening, in this particular instance, on a drinking bout (cf. also 1 Mac 9²⁴). The same sort of seizure may be referred to in 2 S 6⁷, Ac 5¹⁰.

Trance is mentioned in Gn 2¹¹ 15¹². But the cases in 1 S 26¹², Jg 4², Mt 8²⁴ were probably of sleep due to fatigue. Prophetic frenzy is alluded to in Nu 24² 4, 2 K 9¹¹ (cf. Is 8¹⁹). Saul is an interesting psychological study: a man of weak judgment, violent passions, and great susceptibility, eventually succumbing to what seem to be recurring paroxysms of mania, rather than a chronic melancholia. A not uncommon type of monomania seems to be described in Dn 4 (the lycanthropy of Nebuchadnezzar). In the NT various nervous affections are probably included among the instances of demoniac possession, e.g. Lk 11¹⁴, Mt 12²². In Lk 12²², Ac 9⁷ are apparently mentioned cases of temporary aphasia due to sudden emotion. (Cf. also Dn 10¹⁶.)

Deafness and dumbness. Many of the NT cases of possession by dumb spirits were probably due to some kind of insanity or nervous disease, e.g. Mt 9³², Mk 9²⁶. In Mk 7³² stammering is joined to deafness. Is 28¹¹ and 32⁴ (cf. 33¹⁹) probably refer to unintelligible rather than defective speech. Moses' slowness of speech and tongue (cf. Ex 4¹⁰) was probably only lack of oratorical fluency. Patience with the deaf is recommended in Lv 19¹⁴.

Epilepsy. The case in Mt 17¹⁵, Mk 9¹⁸, Lk 9³⁸ is of genuine epileptic fits; the usual symptoms are graphically described. Like many epileptics, the patient had been subject to the fits from childhood. The 'pining away' mentioned in the Markan account is characteristic of a form of the disease in which the fits recur frequently and cause progressive exhaustion. The word used in Mt. to describe the attack means literally 'to be moon-struck'; the same word is found in Mt 4²⁴, and an allusion to moon-stroke occurs in Ps 121⁶. It was a very general belief that epilepsy was in some way connected with the phases of the moon. Such a theory is put forward by Vicary, the physician of Henry VIII., at so late a date as 1577.

Sunstroke. This is mentioned in Ps 121⁶, Is 49¹⁰, and cases of apparently genuine siriasis are described in 2 K 4¹ and Jth 8¹. This seizure is very rapid and painful, accompanied by a great rise in temperature, passing speedily into coma, and resulting as a rule in death within a very short space of time. The cure effected in 2 K 4 was plainly miraculous. Heat syncope, rather than sunstroke, seems to have been the seizure in Jonah's case (Jon 4⁸). He fainted from the heat, and on recovery was conscious of a severe headache and a feeling of intense prostration.

Dropsy is common in Jerusalem. The cure of a case of dropsy is recorded in Lk 14⁷.

Pulmonary disease as such finds no mention in Scripture. The phrase used in 1 K 17¹⁷, 'there was no breath left in him,' is merely the ordinary way of stating that he died.

Gout. This disease is very uncommon among the people of Palestine; and it is not, as a rule, fatal. The disease in his feet from which Asa suffered (1 K 15²³, 2 Ch 16¹²) has usually been supposed to be gout, though one authority suggests that it was articular leprosy, and another that it was senile gangrene. The passages quoted give us no clue to the nature of the disease in question, nor do they state that it caused his death. Josephus describes Asa as dying happily in a good old age. The OT records remark only that he suffered from a disease in the feet, which began when he was advanced in years.

Under the heading surgical diseases may be classed the spirit of infirmity, affecting the woman mentioned in Lk 13¹¹, 12, who, though she could attend the synagogue meetings, was bowed together and unable to lift herself. This was probably a case of senile kyphosis, such as not infrequently occurs with aged women, and sometimes with men, who have spent their lives in agricultural or horticultural labour, which necessitates constant curvature of the body.

Crook-backedness (Lv 21²⁰) disqualified a man for the priesthood. This disease is one which can occur in youth, and is due to caries of the vertebrae. The collections of bones found in Egypt justify the inference that such curvatures must have been fairly common in Egypt.

Fracture of the skull. A case is recorded in Jg 9⁵⁴, where insensibility did not immediately supervene, showing the absence of compression of the brain. In Ac 20⁶ fatal compression and probably a broken neck were caused by the accident. The fall in 2 K 1² was the cause of Ahaziah's ultimate death.

Lameness. Mephibosheth's lameness was due to an accident in infancy (2 S 4¹), which apparently produced some sort of bone disease, necessitating constant dressing, unless the phrase in 2 S 19²⁴ refers merely to washing. Lameness was a disqualification for the priesthood (Lv 21¹⁸); Christ healed many lame people in the Temple (Mt 21¹⁴) as well as elsewhere. Jacob's lameness (Gn 32³¹) may also be mentioned.

Congenital malformations. Cf. 2 S 21²⁰, 1 Ch 20⁶. The possession of superfluous parts was held to disqualify a man for the priesthood (Lv 21¹⁸), as did also dwarfishness (Lv 21²⁰), unless the reference there is to emaciation from disease. The word in Lv 21¹⁸, which is translated 'that hath a flat nose,' may refer to the deformity of a hare-lip.

Skin diseases are of common occurrence in the East. The most important of them was leprosy (wh. see). But there are many minor diseases of the skin recognized in Bible enactments under various terms.

Baldness (Lv 13⁴⁰⁻⁴³) was not looked upon as causing ceremonial uncleanness, nor apparently was it common; it seems to have been regarded not as a sign of old age, but as the result of a life spent in excessive labour with exposure to the sun (cf. Ezk 29¹⁸), and so in Is 37³⁶ it is threatened as a mark of degradation and servitude.

Itch (Dt 28²⁷) is probably the parasitic disease due to a small mite which burrows under the skin, and, if neglected, sometimes spreads all over the body; this disease is very easily communicated, and is not uncommon in Syria at the present time. It was a disqualification for the priesthood (Lv 21²⁰).

Scab (Dt 28²⁷) or scurvy (Lv 21²⁰) is a kindred disease in which a crust forms on the skin; it is most common on the head, but sometimes spreads all over the body, and is most difficult to cure. 'Scab' in Lv 21²⁰ is the

tr. of a different word, but is probably another form of the same disease (cf. Is 31⁷).

Scall or scurf of the head and beard (Lv 13³⁰) is another parasitic disease of similar nature.

Freckled spot (Lv 13³⁹, RV tetter) may be psoriasis, a non-contagious eruption.

The botch of Egypt (Dt 28³⁷, *). The same word is used in Job 27, Ex 9⁹, 2 K 20⁷, Is 38²¹. It is probably a general term for a swelling of the skin. In Ex 9¹⁰ blains, perhaps pustules containing fluid, are stated to have accompanied the boils. The disease in Dt 28³⁸ affected especially the knees and legs. Job's disease appears to have been one of itching sores or spots all over the body, which disfigured his face (21¹), caused great pain and a feeling of burning (8⁴), made his breath fetid (19¹⁷), and were infested with maggots (7⁵). Various names for the exact nature of the disease have been suggested, such as elephantiasis, leprosy, smallpox, etc. Some authorities, however, suppose the symptoms to agree better with those of the 'Biskra button' or Oriental sore, sometimes called 'Aleppo sore' or 'Baghdad sore,' which begins with papular spots, which ulcerate, become crusted over, are slow in granulation, and often multiple. This complaint is probably due to a parasite. Lazarus' sores (Lk 16²⁹) were probably old varicose ulcers of the leg.

Spot (Dt 32⁵, Job 11¹⁴, Ca 4⁷) and blemish (Lv 21¹⁷, Dn 1⁴) seem to be general terms for skin disease. Wen (Lv 12³⁴) means a suppurating sore.

The bloody sweat of our Lord (Lk 22⁴⁴) is difficult to explain. Some regard the passage as meaning merely that His sweat dropped, as blood drops from a wound. Instances of bloody sweat have been quoted in comparison, but it seems that none is satisfactorily authenticated.

Poisonous serpents are mentioned in Nu 21⁴ (where they are miraculously cured by the erection of a brass model of a serpent), Dt 32²⁴, Job 20¹⁴, 1⁶, Is 11⁵, 14²⁹, 30⁶, 59⁵, Jer 8¹⁷, Mt 3⁷ (metaphorically, as also in Mt 12³⁴, 23³⁴, Lk 3⁷), Mk 16¹⁸, Lk 10¹⁹, Ac 28³. There are several poisonous serpents in the desert of the Exodus narrative, whose bites are often fatal; but it has been suggested that the fiery serpents of Nu 21⁴ were really the parasitic worms called guinea-worms, which are not uncommon in the desert region. Scorpion bites are common and often fatal to children in Egypt, but not in Palestine.

Worms (Ac 12⁹) is the description of the disease of which Herod died. One authority suggests that it was acute peritonitis set up by the perforation of the bowel by an intestinal worm. Josephus states that Herod suffered from a violent abdominal pain which in a few days proved fatal. Thus it cannot have been a case of phthisiasis. The death of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 9⁴⁻⁵) is described as preceded by a violent pain of the bowels; then he was injured by a violent fall, and 'worms rose up out of his body'—in all probability a case of compound fractures, in which blow-flies laid their eggs and maggots hatched, owing to neglect of the injuries.

The third plague of Egypt (Ex 8¹⁴) is called one of lice, but the margin of the RV suggests 'sand-flies' or 'fleas.' It is possible that they were mosquitoes or sand fleas, the latter of which generate in the dust.

Discharges or issues of a certain nature caused ceremonial impurity; cf. Lv 15²⁻³. Some of these were natural (Dt 23¹⁰), others probably were the result of impure practices, but it is doubtful how much the ancients knew of the physical consequences of vice. Cf., however, Ps 107¹⁷, 1⁸, Pr 2¹, 5¹¹⁻¹², 7²², *.

Blindness is exceedingly common among the natives of Palestine; the words describing this affliction are of frequent occurrence in the Bible, sometimes in the literal, sometimes in the metaphorical, sense. Apparently only two forms of blindness were recognized: '1) that which arose from the ophthalmia so prevalent in Oriental lands, a highly infectious disease, aggravated by sand, sun-glare, and dirt, which damages the organs, and often renders them quite useless; (2) that due to old age, as in the case of Eli (1 S 3²⁰), Ahijah (1 K 14⁴), Isaac (Gn 27¹). Cf. also Dt 34⁷. Blindness was believed to be a visitation from God (Ex 4¹¹); it disqualified a man for the priesthood (Lv 21¹⁸); but compassion for the blind was prescribed (Lv 19¹⁴), and offences against them were accursed (Dt 27¹⁸). Leah probably suffered from a minor form of ophthalmia (Gn 29¹⁷). In Lv 26¹⁶ we see ophthalmia accompanying malarial fever. The blinding of Elymas in Ac 13¹¹ may have been hypnotic, as also possibly the blinding of the Syrian soldiers in 2 K 6¹⁸.

The cases of blindness which were cured by our Lord are usually given without special characterization; the two of most interest are that of the man born blind (Jn 9¹), and that of the man whose recovery was gradual (Mk 8²²). In the latter case we do not know whether the man was blind from birth or not; if he was, the stage in which he saw 'men as trees walking' would be that in which he had not yet accustomed himself to interpret and understand visual appearances. Our Lord's cures as described were all miraculous, in the sense that the influence of a unique personality must be postulated in order to explain the cure; but He used various methods to effect or symbolize the cure in various cases.

St. Paul's blindness (Ac 9⁴) was probably a temporary amaurosis, such as may be caused by looking at the sun. The 'scales' (Ac 9¹⁸) need not necessarily have been material; the words suggest a mere simile. One of the theories as to his 'thorn in the flesh' is that it was a permanent 'weakness of eye' remaining after his experience (cf. Gal 4¹⁵). But other explanations have been suggested. The blindness of Tobit and its cure may also be mentioned (To 2¹⁰, 11¹¹); the remedy there adopted has a parallel in Pliny (HN xxxii. 24). Eye-salve is recommended in Rev 3¹⁴, but the context is metaphorical.

Old age. Under this heading should be mentioned the famous passage in Ec 12, where the failure of powers consequent on growing years is described in language of poetic imagery.

Child-birth. The special cases of child-bearing which are mentioned in the Bible are mostly quoted to illustrate the 'sorrow' of conception, which was regarded as the penalty of Eve's transgression (Gn 3¹⁶). There are two cases of twins, that of Esau and Jacob (Gn 25²²), and that of Perez and Zerah (Gn 38²⁸⁻³⁰). The latter was 'a case of spontaneous evolution with perineal laceration, probably fatal to the mother.' Rachel's case (Gn 35¹⁸) was one of fatal dystocia, and the phrase in Gn 31³⁵ may hint at some long-standing delicacy. Phinehas' wife (1 S 4¹⁹) was taken in premature labour, caused by shock, and proving fatal. Sarah (Gn 21⁴), Manoah's wife (Jg 13²⁴), Hannah (1 S 1¹⁰), the Shunammite woman (2 K 4¹⁷), and Elisabeth (Lk 1²⁷) are instances of unipara at a late period. Barrenness was regarded as a Divine judgment (Gn 20¹³, 30²), and the forked root of the mandrake was used as a charm against it (Gn 30¹⁴); fertility was correspondingly regarded as a proof of Divine favour (1 S 2², Ps 113⁹), and miscarriage is invoked as a token of God's displeasure in Hos 9¹⁴. The attendants at birth were women (Gn 35¹⁷, Ex 1¹⁵, midwives). The mother was placed in a kneeling posture, leaning on somebody's knees (Gn 30⁴), or on a labour-stool, if such be the meaning of the difficult passage in Ex 1¹⁸. After child-birth the mother was unclean for 7 days in the case of a male, for 14 days in the case of a female, child. After this she continued in a state of modified uncleanness for 33 or 66 days, according as the child was boy or girl, during which period she was not allowed to enter the Temple. The reason for the different lengths of the two periods was that the lochia was supposed to last longer in the case of a female child. Nursing continued for 2 or 3 years (2 Mac 7²⁷), and in 1 K 11³⁰ a child is taken by a relative to wean.

The legislation for the menstrual period and for menorrhagia is given in Lv 15¹⁹⁻²⁴. A rigid purification was prescribed, including everything which the woman had touched, and everybody who touched her or any of those things (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). Menorrhagia (EV issue of blood) was considered peculiarly impossible of treatment (Mt 9²⁰, Mk 5²⁸, Lk 8⁴³), and magical means were resorted to for its cure. In Ezk 16⁴ is a description of an infant with undivided umbilical cord, neither washed nor dressed. The skin of infants was usually dressed with salt to make it firm. The metaphorical use of terms derived from child-labour is exceedingly common in the Bible.

Infantile diseases seem to have been very severe in Palestine in Bible times, as at the present day. We hear of sick children in 2 S 12¹⁵, 1 K 17¹⁷, and Christ healed many children.

Among cases of unspecified diseases may be mentioned those of Abijah (1 K 14¹), Benhadad (2 K 8⁷), Elisha (2 K 13¹⁴), Joash (2 Ch 24²⁵), Lazarus (Jn 11¹), Dorcas (Ac 9³⁷), Epaphroditus (Ph 2²⁷), Trophimus (2 Ti 4²⁰).

4. Methods of treatment.—The Bible gives us very few references on this point. We hear of washing (2 K 5¹⁰); diet perhaps (Lk 8³⁸); the application of saliva (Jn 9⁶); unction (Ja 5¹⁴); the binding of wounds and the application of soothing ointment (Is 1⁶); the use of oil and wine for wounds (Lk 10³⁴); a plaster of figs for a boil (Is 38²¹); animal heat by contact (1 K 12¹⁷, 2 K 4³⁴).

Balm of Gilead or balm is mentioned in Gn 37³⁵ 43¹, Jer 8²² 46¹¹ 51⁴, Ezk 27¹⁷. It appears to be regarded as a sedative application, and was probably an aromatic gum or spice (see art. BALM).

Mandrakes (Mandragora officinalis) were used as a stimulant to conception (Gn 30¹⁴), and the fruit as a medicine. Mint (Mentha silvestris), anise (L. nethum graveolens), cumin (Cuminum sativum) were used as carminatives; salt for hardening the skin, nitre (Jer 22²) to cleanse it. The caper-berry (Capparis spinosa) is mentioned in Ec 12⁵; it was regarded as an aphrodisiac. The wine offered to Christ at His crucifixion was probably intended as a narcotic (Mt 27³⁴, Mk 15²³, Lk 23³⁶, Jn 19²⁹). Most of the remedies were dietary in the Jewish as in the Egyptian pharmacopœia, e.g. meal, milk, vinegar, wine, water, almonds, figs, raisins, pomegranates, honey, etc.

We have a mention of amulets in Is 3²⁰ and perhaps Gn 35⁴. The apothecary's art is mentioned in Ex 30²³⁻²⁵ 37²³, Ec 10¹, 2 Ch 16¹⁴, Neh 3⁴, Sir 38⁸ 49¹. But in all these passages the reference is to makers of perfumes rather than compounders of medicines. It is probable that medicines were compounded by those who prescribed them.

Hygienic enactments dealing with food, sanitation, and infectious diseases are common in the Levitical Code. With regard to food, herbivorous ruminant animals were permitted to be eaten; all true fishes also were allowed; but birds which lived on animal food were forbidden, and all invertebrates except locusts. The fat and the blood of animals were prohibited as food, and regulations were given for the inspection of animals slaughtered for eating. The origin, however, of many of these regulations probably lies in primitive taboo laws (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). Fruits could not be used for food until the tree had been planted for four years (Lv 19²³⁻²⁵). The provisions repeated in Ex 12¹⁹ 13¹, Dt 16³ for the periodic destruction of leaven, whatever their historical origin, must have been of service for the maintenance of pure bread-stuffs.

The agricultural sanitary laws are directed chiefly to prohibit the mixing of different species, e.g. the sowing of different seeds in a field at the same time, the cross-grafting of fruit-trees, the cross-breeding or yoking together of dissimilar cattle. And periodic rest for man and beast was prescribed. No mixture of linen and woollen materials in garments was permitted (Lv 19¹⁹, Dt 22¹¹), as such garments cannot be so easily or thoroughly cleansed as those of one material. There were also various regulations as to domestic sanitation; thus the covering with earth of excreta and of blood was ordered; possibly the fires of the Valley of Hinnom were intended to consume the offal of the city. Houses were to be built with parapets to prevent accident (Dt 22⁸). Isolation in suspected cases of infectious disease was prescribed (Lv 13⁴), and the washing of body and clothes (Nu 19¹¹) was obligatory on those who had touched unclean things.

Uncleanness was in many cases merely ceremonial in nature. But the regulations must often have served to diminish the chances of propagating real infection. Various grades of uncleanness are recognized in the Talmud, and different periods of lustration and isolation were ordained, in accordance with the different grade of uncleanness contracted.

5. Surgical instruments. A flint knife was used for circumcision (Jos 5²), but in later times steel knives were employed. An awl for boring the ear is mentioned in Ex 21⁶.

The most important surgical operation was the performance of circumcision. Its original idea may have been that of imposing a tribal mark on the infant (unless it was at first performed in early manhood and subsequently transferred to the time of infancy); but it came to be regarded as an operation of purification. The exclusion of eunuchs from the service of God (Dt 23¹) may have been due to the dread of importing heathen rites into Israel. But they were important officials in the time of the kingdom, as in Oriental cases generally (1 K 22⁹, 2 K 8⁶ 9²² 24¹⁵, Jer 29³ 34¹⁹ 38⁷ 41¹⁶), and there were eunuchs at the court of the Herods, as elsewhere (cf. Ac 8²⁷). The passage in Is 56⁴ implies that eunuchs were then under no special religious disability; cf. also our Lord's reference in Mt 19¹².

Of course we must admit that in many cases the use of remedies, the sanitary laws, the prescriptions as to food, the regulations as to uncleanness, and so forth, did not necessarily originate in any theory as to their value for the preservation of public health. Primitive taboo customs, folk-lore, magic, superstition, are no doubt responsible for the existence of much that has been here placed under the heading of medicine. And it is quite likely, too, that up to a late period the popular Jewish view of the majority of these rules and customs was enlightened by no very clear conception of their hygienic value. The more educated minds of the nation may possibly in time have come to see that enactments which had originated in crude or mistaken notions of religion might yet be preserved, and valued as important precautions for the prevention of disease and its cure. But it may be doubted whether, even in late times, the vulgar opinion about them was at all scientific. At the same time, it is necessary to recognize that many of the laws, begotten, perhaps, of primitive superstition, did nevertheless serve a medical purpose, and so may without untruthfulness be included in a treatment of Bible medicine.

MEEDDA (1 Es 5²²)—Mehida, Ezr 2², Neh 7⁴.

MEEKNESS.—In the earlier literature of revelation meekness is simply an excellent virtue. Moses is described as 'very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth' (Nu 12³), and his character illustrates the Hebrew ideal of meekness in those days. There was no weakness or cowardice about him. He was 'a still, strong man,' patient and pitiful. Subsequently the word acquired a peculiar significance. In the days of Israel's conflict the men of pride and violence came to the front, while the godly were thrust into the background, condemned and oppressed (cf. Ps 102: 8-10). Thus 'rich' and 'wicked' came to be synonymous (Is 53⁹); and corresponding to these there was a group of terms: 'meek,' 'humble' (or 'lowly'), 'poor,' 'needy.' In our Lord's time these terms denoted the godly remnant in Israel, those who, despised by the rulers, lived devout lives in obscure corners, nourishing their faith on the Scriptures, and 'waiting for the consolation of Israel' (Lk 22: 28), the blessed Advent of the Messiah. And, just as the Psalmists and Prophets had sympathized with the Lord's hidden ones and promised them deliverance (Ps 91: 18 101: 18 37¹¹ [cf. Mt 5¹] 72: 4, Is 11⁴), so Jesus was their champion. He called them 'blessed' (Mt 5: 1-12), and He took His place by their side, Himself 'meek and lowly' (Mt 11: 29), the homeless Son of Man, despised and rejected of men. He shared their humility that they might share His glory. DAVID SMITH.

MEGIDDO (in Zec 12¹ Megiddon).—One of the most important of the fortress cities of ancient Canaan. It was captured by Thothmes III in the 23rd year of his reign, the spoils being magnificent; and it is mentioned several times in the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. Though nominally belonging to Manasseh (Jos 17: 13, Jg 17: 28), the Canaanites remained in possession. Near the 'waters of Megiddo' the Canaanites under Sisera were defeated by Barak and Deborah (Jg 5: 19-21). Solomon restored its fortifications (1 K 9: 15). Here king Ahaziah (2 K 9: 27) died; and the good king Josiah, interfering in a quarrel between Pharaoh-necho and the king of Assyria, and opposing the former's progress in the dangerous passage of Megiddo, was also slain (2 K 23: 29-30, 2 Ch 35: 22), to the grief of all Israel (Zec 12: 11). Finally, it was at Armageddon (RV Har-Magedon, 'the mountains of Megiddo') that the mysterious conflict of Rev 16: 16 was to take place.

The site of Megiddo may now be considered as proved to be Tell el-Mutesellim ('Hill of the Governor'), a great mound about 4 miles N.W. of Tell Ta'annak (Taanach; cf. Jos 12: 17¹¹, Jg 5: 19 etc.). The importance of the site can be seen at a glance, for it guards the great pass from the Plain of Sharon to that of Esdraelon, which in all history, from Thothmes III. to Napoleon I., has been a route of armies. The hill has recently been excavated by the German Palestine Society, and fortifications going back before B.C. 2000 have been uncovered, as well as the most extensive remains of successive cities which have occupied this site for many centuries. Here was found the seal of Shama', 'the servant of Jeroboam'—probably Jeroboam II. To the south of the tell is an abundant stream, and in Roman times a fortified post—the Legio of Eusebius, the modern el-Lejjun—was established there. The stream may have been the 'waters of Megiddo' of Jg 5: 19 etc.; it is one of the most important of the tributaries of the Kishon.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MEGILLOTH.—See CANON OF OT, § 8.

MEHETABEL.—1. The grandfather of Shemaiah (Neh 6: 6). 2. The wife of Hadar or Hadad, king of Edom (Gn 36: 39, 1 Ch 1: 40).

MEHIDA.—The eponym of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2: 32 = Neh 7: 4), called in 1 Es 5: 2 Meedda.

MEHIR.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4: 11).

MEHOLATHITE (1 S 18: 19, 2 S 21: 5).—Probably an inhabitant of Abel-meholah (wh. see).

MEHUJAEI.—A Cainite (Gn 4: 8) (J), corresponding to Mahalel of P's genealogy (Gn 5: 12¹).

MEHUMAN.—One of the seven eunuchs in attendance upon king Ahasuerus (Est 1: 10).

ME-JARKON (Jos 19: 46).—The Heb. text seems to be in disorder. The LXX reading, 'and from the sea, Jarkon and the boundary near Joppa,' sufficiently attests the name Jarkon, a place in the territory of Dan; but the site is not yet recovered. W. EWING.

MEKONAH (AV; RV needlessly changes to Meconah).—A town inhabited after the Captivity (Neh 11: 24). The site has not been identified.

MELATIAH.—A Gibeonite (Neh 3: 7).

MELCHI.—1. 2. Two ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3: 34, 35).

MELCHIAS.—1. 1 Es 9: 36 = Malchijah, Ezr 10: 25. 2. 1 Es 9: 32 = Malchijah, Ezr 10: 21. 3. 1 Es 9: 44 = Malchijah, Neh 8: 4.

MELCHIEL.—The father of Charmis (Jth 6: 15).

MELCHIZEDEK.—Described as king of Salem and priest of God Most High ('El Elyon'), who met Abraham on his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and his allies, refreshed him and his servants with bread and wine, blessed him, and received from him a tenth of the spoil he had taken (Gn 14: 18-20). Salem has been variously identified: (1) with the Shalem of Gn 33: 18 (AV and RVm), a place a little to the E. of Mt. Gerizim and not far from Shechem; (2) with the Salim of Jn 3: 23 in the Jordan Valley S. of Scythopolis; and (3) with Jerusalem, which is called Salem in Ps 76: 2. The last identification is much the most probable; for though it is implied in Jos 15: 63, Jg 19: 10 that Jerusalem was called Jebus so long as it was inhabited by the Jebusites (i.e. up to the time of David), the name Jerusalem really goes back to the 14th cent. B.C., since it appears in the Tell el-Amarna tablets as Uru-salim. This view has the support of Josephus (Ant. 1. x. 2), and further obtains some slight confirmation from the resemblance of the name of Melchizedek to that of Adonizedek, who was king of Jerusalem in the time of Joshua (Jos 10: 3), the element zedek in each name being probably that of a Canaanite deity.

The historical character of the narrative in which Melchizedek is mentioned has been questioned on the ground of certain improbabilities which it contains; but though the events related have received no corroboration from other sources, the names of two of the kings who fought against Abraham, viz. Amraphel and Arioch, have with some plausibility been identified with those of Hammurabi and Eriaku, contemporary kings of Babylon and Larsa about B.C. 2200; so that, if the identification is correct, it confirms the setting of the story, though not its incidents. For the name and personality of Melchizedek no independent confirmatory evidence has yet been obtained.

In Ps 110: 4 to the ideal king of Jewish hopes, the Messiah, there is promised an endless priesthood 'after the order of Melchizedek.' This ascription of priestly functions to a sovereign who was expected to be of the house of David and the tribe of Judah is evidently meant as an exceptional distinction, and implies that the writer lived at a time when priests in Israel were taken exclusively from the tribe of Levi, as was the case after the promulgation of the Deuteronomic law (probably in the 7th cent.). At an earlier date persons belonging to other tribes than that of Levi were sometimes priests: David's sons (2 S 8: 18); and Ira the Jairite (20: 26), who belonged to Manasseh (Nu 32: 41); but the author of Ps 110, in seeking a type for the combination in the same person of both the regal and priestly offices, had to go outside the limits of Israel, and found what he wanted in the priest-king of Salem, who was all the more adapted for the purpose by reason of the deference paid to him by so illustrious a personage as Abraham.

The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, identifying Jesus with the Messiah, and asserting His high priesthood, cites the words of Ps 110, and declares that He was 'named of God a high priest after the order of Melchizedek' (He 5: 6). He then proceeds to show the superiority of Christ's priesthood over that of the Jewish priests, the descendants of Aaron, and seeks to illustrate it by the superiority of Melchizedek over Abraham, as he gathers it from Gn 14. He explains Melchizedek's name to mean 'king of righteousness,' and his title of 'king of Salem' to mean 'king of peace'; and then.

arguing from the silence of the record respecting his parentage, birth, and death, describes him as 'without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, but made like unto the Son of God,' and affirms him to have been greater than Abraham, since he blessed him ('for without any dispute the less is blessed of the better') and received from him (and through him from his unborn descendants the Levitical priests) a tithe of his spoils (He 7:10). In this passage much of the writer's argument is fanciful, the narrative in Genesis being handled after a Rabbinic fashion, and the parallel drawn between our Lord and Melchizedek being largely based on the mere omission, in the OT record, of certain particulars about the latter, which, for the historian's purpose, were obviously irrelevant. At the same time it may perhaps be said that, as contrasted with the Levitical priests who succeeded to their priestly offices by reason of their descent, an ancient priest-king is really typical of our Lord, inasmuch as it is likely that, in a primitive age, such a one would owe his position to his natural endowments and force of character. It was in virtue of His personality that our Lord made, and makes, His appeal to the world; and to the authoritative nature of His attitude in regard to the current teaching of the Jewish religious teachers of His day (Mt 5:21-48, Mk 7:1-23) a distant analogy is, in fact, afforded by the superior position which in Genesis seems to be ascribed to Melchizedek in respect of Abraham, the ancestor of the Jewish race. See also art. PRIEST (IN NT). G. W. WADE.

MELFA.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3:3).

MELCH.—1. A grandson of Merib-baal (1 Ch 8:94). 2. See MOLECH.

MELITA.—An island about sixty miles S. of Sicily, with an area of about ninety-five square miles. Its excellent position as a commercial station led to its early colonization by Phœnicians and Greeks. It became subject to Carthage, but was conquered by the Romans in B.C. 218, and became part of the province of Sicily. But the Carthaginian and Libyan element predominated, hence St. Luke's use of the phrase 'the barbarous people' (Ac 28:16). There can be no doubt that this Melita was the scene of St. Paul's shipwreck. The use of the name Adria (Ac 27:7) led to an attempt to identify it with Melita in the Adriatic, but the term 'Adria' was freely applied to the sea E. and S.E. of Sicily, and the wind 'Euraquilo' (Ac 27:14) would drive them from Crete to Malta if the captain, realizing that his chief danger was the Syrtis quicksands (27:17), took the natural precaution of bearing up into the wind as much as the weather permitted. The description is precise. On the 14th night of their drifting, by sounding they found they were getting into shallower water, and cast out anchors; but when day dawned they saw before them a bay with a shelving beach, on which they determined to run the vessel. Therefore they hastily cast off the anchors, unfastened the rudders, which had been lashed during their drifting, and with the aid of these and the foresail tried to steer the ship to the beach. But before they reached it they ran on a shoal 'where two seas met,' and reached the shore only by swimming or floating on spars. Every detail of the narrative is satisfied by assuming that they landed on the W. side of St. Paul's Bay, eight miles from Valetta, five miles from the old capital Città-Vecchia. The tradition which gave this as the scene was already old when our earliest map of Malta (a Venetian one) was made about A.D. 1530. As it is scarcely likely that the spot was identified by special investigations in the Middle Ages, this is a remarkable instance of the permanence and correctness of some early traditions. Incidentally, it is also a proof of the remarkable impression made on the inhabitants by the three months St. Paul was compelled to spend in the island. St. Luke relates only two incidents. As 'they made a fire for the shipwrecked men, a snake, aroused from the wood by the heat, fastened on St. Paul's hand, and, to the surprise of the onlookers, did him no harm. The word 'venomous' (28:1) is not properly in the text, and St. Luke does not state that it was a miraculous deliverance. But the natives thought it was, and therefore there probably were venomous snakes in Malta then. There are none now, but in an island with 2000 inhabitants to the square mile they would be likely to become extinct. The other incident was the curing of dysentery of the father of Publius (wh. sec.). Naturally there are local traditions of St. Paul's residence, and the map referred to above has a church of St. Paul's near the bay, but on its E. side. The first known bishop of Malta was at the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Malta has had a varied history since. Vandals, Normans, Turks all left their mark on it. In 1530, Charles V. gave it to the Knights of St. John, who defended it three times against the desperate attacks of the Turks. In 1798, Napoleon seized it, but the English took it from him in 1800, and it has remained in English hands since. But the population remains very mixed,—the race and the native language retaining much of the Arabic element. A. E. HILLARD.

MELONS ('abaththm, the same word as the Arab. battkh, which includes the water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris) as well as other kinds).—Nu 11:5. Here the water-melon is specially referred to, as it was common in Egypt in ancient times. No fruit is more appreciated in the arid wilderness. Melons flourish in Palestine, especially on the sands S. of Jaffa, and are eaten all over the land, being carried to the towns all through the summer by long strings of camels.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MELZAR.—A proper name (AV), or official title (RV 'steward') in Dn 1:16, 18,—in both cases with the article. It is generally agreed that the word is a loan-word from the Assy. massaru, 'guardian,' and stands for one who was teacher and warden of the royal wards. Cheyne, however, is led by the LXX to conclude for Belshazzar as the true reading, and to read in Dn 1:11: 'And Daniel said to Belshazzar, prince of the eunuchs,' etc.

W. F. COBB.

MEM.—The thirteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 13th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

MEMEROTH (1 Es 8:8)=Meraioth, an ancestor of Ezra (Ezr 7:1); called Marimoth in 2 Es 1:2.

MEMMIUS, QUINTUS.—Named along with Manius (wh. sec) as a Roman legate (2 Mac 11:34).

MEMPHIS.—The famous ancient capital of Egypt, a few miles south of Cairo, the present capital. According to tradition, Memphis was built by Menes, who first united the two kingdoms of Upper and Lower Egypt. Kings and dynasties might make their principal residences in the cities from which they sprang, but until Alexandria was founded as the capital of the Greek dynasty, no Egyptian city, except Thebes, under the New Kingdom equalled Memphis in size and importance. The palaces of most of the early kings (Dyns. 3-12) were at or near Memphis, their positions being now marked by the pyramids in which the same kings were buried. The pyramid-field extends on the edge of the desert about 20 miles, from Dahshur on the south to Abu Roash on the north, the Great Pyramids of Gizeh lying 12 miles north of the central ruins of Memphis. The Egyptian name Mnft (in Hebrew Noph, Is 19:1, Jer 2:16 44:1 46:10, Ezk 30:10, 18; once Moph, Hos 9:6), was apparently taken from that of the palace and pyramid of Pepy I. of the 6th Dynasty, which were built close to the city. At a later period, Tahrak (Tirhakah) ruled at Memphis; Necho, Hophra, and the other kings of the 26th Dynasty were buried at their ancestral city Sais, although their government was centred in Memphis. After the foundation of Alexandria the old capital fell to the second place.

but it held a vast population till after the Arab conquest, when it rapidly declined. The growth of Postat and Cairo was accompanied by the destruction of all the stone buildings in Memphis for the sake of the materials, but the necropolis still bears witness to its former magnificence. The bull Apis (Egyp. Hapi) (whose name is read in LXX at Jer 46¹⁸ 'Why did Apis flee from thee?') was worshipped at Memphis as sacred to Ptah (Hephaestus), the principal god of the city.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

MEMUCAN.—One of the seven princes of Persia who had access to the royal presence (Est 1¹⁴, 16, 21).

MENAHEN, one of the latest kings of Israel, was a usurper, like so many other monarchs in this period. He and Shallum planned to seize the throne about the same time (2 K 15^{18,19}). Shallum having possession of Samaria, while Menahem commanded the ancient fortress and former capital, Tirzah. War raged for a brief time with unusual ferocity, resulting in the defeat of Shallum. Menahem seems not to have felt secure on the throne, and to have purchased the help of Assyria by paying a heavy tribute to Tiglath-pileser (called Pul in 2 K 15¹⁹). Or we may suppose the Assyrians to have invaded the country because it was so weakened by civil war that it could no longer make effective resistance. The tribute was a thousand talents of silver, and it was raised by a direct tax on the holders of landed property. The assessment of sixty shekels each shows that there were sixty thousand proprietors in Israel at this time. From the Assyrian sources we learn that this tribute was paid in the year 738 B.C.

It is interesting to note that in the literature of Judaism Menahem (= 'Comforter') is a title of the Messiah.

H. P. SMITH.

MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN.—The words of the handwriting on the wall, which, according to Dn 5²⁵⁻²⁸, appeared mysteriously at Belshazzar's feast, and was successfully deciphered by Daniel alone (vv. 26-28). In v. 25 the words of the inscription ('the writing . . . inscribed,' RV) are given as above, but in the explanation (vv. 26-28) are quoted in a divergent form, and no account is taken of the repetition of the first word. This discrepancy can best be accounted for by assuming that the words of the inscription as given in v. 25 already lay in their present form before the author, and are not the product of his free invention; while vv. 26-28 are the result of 'an attempt to extract from the words, in spite of grammar, a meaning suitable to the occasion.'

What, then, is the real significance of the mysterious words? As has been shown by M. Clermont-Ganneau in the Journal Asiatique for 1886, they are really names of weights. Mene is the Aram. equivalent of the Heb. maneh (Ezk 45¹², Ezr 2³⁹) and =mina; tekell=shekel; and pharsin is a plural, and probably represents a word (perās lit. 'division') which means half-mina. Thus the four words read consecutively: 'A mina, a mina, a shekel, and half-minas.' The enigmatic character of the combination apparently consisted partly in the manner in which the words were supposed to have been written—perhaps in some unfamiliar form of Aramaic cursive or with some curious inversion in arrangement—and partly in determining their import even when read. The appositeness of a list of three weights in such a connexion is not obvious. In deducing a meaning fitted to the occasion Daniel's skill as an interpreter of riddles is strikingly set forth. Each of the mysterious words is invested with a meaning suggested by etymological affinities. The term for 'mina' is connected with a root meaning 'to number'; hence it signifies 'God hath numbered thy kingdom and brought it to an end'; 'shekel' is connected with a root meaning 'to weigh,' and hence—'thou hast been weighed in the balance and found wanting'; 'half-mina' (perās) suggests a double play; 'thy kingdom is divided (perās) and given to the Persians (Aram. pāras= 'Persian').

It should be noticed that a double interpretation is apparently given throughout, each of the words having perhaps been read in two ways, and the meanings combined (see art. 'Mene Mene Tekel Upharsin' in Hastings' DB for details). Another possible rendering is, 'He has counted, counted, weighed, and they assess' (?a commercial formula). Possibly 'an actual inscription found on the walls of the palace at Babylon, or, at any rate, found somewhere, was worked by the author of Daniel into this dramatic scene and arbitrarily explained' (D. S. Margoliouth, ib.). G. H. Box.

MENELAUS.—Brother of Simon the Benjamite (2 Mac 3⁴), or, according to Josephus (Ant. xii. v. 1), a younger brother of Jason and Onias. He purchased the office of high priest from Antiochus Epiphanes for the sum of 660 talents (c. B.C. 172), thereby causing the deposition of Jason, who had obtained the office by similar corrupt means. Being unable, through lack of funds, to pay the required sum, he was cited to appear before the king, but, finding the latter absent on warfare, he plundered the Temple of sacred vessels and thereby found means to silence his enemies. Having secured the death of Onias iii., who threatened to divulge the sacrilege (2 Mac 4²⁷⁻³⁴), he became so unpopular that Jason marched against him to recover the office he had lost (5¹⁻¹⁰). After this attempt of Jason, which ended in failure, Menelaus is lost to sight for some years, but finally suffered death at the hands of Antiochus Eupator (c. B.C. 163).

T. A. MOXON.

MENESTHEUS.—The father of Apollonius (2 Mac 4²¹).

MENI.—A deity named with Gad in Is 65¹¹: 'Ye that . . . prepare a table for Gad, and that fill up mingled wine for Meni.' Gad is Fortune, and Meni Destiny. The name has been correlated with the Arab. Manat, and with a supposed Bab. god Manu. manah in Heb. means 'to number,' and so 'to apportion.' The name of this god of Destiny has been seen in Manasseh and in the name of one of the sons of Anak, Ahiman, in Nu 13²². See Gad.

W. F. COBB.

MENNA.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³¹).

MENUHAI (Jg 20⁴³).—We should perhaps read Manahath (wh. see), or, better, 'from Nohah.' In 1 Ch 8² Nohah is a clan of Benjamin.

MENUHOT.—See MANAHATHITES.

MEONENIM, OAK OF.—A place mentioned only in Jg 9³⁷ as being near Shechem. It is agreed that the rendering should be 'oak of the diviners,' but the derivation of the word mē'ōnenim is uncertain. There is a cognate Arabic word, however, which is used of the hum of insects and the whispering of leaves, and it is tempting, therefore, to connect mē'ōnenim with such a phenomenon as the 'sound of a marching in the tops of the balsams' of 2 S 5²⁴, where the rustling of the leaves is the sign of the presence of Jahweh, as the rustling of the leaves of the oaks of Dodona proclaimed the will of Zeus.

W. F. COBB.

MEONOTHAI.—Son of Othniel (1 Ch 4⁴).

MEPHAATH.—A city of Reuben (Jos 13¹⁸); assigned to the Levites (21³⁷, 1 Ch 6⁷³); a Moabite city in Jer 48²¹. In the 4th cent. A.D. it is said to have been the station of a Roman garrison.

MEPHIBOSHETH.—1. A son of Jonathan (2 S 4⁴), called also in 1 Ch 8³⁴ Merib(b)aal, really the original form of the name 'Baal contends' or 'Baal's warrior.'

David, on succeeding to the throne, instead of destroying all the family of Saul, as was usual on such occasions, spared Mephibosheth out of regard for his father Jonathan (2 S 9¹). Mephibosheth was five years old when Saul fell on Mt. Gilboa, and in the flight of the royal household after the battle he was so seriously injured by a fall as to become lame in both his feet (2 S 4⁴). In that warlike age such a bodily weakness prevented him from becoming a rival of David, and no doubt inclined the latter to mercy. David was informed of his place of concealment in Lo-debar, on the east of the Jordan, by Ziba, who had been steward of Saul (2 S 9¹⁰). The king restored to Mephibosheth all the estates of Saul, Ziba became his steward, and Mephibosheth himself was maintained as a permanent guest at David's table (2 S 9¹³).

At the flight of David from Jerusalem after Absalom's rebellion, Ziba met him on the Mount of Olives with provisions. He also stated that his master had remained in Jerusalem, in hope of obtaining the kingdom of Saul. Notwithstanding the doubtful nature of the story, David said, 'Behold, thine is all that pertaineth to Mephibosheth' (2 S 16¹). On David's return, Mephibosheth came out to meet him, and declared that Ziba had accused him falsely, taking advantage of his lameness. David seems to have doubted the truthfulness of Mephibosheth or did not wish to alienate Ziba, who had also been faithful, and divided the land of Saul between the two. Mephibosheth expressed his willingness that Ziba should have all, 'forasmuch as my lord the king is come in peace unto his own house.'

From 2 S 9¹² we learn that Mephibosheth had a son Mica, who was regarded as the founder of a well-known family of warriors (1 Ch 8³⁵ 9¹¹).

2. One of the sons of Saul's concubine Rizpah, slain by the Gibeonites (2 S 21⁸). W. F. BOYD.

MERAB.—The elder daughter of Saul, promised to the slayer of Goliath (1 S 17²⁵), and then to David personally as a reward for prowess against the Philistines (1 S 18¹⁷), but given as wife to Adriel the Meholathite. In 2 S 21⁸ Michal, whose sons are said to have been given over to satisfy the Gibeonites, is probably a scribal error for Merab. W. F. BOYD.

MERAIAH.—The head of a priestly house (Neh 12¹²).

MERAIOTH.—1. Son of Ahitub and father of Zadok (1 Ch 9¹¹, Neh 11¹¹). 2. A Levite (1 Ch 6⁶¹, Ezr 7³); called in 1 Es 8² Memeroth and in 2 Es 1² Marimoth. 3. A priestly house in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12¹⁶—Memeroth of v.³).

MERARI, MERARITES.—1. The third son of Levi, to whom a division of the Levites traced their descent (Gn 46¹¹, Ex 6¹⁶, Nu 3¹⁷, 1 Ch 6¹⁶ 23¹). The title 'Merarites' is found only in Nu 26⁵⁷; elsewhere they are called 'sons of Merari' (Ex 6¹⁶, Nu 3⁴⁰ 43², 44², 7⁸ 10¹⁷, Jos 21⁷ 34⁴⁹, 1 Ch 6¹⁹ 29⁴¹, 44⁶³, 77⁹¹⁴ 15¹⁷ 23²¹ 24²⁷ 26¹⁹, 2 Ch 29¹², Ezr 8¹⁹). They were subdivided into two groups, the Mahilites and the Mushites (Nu 3²⁴ 26⁵⁸), each being traced to a 'son' of Merari (Ex 6¹⁶, Nu 3⁴⁰, 1 Ch 6¹⁹ 29⁴⁷ 23²¹). From these families fragments of genealogies remain, some branches being traced through the daughters of Mahli (see 1 Ch 23²²).

Very little is related of the Merarites after the Exile. Certain Merarites are mentioned in 1 Ch 9¹⁴ 16-18—Neh 11¹⁶ 17-19 as dwelling in Jerusalem immediately after the Return, and certain others as accompanying Ezra to the city in 454 B.C. (Ezr 8¹⁸). But P and the Chronicler introduce the family into the earlier history. (1) During the desert wanderings the Merarites were on the north side of the Tent (Nu 3⁸); their duty was to carry the less sacred parts of it, the 'boards' (or rather frames), pegs, cords, etc. (3³⁵, 4¹¹ 10¹⁷), for which they were given four waggons and eight oxen (7⁸); and they were superintended by Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron (4²). (2) After the settlement in Palestine, twelve cities were assigned to them (Jos 21⁷ 34-40—1 Ch 6⁶² 77-81). (3) In David's reign the Chronicler relates that the Temple music was superintended partly by Ethan, or Jeduthun, a Merarite, and his family (1 Ch 6⁴⁴-47 18⁴¹ 25¹ 3⁶ 9¹¹ 11¹ 19¹ 21¹; and see 15¹⁷-19). David divided the Levites into courses 'according to the sons of Levi' (23¹; Merarites, vv. 2-22 24²⁸-30), and particular offices of certain Merarites are detailed in 26¹⁰-12 16-19. (4) They took part in the cleansing of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch 29²¹ 34). Cf. also art. KOHATH.

2. The father of Judith (Jth 8¹ 16⁷).

A. H. M'NEILE.

MERATHAIM (Jer 50²¹).—The term is an enigmatical one, and adapted so as to recall to a Heb. ear either 'double rebellion' or 'double bitterness.'

MERCHANDISE, MERCHANT.—See MARKET, TRADE, AND COMMERCE.

MERCHANTMAN.—This Eng. word is now used only of a trading vessel. In AV it means 'merchant, tradesman'; it occurs in Gn 37²⁵, 1 K 10¹⁴, Mt 13⁴. In each case the earliest editions of AV have two separate words.

MERCURY stands in the AV for the Gr. Hermes in Ac 14¹². Hermes, as the spokesman of the gods, was regarded by the Greeks as the god of eloquence. Hence, when Paul and Barnabas healed the cripple at Lystra, the former was hailed as Hermes, 'because he was the chief speaker.' The identification of Hermes with Mercury was due to another attribute. As the messenger of the gods, Hermes was the god who brought good fortune to men. Mercury was the Roman god of commerce (cf. merx, mercari), and success in commerce was attributed to him. Hence the mythology of the two was confused. A. E. HILLARD.

MERCY, MERCIFUL.—

Mercy (French merci) is traced, through ecclesiastical Latin, to merces (reward); it seems to have got its meaning from the exclamation of the alms-receiver, 'Merci!' i.e. 'Reward to you (in heaven)!' 'May God reward you!'—the expression passing from the acknowledgment made to the bounty given, and then to the spirit prompting it. Thus mercy is by derivation allied to merit, merchant, mercenary, amercé.

1. In the OT, noun and adjective render two quite different Hebrew terms. (1) meaning primarily bowels (see Gn 43³⁰, 1 K 3²⁶), then compassion or yearning, occurs as noun, adjective, or verb ('have mercy,' 'show mercy'), with the tr. 'mercy' over 60 times (Gn 43¹⁴, Ex 34⁶, Hab 3⁴, are typical examples),—often 'mercies' or 'tender mercies' for the noun, imitating the Hebrew plural. In 5 instances the EV translates by 'pity,' 'pitiful' (see Ps 103¹³, La 4¹⁹), in 17 by 'compassion.' In Gn 19¹⁶ 'merciful' renders a synonym of the above, which appears elsewhere (2 S 12⁵, Is 63⁹ etc.) as 'pity.'

(2) is a familiar OT word, occurring passim in the Psalms, denoting kindness or benignity, almost confined to the noun-form in this sense. It is rendered 43 times by kindness (often on the part of men), and 30 times by 'lovingkindness' (always of God, and mostly in Ps.), by mercy some 150 times in AV; other renderings—'goodness,' 'favour,' and 'pity'—are occasional RV frequently, the American Revisers uniformly, substitute 'loving-kindness' (wh. see) for 'mercy' where God is the subject. This attribute of J^h lies nearer to the 'grace' (wh. see) than the 'mercy' of the NT, without implying necessarily, like the former, ill-desert in the object. It is associated frequently with 'truth' (wh. see) in J^h—'lovingkindness (mercy) and truth' being the regnant qualities of His dealings with Israel—and with 'covenant' (Dt 7⁹, 1 K 8²³, Neh 1⁵ 9²², Ps 89²⁸, Is 55³, Dn 9⁴), as well as with 'goodness' and 'compassion' (above); while it is contrasted with 'anger,' 'judgment,' and 'sacrifice' (Mic 7¹⁸, Ps 101¹, Hos 6⁶). The word describes what one may call the characteristic temper of J^h, His gracious disposition towards His chosen regarded in their dependence and necessities, His readiness to help, bless, relieve, forgive them—J^h's 'leal love' (G. A. Smith).

(3) A third root, the noun of which is translated 'grace' (wh. see) and its adjective 'gracious,' appears in the verb 16 times as 'be gracious' or the like, and 16 times as 'have' or 'show mercy' in AV (Dt 7⁹, Ps 4¹ etc.), thrice as 'pity.' This term seems to imply more of inclination, and (2) more of active disposition.

MERCY SEAT

(4) The expression 'be merciful' in AV of Dt 21^a 32^a is corrected by RV to 'forgive' and 'make expiation.'

2. Mercy in NT plays a part subordinate to that of love (wh. see). It represents a pair of Greek synonyms, both chiefly, but not exclusively, applied (in Scripture) to God. (a) As used in the LXX, the ordinary term (noun, adjective, and verb) in its noun-form reproduced commonly (2) of the Hebrew words above indicated; but in adjective and verb more often (3), less frequently (1). It denotes compassion as a temper and motive of action rather than a sentiment—eleēmosynē (alms) is one of its derivatives; like 'mercy,' the Greek eleos regards its objects as weak or suffering, and is therefore narrower in range than the Hebrew (2) above defined. Out of the 27 examples of this noun in NT, 9 occur in OT allusions, 7 in salutations or benedictions; other examples are Mt 5⁷, Lk 16^a, Ro 9^a, 2 Co 4¹, Ja 3⁷. The verb is more frequent. (b) The second of the Greek synonyms—verb, noun, and adjective—is more pathetic, and corresponds to (1) of the OT terms; hence the Hebraizing combinations of Ph 2¹, Col 3¹², Ja 5¹¹ (Hebraistic equivalents replace the regular Greek terms in Eph 4², 1 P 3⁸). This tenderer significance 'mercy' bears in Lk 6³⁶, Ro 12¹, 2 Co 13¹, He 10²⁸, also in Mt 18³³ (RV, where AV reads 'pity'). (c) 'Of tender mercies' in Ja 5¹¹ (AV; RV 'merciful') represents a Hebraistic compound nearly the same as that rendered 'tender-hearted' in Eph 4² and 1 P 3⁸ (RV; AV 'pitiful'). Akin to these adjectives is the verb occurring 12 times in the Synoptic Gospels, which is rendered 'moved with compassion' (moved to mercy), describing the emotion stirred in the breast of Jesus—e.g. by the cry, 'Have mercy on us,' of Mt 20³¹⁻³⁴.

G. G. FINDLAY.

MERCY SEAT.—See TABERNACLE, § 7 b.

MEREC.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4¹⁷).

MEREMOTH.—1. The head of the 7th course of priests (Ezr 8³, Neh 3⁴. ^a 10⁶); called in 1 Es 8² Marmoth. 2. See CARABASTON. 3. See MERAIOTH, No. 3.

MERES.—One of the seven princes and counsellors of Ahasuerus (Est 1¹⁴).

MERIBAH.—See MASSAH AND MERIBAH.

MERI(B)BAAL.—See MEPHIBOSHETH.

MERIBOTH-KADESH.—See MASSAH AND MERIBAH.

MERODACH.—The name of the city-god of Babylon, worshipped, after the establishment of Babylon as capital of the Babylonian Empire, as chief god of Babylonia. The Babylonian name was Marduk, older form Maruduk. He gradually absorbed the attributes of other gods once supreme through the influence of their city seats of worship, particularly Ellil the old Bēl, or lord supreme of Nippur. Hence he was in later times the Bēl of Babylonia. Merodach is a Hebraized form occurring only in Jer 50², but the Bēl of the Apocryphal Bēl and the Dragon (Is 46¹, Jer 51⁴) is the same deity. Nebuchadnezzar was specially devoted to his worship, but the Assyrians revered him no less; and even Cyrus, on his conquest of Babylon, treated him with the deepest respect. The name occurs in many Babylonian proper names, and appears in the Bible in Merodach-baladan and Evi-merodach, and probably in Mordecai.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

MERODACH-BALADAN (Is 39¹; misspelt [in MT, but not in LXX] Berodach-b. in 2 K 20¹²).—In Assyrian the name is written Marduk-bal-iddina, and means 'Merodach has given a son.' For his history see p. 66 f.

MEROM, THE WATERS OF.—The scene of Joshua's victory over the northern kings; usually identified with Lake Huleh in the Upper Jordan Valley (Jos 11⁵ 7). This identification is accepted by Robinson (BRPii. 440), G. A. Smith (HGHL, 481), and others. It is questioned by Socin (Baedeker's Palästina), Buhl (GAP), and Guthe (Bibelwörterbuch, s.v.), the last suggesting an impossible position near Meirōn, at the base of Jebel Jermuk. Joshua's crowning victory would not be located by such 'waters' as are to be found there. The kings were encamped at Beroth, not far from Kadesh (Jos. Ant. v. i. 18), but probably they descended, as did Demetrius at a later date (Ant. xiii. v. 7), to battle in the plain, better suited than the rough uplands for the chariots on which they depended. There is nothing to wonder at in the disappearance of the ancient name, in a land where so many names have perished. It is almost certainly the lake Semechonitis of Ant. v. v. 1; the district to the N. was known as Ulatha (Ant. xv. x. 3; BJ i. xx. 4). This is the first appearance of the modern name—Ulatha = Hūleh—which covers both the lake and the district. The water is supplied by the fountains of the Jordan at Hasbeiyeh, Bāniās, and Tell el-Kādi, by the springs at 'Ain el-Balāta and 'Ain el-Mellāha on the western side of the valley; Mt. Hermon and the neighbouring slopes also drain into the basin. In shape Bahiret el-Hūleh is almost triangular. It lies 7 ft. above sea-level. The open water is about four miles in length by about three miles at the broadest part. It is from 10 to 16 ft. in depth. To the N. stretch great breadths of marsh land, with dense thickets of papyrus reeds, through which, in various channels, the streams find their way to the lake. Water fowl of all kinds abound, and the place is a sort of fisherman's paradise. The Ghawārineh Arabs occupy the valley, till the soil, tend the buffaloes, hunt, and fish. The hair tent is seldom seen: their 'houses' are 'built' of the papyrus reed. W. EWING.

MERONOTHITE.—A designation applied in the OT to two men. 1. Jehdeiah (1 Ch 27³⁶). 2. Jadon (Neh 3⁷). From the context of Neh 3⁷ Meronoth would appear to have been in the neighbourhood of Gibeon and Mizpah.

MEROZ.—A place which the angel of Jahweh bids men curse, together with its inhabitants, because they did not come to fight Jahweh's battle against Sisera. It is mentioned only in Jg 5²³, and probably owes its mention merely to the fact that it 'lay in the line of Sisera's flight' (Moore). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

MERRAN.—Bar 3² only. Probably d was misread r in the Sem. original, and the name = Midian (cf. Gn 37²⁸, Hab 3⁸ 7).

MESALOTH.—See ARBELA.

MESHA.—1. Son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁹). 2. Firstborn of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴⁹).

MESHA.—A king of Moab in the 9th cent. B.C. According to an inscription (on the 'Moabite Stone' discovered at Dibon in 1868) describing his deeds, he expelled the Israelitish inhabitants from northern Moab, or from a portion of the debatable land between the two monarchies east of the northern third of the Dead Sea. Under Omri, the builder of Samaria, the border of Israel had been extended southwards to near its ancient limits (Nu 21²⁴); and Mesha reclaimed it by vindictive warfare, from Kiriat-haim as far as Nebo. 2 K 3 also deals with the relation between northern Israel and Mesha, and it is difficult to reconcile the two accounts in every detail. The matter can best be dealt with here by giving the most probable order of the events: (1) the conquest by Omri [Inscription, lines 4, 5] about a.c. 880; (2) the expulsion of the Hebrews by Mesha in the time of Ahab [Inscr. l. 8 ff.] about a.c. 855, Mesha's 'forty years' being, as also often in Hebrew narrative, a round number; (3) the refusal of Mesha to again submit, which is all that the Hebrew of 2 K 1¹ 3⁶ (EV 'rebelled') necessarily implies; (4) the unsuccessful expedition by Joram and his allies to reduce Mesha to submission, recorded in 2 K 3⁶⁻⁷.

J. F. M'CURDY.

MESHA is mentioned as marking one of the boundaries of the territory ascribed to the descendants of Joktan

In Gn 10². Its position has not yet been satisfactorily identified. The proposed identification with the late territory of Mesene at the head of the Persian Gulf is improbable. A better case can be made out for identifying it with Mash or Mashu, a general term in the Assyrian inscriptions for the Syro-Arabian desert; though the passage suggests that a single place, or tribe, rather than so vast a region, is referred to. If the vowel points be emended the word may be read as Massa, the name of a son of Ishmael in Gn 25¹⁴ and 1 Ch 1³⁰. Traces of this latter tribe have been sought in place names in central Arabia, but no identification yet suggested can be regarded as certain.

L. W. KING.

MESHACH.—The name Mishaël, by which one of Daniel's three companions, of the children of Judah, was originally called, was changed by the prince of the eunuchs into Meshaech (Dn 1⁷ and ch. 3). Such changes of name were not uncommon; they marked the fact that a new state of life had now begun. The meaning of the name is quite uncertain.

MESHECH.—1. The name of a people of Asia Minor mentioned after Tubal as among the sons of Japheth (Gn 10²). These two peoples, possibly kindred, appear almost always in conjunction in OT; so even in Is 66¹⁹, where read 'Meshech' instead of 'that draw the bow' (the word for 'bow' being a supplementary gloss). In Ps 120⁵ Meshech and Kedar appear as types of barbarous and warlike people, just as Meshech and Tubal are represented in Ezk 32²⁶ 38² 39¹. In the Assyrian annals the Tabal and Mushki, who are undoubtedly the same as Tubal and Meshech, are found again together (as fierce opponents of Assyria in the 12th cent. B.C.), the former lying to the north-east of Cilicia and the latter eastward between them and the Euphrates. The Tibureni and Moschi of the classical writers must stand for the same two peoples. Ezk 27¹³ names them as trading in slaves and articles of bronze.

2. In 1 Ch 1¹⁷ 'Meshech' is written by mistake for 'Mash' (cf. Gn 10²). J. F. M'Crdy.

MESHELEMIAM.—The eponym of a family of Korahite doorkeepers (1 Ch 9²¹ 26¹) = Shelemiah of 26¹, Shallum of 9¹⁷ 19¹ 21¹, and Meshullam of Neh 12²⁵.

MESHEZABEL.—1. One of those who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3⁴). 2. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²¹). 3. The father of Pethahiah (Neh 11²⁴).

MESHILLEMITH.—A priest (1 Ch 9¹²); called in Neh 11¹⁵ Meshillemoth.

MESHILLEMOTH.—1. An Ephraimite (2 Ch 28¹²). 2. A priest (Neh 11¹⁵); called in 1 Ch 9¹² Meshillemith.

MESHOBAB.—A Simeonite (1 Ch 4³).

MESHULLAM.—1. 2. 3. Three Benjamites (1 Ch 8¹⁷ 9⁷ 8). 4. A Gadite (1 Ch 5¹³). 5. The grandfather of Shaphan (2 K 22⁹). 6. The father of Hilkiah (1 Ch 9¹¹). 7. Another priest of the same family (1 Ch 9²). 8. A Kohathite (2 Ch 34¹²). 9. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3¹⁹). 10. One of the 'chief men' whose services were enlisted by Ezra to procure Levites (Ezr 8¹⁶); called in 1 Es 8⁴ Mosollamus. 11. A Levite who opposed Ezra's proceedings in connexion with the foreign marriages (Ezr 10¹⁵); called in 1 Es 9⁴ Mosollamus. 12. One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁹); called in 1 Es 9³⁰ Olamus. 13. Son of Berechiah, one of those who helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3⁴ 30). His daughter was married to Tobiah (6¹⁹). 14. Son of Besodeiah. He helped to repair the old gate (Neh 3⁴). 15. One of the company that stood at Ezra's left hand during the reading of the Law (Neh 8⁴). 16. 17. A priest and a chief of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh 10⁷ 30). 18. One of the princes of Judah who marched in procession at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 12²⁸). 19. 20. 21. Two heads of priestly houses and a porter in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12¹⁴ 16. 22 [see MESHELEMIAM]).

MESHULLEMETH.—Wife of king Manasseh and mother of Amon (2 K 21¹⁹).

MESOPOTAMIA = Aram-naharaim (see ARAM).

MESS.—A mess is any dish of food sent to the table (Lat. missum, Fr. mes). The word occurs in Gn 43⁴, 2 S 11⁸, Sir 30¹⁸, and RV introduces it at Ilc 12¹⁶.

MESSIAH.—The 'one anointed' (Gr. Christos), i.e. appointed and empowered by God through the impartation of His own spirit, to become the Saviour of His people. The conception of the Messiah is logically implicit in all the expectations of the Hebrew people that Jehovah would deliver Israel and turn it into a glorious empire to which all the heathen would be subjected. But it is not always explicit. The expectation of the coming Kingdom is more in evidence than the expectation of the coming King. But in the same proportion as the conception of the personal Messiah emerges from the general Messianic hope these elements appear within it: (1) the Deliverer; (2) the presence of God's Spirit in His own personality as the source of His power; (3) His work as the salvation of God's people, at first the Jewish nation, but ultimately all those who join themselves to Him.

1. The Messiah of the OT—

In any historical study of the OT it is necessary to distinguish sharply between the Messianic interpretation given to certain passages by later writers, notably Christian and Rabbinic, and the expectation which, so far as it is recoverable, the writers of the OT actually possessed. A disregard of this distinction has been common from the point of view of theological statement, but is fatal to a proper understanding of that progress in the religious apprehension of God and the clarifying of religious expectations which constitutes so large a factor in the Biblical revelation of God. It is always easier to discover tendencies as one looks back over a historical course of events than as one looks forward into the future which these events determine. The proper method in the study of the Messianic hope is not to mass the sentences of the OT to which a Messianic interpretation is given by later Biblical or extra-Biblical writers, but to study them in their context both literary and historical. In such a tracing of the historical development it is necessary to recognize critical results as far as they are reasonably fixed, and thus avoid reading back into the original hopes of the Hebrews those interpretations and implications which were given to the early history by various redactors. These latter, however, constitute data for the understanding of the Messianic ideal in the age of the editors.

Unfortunately, in the present state of criticism it is not possible to arrange the material of the OT in strictly chronological order. This is particularly true in the case of that reflecting the Messianic hope. The following classification of OT references is, therefore, not to be taken as a chronological exposition of a developing hope so much as a grouping of material of similar character.

1. The national tendencies of Messianic prophecy.—In the case of prophets like Elijah and Elisha the hope is hardly more distinct than a belief that the nation which worshipped Jehovah would be triumphant over its enemies. So far as the records of their teaching show, however, there was no expectation of any super-human deliverer, or, in fact, any future contemplated other than one which presupposed a conquering Israel with an equally triumphant Jehovah. Eschatological conceptions were absent, and the new Kingdom was to be political in the truest sense. With the approach of the more tragic days of the fall of the Northern Kingdom, the threatened calamities served as a text for the foreboding of Amos. Hosea's prophecies of prosperity which would come to the nation when it turned from idols and alliances with heathen nations to the forgiving Jehovah may, as current criticism insists, belong to a later period than that usually accorded them; but in them we find little or nothing of the noble universalism to be seen in the promised victory of the seed of the woman over the serpent (Gn 3¹⁴ 15). It is rather a hope of national glory, such as appears in the promise made to Shem (9th), to Abraham (12th), to Jacob (27^{th-28th}), and, in particular, to Judah (49^{th-12th}). The basis of this great expectation is the faith in Jehovah as interpreted by the prophets, whether earlier or later. It was inconceivable to them that the true God should be other than ultimately triumphant; cf. the prophecy of Balaam (Nu 24¹⁷⁻¹⁹), Song of Moses (Dt 32⁸⁻¹⁰), the expectation of 'the prophet' (Dt 18¹⁸⁻¹⁹). This nationalism is to be seen throughout the Messianic hope of the OT, although occasional exceptions are to be found, as in Gn 3¹⁴⁻¹⁵, and in some passages of Ezekiel.

2. The Messianic hope of the great prophets.—With Isaiah began a new development of the Messianic hope, primarily through the preaching of deliverance from the inevitable catastrophe of the Assyrian conquest. Out of the sorrows of the time, born largely, as Isaiah believed, from the sins of Jehovah's people, was to arise deliverance. This seems to be the central teaching of the great passage, Is 7¹⁸⁻¹⁷. Deliverance was to come before the expected child could choose between good and evil, but by the time he reached maturity the greater misery of Assyrian invasion should break forth. But in the name of the child, Immanuel, was the pledge that Jehovah would ever be with His people and would ultimately save them; not impossibly through the child himself, although nothing is said of Immanuel's share in the accomplishment of the deliverance. Whether or not the reference in Is 9⁶⁻⁷ is to Immanuel, it is unquestionable that it is to the coming of a descendant of David, who should deliver Israel and reign with Jehovah's assistance for ever triumphantly. In that glorious time, which was to be inaugurated by the Messianic King, would be prosperity hitherto unknown (Is 11¹⁻²). The 'eternity' of his reign is undoubtedly to be interpreted dynastically rather than personally, but the King himself clearly is a person, and Jehovah's Spirit, which is to be within him, is just as plainly the source of his great success (cf. Is 33¹⁴⁻²⁴). In a similar spirit Micah localizes the new Kingdom established through Divine guidance in Zion (Mic 4¹⁻⁵), and declares that the King is to come from Bethlehem, that is to say, shall be Davidic (5⁴⁻⁵).

Primarily national as these expectations are, the keynote is the deliverance wrought by Jehovah through a particular royal person, in whose days righteousness and peace are to be supreme in the world because of the Hebrew empire. This picture of the royal king became one controlling element in the later Messianic hope.

In this literature, whatever its date may be, there appears also the new note of universal peace to be wrought by Jehovah. In large measure this peace was conceived of as due to the completeness of Jehovah's conquest of the nations in the interests of His people (cf. Is 9¹⁻⁵). But beyond this there can also be seen the hope that the very nature of the reign of the new King would conduce to an end of war. In such a passage as Is 11¹⁻¹⁰ there is struck the keynote of a nobler Messianic reign than that possible to the mere conqueror. The peace then promised was to come from a knowledge of Jehovah as well as from the glories of the Davidic ruler.

The reformation of Josiah finds an echo in the equally exultant expectation of Jeremiah—that Jehovah would surely place a descendant of David upon the throne, a 'righteous branch,' and one who would deliver Israel (Jer 33¹⁴⁻¹⁶). The glory of the restored kingdom was to be enhanced by a New Covenant to replace the broken covenant of Sinai. This covenant would be spiritual, and the relations which it would establish between Israel and Jehovah would be profoundly religious. Israel would be a servant of Jehovah, who would, on His part, forgive His people's sins (Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴, cf. 33¹⁷⁻²²). The restoration of Israel, which was thus to be accomplished by Jehovah, involved not only national honour, but also a new prosperity for the priesthood, and new immortality on the part of the individual and the nation. There is no reference, however, to a personal Messiah. Yet if such a passage as Dt 18¹⁸⁻¹⁹ belongs to this period, it is evident that the hope included the expectation of some great person, who would be even more sublime than Moses himself.

3. The Messianic hope during the Exile.—The great catastrophe which fell upon both the Northern and Southern Kingdoms forced the prophets to re-examine the relations of national misfortune to the persistent hope of the glorious Kingdom of Jehovah. It would seem as if at the outset the exiles had expected that they would soon return to Palestine, but this hope was opposed most vigorously by Ezekiel, and the fall of Jerusalem confirmed his teaching. From the despair that followed, the people were rescued by the appearance of Cyrus, who became the instrument of Jehovah in bringing about the return of the remnant to their own land. It was from these dark years that there appeared a new type of Messianic hope, national and economic, it is true, but also profoundly religious. Jehovah would care for His people as the shepherd cared for his sheep, and the land to which they would return would be renewed (Ezk 34¹¹⁻²⁰), while the nations would support Israel and fear Jehovah (Is 49²²⁻²³). Jehovah would make an everlasting covenant with His people (Is 55³⁻⁵), but the new nation would not be composed of all those who had been swept into exile and their descendants. It would rather be a righteous community, purified by suffering. Thus the hope rises to that recognition of the individual which Ezekiel was the first to emphasize strongly.

At this point we have to decide whether the suffering Servant of Jehovah is to be interpreted collectively as the purified and vicarious remnant of Israel; or as some individual who would stand for ever as a representative of Jehovah, and, through his sufferings, purify and recall Israel to that spiritual life which would be the guarantee of a glorious future; or as the suffering nation itself. The interpretation placed upon these 'Servant' passages (Is 43¹⁻¹² 49¹⁻³ 52¹³⁻¹⁵ 53¹⁻¹²) in Rabbinic thought was ordinarily not personal, but national. It was a suffering Israel who was not only to be gloriously redeemed, but was also to bring the knowledge of Jehovah and salvation to the world at large. And this is becoming the current interpretation to-day. Yet the personification is so complete as to yield itself readily to the personal application to Jesus made by the early Church and subsequent Christian expositors. A vicarious element, which was to prove of lasting influence, is now introduced into Messianic expectation. The deliverance was to be through the sufferings of the Deliverer. See, further, SERVANT OF THE LORD.

4. 'Messianic' Psalms.—While it is not possible to date Ps 2 with any precision, its picture of the coming King who shall reign over all the world because of the power of Jehovah, is fundamentally political. The same is true of Ps 45 and 72. In these Psalms there are expressions which could subsequently be used very properly to express the expectation of a completed Messianic hope, but it would be unwise to read back into them a conscious expectation of a definite super-human person. The hope at the time of the writing of these Psalms was national and political.

5. The attempt at a Messianic nation.—With the return of the exiles from Babylon to Judah attempts were made to inaugurate an ideal commonwealth which should embody these anticipations. The one great pre-requisite of this new nation was to be the observance of the Law, which would insure the coming of the Spirit of Jehovah upon the new Israel (Jl 2²⁸⁻²⁹, Hag 1¹³, Zec 2¹⁻⁴ etc., Is 60¹⁻²²). The coronation of Zerubbabel seemed to Haggai and Zechariah the fulfilment of the promise that the prince would come from the house of David (Hag 2²³, Zec 3⁹). But the new commonwealth was thoroughly inefficient, and the Messianic hope seems to have become dormant in the struggles of the weak State. The literary activity of the years between the re-building of the Temple and the Maccabean outbreak was, however, if current critical views be correct, full of idealistic elements. These expressed themselves in a re-working of the older codes and prophecies of the Hebrews, under the influence of the faith in the coming triumph Jehovah would give His people. The personal Deliverer is not described, but the deliverance was assured. This genuinely Messianic hope was not killed even by other tendencies to replace prophecy by the philosophy of experience. Through all these years it is certain that the fundamental elements of the Messianic hope remained fixed; namely, the ineradicable belief that Jehovah would (a) make of the Jewish nation a world empire; (b) establish the house of David; (c) punish the enemies of His chosen people, whether Gentiles or Jews; and (d) that this glorious future would be established by the expression of the Divine power in the resurrection, not of the individual from Sheol, but of the nation from its miseries. These elements were subsequently to develop into the dominant characteristics of the later Messianic hope—the Kingdom of God, the Davidic King, the Day of Judgment, and the Resurrection of the Righteous.

II. The Messiah of the Jewish literature.—1. The rise of apocalypses.—The attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to crush out Judaism led to the appearance of a new type of religious literature—the apocalypse. The origin of this literature is a matter of dispute. The influence of the Babylonian myth cycles is certainly apparent, but the apocalypses, as they stand, have no precise analogy in other literature of the period. For our present purpose, however, the importance of the apocalypse lies in the fact that it contributed to the development of a new Messianic conception. In the very nature of the case the misery of Syrian persecution forced 'the Pious' not only to renewed faith in Jehovah, but also to a new sense of the need of prophecy. In the absence of the genuine prophet, the triumph of Israel and the inevitable destruction of Jehovah's foes were foretold by symbol. The pseudonymous literature, which thus arose in the course of time, however, came to be taken not simply as figures of speech, but as possessing an ill-defined literal character (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE).

2. The Messiah of the later canonical books is not well defined. The apocalyptic sections of Daniel contain a pervasive Messianic element, and in the portrayal of this hope we find the first thoroughly elaborated apocalypse of Judaism. The international relations of Israel are traced, but the historical horizon is bounded by Antiochus Epiphanes. A most important element of the future as set forth by Daniel is to be seen in the triumph of the kingdom of the saints, whose symbol is a 'son of man,' over the oppressing kingdoms of Babylon, Media, Persia, and Syria, symbolized by the four beasts. There is, however, no sharply distinct personal Messiah in these visions, and the expectation is primarily that of a genuinely political State established by Jehovah in Palestine. The 'day of Jehovah' (see DAY OF THE LORD) is, however, now elaborately developed into a world-judgment, and the lines of future apocalyptic Messianism are clearly drawn. But it is now to some extent expanded by the belief that the righteous, both Hebrews and others, would be raised from the dead to join in the Kingdom (Dn 12²). In this union of the idea of the resurrection of the nation with that of the individual we find material which was ready to grow into the pictures of the later apocalypse.

3. In the Sibyllin Oracles the figure of the Messiah again is not distinct, but there is a picture (III. 6² 7²) of a glorious time when under a Divinely supported king (doubtless a member of the Hasmonæan house) war was to cease and God was to bless the righteous and punish the wicked. The nations would then come under the law of Jehovah, and Jerusalem would be the capital of the world-wide empire to be established miraculously. The other literature of the inter-Biblical period is not so hopeful, although ben-Sira foresees an everlasting Jewish empire under a Davidic dynasty (Sir 32¹, 19 33¹, 37² 47¹ 50²).

4. In the different strata of the Eth. Enoch literature the hope of a personal Messiah is presented in somewhat different degrees of distinctness. In the older sections (1-36) of the original groundwork (chs. 1-36, 72-104), the hope, though apocalyptic, is national. Here, however, as in the later literature, attention is centred rather on the punishment of the wicked than on the development of the new Kingdom. Very noteworthy is the fact that both the punishment of the wicked and the rewards of the righteous were to be eschatological. But eschatology, though involving the resurrection, is still somewhat naïve. The righteous are to live 500 years, beget 1000 children, and die in peace (ch. 10). Still, the punishment of the wicked is to be in Sheol, which has been divided into four sections with varying conditions (ch. 22; see SHEOL). It is obvious, however, that in this early Enoch literature the thought is poetic rather than precise, and in a way it marks the transition from the political religious hope of the prophets to the transcendental expectations of the later apocalypses.

In the dream visions (chs. 83-90) there is a more elaborate symbolical account of the sufferings of the Hebrew people under various oppressors. The new age, however, is about to be introduced by the Day of Judgment, when wicked persons—whether men, rulers, or angels—are to be cast into an abyss of fire. Then the New Jerusalem is to be established by God. The dead are to be raised, the Messiah is to appear, and all men are to be transformed into His likeness. These latter elements of the hope, however, are somewhat obscurely expressed. The Messiah seems to have no particular function either of judgment or of conquest. The new Kingdom is a direct gift of God.

In the later chapters of this early section (chs. 90-104) the thought becomes more eschatological. The resurrection comes at the end of the Messianic reign, which is to be one of struggle, in which the wicked are to be subdued. The Messiah is thus more distinct, and is at least once called by God 'my Son.'

In the other group of Enoch visions (chs. 37-72) the transcendental has become to some extent literalized. The Messiah is now very prominent, being called 'son of man,' 'elect,' 'righteous one.' He is pre-existent, and co-judge with God over both the living and the dead. The punishment of the enemies of Israel is still as prominent as the establishment of the new Kingdom, and the latter is described in terms which make it evident that the Jews could not conceive of any Kingdom of God apart from Palestine. There men and angels are to dwell together and rule over a world freed from sin.

5. In the Book of Jubilees the Messianic hope is all but lacking. Angelology and demonology are well developed, but apparently the author of the visions conceived of the Messianic age as about to dawn, even if it had not already begun. Members of that age were to live 1000 years, and were to be free from the influence of Satan. The Judgment was to close this period, but there was to be no resurrection of the body. There is no reference to a Messiah, but rather to the conquest of the world by a nation that kept Jehovah's law.

6. The best-drawn picture of the Messiah in the Pharisaic literature is that of the Psalms of Solomon. In the 17th and 18th of these the apocalyptic element is largely wanting, but there is nothing inconsistent with the view of apocalyptic Messianism. The Messiah, however, is given a position not accorded him elsewhere in pre-Christian Jewish literature. He is neither sufferer nor teacher, pre-existent nor miraculously born; he is a mighty king, vice-regent of God, strong through the Holy Spirit. He would conquer the world without weapons or armies, with the word of his mouth.

6.e. miraculously. The capital would be at Jerusalem, which would be purged from all heathen, and his subjects would be righteous Jews, 'sons of God.'

7. The literature of later Pharisaism became very strongly apocalyptic, but the figure of a personal Messiah is not always present. In the Assumption of Moses there is no personal Messiah mentioned, and God is said to be the sole punisher of the Gentiles. The sufferings of the faithful are treated as an incentive to faith in the Kingdom of God. The concrete king of the hostile kingdom should be overcome. The enemies of God were to be punished in Gehenna, and a glorious dispensation for united Israel was to dawn.

In Slavonic Enoch, likewise, there is no mention of the Messiah or of the resurrection, although the latter is doubtless involved in the doctrine of the millennium, which this book sets forth. It would appear that both in the Assumption of Moses and in Slavonic Enoch the central figure is God, the deliverer of His people and judge of His enemies, rather than the Messiah.

In the Apocalypse of Baruch and in Second Esdras, however, transcendentalism reaches its final form under the influence of the tragedy of the fall of Jerusalem. These two books are very probably the different forms of cycles of apocalyptic hopes that prevailed among the pious Jews. In one cycle a Messiah would slay those who had in any way injured the Jewish people, and make a Jerusalem already prepared in heaven his capital. In the other cycle there is no such glory in store for Israel, but there will be an end of corruptible things, and the establishment of a new world-age in which the dead shall be raised under the command of the Messiah. In Second Esdras the Christ is conceived of as pre-existent, raised from the sea in company with Enoch, Moses, and Elijah; and is addressed by God as 'my Son.' He destroys the enemies of Israel without war, with fire that proceeds from his mouth. The ten tribes of Israel return with their brethren to live in the New Jerusalem which had come down from heaven. Then the Messiah and all mankind die, remaining dead for an entire 'week'; after that come a general resurrection and judgment, and the fixing of the destinies of eternity. God, however, rather than the Messiah, is to be judge.

In these later apocalypses the Christ plays a large rôle, but is manifestly to be subordinated to God.

III. The Messiah of popular expectation in NT times.—Over against this Messiah of Pharisaic literature, so clearly increasingly superhuman in character, must be placed the Messianic hope of the people at large. It is difficult to discover this in detail, for the reason that it found its way into literature only as a hope that had been rejected by the writers. Yet it is possible in some passages of Josephus to trace its rise and its tragic outcome. The Messianic spirit is undoubtedly to be seen in the succession of so-called 'robbers' that disturbed the reigns of Herod I. and his successors; as well as in the conspiracies under 'the ten men' (Ant. xv. viii. 3, 4) and the Rabbis Judas and Matthias (Ant. xvii. vi. 2, 4). With the death of Herod, however, the Messianic movement among the masses gathered headway, particularly after the erection of Judæa into a procuratorial province (A.D. 6). Judas of Gamala and a Pharisee named Zaduc organized a fourth sect co-ordinate with the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, and incited the people to revolt, because of the census then established. There is no evidence, however, that this new sect, which is clearly that of the Zealots, had any distinct hope of a superhuman Messiah. According to Josephus (Ant. xviii. i. 1, 6), they said God was to be their only ruler and lord. To this new party Josephus attributes in large degree the fall of the Jewish State. Messianic movements are also to be seen in the attempted revolt of the prophet Theudas, in robbers like Eleazar, in the Sicarii (or Assassins), and in 'the Egyptian,' with whom St. Paul was momentarily identified by the chief captain (Ac 21³⁸). Besides these were bands of fanatics like those mysterious men mentioned by Josephus (BJ ii. i. 2, 3). All these movements co-operated to bring about the destruction of the Jewish State, for the revolt of 66 must be regarded as distinctly Messianic—a fact perceived by Josephus in the important passage BJ vi. v. 4, where it is said: 'What most stirred them up to war was the ambiguous oracle that was found also in their sacred writings [doubtless Daniel; cf. Ant. x. x. 4] that about that time one from their country should become ruler of the world.'

It is greatly to be regretted that this Messianic hope of the people has not left larger traces of itself. It is, however, not difficult to see in it the more political and concrete hopes which the Pharisees expressed in terms of the apocalypse. The Zealots, like the Pharisees, expected the new Kingdom to be established by God or His representative the Messiah, but, unlike the Pharisees, they were not content to await the Divine action. They preferred rather to precipitate deliverance by political revolt. The fact that the Messiah is not prominent in such hopes does not imply that such a person was unexpected. A leader would certainly be involved in any revolt, but such a leader would not necessarily be superhuman. Yet it would be unsafe to say that the Messiah whom the people expected, any more than he whom the Pharisees awaited, would be without Divine appointment and inspiration. He might not be, strictly speaking, supernatural, but he would certainly be given the Divine Spirit and power to bring deliverance which, without the aid of God, would be clearly impossible. The chief difference between the Messianic hope of the Pharisees and that of the Zealots and people was probably the lack in the latter of the eschatological, transcendental element, such as the resurrection from the dead and the heavenly Jerusalem, which was so important in the hope of the Pharisees. How thoroughly social and political this folk-Messianism became is to be seen in the various abortive attempts to establish, during the revolt of 66, a peasant republic, as well as in the destruction of evidence of indebtedness and the massacre of the aristocrats. The Pharisaic expectation would never have led to violence, but rather involved the patient waiting of the faithful for the time set by Jehovah.

IV. The Messiah of the Samaritans.—It would be exceedingly helpful, particularly for an understanding of Jn 4¹⁻⁴², if we knew the Samaritan Messianic hope with some precision. Unfortunately, there is no literature dating from the time of Christ which sets this forth. So far, however, as it can be recovered from later sources, and particularly from the present high priest of the Samaritans, it would seem that the expectation did not include the Davidic King of Judaism, but centred rather about the prophecy of Dt 18¹⁸ of the prophet God was to raise up like unto Moses. This prophet, according to the Samaritan belief, was to be 'the Converter,' who would bring moral and religious truth to light. At the same time, they believed that the Gentiles would be subjected to him, would believe in him and the holy Law, and in the sanctuary of Mt. Gerizim. There seems to have been no expectation of miraculous powers to be exercised by the prophet; but concerning this, as in fact about other particulars of the Samaritan hope, no statement can be made with absolute certainty.

V. The Messiah of Rabbinism.—Subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem, Pharisaism developed rapidly into its final stage of Rabbinism. The two tendencies which are so marked in Pharisaism—one towards strict legalism, the other towards Messianic idealism—were then codified and systematically elaborated. The development of the Messianic expectation, however, was to some extent shaped by the need of combating the Messianic interpretations of Christianity. Traces of this influence are undoubtedly to be found in the Targum on Is 52, and in 2 Esdras, but they are also to appear in literature that was clearly subjected to Christian redaction. The Messiah was generally regarded as a descendant of David. He was to free Israel from the power of the heathen world, kill its emperor of the kingdom of evil, and set up his own Kingdom. He was regarded also as pre-existent, not merely ideally, but actually. For a merely ideal pre-existence is not to be argued from the well-known saying including the seven things created before the world was made. The name here undoubtedly implies personality, and in some of the later Jewish writings this pre-existent state is somewhat minutely described. He is to be hidden until he appears, but the obvious inconsistencies of view were never fully systematized.

Doubtless because of the Messianic arguments of Christians, based upon such passages as Is 53, the Rabbis were forced to the recognition of the idea of the suffering Messiah. In this recognition, however, no change was made in the conception of the Messiah the son of David, but the belief came to involve a second Messiah the son of Joseph. His office and person are not described in detail, but later Rabbinic teaching held that he would appear before the coming of the Messiah the son of David, would gather faithful Jews to him, defeat his people's enemies, and establish a great empire with its capital and temple at Jerusalem. Thereafter some one of the various transcendental enemies of Israel, like Gog and Magog, would defeat and slay him. Then the Messiah son of David would come and resurrect the Messiah son of Joseph, and establish the great and more permanent Messianic Kingdom. This conception of the Messiah son of Joseph, however, has never played a very large rôle in Rabbinic Messianism, and must be regarded in the light of a concession to Christian opponents rather than as a really formative influence. The older hope of the Messiah son of David is that dominant among orthodox Jews, who still await his coming, which is to follow the appearance of Elijah (Mal 3¹ 4⁵ 6).

VI. The Messiah of the NT.—As its very name indicates, Christianity centres about the belief that Jesus was the Messiah. The definition of that word as applied to Jesus is one about which there is some difference of opinion. Conceivably it might be (a) that of Pharisaic Messianism; (b) something altogether new; or, more probably, (c) the old conception modified by certain new elements.

In discovering what the Messianic conceptions of the NT are, it is necessary to avoid a dogmatic attitude of mind, and to come to the discussion from the historical-exegetical point of view. In such a method the point of departure is the presupposition that current beliefs and definitions were used by Jesus and His disciples wherever such thoughts and definitions are not distinctly changed or abrogated. A disregard of this primary principle in historical method has too frequently been the cause of false perspective and anachronistic conclusions as regards NT thought.

1. Jesus' conception of Messiahship.—That Jesus conceived of Himself as a Messiah seems to be beyond question, if the saying of Mk 14⁶¹ 62 is regarded as historical. But such a conclusion does not rest wholly upon a single saying. His words concerning His conquest of Satan (Mk 3²³⁻²⁶) are altogether consonant with the conception of Himself as Christ; and His assent to the confession of the Apostles at Caesarea Philippi is a practical acceptance of the title (Mk 8²⁷⁻³⁰), which has been made more explicit in Mt 16¹³⁻¹⁶, Lk 9¹⁸⁻²⁰. His answer to the inquiry of John the Baptist as to whether He were the Coming One (Mt 11²⁻¹⁰, Lk 7¹⁸⁻¹⁹) can be interpreted only as affirmative. The question was genuinely Messianic, and the Scripture which He used (Is 35⁴⁻⁶) was given a Messianic interpretation by the Rabbis. To give it any other than a Messianic implication is to render the whole episode unintelligible. It is to be noticed further that this saying is not exposed to the difficulties which inhere in some of the apocalyptic sayings attributed to Jesus, or in the repeated Messianic designations of the Fourth Gospel.

It is easy by a process of subjective criticism to remove such sayings from the field of discussion, but such procedure is arbitrary in view of the facts already adduced. It is true that in the Synoptic Gospels Jesus does not at the beginning of the Galilean ministry go about the country announcing that He is the Christ, but neither does He undertake this sort of propaganda according to the Johannine source. And it should not be overlooked that in any case His words in the synagogue of Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁶⁻³⁰, Mt 13⁵⁴⁻⁵⁸, Mk 6¹⁻⁶), which can best be interpreted as an exposition of His conception of His Messiahship, were uttered in the early part of His ministry. While some allowance may be made for the Johannine accounts of the early acceptance of Jesus as Christ, there is no reason why the ascription of the title to Him by the disciples might not have been made at the beginning of the ministry in the same futurist sense as is involved in the obvious Messianic definition implied in the questions of the sons of Zebedee in the Synoptic cycle (Mk 10³⁶⁻⁴⁰). The fact that Jesus accepted such interpretations of His future makes it plain that He regarded Himself as Christ, at least in the sense that He was to do Messianic work in the future.

This, however, brings us face to face with the question as to how far Jesus applied to Himself the eschatological Messianic hopes of His people, and how far He developed an original Messianic ideal. As yet no consensus of scholars has been reached on this very difficult point. Certain things, however, seem to be established. (a) Jesus was not regarded generally as the Christ, but rather as a prophet and miracle-worker. He certainly refused to commit Himself to the Messianic programme of the Zealots. He rejected the title 'Son of David' (Mk 12³⁵), and refused to be made a king, or to use physical force in bringing in the Kingdom of God (Jn 6¹⁵; cf. Mt 4⁸⁻¹⁰, Lk 4⁵⁻⁸, Mk 14⁴⁷ 48). (b) Unless all reference by Jesus to the future in terms of eschatology is to be denied (a decision impossible for reasonable criticism), He certainly thought of Himself as returning in the near future to establish a Kingdom that was eschatological.

Although it is probable that the writers of the Gospels have imported eschatological references into the sayings of Jesus, it is impossible to remove them altogether. If, as is probable, Jesus conceived of the Kingdom as the gift of God, for whose coming men were to prepare, it is inevitable that His Messianic career would have been regarded as future as truly as the Kingdom itself (cf. Mt 6¹⁰, Mk 9¹, Lk 12³², Mt 25, Mk 14⁶¹ 62, Mk 13, 1 Th 4¹³⁻¹⁷, Mt 19²⁸, Lk 22³⁰).

(c) But although the coming of the Kingdom, with the attendant Judgment, was still in the future, Jesus cannot be said to have conceived of His mission wholly in terms of eschatology. He had broken with Pharisaism too completely to warrant our attributing to Him a priori complete subjection to any Pharisaic conception. If there is anything that stands out in the expression of Jesus' self-consciousness, it is that His experience of God was superior to that of a prophet. While in the Synoptic Gospels He does not use explicitly the terms 'Christ' or 'Son of God' of Himself, His reticence in the use of terms is balanced by His conception of His own relation to the Kingdom of God. He was the 'Son of Man,' i.e., in accordance with Dn 7¹³. He was the type of the coming Kingdom. If, as is undoubtedly the case, He maintained reserve in His preaching in making explicit claims concerning Messiahship, such reserve is easily explained as a preventive against those misapprehensions with which people would have been sure to regard His work. The spirit of the Lord was upon Him to enable Him to do certain deeds which it was expected the Christ would perform. He was gathering disciples who, as His followers, were to share in the coming Kingdom. In a word, because of the Divine Spirit embodied in His own self-consciousness, He was already engaged in the work of saving God's people.

(d) The connecting link between the Messianic career of service and the Messianic career of glory was His death.

No fair criticism can doubt that Jesus saw in these two supreme experiences elements of His work as Saviour. Only thus can we interpret His saying at the Last Supper and His repeated prophecies to His followers (Mk 14²⁴ 8³¹⁻³² 9³⁰⁻³², Mt 12³⁴, Lk 12³⁴). Thus He fulfilled in Himself the Messianic picture of the Suffering Servant of Is 53. (e) In conclusion, it appears that Jesus' conception of Himself as Messiah was that He was the One in whom God Himself was revealing Himself as the Saviour of those who would accept Him as the Father. The teaching of Jesus from this point of view becomes something more than theoretical ethics and religion, and is seen to be an exposition of His own Messianic self-consciousness. Even in His humiliation and in His sufferings He was the Divinely empowered Saviour. If His faith in the ultimate triumph of that salvation took the form of the eschatology of His people, it does not thereby lose any of its significance. By His sufferings God's righteous Servant did justify many, and by His death on the cross He did draw men to Him. With His resurrection began a new era in religious experience, which revealed the realities of those pictures of that transcendental 'age to come' in which current Messianism clothed the glories of the Divine deliverance.

In short, Jesus modified the conception of the Messiah fundamentally: (1) by recognizing in His own experience vicarious suffering as a part of the Divine deliverance, but even more (2) by His insistence on the universal fatherliness of God, which transformed salvation from something ethnic and national into a salvation from sin and death of all those who accept Him as the Christ; i.e. who by faith reproduce in their lives that dynamic union with God, which was the source of the power which He Himself exhibited in His life and resurrection.

2. The conception of the Messiah among the Apostles.—In general the Apostles may be said to have believed Jesus to be the Messiah in the sense that (a) in His earthly period of humiliation He was anointed with God's Spirit; (b) that He had not done the strictly Messianic work during His earthly career; (c) that He had been declared the Christ by His resurrection; and (d) that, though now in authority in heaven, He would return to deliver His people, establish a Kingdom, and hold the world-judgment which was to be preceded by the resurrection of believers, if not of all men.

(1) In the primitive Church of Jerusalem expectation centred about the eschatological concept of judgment and deliverance. As appears from the speech of St. Peter at Pentecost (Ac 2¹⁴⁻⁴²), as well as from other addresses from the early chapters of Acts, the disciples believed that the new age was about to dawn. They were living in 'the last days' of the pre-Messianic age. The Christ had appeared, but had been killed, had ascended to heaven after His resurrection, thence He had sent the Holy Spirit to those who believed that He was the Christ, thus fulfilling the prophecy of Jl 2²⁸⁻³² (which, however, had not been thus interpreted by the Pharisees). The Resurrection had not made Him the Christ, but had decisively shown that He was the One whom God had made Lord and Christ (Ac 2³⁶). In the primitive Church the Messianic deliverance was limited to the commonwealth of Israel. If the Gentiles were to share in the Messianic deliverance, they had need to be circumcised and join the Jewish community (Ac 15¹).

Just how far disciples like St. Peter and St. John were committed to this strictly Jewish type of Messianic expectation it is difficult to say. It would, however, be unfair to hold that they represented the so-called 'party of the circumcision' which combated St. Paul in his removal of all conditions of salvation beyond faith in Jesus as Christ. It should not be overlooked, moreover, that even in the primitive Jerusalem Church the death of Jesus was regarded as a part of the Messianic programme of deliverance, though there is no distinct theory of the Atonement formulated.

(2) St. Paul's conception of the Messiah. (i.) This is in marked advance upon that of the primitive Church.

He was at one with the Jerusalem community in holding that the Kingdom had not yet come, and that Jesus would soon return from heaven to establish it. He built into his Messianic conception, however, a number of important elements, some of which were derived from Judaism. These elements were (a) the vicarious nature of the death of Christ; (b) the pre-existence of Jesus as Christ; (c) the doctrine of the second Adam, i.e. that Jesus in His resurrection was the type of the risen humanity, as Adam was the type of physical humanity; (d) the more or less complete identification of Jesus with the Spirit who came to the disciples, as distinct from having been sent by Jesus to the disciples.

(ii.) It is not difficult to see, therefore, why it was that St. Paul's chief interest did not lie in the career of the historical Jesus as a teacher and miracle-worker, but rather in the Divine, risen Christ who maintained spiritual relations with His followers. To have made the teaching of Jesus the centre of his thought would have been to replace the legalism of the Law by the legalism of a new authority. St. Paul was evidently acquainted with the teaching of Jesus, but his message was not that of a completed ethical philosophy, but a gospel of good news of a salvation possible to all mankind, through faith in Jesus as the Messiah. The Pauline gospel to the unconverted (see Ac 13¹⁶⁻⁴¹ 14¹⁷⁻¹⁷ 17¹⁻²) started with the expectation of Messianic judgment, presented the crucified Jesus as declared the Christ by His resurrection, proved it by the use of OT prophecy, and closed with the exhortation to his hearers to become reconciled to God, who was ready to forgive and save them. In his thought salvation consisted in the possession, through the indwelling Holy Spirit of God, of the sort of life which the risen Jesus already possessed. Morality was the expression in conduct of this regenerate life.

(iii.) The Pauline Christ is Divine, and His work is twofold. First, it is to be that of the Messiah of Jewish eschatology. The Apostle utilizes many of the elements of the Messianism of the Pharisees, e.g. the two ages, the world-judgment, the trumpet to raise the dead, the sorrows of 'the last days.' But he also made a distinct addition to Messianic thought (a) by his emphasis upon the relation of the death of Jesus to the acquittal of the believer in the eschatological judgment, and (b) in his formulation of a doctrine of the resurrection by the use of the historical resurrection of Jesus. The argument in this latter case rests on two foundations—testimony and the implications of Christian experience. The Christian is to be saved from death, the wages of sin, after the manner of his risen Lord, who had borne death on his behalf. Thus the Pauline Christology is essentially soteriological. Its speculative elements are wholly contributory to the exposition of the certainty and the reasonableness of the coming deliverance. Clothed though it is in Jewish vocabularies and conceptions, the Pauline conception of Christ and His work has for its foci the historical Jesus and Christian experience. The concepts inherited from Judaism do not give rise to his belief in the resurrection, but his confidence in the historicity of that event gives rise to his Christology.—Secondly, conceiving thus of Jesus as the supreme King of those whom He had delivered, the Pauline conceptions of His relations with the Church followed naturally. God was not to condemn those who had voluntarily undertaken to prepare for the Kingdom when it should appear. They were 'justified' through their faith in Jesus as Christ. But could the King of that coming Kingdom be indifferent to those who were justified, had already received the Holy Spirit as a first instalment of the future blessing, and were daily awaiting His reappearance? The Christ was the 'Head' of the Church in 'the last days,' just as truly as, in the 'coming age,' He would be King. His supremacy over the Church consisted not merely in that its original nucleus was composed of His disciples, but also in that He had instituted its simple rites, established the details of its organization by giving to its members varying gifts of the Spirit, oversees its affairs, and is present within it. In fact, so intimate is His relation with the Church, that Christians may be said to be in Him, and He in them.

From this union of the believer with his Lord (generally mediated in the Pauline thought by the presence of the Holy Spirit) comes the consummation of the salvation of the individual. Since He had triumphed over death, the believer in whom the Holy Spirit lived might also expect the gift of that spiritual body which was one element of the salvation wrought by Jesus in the case of the individual.

(iv.) Yet St. Paul would not say that the Christ was to reign eternally. After He had completed His work of Messianic deliverance, had finally conquered sin and death, and had established His glorious age, He was to give up the Kingdom to the Father that God might be all and in all (1 Co 15²⁴). Thus, while the Pauline soteriological thought is Christo-centric, his theology is Theo-centric. Jesus is Christ in the sense that through Him God accomplishes the salvation of His people—with St. Paul no longer the Jewish nation, but individuals who, because of their relations with the Deliverer, have been wrought into a unity on earth and await an even nobler unity in heaven.

(3) In post-Pauline Apostolic thought the Messianic concept is still central, but in its development we notice two tendencies. (a) There is the tendency, already present in primitive and Pauline Christianity, to find confirmation of the Messianic dignity of Jesus in the OT prophecies. With their recollections of the historical career of Jesus, the Apostles saw in the OT Messianic meanings which had eluded the Pharisees. They did not, it is true, disregard those passages which set forth the royal dignity of the Christ, but they were far more concerned in arguing for the Messianic significance of those passages which foretold the victory of God's Anointed over death and the vicarious nature of His sufferings. Thus such passages as Ps 110 and Is 53 were seen to supplement each other in teaching the consonance of the Messianic dignity with suffering.

As Christian thought developed, this tendency to find Messianic references in the OT set practically no limits to itself. In the Epistle to the Hebrews the essential features of the entire Hebrew cult are viewed as foreshadowings of the career and the glories of the Christ. In the prophetic fulfillments noticed by the writer of the First Gospel, the prophecy of the birth of a son to 'the virgin' (Is 7¹⁴) and the recall of Israel from Egypt (Hos 11¹) are also seen to be prophecies of the experience of Jesus (Mt 1²² 2¹⁵). The same was true of more incidental matters, such as His name and His description as the Nazarene (Mt 2²³), while the experience of Jonah was regarded as a type of His burial and resurrection (12⁴⁰). Particularly was it seen that His vicarious character was foretold. In the Book of Revelation the Messianic future of Jesus and His Kingdom was still further elaborated by the copious utilization of apocalyptic thought. In the Apostolic Fathers the use of the OT as the basis for Christological thought involved an arbitrary exegesis which extended far beyond the limits of proper methodology; and events in the life of Jesus were found predicted in sayings and events quite unused by the Apostles.

(b) The second tendency in post-Pauline Christological interpretation is to re-state the Messianic significance of Jesus in terms of current philosophy. The most pronounced illustration of this is to be seen in the Johannine literature. Here the Christ is identified with the Logos, and His entire career is viewed as an illustration of the great conflict between light and darkness, life and death, the powers of Satan and the powers of God. In the Epistle to the Hebrews a tendency is to be seen towards the metaphysical conception of Jesus as the Son of God—a tendency which was to find its outcome in the theological formulations of the 3rd and 4th centuries.

But in both these tendencies the fundamental conception of Messiahship is maintained. God is in Jesus reconciling the world to Himself, not imputing their trespasses to those who accept Him, and already engaged in the work of their salvation. The elemental conception of the Messiah thus passed over into Christian thought. It carried with it, it is true, the figures of that interpretation which was born of the development of the Hebrew and Jewish thought. But these figures are not the essential element of Christianity. That is rather the message which the prophets themselves had applied exclusively to Israel, viz. that God would save His people through some personality in whom His spirit was particularly resident to empower Him for the work of salvation. Thus in the history of Jesus and in Christian experience this Divine salvation is set forth, not as ab extra, but as the result of the in-working of God in human lives, to which He comes through the mediation of faith in Jesus, His supreme revelation. To formulate and vindicate the message of this salvation is to exhibit the content of the gospel.

SHAILER MATTHEWS.

METE.—'To mete' is 'to measure,' and a 'meteyard' (Lev 19³⁵) is a merchant's measuring-stick.

METHEG-AMMAH.—David took Metheg-ammah out of the hand of the Philistines' (2 S 8¹ AV and RVm). RV tr. 'the bride of the mother-city,' which has been interpreted to mean authority over the metropolis, or the suzerainty exercised by the Philistines,—it being assumed that Gath was the leading city. In all probability the text is corrupt beyond restoration. See, further, ExpT, Oct. 1899, p. 48, and Feb. 1906, p. 215.

W. F. COBB.

METHUSELAH.—A Sethite, the father of Lamech, Gn 5²⁸. (P), 1 Ch 1¹, Lk 3³⁷—Methushael in J's genealogy, 4¹⁸. The name is interpreted by Holzinger as 'man of the javelin'—a fitting name for a time when the earth was full of violence.

METHUSHAEL.—A Cainite, the father of Lamech. Gn 4¹⁸ (J); Methuselah in P's genealogy (5²⁸). The interpretations of the name are various.

MEUNIM.—See MAANI, MAON, MINAEANS.

MEUZAL.—Ezk 27¹⁹ AVm. See UZAL.

ME-ZAHAB ('waters of gold').—Father of Matred and grandfather of Mehetabel the wife of Hadar (Hadad), one of the kings of Edom (Gn 36³⁹). The name Mezahab is much more like that of a place than of a person. Holzinger suggests that it is the same name as appears in a corrupted form in Dt 1¹ as Dizahab (wh. see).

MEZOBAITE.—One of David's heroes is called in 1 Ch 11⁴⁷ 'Jaasiel the Mezobaite.' The text is doubtful.

MIBHAR.—In 1 Ch 11³⁸ one of David's heroes appears as 'Mibhar the son of Hagri.' The parallel passage 2 S 23³⁶ reads, 'of Zobah, Bani the Gadite,' which is probably the correct text.

MIBSAM.—1. A son of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁸—1 Ch 1³⁰). 2. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4³⁶).

MIBZAR ('fortification').—A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36⁴¹—1 Ch 1⁴⁰).

MICAH.—1. Son of Merib-baal (Mephibosheth), 2 S 9¹²; called in 1 Ch 8³⁴. 9⁴⁰. Micah. See MICAH, No. 3. 2. Son of Zichri (1 Ch 9¹⁴, Neh 11¹⁷)—Micaiah of Neh 12³⁶. 3. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹⁴).

MICAH, MICAIAH ('Who is like Jahweh?').—This name, which occurs at least twelve times in the OT, and is a woman's name as well as a man's, is spelt in three different ways; the full name is Micajahu, a partially shortened form is Micaiah, while a still shorter form is Micah. The more important of those who bore this name are the following:—1. Micah, a dweller in the hill-country of Ephraim; he stole from his mother eleven hundred pieces of silver, which, however, he returned on hearing the curse which his mother pronounced against the thief. With part of the returned silver his mother causes an image to be made, which Micah sets up in his house; he then consecrates one of his sons a priest. But a Levite, named Jonathan, comes to the house of Micah while journeying; Micah induces him to be his priest instead of the son whom he had first consecrated. During this time the Danites send out five men to search for a suitable locality wherein to settle down; these five men come to the house of Micah, and while staying there they recognize the Levite. On their return they report that they have found a place for their tribe to dwell in. The whole 'family' of the Danites then set out, and come to take possession of the district they intend to make their home. On their coming into the neighbourhood of Micah's dwelling-place, the five men who had already been there come and persuade Micah's Levite to join them, and to bring with him Micah's ephod, teraphim, and graven image. Micah follows after them; but protests in vain, for he is warned that if he attempts to regain his priest and lost treasures by force he will lose his goods and his life; he therefore returns home without them (Jg 17. 18). This very interesting narrative has undoubtedly a basis in fact: it records—though later editors have somewhat altered its original form—how the sanctuary in Dan first came to be established (see esp. Jg 18²⁹⁻³¹).

2. Micaiah, the son of Imlah; a prophet of Jahweh who is called by Ahab, at the request of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to prophesy concerning the result of a projected expedition against the Syrians. In reply to Ahab's inquiry Micaiah first prophesies smoothly; but Ahab bids him speak nothing but the truth; thereupon he foretells the disaster that is to befall the allied armies of Israel and Judah if they go up to Ramoth-gilead to battle. The parable which the prophet then utters is a terrible indictment against the 'lying prophets' of Israel; the blow which one of them thereupon gives him is answered by a further prophecy, this time directed against the false prophet who gave the blow. Micaiah is then commanded to be imprisoned until the king returns in peace; but, undaunted, the prophet replies, 'If thou return at all in peace, Jahweh hath not spoken by me.' The sequel showed Micaiah to have prophesied truly (1 K 22). 3. Micah, the son of Mephioseth (1 Ch 8⁴⁴. 9^{40f}. [2 S 9¹² Mica]). 4. Micaiah, one of the teachers sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the commandments of Jahweh in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁷). 5. Micaiah, the son of Gemariah, and a contemporary of Jeremiah, who heard Baruch reading out the prophecies of Jeremiah, and then spoke of them to the princes who were assembled in the scribe's chamber (Jer 36¹⁻¹³), perhaps identical with the Micaiah of 2 K 22² and the Micah of 2 Ch 34²⁰. 6. One of the priests who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12⁴¹). Other less important bearers of the name are mentioned in 1 Ch 5⁵ 23²⁰ (cf. 24^{24f}), 2 Ch 13² (see MAACAHA, 4), Neh 10¹¹ 12³⁶. [1 Ch 9¹⁵ Mica] 4, Jth 6⁴. For the prophet Micah see the following article. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

MICAH.—The Morashtite, one of the four prophets of the 8th century B.C. whose writings have survived. Probably his prophecy does not extend beyond the first three chapters of the Book of Micah (see next art.).

According to the general interpretation of 1⁵, Micah prophesied, at least in part, before the destruction of Samaria, which took place in B.C. 722; though some place his prophetic activity entirely in the years 705–701. In any case, he prophesied a generation or so later than Amos, later also than Hosea; but he was contemporary with Isaiah, and his activity coincides with the mid-career of Isaiah, or its close, according as we accept the one or the other of the two views just mentioned.

He was a native of Moreseth (1⁵, Jer 26¹⁰), a place which, if we identify it, as we probably should, with Moreseth-gath (Mic 1¹⁴), lay in the Shephelah of Judah, a fertile country with views over the Philistine country to the Mediterranean, and backed by the loftier hills which rise to the plateau on which Jerusalem is placed. The home of Micah thus lay a good day's journey from the capital, which, if we may judge from the vividness of his descriptions, he must frequently have visited.

How Micah worked we are not told; that he spoke in public, and that perhaps both at home and in Jerusalem, is probable in the light of what is known of Amos and Isaiah; and, guided by the same analogy, we may suppose that he himself summarized his teaching in writing (Mic 1–3 in the main).

Of the call of Micah we have no details, but he understood his duty as prophet to consist in 'declaring to Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin' (3³), and the doom which these involved. This transgression is centralized in the capitals—Samaria and Jerusalem (1⁵ 'What is the sin (so LXX) of Judah? Is it not Jerusalem?'; cf. 3¹⁰⁻¹²). The rising buildings and the growing magnificence of Jerusalem in Hezekiah's day spoke to him of the grinding down of the poor by which the wealth needed for such works had been obtained. It is more especially the leading and ruling classes that Micah upbraids—the wealthy land-proprietors who squeeze out the smaller holders (2¹⁰; cf. Is 5⁸), the judges and officials (3¹⁻⁴), the prophets (3³⁰), and the priests; they have wholly misunderstood Jahweh; in the very pursuit of injustice and inhumanity they rely on His presence for safety! (3¹¹). With Micah as with Isaiah, Amos, and Hosea, Jahweh is thus essentially a righteous God, offended by man's moral sins, pleased only with a moral life; the ethical is the essential element in His personality. Brief as is his prophecy, this is clear, and the deep impression made by his work is evident from the narrative in Jer 26. G. B. GRAY.

MICAH, BOOK OF.—The Book of Micah stands in EV sixth in order of the so-called Minor Prophets. In the LXX it stood third, preceded only by Hosea and Amos. EV in its arrangement follows the Hebrew Bible. In the Hebrew Bible the Book of Micah is the sixth section of a collection of prophecies already known about B.C. 180 as 'the Twelve Prophets' (Sir 49¹⁰). This Book of 'the Twelve Prophets' cannot have been compiled earlier than the 5th cent. B.C., for it contains the Book of Malachi, and it probably was not compiled till towards the close of the 3rd century B.C. For the history of the Book of Micah prior to its inclusion in this compilation we must rely entirely on internal evidence, except for any conclusions which may be drawn from Jer 26^{17ff}. It appears certain that the section of the Book of the Twelve Prophets entitled Micah consists in part of prophecies of Micah the Morashtite (see precd. art.), a contemporary of Isaiah, and in part of prophecies of later date; but the determination of what are the later prophecies is not in every case equally easy or sure.

The book divides into three clearly marked sections—chs. 1–3, Prophecies of Judgment for sin (exception 2^{11f}); chs. 4, 5, Prophecies of Promise (mainly, if not entirely); chs. 6, 7, more miscellaneous in character, but containing in ch. 7 confessions of national sin.

The first of these sections contains, and for the most part consists of, prophecies of Micah. The allusion to Samaria (which was destroyed in 722) as still standing, and the accordance of the other conditions presupposed with what is otherwise known of the latter half of the 8th cent. B.C., would suffice to prove this; but we also possess early external evidence that Micah was the author of a saying occurring in this section of the book. At the close of the following century (B.C. 608) the prophet Jeremiah was denounced by the priests and prophets as worthy of death, because he had predicted the destruction of Jerusalem; but certain elders cited against the priests and prophets the precedent of Micah the Morastite, who had made a similar prediction in the days of Hezekiah, and yet, so far from being put to death, had led his people to repentance; in citing this case the speakers quote the words with which Mic 3 closes (see Jer 26, esp. vv. 17-19). Of course, the citation of this single verse does not prove that even the first three chapters of the Book of Micah were then in circulation in their present form; but the narrative in Jeremiah shows that Micah, a century after he prophesied, ranked as a prophet of judgment, and Micah 1-3 is pre-eminently prophecy of judgment. The two verses (21^{2f}) which interrupt the general tenor of chs. 1-3 with a promise, represent Israel as scattered, and appear to presuppose the Exile; they are certainly not part of the preceding prophecy, and probably are an insertion in the book after the time of Jeremiah. It is held by some that the Book of Micah known to Jeremiah's contemporaries also lacked the following portions of chs. 1-3:—11-15a, 7, 10-16 28. Note, for example, that 17 stands most awkwardly before 18, which may give the reason for 18, but certainly not for 17. Yet the grounds given for deleting these passages in order to recover the earliest form of the Book of Micah are by no means in all cases equally conclusive. For the teaching of Micah, see preceding article.

Two not quite identical questions now naturally arise: Did the Book of Micah in the time of Jeremiah extend beyond ch. 3? Do chs. 4-7 contain any prophecies of Micah? The answers, so far as they can be given, must rest mainly on internal evidence. What suggestion the narrative of Jer 26 offers in this connexion may best be put in the form of a question. Could the elders have cited (Jer 26¹⁸) the words of Mic 3¹² if those words were then, as now, immediately followed (Mic 4¹⁻⁴) by a glowing description of the future glory of Jerusalem? Would they not thereby have given the priests an opening to say that Micah's life was spared because he repented of his blasphemy against their city and spoke of its glory?

Chs. 4, 5 appear to be a cento of brief prophecies, several of them being fragments as follows: 4¹⁻⁴, 5, 6-8, 9, 10, 11-13, 51, 2-6, 7-9, 10-14. The first of these (4¹⁻⁴) stands also in the Book of Isaiah (22⁹). Neither in Isaiah nor in Micah is the passage connected either with what precedes or with what follows; owing to mistranslation, RV indeed suggests that 4¹⁻⁴ is the contrast to 3¹²; but for 'but' in 4¹ must be substituted 'and' as in RV itself in Is 22. The verses contain a prophetic poem of 20 short lines (two of which were omitted in Isaiah); as the same Psalm (14 = 53) was included in two separate collections of Psalms, so this poem was not unreasonably thought worthy by two editors of prophetic literature to be included in their collections. It is impossible to examine here in detail the remaining sections of these chapters; some seem, if naturally interpreted, to presuppose the dispersion of Israel at the Exile; see e.g. 4⁶⁻⁸ 57, where promises of a bright future are made to Israel, who has already been reduced to a remnant; some passages contain the expectation of a judgment on the nations in general (4¹⁰ 54), which is certainly more conspicuous in the later prophets than in those of the age of Micah; in 4¹¹⁻¹³ Zion seems to be regarded as inviolable—a point of view strikingly different from that with which Micah was popularly identified (Mic 3¹², Jer 26¹⁸). In 5¹⁰⁻¹⁴ there is little or nothing inconsistent with an eighth century origin; read by themselves, without v. 15, they are not necessarily a prophecy of promise, but rather of judgment. Here (and perchance in 5¹), if anywhere in chs. 4, 5, we may look for Micah's work; for though so early an origin of these verses is not certain, neither is it certain that they are a piece of late reproductive prophecy.

Turning next to chs. 6, 7, we remark first that since Ewald the allusion to sacrificing the firstborn, and certain other features, have been commonly considered to point to the period of Manasseh as that in which chs. 6, 7 were written—a date which would not quite necessarily exclude Micah's authorship, for Manasseh began to reign about 695 B.C.

In 6¹⁻⁵ some points, such as the use of 'burnt-offering' (not 'sin-offering') and the nature of the allusion to Balaam, may be more easily explained if the passage be at least pre-exilic. The classical prophetic definition of religion with which this section closes (6⁸), though it embraces and summarizes the fundamental teaching of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah, does not pass beyond it—a fact which is thoroughly compatible with Ewald's theory, though not, of course, in itself a proof of its correctness.

But it is more than doubtful whether chs. 6, 7 should be treated as a single prophecy; 6⁹⁻¹⁶ and 7¹⁻⁴, though scarcely a continuation of 6¹⁻⁸, are not obviously separated from it at all widely in situation or time. On the other hand, as compared with 7¹⁻⁴, 7²⁰ show a marked difference. Wellhausen (cited by Driver, LOT 332 f.) has tersely summed this up.

'7¹⁻⁴ consists of a bitter lamentation uttered by Zion over the corruption of her children; and the day of retribution, though ready, is yet future, 7⁴. In 7²⁰ Zion, indeed, is still the speaker; but here she has already been overpowered by her foe, the heathen world, which is persuaded that by its victory over Israel it has at the same time vanquished Jahweh (7⁹). The city has fallen, its walls are destroyed, its inhabitants pine away in darkness, i.e. in the darkness of captivity (7⁹ 11). Nevertheless, Zion is still confident, and though she may have to wait long, she does not question her final triumph over the foe (7⁸ 10 11). She endures patiently the punishment merited by her past sins, assured that when she has atoned for them, God will take up her cause and lead her to victory (7⁹). What was present in 7¹⁻⁴, viz., moral disorder and confusion in the existing Jewish State, is in 7²⁰ past: what is there future, viz., the retribution of 7⁹, has here come to pass, and has been continuing for some time. Between 7⁴ and 7²⁰ yawns a century.'

Briefly, then, the history of the Book of Micah seems to have been this: a summary of the teaching of the prophet Micah, not improbably prepared and written by himself, was well known in Jerusalem at the end of the seventh century—a century after the lifetime of the prophet. This small book was re-edited and provided with its present expanded title, and enlarged by the addition of a collection of prophetic pieces, some of pre-exilic, and several of post-exilic, origin. It is not necessary to suppose that this added matter was originally attributed to Micah, though subsequently it came to be regarded as his work in the same way as Isaiah 40-66 and Zec 9-14 came to be looked upon as writings of Isaiah and Zechariah respectively. The final stage in the history of the book was its incorporation, probably towards the close of the 3rd cent. B.C., in the great prophetic work 'The Book of the Twelve.' It is impossible to determine through how many stages of editorial treatment the book passed, but some of these stages certainly fell within the post-exilic period.

The most convenient English commentaries are those by T. K. Cheyne in the Cambridge Bible, and R. F. Horton in the Century Bible. The discussion and new translation from an emended text in G. A. Smith, Book of the Twelve Prophets, i. 355 ff., will be found most valuable and helpful.

MICE.—See MOUSE, and MAGIC, 569^b.

MICHAEL ('Who is like God?').—1. Father of the Asherite spy (Nu 13¹⁵). 2. 3. Two Gadites (1 Ch 5^{13f}). 4. The eponym of a Levitical guild of singers (1 Ch 6⁴⁹). 5. Name of a family in Issachar (1 Ch 7⁴ 27¹⁸). 6. Eponym of a family of Benjamites (1 Ch 8¹⁵). 7. A Manassite chief who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12²⁰). 8. A son of king Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21³). 9. The father of Zebadiah (Ezr 8¹, 1 Es 8²⁴). 10. The archangel. See next article.

MICHAEL ('the archangel').—Although reference to angels and their visitations is common in the OT, especially during transition periods (e.g. the period of the Judges and that of the Captivity are specially noticeable for angelic appearances), the name Michael is not found until the later period, when the angelic office was divided into two parts, which were assigned to individual angels. In the Rabbinical traditions Michael figures considerably. He is connected with many incidents in the history of Moses, especially his burial (cf. Dt 34⁹), when he disputed with Satan, who claimed the body by reason of the murder of the Egyptian (Ex 21²). In the OT he is alluded to several times in the Book of Daniel (10¹³, 12¹) as 'one of the chief princes', 'the prince', and 'the prince which standeth for the people', and he is opposed to the prince-angels of Persia and of Greece. He is here regarded as the guardian of the Israelites in their opposition to polytheism and foreign innovations.

In the NT Michael is found fighting in heaven (Rev 12⁷) against the dragon, 'him that is called the devil and Satan,' and is typical of the warfare which is the special work of the Church on earth. In the passage in Jude (v. 9) a definite reference is made to the tradition already mentioned, 'Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee' (cf. Zec 3¹ for a similar incident). T. A. MOXON.

MICHAL.—Younger daughter of Saul, offered to David, as a snare, on condition that he would slay one hundred Philistines. The popularity of David led Saul to seek his life. He had David's house surrounded, but Michal deceived the messengers, and contrived David's escape by the window (1 S 19¹¹⁻¹⁷). Saul then gave Michal to Paltiel. When Abner negotiated with David to deliver Israel to him, the king stipulated for Michal's return. This was accomplished, though the record does not make it clear whether directly from Ishbaal (Ishbosheth) at the instance of David, or through Abner (2 S 3¹⁶). Paltiel followed weeping, but was rudely dismissed by Abner. The closing scene between Michal and David is pathetic. David's dance before the ark was unseemly in the eyes of Michal, and she rebuked him. His answer was equally curt. The statement that Michal died childless may mean that she was divorced (2 S 6¹⁶). The estrangement was probably due to the numerous wives that now shared David's prosperity and Michal's authority. J. H. STEVENSON.

MICHEAS (2 Es 1³⁰) = the prophet Micah.

MICHMAS.—See next article.

MICHMASH.—A place (not enumerated as a town) in the territory of Benjamin, and in the mountains of Bethel. It comes into prominence in connexion with the daring raid made by Jonathan and his armour-bearer upon the Philistines there encamped (1 S 13. 14). It was one of the smaller places to which the returning exiles belonged, contributing only 122 men to the enumeration of Ezra (Ezr 2²⁷) and Nehemiah (7³¹) [in both these last two passages Michmas]. Nehemiah further alludes to it as a border city of Benjamin (11³¹). Indications of its position may be obtained from the Jonathan story and also from Isaiah's picture of the course of an Assyrian raid (Is 10²⁸). These indications permit an identification of the site with the modern village of Mukhmās, situated in a wild and desolate region near the head of the Wady Kelt. In 1 K 4⁹ for Makaz the LXX erroneously reads Michmash. For a time it was the seat of the government of Jonathan Maccabæus (1 Mac 9²³). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

MICHMETHAH.—The word occurs only in Jos 16⁶ 17¹, in each case with the article, therefore probably not a proper name. Of the meaning of the word we are entirely ignorant. It indicated a place or some natural feature on the boundary of Manasseh. An echo of the old name may perhaps be heard in el-Mukhneh, the plain which lies to the east of Nâblus. W. EWING.

MICHRI.—Eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 9³).

MICHTAM.—See PSALMS, p. 772^a.

MIDDIN.—A town in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15⁶¹). The site has not been recovered.

MIDIAN, MIDIANITES.—A nomadic tribe or group of tribes, said by an early genealogy (Gn 25²) to be descended from Abraham by Keturah, of which the Kenites (wh. see) were a part. They lived in ancient times in northern Arabia, but vanished at an early date from history.

According to E they were traders, who sold Joseph into Egypt (Gn 37²⁸⁻³⁰). They roamed about Sinai (Ex 3¹², Hab 3⁷). Jethro (E) or Hobab (J), Moses' father-in-law, was their priest. As Jethro is also said to be a Kenite (Jg 1¹⁰), probably the Kenites were a part of the Midianites. They were afterwards absorbed by the tribe of Judah (Jg 1¹⁶, 1 S 15¹). The Prophetic source (J) also shows that in an early form of the narrative it was Midian, not Moab, that was said to have hired Balaam to curse Israel (cf. Nu 22⁴⁻⁷). If this is so, it was a different branch of Midianites from the Kenites. The same source informs us (Gn 36³⁸) that a king of Edom smote Midian in the field of Moab. The references point to an activity of Midian in this region of which we have no other trace.

The next we hear of the Midianites is in the period of the Judges, when they invaded the territory of central Palestine in hordes, and were put to rout by Gideon and his three hundred men (Jg 6-8). These Midianites seem to have lived to the east of Palestine, and to have gained access to the west Jordan lands through the valley of the Jabbok. This corresponds with the statement of Gn 25⁶ (JE), that the sons of Abraham by Keturah, of whom Midian was one, lived to the eastward. At the time of Gideon the Midianites were led by two chiefs, whose names J preserves as Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 8¹³), while E calls them Oreb and Zeeb (Jg 7²⁵). Gideon so completely ruined the power of the Midianites that his victory was long remembered (cf. Is 9¹⁰⁻¹², Ps 83⁹). From this blow the tribe never recovered, and disappears from history.

According to a late Priestly passage (Nu 31¹⁻¹⁶), Moses is said to have gained a great victory over the Midianites. Perhaps, as some scholars think, this is a later version of the victory of Gideon. Possibly it is another version of the victory of the king of Edom.

The genealogy given in Gn 25¹⁻⁴ calls Ephah a son of Midian. Is 60⁶ mentions both Midian and Ephah in connexion with Kedar. Tiglath-pileser III. (K1B ii. 21) mentions a Khayapa in connexion with Taima, which Delitzsch (Paradies, 304) identifies with Ephah. This would correspond with the location given in the genealogy.

Ptolemy (Geog. vi. 7) mentions a place, Madiana, on the coast of Arabia, which is probably the same as Madayan on the Haj road to Mecca. Noldeke (EB iii. col. 8081) thinks that the name has survived from an old habitat of the Midianites. GEORGE A. BARTON.

MIDRASH.—See COMMENTARY.

MIDWIFE.—See MEDICINE, p. 600^b.

MIGDAL-EDER.—See EDER, No. 1.

MIGDAL-EL.—A town of Naphtali (Jos 19³⁹) between Iron and Horem. The site is uncertain.

MIGDAL-GAD.—A town in the Shephelah, in the territory of Judah (Jos 15²⁷), which cannot be identified with any certainty. Guthe suggests Khirbel el-Mejdeleh, about 5 miles S. of Beit Jibrin, with remains of buildings, cisterns, and rock-hewn tombs; or Khirbel el-Mejdel, about 14 miles S. of Beit Jibrin, with extensive ruins, etc. Warren (Hastings' DB) suggests †-Mejdel, a thriving village 2½ miles N.E. of Ashkelon. The name 'Tower of Gad' probably points to its having been a seat of idolatry, where the Canaanites worshipped Gad—'Good Luck' or 'Fortune.' W. EWING.

MIGDOL.—A Semitic word meaning 'tower,' borrowed by the Egyptians of the New Kingdom, and common as a word and in place-names. 1. Ex 14², Nu 33⁷, on the border of Egypt, near the spot where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea; probably a mere guardhouse on the road. 2. Ezk 29¹⁰ 30⁶, where 'from Migdol to Syene' is the true reading, instead of 'from the tower of Seveneh.' Here Migdol is the N.E. extremity of Egypt, as Seveneh is the S. It may be identical with Magdolo in a Roman itinerary, perhaps at the now deserted site of Tell el-Her, 12 miles south of Pelusium. 3. In Jer 44¹ 46¹⁴ Migdol is mentioned with Tahpanhes and Noph (Memphis) as a habitation of the Jews, and is probably the same as No. 2. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

MIGRON.—One of the places mentioned in Isaiah's description of the march of the Assyrians on Jerusalem. The direction of the march is from north to south; hence Migron (Is 10²⁹) lay north of Michmash (wh. see.), and north of the Wady es-Suwēntī, which is the 'pass' of Is 10²⁹. The name perhaps survives in Makrūn, a ruined site situated a mile or two N.W. of Makhmas (Michmash). In 1 S 14⁷ Saul, whose army was encamped south of the Wady es-Suwēntī, is said to have dwelt in 'the uttermost part of Geba (so read) under the pomegranate tree which is in Migron.' Probably 'in Migron' should rather be translated 'in the threshing-floor'; if not, we must infer that there were two places not many miles apart, one north and the other south of the Wady es-Suwēntī, bearing the same name. This southern Migron has not been identified.

G. B. GRAY.

MIJAMIN.—1. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁵); called in 1 Es 9²⁸ Maelus. 2. Eponym of the 6th of the priestly courses (1 Ch 24⁹). This family returned with Zerub. (Neh 12⁹), and was represented at the sealing of the covenant (10⁷) = Miniamin of Neh 12¹⁷.

MIKLOTH.—1. A son of Jeiel (1 Ch 8²² = 9^{27f.}). 2. An officer of David (1 Ch 27⁴).

MIKNEIAH.—A gate-keeper of the ark (1 Ch 15¹⁸).

MILALAI.—The eponym of a priestly family (Neh 12²⁰).

MILCAH.—1. Daughter of Haran and wife of Nahor (Gn 11²⁹). The names of her children are given in 22^{20d}. Rebekah was her granddaughter (24¹⁵ 24⁴⁷). 2. Daughter of Zelophehad, Nu 26³³ 27¹ 36⁴¹, Jos 17³ (all P).

MILCOM.—The national deity of Ammon. Solomon established a sanctuary for him on the Mount of Olives, which seems to have continued till it was destroyed by Josiah (1 K 11¹⁵ 23, 2 K 23¹³). In 2 S 12²⁰, 1 Ch 20², Jer 49¹, and Zeph 1⁴ Malcam ('their king') is probably an incorrect vocalization of Milcom. The name is from the common Semitic root malk, melek ('king' or 'prince'), probably with an inflectional termination. The traditional identification of Milcom with Molech is based only upon 1 K 11⁷, a verse which is probably corrupt. See MOLECH. W. M. NESBIT.

MILDEW (perāḡon, Dt 28²², 1 K 8²⁷, 2 Ch 6³³, Am 4⁹, Hag 2¹⁷) is a disease of grain due to various fungi: it is produced by damp, and is in the above passages associated with shiddāphōn, 'blasting,' the opposite condition produced by excessive drought.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MILE.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MILETUS.—The southernmost of the twelve colonies forming the Ionian confederacy of Asia Minor. It lay on the S. coast of the Latonian Gulf, which penetrated Caria S. of the peninsula of Mycale, and received the waters of the Meander. The silt of this river filled up the gulf, and Miletus is now 5 miles from the sea, while the former island of Lade, which helped to make its harbour, is now a hill rising in the alluvial plain.

Two visits of St. Paul to Miletus are mentioned. The first (Ac 20¹⁴) took place when he was returning to Jerusalem at the end of the Third Missionary Journey. He stayed long enough to send for the elders of Ephesus, and give them the farewell charge recorded in Ac 20. This probably needed two days. The second visit is mentioned in 2 Ti 4²⁰ 'Trophimus I left at Miletus sick.' This must have been between St. Paul's first and second imprisonment at Rome. In neither case are we told of any attempt to found a church at Miletus. Miletus was already unimportant by comparison with Ephesus, which now received the trade of the Meander valley, and shared with Smyrna the trade that came along the great road through the centre of Asia Minor. Ephesus was recognized by the Romans as the southern capital of the province of Asia. Formerly Miletus had led Ionia. Its trade was mainly in wool, and it had founded numerous colonies on the Black Sea and Propontis (Sinope, Trapezus, Abydos, Cyzicus), besides Naucratis in Egypt. It had led the Ionian revolt, the fate of which was determined by the battle of Lade and the capture of Miletus, B.C. 494. It had defended itself on behalf of the Persian power against Alexander in B.C. 334. Its ruins are now called Palatia. They seem to include few Christian remains, but Miletus was a bishopric, and from the 6th cent. an archbishopric.

A. E. HILLARD.

MILK.—Milk was at all times an important article of diet among the Hebrews, and by ben-Sira is rightly assigned a prominent place among the principal things necessary for man's life (Sir 39²⁵). It was supplied by the females of the 'herd' and of the 'flock,' the latter term including both sheep and goats (Dt 32¹⁴, where render 'sour milk [chem'āh] of the herd, and milk [chālāb] of the flock'), probably also by the milk camels (Gn 32¹⁵). At the present day goats' milk is preferred to every other.

In Bible times, as now, milk slightly soured or fermented was a favourite beverage. The modern Bedouin prepares this sour milk, or leben, as it is called, by pouring the fresh milk into a skin (cf. Jg 4¹⁹ 'she opened the milk-skin (EV 'a bottle of milk'), and gave him drink'), to the sides of which clots of sour milk from a previous milking still adhere. The skin is shaken for a little, when the process of fermentation speedily commences, and the milk is served 'with that now gathered sourness which they think the more refreshing' (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, i. 263). Such was the refreshment with which Jael supplied Sisera. 'He asked water, she gave him milk; she brought him sour milk (chem'āh) in a lordly dish' (Jg 5²⁶, where EV has 'butter,' but one does not drink butter; cf. 4¹⁹ cited above).

In several OT passages, however, this word, chem'āh, does evidently signify butter, as in Pr 30²⁵ 'the churning (lit. as RVm 'pressing') of milk bringeth forth butter.' So Ps 55²⁸ RV, 'his mouth was smooth as butter,' where 'sour milk' is clearly out of place. The former passage suggests the procedure of the Arab housewife whom Doughty describes (op. cit. ii. 67) as 'rocking her blown-up milk-skin upon her knees till the butter came; they find it in a clot at the mouth of the skin.' Butter cannot be kept sweet under the climatic conditions of Palestine, but must be boiled, producing the samm or clarified butter universally prized throughout the East.

Cheese is mentioned three times in our AV (1 S 17¹⁸, 2 S 17²⁹, Job 10¹⁰); in each case the original has a different word. The clearest case is the last cited; the text of 2 S 17²⁹, on the other hand, is admittedly in disorder, and we should perhaps read, by a slight change of consonants, 'dried curds'; these, when rubbed down and mixed with water, yield a refreshing drink much esteemed at the present day. From the Mishna we learn that rennet and the acid juices of various trees and plants were used to curdle (Job 10¹⁰) milk. After being drained of the whey—the water of milk—the curds were salted, shaped into round discs, and dried in the sun. The Tyropoeon valley in Jerusalem received its name, 'the valley of the cheesemakers,' from the industry there carried on.

There has been much discussion of late as to the origin of the popular expression 'flowing with milk and honey,' so frequently used in OT to describe Palestine as an ideal land abounding in the necessities and delicacies of life. Many recent scholars demur to the traditional view that this is expressed by the words 'milk and honey,' on the principle of the part for the whole, and favour a more recondite origin in a forgotten Palestinian mythology. This explanation would bring the phrase in question into line with the equally familiar 'nectar and ambrosia' of Greek mythology.

Even more obscure is the significance of the thrice-repeated command: 'Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk' (Ex 23¹⁹ 34²⁶ Dt 14²¹). Opinion is still divided as to whether we have here a piece of purely humanitarian—some would say sentimental—legislation, or the prohibition of a magical rite incompatible with the religion of Jⁿ. For the latest exposition of this view, see J. G. Frazer, 'Folk-lore in the OT,' in Anthropological Essays, etc. (1907), 151 ff.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MILL, MILLSTONE.—1. Three methods of preparing flour were in use in Palestine in Bible times, associated with the mortar and pestle (see MORTAR AND PESTLE), the rubbing-stone, and the quern or handmill. The most primitive apparatus was the rubbing-stone or corn-rubber, which consisted really of two stones. The one on which the corn was ground was a substantial slab, often 2½ feet long, and about a foot wide, slightly concave and curving upwards, like a saddle, at both ends (ilust. in Macalister, Bible Sideights, etc., fig. 28). The other, the rubbing-stone proper, was a narrow stone from 12 to 18 inches long, pointed at both ends and also slightly curved, one side being plain and the other convex. In manipulating the rubber, the woman grasped it by both ends and ground the grains of wheat or barley with the convex side. Cf. Macalister's description in PEFSI, 1903, p. 118, with Schumacher's photograph reproduced by Benzinger, *Heb. Arch.*² (1907) 63, and the Egyptian statuette in Erman's Ancient Egypt, 190. Vincent in his Canaan d'après l'exploration récente (405, fig. 282) shows a corn-rubber of flint from the palæolithic age!

2. The more familiar apparatus for the same purpose was the handmill or quern. As in so many instances (see, e.g., LAMP), the recent excavations enable us to trace two distinct stages in the evolution of the Palestinian handmill. The Gezer specimens described in detail in PEFSI, 1903, 119, belong to the earlier type, which is distinguished from the later form by the absence of a handle for rotating the upper stone. The quern-stones 'are always small, rarely being as much as a foot across.' The lower stone, the 'nether millstone' of Job 41²⁴, was always more massive than the 'upper millstone' (Dt 24⁶), and was apparently fitted with 'a narrow spindle' sunk into the stone. The upper stone was pierced right through, and by this hole the mill was fed. According to Mr. Macalister, 'the upper stone was grasped with both hands (the fingers clasp the edge, the thumbs being between the spindle and the stone), and worked through about one-third of a rotation, backward and forward.' For varieties of this type, see PEFSI, 1903, p. 119 f.

In the later and more effective type of handmill, which was that in use in NT times, the stones were larger, although the lower stone was still considerably wider than the upper (Baba bathra, ii. 1). As in the querns of the present day, the latter was fitted with a wooden handle (yad in the Mishna) in the shape of an upright peg inserted near the outer edge. The mill was fed, as before, through a funnel-shaped cavity pierced through the upper stone, which was rotated by the handle through a complete circle. Sometimes, as appears from Mt 24⁴, two women worked the mill, seated opposite each other, and each turning the upper stone through half a revolution, as may still be seen in the East.

By the first century of our era a larger and different form of mill had been introduced, apparently, to judge by the names of the various parts in the Mishna (see art. 'Mill' in EBi iii. 3093), under Græco-Roman influence. In the larger specimens of this type, the upper millstone, in the shape of two hollow cones, as described in detail, loc. cit., was turned by an ass, and is the 'great millstone' of Mt 18⁶ RV (lit. as RVm 'a millstone turned by an ass').

3. The work of the mill belonged at all times to the special province of the women of the household (Mt 24⁴). In large establishments, it fell to the slaves, male (Jg 16²³) and female (Ex 11⁵), particularly the latter, hence the figure for the slavery of captivity in Is 47².

The finer varieties of meal, the 'fine flour' of OT, were got by repeated grinding, or by sifting with sieves, or by a combination of both processes.

How indispensable the handmill was considered for the daily life of the family may be seen from the provision of the Deuteronomic legislation forbidding the creditor to take in pledge the household mill (so rightly RV), or even the upper millstone, 'for he taketh a man's life to pledge' (Dt 24⁶). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MILLENNIUM.—A period of a thousand years, during which, according to Rev 20²⁻⁷, the Dragon (i.e. the devil) is to be confined in the abyss, while the martyrs, having been raised from the dead, are to reign with Christ. The period begins with this first resurrection, and at its end, Satan, prior to his destruction, is to be released for a time to deceive the nations.

This reference in Revelation is unique in the NT. The Millennium was, however, present in the Jewish apocalyptic literature. In Slavonic Enoch (chs. 32 and 33), time is described as a week of seven days, each of one thousand years in length. These six days (i.e. 6000 years) are said to have elapsed from the time of the Creation to the Judgment. Then will come a 'sabbath of rest' of a thousand years, and then an eighth day which shall be timeless. A similar expectation is to be found in the Talmud (Sanh. 97a), and it is not impossible that this conception can be traced back to Babylonia or Persia.

In the history of the Christian Church the doctrine of the Millennium has played a considerable rôle, but Chiliasm (wh. see) has been opposed by most of the great theologians from Augustine down. In the Epistle of Barnabas (ch. 15) we have a view very similar to that of the Slavonic Enoch, while Justin Martyr (Dial. 80) regards a chiliastic view of the future as an essential part of Christian faith, although he knows that it is not held by all the orthodox. At the present time, in addition to the Second Adventists, millennial views are held strongly by a number of earnest Christians commonly called pre-millenarians because of their belief that Christ will return before the period of a thousand years begins and establish an earthly reign. In accordance with this theory (see CHILIASM, PAROUSIA), the resurrection is to be limited not to martyrs but to all Christians. Such an interpretation obviously does violence to the connexion between the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Revelation, and gives undue prominence to an expectation which was held by neither Jesus nor St. Paul, nor, in fact, by any writer of the NT except the author of Revelation. At the same time, there is little question that this pre-millennial view is germane to the literalistic Messianic hope which controlled the NT Church, and is not beyond a possible harmonization with 1 Co 15²²

The fundamental difficulty in erecting it into a doctrine of essential Christianity is that it presupposes conditions and expectations, carried over from Judaism, which the course of history has shown to be without foundation.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

MILLET (probably Panicum miliaceum or perhaps Andropogon sorghum) is mentioned in Ezk 4⁹ (only) as an ingredient in bread. See Food, § 2.

MILLO.—A place near Shechem (the name of which would be better rendered Beth-millo, without translating the first element ['house of Millo,' AV and RV]), quite unknown, the inhabitants of which were associated in the coronation of Abimelech (Jg 9⁸⁻²⁰). Joash was slain at a 'Beth-millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla' (2 K 12²⁰). Whether this be the same place, or whether (perhaps more likely) it was somewhere near Jerusalem, and (if so) where or what it may have been, are questions to which no answer can be given. On the 'Millo' of 2 S 5⁹, 1 K 11²⁷ etc., see JERUSALEM, II, § 2.

MINÆANS.—The name of a S. W. Arabian people dwelling north of the Sabæans (Sheba), who in the 9th and 8th cents. B.C. became a powerful nation with a dominion stretching north to the peninsula of Sinai. It is supposed by recent scholars that they are meant by the Me'unim or (better) Me'inim, who are named in 1 Ch 4¹¹ as dwelling in the Negeb, in 2 Ch 26⁷ along with the Arabians, and in 2 Ch 20¹ (by correction) along with the Ammonites. In all these passages the LXX understand Minæans. J. F. M'CURDY.

MIND.—See PSYCHOLOGY.

MINIAMIN.—1. A Levite (2 Ch 31¹⁶). 2. Neh 12¹⁷ = Mijamin of 1 Ch 24⁹, Neh 10⁷ 12⁹. 3. A priest who took part in the ceremony of the dedication of the walls (Neh 12¹¹).

MINING AND METALS.—Though Palestine proper is deficient in mineral resources, yet these were present to some extent on its borders, and were not only abundantly found, but even largely developed, in other parts of the ancient East. The Scripture references to mining, accordingly, though not very numerous, are sufficiently definite. Such a passage as Dt 8⁹ (cf. 33²⁵), though inapplicable to Palestine proper, may hold good of the Lebanon district or (as has been suggested by some) of the Sinaitic region. The classical description of the miner's life in Job 28 is evidently based on observation. It depicts the adventurous and toilsome character of the quest, the shafts sunk and the galleries tunnelled in the rock, the darkness, the waters that have to be drained away, the hidden treasures of precious stones and metals that reward the effort and the ingenuity of man.

The list of metals in Nu 31² includes all those that are mentioned in Scripture, viz. gold, silver, 'brass,' iron, tin, and lead. All these are again enumerated in Ezk 27¹²⁻¹³ as articles of Tyrian commerce.

Brass.—This English word, as late as 1611, denoted copper or bronze (an alloy of copper and tin) rather than the modern brass (an alloy of copper and zinc). Hence, where 'brass' occurs in EV, copper or bronze is to be understood (see RVm on Gn 4²², and art. BRASS).

Copper occurs once in AV (Ezr 8²⁷, RV 'bright brass'). But see on 'Brass' above and 'Steel' below.

Gold is a metal the use of which can be traced back to the earliest times of civilization. As a medium of currency it was reckoned by weight, in shekels and talents, coinage being unknown among the Jews before the Exile. While it figured in the history of Israel from the beginning (see the spoils of Egypt [Ex 12³⁵], Midian [Nu 32²³, Jg 8²⁶], and Jericho [Jos 7²¹]), it became specially plentiful in Palestine in the time of Solomon (1 K 10¹⁴⁻²¹), the main sources of it being Ophir (1 K 9²⁸ 10¹¹), Tarshish (1 K 10²²), and Sheba (1 K 11⁹, Ps 72¹⁵). Another gold-producing country was Havilah (Gn 2¹¹). Of these localities Havilah and Sheba were Arabian.

Ophir (wh. see) may have been the same, though. Its situation has also been sought in India and S. Africa. For goldsmiths see Neh 3¹⁸⁻²¹, Is 40¹⁹ 41⁷ 46⁶, also (RV) Jer 10⁹⁻¹⁴ 51¹⁷. The products of their art comprised beaten work (Ex 25¹⁸ 37¹⁷⁻²², Nu 8¹⁴ 37⁷, 1 K 10¹⁸⁻¹⁹, 2 Ch 9¹⁶⁻¹⁷), plating (Ex 25¹¹⁻²⁴ 26²⁹⁻³² 30⁶), and wire or thread for embroidery (Ex 39³).

Iron appears to have come into use later than copper or bronze. Its ores are found in the Lebanon district, in the region of Sinai, and sparsely in Egypt. The most famous ancient seat of its manufacture was among the Chalybes in the Highlands of Assyria. Mining for the ore is mentioned in Job 28²; the 'iron furnace' in Dt 4²⁰, 1 K 8¹¹, Jer 11⁴; and the forge in Is 44¹². In modern times iron is separated from its ores as cast iron, from which wrought iron and steel are subsequently prepared. But in ancient times the temperature necessary to melt iron was unavailable, and it must have been produced as wrought iron, which is still obtained by primitive smelting processes in various parts of the world. The uses of iron alluded to in Scripture are very varied, but call for no special comment. In Dt 3¹⁴ and possibly in Am 1³ 'iron' means black basalt.

Lead is mentioned in Jer 6²⁹, Ezk 22¹⁸⁻²² in connexion with the smelting of silver (see 'Silver' below). Its weight is referred to in Ex 15¹⁰. The 'ephah' in Zec 5⁷⁻⁸ has a leaden covering. Rock-cut inscriptions were made more durable by having the chiselled letters filled up with lead (Job 19²⁴).

Silver, like gold, was a very early medium of exchange (Gn 23¹⁶⁻¹⁸). The Heb. and Gr. words for silver are often rendered 'money' in EV. There are frequent references in OT to the use of this metal for vessels and ornamental work. In NT there is special mention of the guild of silversmiths at Ephesus, and of the 'shrines' or models of the temple of Diana which were their most profitable article of trade (Ac 19²⁴). Among the sources of the metal, Arabia (2 Ch 9¹⁴) and Tarshish (2 Ch 9²¹, Jer 10⁹, Ezk 27¹²) are named. The commonest ore of silver is argentiferous galena, which contains a large quantity of lead, and in which other metals may also be present. In the course of smelting the lead combines with the other impurities to form a heavy 'slag,' which separates by its weight from the molten silver, leaving the latter pure. This process is referred to, usually in a figurative moral sense, in Ps 66¹⁰ (cf. Is 48¹⁰), Pr 17³ 25⁴ 27²¹, Zec 13⁹, Mal 3², and especially in Jer 6²⁸⁻³⁰ and Ezk 22¹⁷⁻²². In the last two passages lead is the most prominent impurity, the others being 'brass,' iron, and tin. The mixture of these was the refuse or 'dross' of silver (see also Is 12² 23).

Steel (2 S 22³⁶, Job 20²⁴, Ps 18³⁴, Jer 15¹²) is a mistaken translation in AV of the words elsewhere rendered 'brass.' RV has 'brass' in these passages, and copper or bronze is to be understood. Only in Nah 2⁹ (RV) is 'steel' possibly a correct rendering. Steel is a form of iron containing more carbon than wrought iron. It is capable not only of being welded but also cast, and tempered to various degrees of hardness and elasticity.

Tin derived its importance from its use as a constituent of bronze (an alloy of copper and tin). It is mentioned as an article of Tyrian commerce in Ezk 27¹², and as an impurity in silver in Ezk 22¹⁸ (cf. Is 1², RVm 'alloy'). Its earliest sources are uncertain, but it appears to have come to the East from the West. It is known that the Phœnicians obtained it from the Scilly Isles and Cornwall.

Flint is a form of silica, and occurs abundantly, in the form of nodules, in many of the limestone rocks of Palestine. It is exceedingly hard, and its property of sparking when struck on steel or on another flint provided a very ancient and common means of obtaining fire (2 Mac 10⁹). Flint has a sharp edge when broken or chipped, and was used for primitive weapons and instruments of many kinds—arrow-heads, knives, etc. For the latter see Ex 4² RV, Jos 5².³ RV. In other Scripture references to flint its hardness is chiefly 'n view (Dt 32², Job 28⁹ RV, Is 57⁵ 50⁷, Ezk 3⁹).

Marble is limestone (carbonate of lime), hard and close-grained enough to be polished. The purest forms are white, but many coloured varieties are highly valued. Marble was among the materials prepared by David for the Temple (1 Ch 29²). Josephus (Ant. viii. iii. 2, 9) says that Solomon's Temple was built of white stone from Lebanon, but the stones exposed in the Jews' Walling Place appear to be from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, probably from the quarries under Bezetha. Marble supplies a simile in Ca 5¹³, and is mentioned among the merchandise of 'Babylon' in Rev 18¹².

JAMES PATRICK.

MINISH.—The mod. form is 'diminish.' 'Minish' occurs in AV in Ex 5¹⁹, Ps 107²⁹, and RV introduces it at Is 19⁸, Hos 8¹⁰; but Amer. RV prefers 'diminish' everywhere.

MINISTER.—The word 'minister' comes from the Lat. minister = 'servant,' and generally it may be said that wherever it is found in the Bible, whether in OT or in NT, its original meaning is its primary one, service being the idea it is specially meant to convey.

1. In OT it is used (corresponding to the same Heb. word in each case) of Joshua as the personal attendant of Moses (Ex 24¹², Jos 1¹), of the servants in the court of Solomon (1 K 10⁶), of angels and the elemental forces of nature as the messengers and agents of the Divine will (Ps 103¹ 104⁴; cf. He 1⁷.¹⁴), but, above all, of the priests and Levites as the servants of Jehovah in Tabernacle and Temple (Ex 28³⁵, 1 K 8¹¹, Ezr 8¹⁷, and constantly). The secular uses of the Heb. word, standing side by side with the sacred, show that it was not in itself a priestly term. Ministry was not necessarily a priestly thing, though priesthood was one form of ministry.

2. In NT several Gr. words are tr. 'minister,' three of which call for notice. (1) hypereides is found in Lk 1² 4²⁰, Ac 13²⁶, 1 Co 4¹. In two of these cases RV has properly substituted 'attendant' for 'minister' to avoid misconception. The 'minister' (Lk 4²⁰) to whom Jesus handed the roll in the synagogue at Nazareth was the hazzan, corresponding to the English vergor or Scotch beadle. John Mark (Ac 13⁵) was the minister of Barnabas and Saul in the same sense as Joshua was of Moses,—he was their attendant and assistant. In the other cases hypereides is used of the minister of Christ or of the word in a sense that is hardly distinguishable from that of diakonos as under.

(2) leitourgos.—In classical Gr. this word with its cognates is applied to one who renders special services to the commonwealth, without any suggestion of a priestly ministry. But in the LXX it was regularly applied, especially in its verbal form, to the ritual ministry of priests and Levites in the sanctuary, and so by NT times had come to connote the idea of a priestly function. What we have to notice, however, is that no NT writer uses it so as to suggest the discharge of special priestly functions on the part of an official Christian ministry. Either the reference is to the old Jewish ritual (Lk 1², He 9²¹ 10¹¹), or the word is employed in a sense that is purely figurative (Ro 15¹⁶, Ph 2¹⁷); or, again, is applied to a ministrations of Christian charity (2 Co 9¹², Ph 2²⁶.³⁰) or of prayer (Ac 13³; cf. v.³), from which all ideas of priestly ritual are clearly absent.

(3) diakonos.—Even more significant than the uses to which leitourgos and its cognates are put in the NT is the fact that they are used so seldom, and that diakonos and diakonia are found instead when the ideas of minister and ministry are to be expressed. This corresponds with the other fact that the priesthood of a selected class has been superseded by a universal Christian priesthood, and that a ministry of lowliness and serviceableness (which diakonos specially implies) has taken the place of the old ministry of exclusive privilege and ritual performance. diakonia is the distinctive Christian word for 'ministry,' and diakonos for 'minister.' But these nouns and the related verb are used in the NT with a wide range of application. The personal services rendered to Jesus by Martha, Mary, and other women (Lk 10⁴⁰, Jn 12⁷, Mt 27⁸), and to St. Paul by Timothy, Erastus, and Onesimus (Ac 19²², Philem¹³), are described as forms of ministry. The man who serves and follows Christ is His minister (Jn 12²⁶; 'my diakonos' is the expression in the original); and the minister of Christ will not fail to minister also to the brethren (1 Co 12⁵, 1 P 4¹⁰). But while every true Christian is a minister of Christ and of the brethren, there is a ministry of particular service out of which there gradually emerges the idea of a special Christian ministry. We may find the roots of the idea in our Lord's words to His disciples, 'Who-soever would become great among you shall be your minister, . . . even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20²⁸). The minister at first was one who was distinguished from others by his larger services. He did not hold an office, but discharged a function. There were differences of function, indeed, and, above all, the distinction between those who were ministers of the word (Ac 6⁴, 2 Co 3⁶, Eph 3⁷) and those who ministered by gracious deed (Ac 6¹¹). But whatever might be the 'diversities of ministrations' (1 Co 12⁵), the word diakonos covered them all. At a later stage, when differences of function have begun to harden into distinctions of office, the name diakonos is specially appropriated to the deacon (wh. see) as distinguished from the presbyter or bishop (Ph 1¹, 1 Ti 3¹⁻¹³). But diakonos still continues to be used in its wider sense, for Timothy, who was much more than a deacon, is exhorted to be 'a good minister (diakonos) of Jesus Christ' (1 Ti 4⁹). See following article.

J. C. LAMBERT.

MINISTRY.—The foregoing art. has sufficiently dealt with the general idea of ministry, but something remains to be said more particularly of the foreshadowings and beginnings of an official Christian ministry as these are found in the NT. The earliest historical datum is the distinction drawn by the Twelve between the 'diakonia of the word' and the 'diakonia of tables' (Ac 6².⁴)—a distinction that constantly reappears in the writings of St. Paul (e.g. Ro 12⁸⁻⁹, 1 Co 11⁷ 9¹⁴ 12²⁸), though by and by the latter of these two ministries widens out so as to include many other matters besides the care of the poor. These two forms may be broadly distinguished as a general and prophetic ministry on the one hand, a local and practical on the other.

1. General and prophetic.—Ac 6¹² shows that from the first the Twelve recognized that they were Divinely called to be ministers of the word, i.e. preachers of the gospel; and St. Paul repeatedly affirms the same thing regarding himself (1 Co 11⁷ 9¹⁴, 2 Co 3⁴, Col 1²⁸). But it was not the Apostles only who discharged this high spiritual function. Besides Apostles, a word which is used in a wider as well as a narrower sense (see Ac 14¹⁴, Ro 16⁷; cf. Didache, xi. 4 ff.), the Church had also prophets and evangelists and teachers, all of them, in somewhat different ways no doubt, fulfilling this same task of proclaiming the word (1 Co 12²⁸.²⁹, Eph 4¹¹; for prophets, see also Ac 11²⁷ 15³⁵ 21¹⁰; for evangelists, Ac 21⁵, 2 Ti 4⁵; for teachers, Ac 13¹, 1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹), and moving about from place to place in order to do so. That the prophetic ministry in its various forms was a ministry of function and not of stated office, is shown by the fact that the same person might be at once apostle, prophet, and teacher (cf. Ac 13¹ 14¹⁴, 1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹).

2. Local and practical.—Of this the Seven of Jerusalem furnish the earliest examples. Their special duties, when we first meet them, are restricted to the care of the poor, and in particular to the charge of the 'daily ministration.' But, as the local Churches grew in size and Church life became more complex, other needs arose. There was the need of government and discipline, of pastoral counsel and comfort, of stated instruction by regular teachers as well as of occasional visits from wandering apostles and prophets. In the 'helps' and 'governments' of 1 Co 12²⁸ we have a reference to some of these needs. And by and by we find that to meet the necessities of the situation the local ministry has blossomed out into two separate forms. (a) First there is the presbyter or elder, otherwise known as the bishop or overseer (for the substantial identity between the presbyter and the bishop, see art. BISHOP), whose duties are to feed the flock and help the weak (Ac 20^{17, 28, 35}, 1 P 5²), to visit and pray for the sick (Ja 5¹⁴), to rule and teach (1 Ti 3²⁻⁴). (b) Next there are the deacon, and his companion the deacons (Ph 1¹, 1 Ti 3⁸⁻¹²), whose duties are not clearly defined, but the description of whose qualifications suggests that their work lay largely in visitation from house to house and ministration to the poor (1 Ti 5⁸⁻¹¹). The local ministry, it thus appears, came to discharge some of the functions that had originally belonged to the general ministry of Apostles and prophets. The latter, however, was still recognized to be the higher of the two. St. Paul summons the presbyter-bishops of the Church in Ephesus to meet him at Miletus, and addresses them in a tone of high spiritual authority (Ac 20¹⁷⁻⁴⁰). And even in the Didache, which belongs probably to about the end of the 1st cent., we find that when a wandering prophet visits a Church and is recognized as a true prophet, precedence is given him over the resident bishops and deacons (Did. x. 7, xlii. 3). See, further, APOSTLE, BISHOP, DEACON, EVANGELIST, LAYING ON OF HANDS, PROPHET IN NT. J. C. LAMBERT.

MINNI.—A people named in Jer 51¹⁷ along with the Armenians ('Ararat') and Scythians ('Ashkenaz') as coming assailants of Babylon. They are the Mannai of the Assyrian inscriptions, who dwelt between the lakes Van and Urmia. J. F. M'CURDY.

MINNITH marks the direction in which Jephthah pursued the defeated Ammonites from Aroer (Jg 11³⁰), i.e. 'Aroer which is in front of Rabbah' (Jos 13²⁴). The site has not been recovered. That indicated in the Onomasticon, 4 miles from Heshbon on the way to Philadelphia, seems too far to the south. The place appears to have been famous for the high quality of its wheat (Ezk 27¹⁷, cf. 2 Ch 27⁵). It must be added that in both passages there are strong reasons for suspecting the correctness of the text. W. EWING.

MINT (Gr. hēdyosmon, Mt 23², Lk 11⁴⁰).—One of the trifles which were tithed; primarily, perhaps, peppermint (Mentha piperita), but including also allied plants, such as the horse mint (M. sylvestris), which grows wild all over Palestine. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MIPIHKAD.—A gate somewhere near the northern end of the East wall of Jerusalem, as may be deduced from the one reference to it (Neh 3³¹ AV 'the gate Miphkad', RV 'the gate of Hammiphkad') describing its restoration after the Exile. Many attempts have been made to identify it more exactly; but as the course of this part of Nehemiah's wall has not been revealed by excavation, and consequently the positions of its gates are not known with certainty, such attempts are mere guesswork. See the note on the gates in art. JERUSALEM, II, § 4. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

MIRACLES.—1. The narratives.—(a) In the Gospels Jesus is recorded to have cast out devils (Mt 8²⁸ 15²³ 17¹⁸, Mk 1³⁴), restored paralytics (Mt 8¹⁶ 9¹, Jn 5⁹), revived the withered hand (Mt 12¹³), released from the spirit of infirmity (Lk 13¹⁶), stanch an issue of blood (Mt 9²²), cured dropsy (Lk 14¹), allayed fever with a touch (Mt 8¹⁴), given speech to the dumb, hearing to the deaf, and sight to the blind (Mt 9³² 12²², Mk 7³³, Mt 9³³ 20³⁴, Mk 8²⁵, Jn 9⁷), cleansed leprosy (Mt 9³⁴ Lk 17¹⁹), and even raised from the dead (Mt 9²⁵, Lk 7¹⁵, Jn 11⁴⁴). Besides these miracles of healing there are ascribed to Him other extraordinary acts, such as the Stilling of the Storm (Mt 8²³), the Feeding of Five Thousand (Mt 14¹⁵) and Four Thousand (15³²), the Walking on the Sea (14²⁹), the Change of Water into Wine (Jn 2⁹). The blasting of the Fig Tree (Mt 21¹⁹), and the finding of the Coin in the Fish's Mouth (17²⁷), may possibly be figurative sayings misunderstood. The Two Draughts of Fishes (Lk 5⁸ and Jn 21¹⁵) may be variant traditions of one occurrence, and, like the recovery of the Nobleman's Son of Capernaum (Jn 4⁴⁶), may be regarded as proof of superhuman wisdom, and not of supernatural power. These miracles are presented to us as the acts of a Person supernatural both in the moral character as sinless and perfect, and in the religious consciousness as alone knowing and revealing the Father. It was the universal conviction of the early Christian Church that after three days He rose from the dead (1 Co 15⁴), and was universally present in supreme power (Mt 28^{18, 20}).

Regarding the miracles of Jesus the following general considerations should be kept in view. (a) It is impossible to remove the records of miracles from the Gospels without tearing them to pieces, as these works of Jesus are so wrought into the very texture of His ministry. (b) The character of the miracles is absolutely harmonious with the power of Jesus; with only two apparent exceptions they are beneficent. The blasting of the fig tree (Mt 21¹⁹), even if the record is taken literally, may be explained as a symbolic prophetic act, a solemn warning to His disciples of the doom of impenitent Israel. The finding of the coin in the fish's mouth (Mt 17²⁷) would be an exception to the rule of Jesus never to use His supernatural power on His own behalf, and the narrative itself allows us to explain it as a misunderstanding of figurative language. (c) The miracles were not wrought for display, or to prove His claims. Jesus rejected such use as a temptation (Mt 4^{8, 7}), and always refused to work a sign to meet the demands of unbelief (Mt 16⁹). He did not highly esteem the faith that was produced by His miracles (Jn 4⁴⁸). The cure of the paralytic, which He wrought to confirm His claim to forgive sins, was necessary to assure the sufferer of the reality of His forgiveness (Mt 9⁹). The miracles are not evidential accessories, but essential constituents of Jesus' ministry of grace. (d) While faith in the petitioner for, or recipient of, the act of healing was a condition Jesus seemingly required in all cases, while He was prevented doing His mighty works, as at Nazareth, by unbelief (Mt 13⁵⁸), while the exercise of His power was accompanied by prayer to God (Jn 11^{41, 42}), His healing acts were never tentative; there is in the records no trace of a failure. (e) In view of one of the explanations offered, attention must be called to the variety of the diseases cured; nervous disorders and their consequences did not limit the range of His activity.

(b) In the Acts the record of miracles is continued. The promise of Jesus to His Apostles (Mt 10⁸, cf. Mk 16^{17, 18}) is represented as abundantly fulfilled. In addition to the charisms of tongues and prophecy (wh. see), there were signs and wonders wrought by the Apostles and others (Ac 2⁴³ 5^{12, 16} 6⁸ 8¹⁹). Miracles of which further details are given are the restoration of the lame man at the gate Beautiful (3⁷), and of the cripple at Lystra (14⁹), the cure of the palsied Aeneas (9³⁴), the expulsion of the spirit of divination at Philippi (16¹⁸), the healing of the father of Publius in Melita (28⁹), the restoration to life of Dorcas (9⁴⁰) and Eutychus (20¹⁰), the narrative does not distinctly affirm death). This supernatural power is exercised in judgment on Ananias and Sapphira (5^{1, 10}), and on Elymas (13¹¹)—acts the moral justification of which must be sought in the estimate formed of the danger threatening the Church and the gospel, but which do present an undoubted difficulty. One may hesitate about accepting the statement about the miracles wrought by Peter's shadow (5¹⁴) or Paul's aprons (19¹²). What are represented as miraculous deliverances from imprisonment are reported both of Peter (12⁹) and of Paul (16²⁶). Paul's escape from the viper (28³) does not necessarily involve a miracle. These miracles, which, taken by themselves as reported in Acts, there might be some hesitation in believing, become more credible when viewed as the continuation of the supernatural power of Christ in His Church for the confirmation of the faith of those to whom the gospel was entrusted, and also those to whom its appeal was first addressed. In this matter the Epistles of Paul confirm the record of Acts (1 Co 12^{10, 28}, 2 Co 12¹²). Paul claims this supernatural power for himself, and recognizes its presence in the Church.

(c) We cannot claim to have contemporary evidence of the miracles of the OT, as we have of those of the NT. The miracles are almost entirely connected either with the Exodus from Egypt, or with the ministry of Elijah and of Elisha. The majority of the miracles of the first group are not outside of the order of nature; what is extraordinary in them is their coincidence with the prophetic declaration, this constituting the events signs of the Divine revelation. While the miracles ascribed to Elijah and Elisha might be considered as their credentials, yet they cannot be regarded as essential to their prophetic ministry; and the variations with which they are recorded represent popular traditions which the compiler of the Books of Kings has incorporated without any substantial alteration. The record of the standing still of the sun in Gibeon is obviously a prosaic misinterpretation of a poetic phrase (Jos 10¹²⁻¹⁴); behind the record of the bringing back of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz (2 K 20¹¹) we may assume some unusual atmospheric phenomenon, refracting the rays of the sun; the speech of Balaam's ass (Nu 22²⁷) may be regarded as an objectifying by the seer of his own scruples, doubts, and fears; the Book of Jonah is now interpreted not literally, but figuratively; the Book of Daniel is not now generally taken as history, but rather as the embellishment of history for the purposes of edification. The revelation of Jehovah to Israel is seen in the providential guidance and guardianship of His people by God, and in the authoritative interpretation of God's works and ways by the prophets, and in it miracle, in the strict sense of the word, has a small place. While the moral and religious worth of the OT, as the literature of the Divine revelation completed in Christ, demands a respectful treatment of the narratives of miracles, we are bound to apply two tests: the sufficiency of the evidence, and the congruity of the miracle in character with the Divine revelation.

2. The evidence.—In dealing with the evidence for the miracles the starting-point should be the Resurrection. It is admitted that the belief that Jesus had risen prevailed in the Christian Church from the very beginning of its history; that without this belief the Church would never have come into existence. Harnack seeks to distinguish the Easter message about the empty grave and the appearances of Jesus from the Easter faith that Jesus lives: but he is not successful in showing how the former could have come to be, apart from the latter. No attempt to explain the conversion of Paul without admitting the objective manifestation of Christ as risen can be regarded as satisfactory. 'It may not be possible absolutely to harmonize in every detail the records of the appearances, but before these narratives were written it was the common belief of the Christian Church, as Paul testifies, 'that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the Scriptures' (1 Co 15³⁻⁴). If the Resurrection of Christ is proved, this fact, combined with His absolutely unique moral character and religious consciousness, invests the Person of Jesus with a supernaturalness which forbids our limiting the actions possible to Him by the normal human tests. His miracles are not wonders, for it is no wonder that He should so act, but signs, proofs of what He is, and works, congruous with His character as 'ever doing good,' and His purpose to reveal the grace of the Father. Harnack will not 'reject peremptorily as illusion that lame walked, blind saw, and deaf heard,' but he will not believe that 'a stormy sea was stilled by a word.' The miracles of healing are not all explicable, as he supposes, by what Matthew Arnold called moral therapeutics—the influence of a strong personality over those suffering from nerve disorders, as they embrace diseases of which the cure by any such means is quite incredible; and the evidence for the cosmic miracles, as the miracles showing power over nature apart from man have been called, is quite as good as for the healing miracles. If the Synoptic Gospels can be dated between A.D. 60 and 90, as is coming to be admitted by scholars generally, the evidence for the miracles of Jesus is thoroughly satisfactory; the mythical theory of Strauss must assume a much longer interval. Harnack regards as 'a demonstrated fact' that 'Luke, companion in travel and associate in evangelistic work of Paul,' is the author of the Third Gospel and the Acts; nevertheless he does not consider Luke's history as true; but Ramsay argues that the Lukan authorship carries with it substantial accuracy. In his various writings he has endeavoured to show how careful a historian Luke is, and if Luke's excellence in this respect is established, then we can place greater reliance on the evidence for miracles in the early Church, as well as in the ministry of Jesus. Harnack lays great stress on the credulity of the age in which the Gospels were written; but this credulity was not universal. The educated classes were sceptical; and, to judge Luke from the preface to his Gospel, he appears as one who recognized the duty of careful inquiry, and of testing evidence. The miracles of the Gospels and the Acts are closely connected with the Person of Jesus, as the Word Incarnate and the risen Lord, and the credulity of the age does not come into consideration unless it can be shown that among either the Jews or the Gentiles there was a prejudice favourable to belief in the Incarnation and the Resurrection. The character of the miracles, so harmonious with the Person, forbids our ascribing them to the wonder-loving, and therefore wonder-making, tendency of the times.

Some indications have already been given in regard to the evidence for the miracles of the OT. The frequent references to the deliverance from Egypt made in the subsequent literature attest the historical reality of that series of events; and it cannot be said to be improbable that signs should have accompanied such a Divine intervention in human history. Some of the miracles ascribed to Elisha are not of a character congruous with the function of prophecy; but it may be that we should very cautiously apply our sense of fitness as a test of truth to these ancient narratives. In the OT history, Prophecy (wh. see) was the supernatural feature of deepest significance and highest value.

3. Explanations.—Admitting that the evidence is satisfactory, and the miracles are real, what explanations can be offered of them? (a) One suggestion has already been considered; it is favoured by Harnack and Matthew Arnold: it is that one person may exercise over another so strong an influence as to cure nervous disorders. The inadequacy of this explanation has been shown; but even were it admissible, a reason would need to be given why Jesus used a means not known in His age, and thus anticiated modern developments of medical skill. It is certain that Jesus worked His miracles relying on the Divine powers in Himself; whether in any cases this obscure psychic force was an unknown condition of His miracles is a matter of secondary importance.

(b) A second suggestion, made by the late Duke of Argyll (Reign of Law, p. 16), is that God chooses and uses laws unknown to man, or laws which, even if he knew, he could not use. He thinks that this would meet the prejudice of scientific thought against effects without causes. This explanation recognizes that miracles are not explicable by the laws of nature as known to man, and that it is of God's free choice that for certain ends He uses means otherwise unknown. As these laws are quite hypothetical, and as this use of them only occasionally is not at all probable, this explanation does not appear to make miracles any more credible.

(c) We may now attempt to define more closely what we mean by a miracle. It does seem, on the whole, desirable to restrict the term 'miracle' to an external event of which there is sensible evidence. Inward changes, such as in the prophetic inspiration, or the religious conversion of an individual, however manifest the Divine presence and action may be for the person having the experience, should not be described as miracles, unless with some qualification such as spiritual or moral. The negative feature of the external event which justifies our describing it as a miracle is that it is inexplicable by the natural forces and laws as known to us. The will of man is a force in nature with which we are familiar, and therefore the movements of the body under the control of the will are not to be described as miraculous. We say more than we are justified in saying if we describe a miracle as an interference with the laws and forces of nature, or a breach in the order of nature; for just as the physical forces and laws allow the exercise of human will in the movements of the body, so the power that produces the miracle may, nay must, be conceived as so closely related to nature that its exercise results in no disturbance or disorder in nature. The miracle need not interfere with the continuity of nature at all. The modern theory of Evolution is not less, but more, favourable to the belief in miracle. It is not a finished machine, but a growing organism, that the world appears. Life transcends, and yet combines and controls physical forces (Lodge's Life and Matter, p. 198). Mind is not explicable by the brain, and yet the will directs the movements of the body. There is a creative action of God in the stages of the evolution, which attaches itself to the conserving activity. Applying the argument from analogy, we may regard the Person of Christ and the miracles that cluster round His Person as such a creative action of God. If we adequately estimate the significance of the Exodus in the history of mankind, the providential events connected with it will assume greater credibility. But there is a final consideration. The purpose of God in Christ is not only perfective—the completion of the world's evolution; it is also redemptive—the correction of the evil sin had brought on the human race. It was fitting that the redemption of man from sin should be accompanied by outward remedial signs, the relief of his need and removal of his sufferings. God is without variation and shadow that is cast by turning in His purpose, but His action is conditioned, and must necessarily be conditioned, by the results of man's use of the freedom which for His wise and holy ends He bestowed. He may in His action transcend His normal activity by a more direct manifestation of Himself than the natural processes of the world afford. The consistency of character of a human personality is not disproved by an exceptional act when a crisis arises; and so, to deal effectively with sin for man's salvation, God may use miracles as means to His ends without any break in the continuity of His wisdom, righteousness, and grace.

4. Objections.—It seemed desirable to state the facts, the proofs for them, and the reasonableness of them, before taking up the objections that are made. These objections refer to two points,—the possibility of miracle at all, and the sufficiency of the evidence for the miracles of the Bible. Each of these may be very briefly dealt with. (a) For materialism, which recognizes only physical forces; and pantheism, which so identifies God and man that the order of nature is fixed by the necessity of the nature of God; and even for deism, which confines the direct Divine activity to the beginning, and excludes it from the course of the world, miracles are impossible. Agnosticism, which regards the ultimate reality as an inscrutable mystery, is under no logical compulsion to deny the possibility of miracles; Huxley, for instance, pronounces such denial unjustifiable. Two reasons against the possibility of miracles may be advanced from a theistic standpoint. In the interests of science it may be maintained that the uniformity of nature excludes miracle; but, as has just been shown, the theory of Evolution has so modified the conception of uniformity that this argument has lost its force. Life and mind, when first appearing in the process of evolution, were breaches in the uniformity. The uniformity of nature is consistent with fresh stages of development, inexplicable by their antecedents; and only when science has resolved life and mind into matter will the argument regain any validity. In the interests of philosophy, it may be argued that miracles interrupt the continuity of thought: the world as it is is so reasonable (idealism) or so good (optimism) that any change is unthinkable. But the affirmation ignores many of the problems the world as it is presents: sin, sorrow, death are real; would not the solution of these problems give both a more reasonable and a better world? and if miracles should be necessary to such a solution, they are thinkable. Again, is it not somewhat arrogant to make man's estimate of what is reasonable and good the measure of God's wisdom and grace?

(b) The more usual objection is the insufficiency of the evidence. Hume laid down this criterion: 'No testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle unless the testimony be of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavours to establish.' Or briefly, it is contrary to experience that a miracle should be true, but not contrary to experience that testimony should be false.' But to this statement it may properly be objected, that it assumes what is to be proved; for, while it may be contrary to ordinary experience that miracles happen, what the defenders of miracles maintain is that there have been exceptional experiences of miracles. If miracles were common, they would cease to be so described; their uncommonness does not prove their incredibility. Although the test is one that has no warrant, yet it may be argued that Christ's character and resurrection would stand it. It is less credible that the portrait of Jesus given in the Gospels was invented, than that Jesus lived as there depicted. It is less credible that the Apostolic faith in the risen Lord, and all it accomplished, should have its origin in illusion, than that He rose from the dead. The improbability of miracle is usually the tacit assumption when the sufficiency of the evidence is denied. If the relation of God to the world is conceived as a constant, immanent, progressive, perfective, redemptive activity, the probability of miracles will be so great that the evidence sufficient to prove an ordinary event will be regarded as satisfactory, provided always that this test is met, that the miracle is connected with the fulfilment of the Divine purpose, and is congruous in its character with the wisdom, righteousness, and grace of God.

5. Value.—A few words may in conclusion be added regarding the value of the miracles. The old apologetic view of miracles as the credentials of the doctrines of Christianity is altogether discredited. It is the truth of the doctrines that makes the fact of the miracles credible. It is Christ's moral character and religious consciousness that help us to believe that He wrought wonderful works. The NT recognizes that a miracle proves only superhuman power (2 Th 2⁹); only if its character is good, is it proved Divine. In the OT prophecy is declared false, not only when unfulfilled (Dt 18²²), but also when it leads to idolatry (13³). The moral test, which can be applied to the miracles of the Gospels, shows the irrelevancy, not to say the flippancy, of Matthew Arnold's sneer about the turning of a pen into a pen-wiper as the proof of a doctrine. The miracles of the Gospels are constituent elements of Christ's moral perfection, His grace towards men. While the miracles are represented in the Gospels as not in themselves sufficient to generate faith (Jn 11⁴⁶ 12³⁷), yet it is affirmed that they arrested attention and strengthened faith (Mt 8⁷, Lk 5⁸ 7¹⁶, Jn 21⁶ 6¹⁴). Christ Himself is reported as appealing to them as witness (Jn 5³⁹), but the appeal seems deprecatory, as elsewhere He rates low the faith that rests on seeing miracles (Jn 4⁴⁸ 14¹¹), while condemning the unbelief that resists even this evidence (Mt 11³⁰). At the beginning of the Christian Church the miracles had some value as evidence. To-day the change Christ has wrought in human history is the most convincing proof of His claim; but we must not ignore the value the miracles had when they occurred, and their value to us still as works of Christ, showing as signs His grace. ALFRED E. GARVIE.

MIRIAM.—1. The sister of Moses and Aaron, probably older than either. It was she who watched Moses in the ark of bulrushes (Ex 2⁴). She is called 'the prophetess,' and led the women in the song of victory at the Red Sea (Ex 15²⁰). In the course of the wilderness wanderings she combined with Aaron against Moses, and was punished by leprosy, which was healed in answer to the prayer of Moses (Nu 12¹⁻¹⁵). She died in Kadesh towards the end of the wilderness journey (Nu 20¹). Her story is referred to in Dt 24⁹⁻¹⁰ in connexion with the ceremonial law of leprosy, and in Mic 6⁴ she is spoken of along with Moses and Aaron as a leader of the people. The name Miriam becomes in Greek Mariam and Mariamne, also Maria, our Mary, and is probably of Egyptian derivation (mer Amon, 'beloved of Amon').

2. A man (or woman) of the family of Caleb (1 Ch 4¹⁷).

W. F. BOYD.

MIRMAH.—Eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8¹⁰).

MIROR.—See GLASS.

MISAEEL.—1. 1 Es 9⁴⁴ = Misael, Neh 8⁴. 2. Three ⁶⁶ = Misael, No. 3.

MISGAB.—Mentioned along with Nebo and Kirjathaim in the oracle against Moab (Jer 48¹). Perhaps it is not intended as a proper name. The same Heb. term occurs in Is 25¹², where both AV and RV tr. 'high fort' (cf. 2 S 22⁸, Ps 9³ bis 18² 46⁷. 11 48³ 59¹⁶. 15 17 62². 6 94²² 144⁴, Is 33¹⁶).

MISHAEL.—1. A Kohathite (Ex 6²², Lv 10⁴). 2. One of Ezra's supporters (Neh 8⁴); called in 1 Es 9⁴⁴ Misael. 3. See MESHAH.

MISHAL.—A town of Asher (Jos 19³⁶), given to the Gershonite Levites (21³⁰) = 1 Ch 6⁷⁴ Mashal. The site is unknown.

MISHAM.—Eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8¹²).

MISHMA.—1. A son of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁴ = 1 Ch 1³⁰). 2. The eponym of a Simeonite family (1 Ch 4³⁴).

MISEMANNAH.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 12³⁰).

MISHNA.—See TALMUD.

MISRAITES.—A family of Kirjath-jearim (1 Ch 24⁴).

MISPAR.—One of the exiles who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2²) = Neh 7⁷ Mispereth, 1 Es 5¹ Aspharasus.

MISPERETH.—See preceding article.

MISREPHOTH-MAIM.—From the Waters of Merom the defeated Canaanites fled to Great Zidon, and unto Misrephoth-maim (Jos 11³). It marks the S. boundary of the Zidonians, who had not been driven out by Joshua (13³). The Ladder of Tyre formed a natural limit to the territory of the Zidonians. On the slope of Ras en-Naqurah, the most southerly of the promontories forming the 'Ladder,' is found a site called Musheirifeh, which Thomson (LB) with great probability identifies with Misrephoth-maim. W. EWING.

MITE.—See MONEY, § 7.

MITHKAH.—One of the 12 'stations' (Nu 33³⁸. 29).

MITHNITE.—A gentile name applied to one of David's officers in 1 Ch 11⁴². The text is doubtful.

MITHRADATES.—1. 1 Es 2¹¹ = Mithredath, Ezr 1⁴. 2. (AV Mithradates) 1 Es 2¹⁶ = Mithredath, Ezr 4⁷.

MITHREDATH (Pers. = 'given by Mithra, or the sun').—1. The Persian treasurer, whom Cyrus commanded to deliver to Sheshbazzar the sacred vessels (Ezr 1⁴ = 1 Es 2¹¹ Mithradates). 2. Apparently a Persian officer stationed in Samaria. Together with his colleagues he wrote to Artaxerxes (Longimanus) to hinder the re-building of the walls of Jerusalem (Ezr 4⁷ = 1 Es 2¹⁶ Mithradates).

MITRE.—With the exception of Zec 3⁵ where it represents the Heb. tsantph or turban (for which see DRESS, § 5 a), and Ezk 21³ RV (see below), 'mitre' in EV is used exclusively of the characteristic headdress of the Jewish high priest. The 'mitre' (Heb. mitsnepheth, from the same root, signifying to 'wind round,' as tsantph) was an elaborate species of turban, composed of a long swathe of 'fine linen' (Ex 28³⁹), 16 cubits in length, according to the Talmud. Its precise form, however, is uncertain; the descriptions given by Josephus of the high-priestly mitre of his day, besides being obscure in themselves, agree neither with one another nor with the OT text.

On the now common assumption that the Priests' Code originated in Babylonia, it is probable that the mitre was intended to have the conical form characteristic of the tiara of the Babylonian kings. For ornament it had 'a plate of gold,' on which were engraved two Hebrew words signifying 'holiness to J^h' (Ex 28³⁶, Lv 8⁹; cf. Sir 45¹²). The plate rested on the front of the mitre, and was kept in position by a blue-purple ribbon (Ex 28³⁷ 39¹¹), which probably served as a fillet and was tied behind, perhaps with the ends hanging down, as in the case of the jewelled diadem or fillet worn by the Assyrian kings. Hence the fillet could be described as 'the holy crown' (Lv 8⁹), and by ben-Sira as 'a diadem (EV 'crown') of gold upon the mitre' (Sir 45¹²). The royal crown of Judah, according to Ezekiel (21³), consisted of the same two parts (see Heb. text in each case): 'remove the mitre (RV), and take off the diadem (EV 'crown').' This passage is our warrant for saying that the headdress prescribed for the high priest in the Priests' Code, consisting of mitre and diadem, is intended to signify that the high priest shall unite in his person the highest office in both Church and State.

The headdress of the high priest is always distinguished from that of his subordinates, for which see BONNET.

MITYLENE was the chief town of Lesbos on its E. coast, subsequently giving its name to the whole island. It was one of the early Æolian colonies, and one of the earliest homes of Greek lyric poetry—the birthplace of Sappho and Alcaeus. It attained great naval power, and founded colonies such as Sigæum and Assos. It took a prominent part in the Ionian revolt, but helped Xerxes against Greece. It joined the Athenian alliance, but revolted in B.C. 428 and was nearly annihilated. After opposing Rome in the Mithradatic War, it was made a free city. It has belonged to the Turks since A.D. 1462. Its mention in Ac 20¹⁴ is merely incidental.—St. Paul's ship spent a night there.

MIXED MULTITUDE.—A description given (1) to certain persons who joined Israel in the Exodus from Egypt (Ex 12²⁸), and who fell a lusting at Kibroth-hattaavah (Nu 11⁴); (2) to those who were separated from the Israelites after the return from the Captivity (Neh 13²).

In Ex 12²⁸ those referred to are probably strangers of non-Israelitic or half-Israelitic origin. The Hebrew consonants (differently pointed) mean either 'mixed' or 'Arabian,' and some have suggested that we ought here to translate 'Arabians.' In Jer 25²⁰ 50²⁷, Ezk 30⁵, the same Hebrew word is translated by the expression 'mingled people,' where it has been supposed by some to refer to foreign mercenaries. In Ezk 30⁵ at least 'Arabians' gives a better meaning. The Hebrew word in Nu 11⁴ is a different one, and is probably a contemptuous term signifying the mob, the rabble.

The context in Neh 13² leaves no doubt as to the meaning. The reference is to the strangers with whom the Israelites had intermarried and the children of such alliances.

MIZAR.—Ps 42⁶ runs: 'I remember thee from the land of Jordan and the Hermons, from the hill Mizar.' It is a question whether Mizar is a proper name or an appellative—'the little' (?). If the former, Mizar must be a peak of the Hermons, and is otherwise unknown. If the latter, the text must in some way be corrected. The simplest and most satisfactory expedient is to remove the initial m from mēzar in the phrase mēzar mizar, and render 'O, thou little hill.' The reference will then be to Zion. As the whole Psalm reads like the cry of an exile from Zion, expressive of his home-sickness, this rendering makes admirable sense. 'O, my God, my soul is cast down within me; for I remember thee from the land of Jordan and the Hermons, O, thou little hill (of Zion).' The initial m in mēzar might well have crept in from the final m of the preceding word, Hermonim.

W. F. COBB.

MIZPAH, MIZPEH.—These words (from tsāphāh, to 'look out,' esp. as a watchman) mean 'outlook-point'; and they are the names of several places and towns in Palestine, all presumably situated on elevated spots, and all probably ancient sacred places. The sites of several are, however, uncertain. As both names are significant, they nearly always in the Heb. have the article.

1. Mizpah in Gn 31⁶, where Jacob and Laban made their compact together, and where the name is explained, by a popular etymology, from the words used by Laban, 'J' watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another' (and interpose, it is implied, if either attempts to take an advantage of the other). The name has not been preserved, and hence the site cannot be fixed, except conjecturally. Improbable sites have been suggested: to judge from the general line of Jacob's route from Haran, the 'Mizpah' here referred to will have been some eminence on the N.E. of the Jebel Ajlun, some 40 miles S.E. of the Lake of Gennesaret (cf. Driver, Genesis, pp. 288, 301 f.).

2. The 'land of Mizpah,' at the foot of Hermon, in Jos 11⁴, probably the same as the 'cleft (or plain between mountains) of Mizpeh' in v. 8. This 'Mizpah,' or 'Mizpeh,' has been identified with the Druse village Mutelle (the 'climbed up to'), on a hill 200 ft. high, at the S. end of the broad and fertile plain called the Merj 'Ayūn (the 'meadow of 'Ayūn'), overlooking the basin of the Huleh sea, a little N. of Abil, and 8 m. W.N.W. of Bānīās (Rob. iii. 372 f.). This, however, is thought by some to be not enough to the E. (notice 'under Hermon' v. 3, and 'eastward' v. 9); and Buhl (GAP 240) conjectures that it may have been the height on which are now the ruins of the Saracenic castle Kal'at es-Subēbē, 2 m. above Bānīās, on the N.E. In the former case the 'land' of M. would be the Merj 'Ayūn itself, between the rivers Litani and Hasbāni; in the latter it would be the plain stretching down from Bānīās towards Lake Huleh.

3. Mizpeh in Jos 15²⁸, in the Shephēlah, or 'lowland' of Judah, mentioned in the same group of cities as Lachish (Tell el-Hesi, 34 miles S.W. of Jerusalem). According to Eusebius (Onom. 279), there was a Mizpeh in the district of Eleutheropolis (Beit-Jibrin, 23 m. S.W. of Jerus.), on the N., and another on the road from Eleutheropolis to Jerusalem. The former of these descriptions would suit Tell es-Safiyeh, on a hill of white chalk 7½ m. N.N.W. of Beit-Jibrin, with a commanding view, which, however, is now identified by many with Gath; the latter is too indefinite to permit of any identification being made with confidence.

4. The Mizpah of Jg 10¹⁷ 11¹¹, Jephthah's home,—apparently, to judge from the narrative, not very far from the Ammonite territory, and (11²⁸) the Aroer in front of Rabbath-ammon (Jos 13²⁸). The site can only be fixed conjecturally. Moore suggests the Jebel Osha, 16 m. N.W. of Rabbath-ammon, the highest point of the mountains S. of the Jabbok (3597 ft.), commanding a view of almost the whole Jordan Valley, as well as of much of the country opposite, on the W. of Jordan (Conder, Heth and Moab, 186 f.). Whether the 'Mizpeh of Gilead' of Jg 11²⁸ is the same spot is uncertain; from the difference of name, it would rather seem that it is not. The Mizpah of Hos 5¹ is, however, very probably the same as Jephthah's Mizpah. The Ramath-mizpeh ('height of the outlook-point') of Jos 13²⁸, on the N. border of Gad, has also been supposed to be the same as Jephthah's Mizpah; but this is uncertain; a point further to the N. seems to be required.

5. The Mizpah, on the W. of Jordan, mentioned in Jg 20¹ 21¹ 1 S 7⁴⁸ 10¹⁷ as a meeting-place of Israelites on important occasions; in 1 K 15²² (=2 Ch 16⁶) as fortified by Asa; in 2 K 23²⁸ 25, Jer 40⁶, and several times besides in Jer 40. 41, as the residence of Gedaliah, the governor appointed by Nebuchadnezzar over Judah after the capture of Jerusalem in 586; and in Neh 3⁷ 18. 19. The same place appears to be intended by the 'Mizpeh' of 1 Mac 3⁶ (Gr. Massēpha, as often in LXX for 'Mizpah,' e.g. Jg 20¹ 2), 'over against Jerusalem,' a former 'place of prayer' (i.e. sanctuary) for Israel, at which the faithful Israelites assembled after Antiochus Epiphanes had desecrated the Temple and stopped all worship in it. This Mizpah was identified with much probability by Robinson (i. 460) with Nebi Samwil, a height 4½ m. N.W. of Jerusalem, 2935 ft. above the sea, and some 500 ft. above the surrounding plain (notice 'gone or came up' in Jg 20¹ 21¹ 3), with a commanding view of the country round (ib. 457 f.). Nebi Samwil is 3 m. W.N.W. of Gibeon (cf. Jg 20¹ 3 with the sequel), 2 m. S. of Gibeon (cf. Neh 3⁷), and a little N. of the present road from Joppa to Jerusalem. It is the actual point from which travellers ascending by the ancient route through the pass of Beth-horon caught their first glimpse of the interior of the hills of Palestine. 'It is a very fair and delicious place, and it is called Mount Joy, because it gives joy to pilgrims' hearts; for from that place men first see Jerusalem' (Maundeville, cited in SP, p. 214). Its present name Nebi Samwil (the 'Prophet Samuel'), is due to the Moslem tradition that it was Samuel's burial-place (cf. 1 S 7⁴ 15, where Mizpah is mentioned as one of Samuel's residences); and the mosque there—once a Crusaders' church—contains a cenotaph revered by the Moslems as his tomb.

6. Mizpeh of Moab (1 S 22³⁸—'Mizpeh' is perhaps also to be read in v. 5 for 'the hold'), the residence of the king of Moab when David consigned his parents to his care. It must have been situated on some eminence in Moab; but we have no further clue to its site.

S. R. DRIVER.

MIZRAIM.—The name of Egypt (wh. see), and especially of Lower Egypt. Mizraim was son of Ham and father of Ludim, Anamim, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim

(i.e. the inhabitants of Upper Egypt), Casluhim, and Capthorim (Gn 10⁶. 12. 14). Cf. also art. PATHROS.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

MIZZAH.—A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36¹². 17 = 1 Ch 1²⁷).

MNASON of Cyprus, mentioned in Ac 21¹⁶ as one who entertained Paul and his companions on their journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem. The Greek in this passage admits of two constructions, either 'bringing with them one Mnason,' or 'bringing us to Mnason.' The most probable explanation is that Mnason lived in some village between Caesarea and Jerusalem, and that Paul broke his journey there and stayed the night with him. The distance was between 60 and 70 miles, too great for a day's journey.

He is called 'an old (RV 'early') disciple,' that is, one of the first disciples, probably one of those converted on the day of Pentecost.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

MOAB, MOABITES.—Moab occupied the lofty table-land to the east of the Dead Sea. It was bounded on the E. by the Arabian desert, on the S. by the land of Edom, on the W. by the Dead Sea and Jordan Valley. Its N. boundary fluctuated at different periods between the Arnon and an indistinct line some distance north of Heshbon. This table-land is elevated some 3000 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and 4300 feet above the Dead Sea. It is traversed by three deep valleys, the middle one of which, the Arnon, is the deepest, and is often mentioned in the Bible. The northern portion consists of broad stretches of rolling country, the reddish soil of which is fertile, while in the southern portion more hills are found, and the deep wrinkles interfere more with agriculture. In the winter months the rainfall is adequate, and renders the country very desirable in comparison with the deserts on its border.

In the earliest times known to us this land was called Lotan (Egyp. Ruten), or Lot. The narrative of Gn. 19, which makes Lot (wh. see) the father of Moab, apparently means that the Moabites settled in this land of Lot. The meaning of Moab is undetermined. The etymology of Gn 19³⁷ (LXX) is not philological, and modern guesses are uncertain.

The narrative of Gn 19 shows that the Israelites recognized the Moabites as their kinsmen. That they really were such, their language, religion, and customs, so far as known to us, also testify. Probably, then, the Moabites came with the wave of Aramean migration which brought the Israelites, secured a foothold in the land of Lotan while the Israelites were still nomads, and adopted the Canaanitish speech of the people among whom they settled. Sayce believes they were settled in this territory by c. B.C. 1300, for Rameses II., he thinks, alludes to the country Moab (cf. Patriarchal Palestine, p. 22), but this lacks confirmation.

At the time of the approach of the Hebrews to Palestine the Moabites were so strongly intrenched in their land that the invaders avoided all conflict with them (Dt 2⁹, Jg 11¹⁵, 2 Ch 20¹⁰), although they conquered king Sihon, who had subdued all of Moab north of the Arnon (Nu 21²¹⁻²⁴, Dt 2²⁴⁻²⁵). The Moabites viewed the coming of Israel with alarm, and desired to attack them, but did not dare (Nu 22-24, Dt 23, Jg 11²⁶).

According to the Priestly narratives, the Israelites secured at this time the territory north of the Arnon; but the narratives differ as to whether its cities were all assigned to Reuben (so Jos 13¹⁵⁻²¹), or whether some of the most southerly (Dibon, Ataroth, and Aroer) were assigned to Gad (Nu 32⁴⁰⁻⁴²). Perhaps the latter view represents the fact. The Gadites obtained some of the southern cities, and the Reubenites some of the northern. Probably the conquest was not very complete.

Early in the period of the Judges, the Moabites not only had regained control of all this territory, but had extended their power into western Palestine so as to oppress the Benjamites (Jg 3¹²⁻³⁰). This led to the course of time the Moabites absorbed the tribe of Reuben, though the latter maintained their identity for a considerable period.

According to the Book of Ruth, friendly intercourse existed between Moab and Israel at this period. Saul fought with the Moabites (1 S 14⁷), but with what result we do not know. Towards the end of his reign they aided David against him (1 S 22²⁶). David subjugated Moab, and rendered the country tributary to Israel (2 S 8¹⁻². 13). This subjugation apparently continued during the reign of Solomon, for he had Moabitish women in his harem, and built a shrine for Chemosh, the god of Moab (1 K 11¹⁻⁷).

After the reign of Solomon, Moab apparently gained its independence. Our next information comes from the so-called 'Moabite Stone,' an inscription of Mesha, king of Moab, found at the ancient Dibon, and now preserved in the Louvre. Mesha states that Omri, king of Israel, conquered Moab, and that Moab continued subject to Israel till the middle of the reign of Ahab, when Chemosh enabled him (Mesha) to win victories over Israel, which secured Moabitish independence, and which he describes in detail. A somewhat confused allusion to this is found in 2 K 3¹⁶. Jehoram, Ahab's successor, undertook, with the aid of Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom, to reduce Moab once more, and almost succeeded. The country was overrun, the capital besieged and reduced to great extremity, when the king of Moab sacrificed to Chemosh his firstborn son on the city wall in sight of both armies (2 K 3²⁷). The courage which this aroused in the Moabites, and the superstitious dread which it excited in the besieging army, secured a victory for the former. It appears from 2 K 13²⁰ that after this, Moabites frequently invaded Israel.

Amos (2¹⁻⁵) in the next century reproved Moab for barbarities to Edom, and Tiglath-pileser III. of Assyria enumerates the king of Moab among his tribute-payers (KIB ii. 20). Sennacherib, about B.C. 700, received tribute from Chemosh-nadab, king of Moab (KIB ii. 91), and the country remained vassal to Assyria during the following reigns of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal (cf. KIB ii. 148, 238).

Moabites aided Nebuchadnezzar against Jehoiakim at the very end of the same century (2 K 24²). Is 15. 16, Zeph 2⁸⁻¹¹, Jer 48, and Ezk 25²⁰ contain prophecies against Moab, but do not add to our knowledge of the history. Jer 48 indicates that a great calamity was impending over them. In Neh 4⁷ Arabians rather than Moabites are allies of the Ammonites (cf. also 1 Mac 9³²⁻⁴² and Jos. Ant. XIII. xiii. 5, XIV. i. 4). We know that the Nabataeans were in possession of this country a little later, and it is probable that by the time of Nehemiah they had for ever brought the Moabite power to an end. Some infer from Jeremiah's prophecy that Moab rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar as Israel and Ammon did, and that he carried enough of them captive to weaken them and render them an easy prey to the Nabataeans. Possibly this is true, but we know nothing of it.

The language of the Moabites was, as the Moabite Stone shows, identical with that of Israel. That peculiar construction known as Waw Consecutive is found, outside of Biblical Hebrew, only in the Moabite Stone and one or two Phoenician inscriptions.

The religion of the Moabites was very similar to that of early Israel. The references to Chemosh in Mesha's inscription are very similar to references to Jahweh in Israelitish writings of the same period. The Divine name Ashtar-Chemosh indicates that the worship of the feminine divinity known to the Babylonians as Ishtar, and to the Phoenicians as Astarte, was also mingled with the worship of Chemosh. Traces of the repellent nature of this worship appear in the OT (Nu 25³. 11⁴, Jos 22⁷, Ps 106³¹). No great ethical prophets, such as elevated the religion of Israel, rescued the religion of Moab from the level of its barbaric Semitic origin.

MOADIAH.—See MAADIAH.

MOCHMUR.—A wady apparently S.E. of Dothan (Jth 7¹⁸).

MODIN.—A village in the Shephelah, never mentioned in the OT, but of great importance as the home of the Maccabees. Here Mattathias, by slaying a Jew who conformed to the paganizing commands of Antiochus, struck the first blow for Jewish religious freedom (1 Mac 2¹⁻²⁸). He was buried at Modin (2⁷⁰), as were his illustrious sons Judas (9¹⁹) and Jonathan (13²⁸). Simon here built an elaborate monument with seven pyramids, commemorative of his father, mother, and four brethren, with great pillars around, and bas-reliefs of military and naval triumphs. This splendid monument could be seen at sea. It stood for about 500 years, after which it seems to have disappeared; and with it was lost all recollection of the site of Modin. This has been recovered in recent years in the little village of el-Medyeh, near Lydd. There are numerous rock-tombs about, some of them traditionally known as Qabr el-Yehad, or 'the Jews' tombs,' but nothing is to be seen in any way suggestive of the Maccabean mausoleum.

MOETH (1 Es 8⁶³) = Noadiah of Ezr 8³³.

MOLADAH.—A city reckoned to Judah in Jos 15²⁶, and to Simeon in Jos 19², 1 Ch 4²⁸. It is in no way related to Tell el-Müh, 'hill of salt,' with which Robinson and others have identified it. Probably it lay near Beersheba, but the site has not been recovered.

MOLE.—1. tinsmeth, Lv 11³⁰ (AV 'mole,' RV 'chameleon'; but same word is in Lv 11¹⁸ and Dt 14¹⁸ tr. AV 'swan,' RV 'horned owl'). See CHAMELEON.

2. chaphôr-pêrôth ('burrowing animals'), Is 2²⁰, may apply to rats, mice, jerbous, etc., as well as 'moles.' The true insectivorous mole does not occur in Palestine, but the rodent Spalax typhlus, the mole rat, is very common. It lives entirely underground, has most rudimentary eyes, and makes very long burrows. It is gregarious, and large areas are sometimes covered thick with its hillocks.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MOLECH, MOLOCH.—A deity worshipped by the Israelites, especially by the people of Judah, towards the close of the monarchy. Melech ('king') was evidently the title of this god; and the present form is due to the combination of the original consonants with the vowels of bôsheth ('shame'). The passages in which reference to this divinity is probably found are Lv 18²¹ 20²⁻⁴, 1 K 11⁷, 2 K 23¹⁰, Is 30²³ 57⁹, Jer 32³⁵. The chief feature of the worship seems to have been the sacrifice of children. Its special centre was just outside Jerusalem, at a place in the Valley of Hinnom called the Topheth (which see). The cult was introduced, according to 1 K 11⁷, by Solomon. If the reference here is an error (see below), Ahaz may have been the innovator (2 K 16⁹). At any rate, it flourished in the 7th cent. B.C., as we gather from prophetic denunciation and the legislation of Deuteronomy. Manasseh sacrificed his son (2 K 21⁹). Josiah suppressed the worship and defiled Topheth. But under Jehoiakim this worship revived, and continued till the Captivity.

As to the identity of Melech, there is an interesting question. Very ancient tradition identifies him with Milcom (wh. see), the national god of Ammon. But the only basis for this view which the Heb. text of the OT furnishes is 1 K 11⁷, and the Gr. VSS offer evidence that the original reading in this passage may have been 'Milcom,' as in v. 5 and v. 35. On the other hand, we are told that, while Melech was worshipped at Topheth, the sanctuary of Milcom was on the Mount of Olives (2 K 23¹²). Moreover, this cult seems to have been regarded as Canaanitish in origin (Dt 12²⁹⁻³¹ 18⁹⁻¹⁴). Again, we learn from many sources that the most atrocious child-sacrifice was a prominent feature in the public religion of the Phœnicians, both in their Palestinian homeland and in Carthage; and in this connexion we find constant reference to the pit of fire into which the victims were cast (see TOPHETH). Among other Semitic peoples also there are occasional instances of the offering of children, but not as a regular practice such as we are considering.

freq. this worship is also called Baal ('master') (Jer 19⁶ 32³⁵). This is likewise a title of numerous Semitic divinities, and is sometimes used of Jahweh (see BAAL). When the name 'Baal' is used in the OT with specific reference to a particular god, it means Melkarth of Tyre (1 K 16³², 2 K 3² 8¹⁸, 27 10¹⁸⁻²⁷ 11¹⁸). The prophets undoubtedly regarded the cult as foreign, and as an apostasy to heathenism. But does this necessarily prove that Melech was a false god? Jeremiah's protest that Jahweh had not required these sacrifices (7³¹ 19⁶ 32³⁵) would seem to imply that the people did not regard this as the worship of another god. Indeed, Ezekiel goes further, and claims that Jahweh Himself gave them these 'statutes that are not good,' and sacrifices of the firstborn, because they had rejected purer worship (Ezk 20²⁵ 31¹). On the whole, the evidence seems to indicate that this cultus was due to Phœnician influence, and was introduced because of popular misunderstanding of the laws relating to the giving of the firstborn to Jahweh. The origin of such a cult, together with a possible more or less complete identification with Melkarth, would explain the constant use of the titles 'Melech' and 'Baal' rather than the name 'Jahweh.'

MOMDIS (1 Es 9³⁴) = Maadai, Ezr 10³⁴.

MONEY.—1. Antiquity of a metallic currency: weights and values.—That the precious metals, gold and silver, and to a less extent copper, were the ordinary media of exchange in Palestine from a time long prior to the appearance there of the Hebrews, is now amply attested by evidence from Egypt and Babylonia, and even from the soil of Palestine itself. The predominance of silver as the metal currency for everyday transactions is further shown by the constant use in Hebrew literature of the word for 'silver' (keseph) in the sense of 'money.'

As there can be no question of the existence of coined money in Palestine until the Persian period, the first step in the study of the money of OT is to master the system of weights adopted for the weighing of the precious metals. Money might indeed be 'told' or counted, but the accuracy of the 'tale' had to be tested by means of the balance; or rather, as we see from such passages as 2 K 12¹⁰ 11 (RV), money was told by being weighed. Now, all the weight-systems of Western Asia, and even of Europe, had their origin in Babylonia (for details see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). There, as required by the sexagesimal system of reckoning, the ancient unit of weight, the manu (Heb. maneh as in Ezk 45¹²—elsewhere in EV 'pound') or mina, which weighed 7580 grains on the light, and 15,160 on the heavy standard, was divided into 60 shekels, while 60 minas went to the higher denomination, the talent. It will thus be seen that the light Babylonian trade shekel weighed, neglecting fractions, 126 grains troy, and the heavy shekel 252. The former, it will be useful to remember, was but three grains heavier than a British gold sovereign.

As this weight-system spread westwards with the march of Babylonian civilization and commerce, it came into conflict with the decimal system of calculation, and a compromise was effected, which resulted in the mina being reduced to 50 shekels, while the talent remained at 60 minas, although reduced in weight to 3000 shekels. That the Hebrew talent by which the precious metals were weighed contained 3000, not 3600, shekels may be seen by a simple calculation from the data of Ex 38²⁵⁻²⁶. Further, the heavy Babylonian shekel of 252 grains remained in use among the Hebrews for the weighing of gold until NT times. For this we have the express testimony of Josephus, who tells us (Ant. xiv. vii. 1) that the Hebrew gold mina was equal to 2½ Roman pounds. On the basis of 5053 grains to the libra or pound, this gives a shekel of 252½ grains, the exact weight of the heavy Babylonian shekel of the common or trade standard.

For the weighing of silver, on the other hand, this shekel was discarded for practical reasons. Throughout the East in ancient times the ratio of gold to silver was 13½:1, which means that a shekel of gold could buy 13½ times the same weight of silver.

The latest explanation of this invariable ratio, it may be added in passing, is that advocated by Winckler and his followers. On this, the so-called 'astral mythology' theory of the origin of Babylonian culture, gold, the yellow metal, was specially associated with the sun, while the paler silver was the special 'moon-metal.' Accordingly it was natural to fix the ratio between them as that which existed between the year and the month, viz. 360:27 or 40:3.

In ordinary commerce, however, this ratio between the two chief media of exchange was extremely inconvenient, and to obviate this inconvenience, the weight of the shekel for weighing silver was altered so that a gold shekel might be exchanged for a whole number of silver shekels. This alteration was effected in two ways. On the one hand, along the Babylonian trade-routes into Asia Minor the light Babylonian shekel of 126 grains was raised to 168 grains, so that 10 such shekels of silver now represented a single gold shekel, since $126 \times 13\frac{1}{2} = 168 \times 10$. On the other hand, the great commercial cities of Phœnicia introduced a silver shekel of 224 grains, 15 of which were equivalent to one heavy Babylonian gold shekel of 252 grains, since $252 \times 13\frac{1}{2} = 224 \times 15$. This 224-grain shekel is accordingly known as the Phœnician standard. It was on this standard that the sacred dues of the Hebrews were calculated (see § 3); on it also the famous silver shekels and half-shekels were struck at a later period (§ 5).

With regard, now, to the intrinsic value of the above gold and silver shekels, all calculations must start from the mint price of gold, which in Great Britain is £3, 17s. 10½d. per ounce of 480 grains. This gives £2, 1s. as the value of the Hebrew gold shekel of 252 grs., and since the latter was the equivalent of 15 heavy Phœnician shekels, 2s. 9d. represents the value as bullion of the Hebrew silver shekel. Of course the purchasing power of both in Bible times, which is the real test of the value of money, was many times greater than their equivalents in sterling money at the present day.

The results as to weights and values above set forth may be presented in tabular form as follows:—

Denomination.	Weight.	Intrinsic Value.
GOLD—
Shekel	252½ grs. troy.	£2 1 0
Mina = 50 shekels	12,630 " "	102 10 0
Talent=3000 "	758,000 " "	6150 0 0
	(circa 108 lbs. avoird.)
SILVER—
Shekel	224½ grs. troy.	0 2 9
Mina	11,225 " "	6 16 8
	(circa 1 lb. 10oz. avoird.)
Talent	673,500 grs. troy.	410 0 0

Since the effective weight of the extant shekels is somewhat under the theoretical weight above given, the intrinsic value of any number of shekels of silver may be found with sufficient accuracy by equating the shekel roughly with our half-crown (2s. 6d.).

Although we have literary and numismatic evidence for the gold and silver shekels of these tables only, it may now be regarded as certain that other standards were in use in Palestine in historic times for weighing the precious metals. The best attested is that which the present writer, in his article 'Weights and Measures' in Hastings' DB iv. 904 f., termed the 'Syrian 320-grain unit,' a shekel which is ⅓ of a heavy Babylonian mina of 16,000 grains. That the light shekel of this standard, represented by the now familiar weights of 160 grains or thereby, inscribed netseph, was used for weighing silver or gold or both is evident from the small denominations which have been recovered, such as the quarter netseph of 40 grs., known as the Chaplin weight (see op. cit. and PEFS, 1903, p. 197, 1904, p. 209 ff., and later years).

2. Money in the pre-exilic period.—Throughout the whole of this period, as has already been emphasized, in every transaction involving the payment of sums of considerable value, the money was reckoned by weight. Accordingly, when Abraham bought the field and cave of Machpelah he 'weighed to Ephron the silver . . . four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant' (Gn 23⁶). In view of what has just been said regarding the variety of standards in use in Palestine in early times, it would be unwise, in the present state of our knowledge, to pronounce as to the value of the price paid in this transaction. On the Phœnician standard it would be approximately £55 sterling; on the netseph standard, which stands to the Phœnician in the ratio of 5:7, it would be under £40. Similarly, the price which David paid for the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite, 50 shekels of silver (2 S 24²⁰), will vary from £5 to £7 according to the standard adopted. On the other hand, where gold is concerned, as in the case of the 30 talents which Sennacherib 'appointed unto Hezekiah' (2 K 18⁴), we may with some confidence assume the gold standard common to Palestine and Assyria. In this case Hezekiah's tribute will represent the respectable sum of £184,500.

A noteworthy feature of the entries of prices in the pre-exilic writings of the Hebrews is the disappearance of the mina, the sums being stated in terms of shekels and talents exclusively. Thus Abraham, as we have seen, paid 400 shekels, not 8 minas, to the children of Heth; the weight, and therefore the value, of Achan's 'wedge of gold' (see next paragraph) is given as 50 shekels, not as 1 mina, and so throughout.

In this period the precious metals circulated in three forms. The shekel, its subdivisions (cf. the quarter-shekel of 1 S 9⁸) and smaller multiples, had the form of ingots of metal, without any stamp or other mark, so far as our evidence goes, as a guarantee of their purity and weight. Larger values were made up in the shape of bars, such as Schliemann discovered at Troy and Macalister found at Gezer (illust. Bible Sidights, etc., fig. 36). The 'wedge' (lit. 'tongue') of gold' which Achan appropriated from the loot of Jericho (Jos 7²¹) was probably such a thin bar of gold. Further, Rebekah's nose-ring of half a shekel of gold, and her bracelets of ten shekels (Gn 24²²), represent a third form which the metal currency of the early period might assume. The vases and other vessels of gold and silver which are so frequently mentioned in ancient tribute lists also, in all probability, represented definite weights and values.

To such an extent was the shekel the exclusive unit in all ordinary transactions, that the Hebrew writers frequently omit it in their statements of prices. This applies to gold as well as to silver, e.g. 2 K 5⁵ 'six thousand' of gold, where AV and RV supply 'pieces,' but RVm has the correct 'shekels' (cf. silverling [wh. see; in Is 7²⁶]).

3. Money in the Persian period: introduction of coins.—In this period the money of the small Jewish community was still, as before the Exile, chiefly ingots and bars of the precious metals, without official mark of any kind. The addition of such a mark by the issuing authority serves as a public guarantee of the purity of the metal and the weight of the ingot, and transforms the latter into a coin. Coined money is usually regarded as the invention of the Lydians early in the 7th cent. B.C., but it is very improbable that any 'coins' reached Palestine before the fall of the Jewish State in B.C. 587. The first actual coins to reach Jerusalem were more probably those of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 522-485), who struck two coins, the daric in gold, and the siglos or siklos (from shekel) in silver. The daric was a light shekel of 130 grains—7 grains heavier than our 'sovereign'—worth twenty-one shillings sterling. The siglos was really a half-shekel of 86½ grains, equal therefore to ½ of the daric, on the ten-shekel basis set forth in § 1, or a fraction more than a shilling.

In several passages of Chron., Ezr., and Neh. the RV has substituted 'darics' for AV 'drams' (1 Ch 29⁷, Ezr 2²⁰, Neh 7⁷⁰, etc.). But there are valid reasons (see 'Money' in Hastings' DB iii. 421) for retaining the older rendering in the sense, not of coins, but of weights. On the other hand, since Nehemiah was a Persian official, the 'forty shekels of silver' of Neh 5¹⁸ may be Persian sigloi, although they may with equal probability be regarded as shekels of the usual Phœnician standard. There is, of course, no question of the Jewish community striking silver coins of their own, this jealously guarded right being then, as always, 'the touchstone of sovereignty.'

In this period, however, the wealthy commercial cities on the Phœnician seaboard—Aradus, Sidon, Tyre, and others—acquired the right of issuing silver coins, which they naturally did on the native standard. The effective weight of these shekels or tetradrachms, as they are usually termed, averages about 220 grains, a few grains short of the normal 224. These coins have a special interest for the Bible student, from the fact that they are the numismatic representatives of 'the shekel of the sanctuary', which is prescribed in the Priests' Code as the monetary unit of the post-exilic community (see Lv 27¹⁸ 'all thy estimations shall be according to the shekel of the sanctuary'). In Ex 30¹³ and elsewhere this shekel is said to consist of 20 gerahs, which the Greek translators identified with the small silver obol of the Gr. coinage, 20 of which yield a shekel of 224 grains. Moreover, it is repeatedly stated in the Talmud that 'all payments according to the shekel of the sanctuary are to be made in Phœnician currency' (Mishna, Bechoroth, viii. 7). For the mode of payment of the half-shekel tax for the Temple service: see § 7.

4. Money in the period from Alexander to the Maccabees.—Alexander's conquest of Syria was naturally followed by the introduction of his coinage in gold, silver, and bronze. On his death, Ptolemy I. established himself in Egypt, to which he soon added Palestine. During the following century (B.C. 301-198) the Jews had at their command the coins of the Ptolemaic dynasty, struck at Alexandria on the Phœnician standard, as well as those of the flourishing cities on the Mediterranean. The tribute paid by the Jews to the third Ptolemy did not exceed the modest sum of 20 talents of silver, or circa £4360.

In B.C. 198 Antiochus III. wrested Palestine from the Ptolemys. Now the Seleucids had continued Alexander's silver coinage on the Attic standard, the basis of which was the drachm of, originally, 67 grs., but the effective weight of the Syrian drachms and tetradrachms of this period is slightly below this standard, and may be valued at 11d. and 3s. 8d. respectively. The drachms (To 5¹⁴, 2 Mac 4¹⁹ 124) and talents (6000 drachms) of the Books of Maccabees are to be regarded as on this Syrian-Attic standard.

5. The first native coinage: the problem of the 'shekel of Israel.'—In B.C. 139-138 Antiochus Sidetes granted to Simon Maccabæus the right to coin money (see 1 Mac 15¹¹). 'The thorniest question of all Jewish numismatics,' as it has been called, is the question whether and to what extent Simon availed himself of this privilege. A series of silver shekels and half-shekels on the Phœnician standard, bearing dates from 'year 1' to 'year 5,' has long been known to students. They show on the obverse and reverse respectively a cup or chalice and a spike of a lily with three flowers. The legends in old Hebrew letters on the shekels are: obv. 'Shekel of Israel'; rev. 'Jerusalem the holy' (see illust. in plate accompanying art. 'Money' in Hastings' DB iii. Nos. 14, 15; Reinach, Jewish Coins, pl. ii.; and more fully in Madden's Coins of the Jews—the standard work on Jewish numismatics, 67 ff.). Only two alternatives are possible regarding the date of these famous coins. Either they belong to the governorship of Simon Maccabæus who died B.C. 135, or to the period of the great revolt against Rome, A.D. 66-70. The latest presentation of the arguments for the earlier date will be found in M. Theodore Reinach's book cited above. It is not a point in his favour, however, that he is compelled to assign the shekels of the year 5 to John Hyrcanus, Simon's son and successor.

The present writer is of opinion that the arguments he has advanced elsewhere in favour of the later date (DB iii. 424 f., 429 f.) still hold good. In this case the earliest Jewish coins will be certain small bronze coins struck by the above-mentioned Hyrcanus (B.C. 135-104), with the legend in minute old Hebrew characters: 'John, the high priest, and the commonwealth (or the executive) of the Jews.' The title of 'king' first appears on bronze coins of Alexander Jannæus—Jonathan the king—who also first introduced a Greek, in addition to a Hebrew, legend. No silver coins, it may be added, were struck by any of Simon's successors, or even by the more powerful and wealthier Herod. The bronzes of the latter present no new feature of interest.

6. Money in Palestine under the Romans.—From a numismatic point of view Judæa may be said to have formed a part of the Roman dominions from B.C. 63, from which date the Roman monetary unit, the silver denarius, with its subdivisions in copper, as quadrans, etc., was legal tender in Jerusalem. Since the denarius was almost equal in weight to the Syrian-Attic drachm (§ 4)—the silver unit throughout the Seleucid empire—the two coins were regarded as of equal value, and four denarii were in ordinary business the equivalent of a tetradrachm of Antioch.

The Roman gold coin, the aureus, representing 25 denarii, varied in weight in NT times from 126 to 120 grains. Since a British 'sovereign' weighs a little over 123 grains, the aureus may for approximate calculations be reckoned at £1. Similarly the denarius from Augustus to Nero weighed 90 grs.—our sixpenny piece weighs 43.6 grs.—and was equal to 16 copper asses. To reach the monetary value of the denarius in sterling money, which is on a gold standard, we have only to divide the value of the gold aureus by 25, which gives 93d., say nine pence halfpenny for convenience, or a French franc.

In addition to these two imperial coins, the system based on the Greek drachm was continued in the East, and both drachms and tetradrachms were issued from the imperial mint at Antioch. In our Lord's day Tyre still continued to issue silver and bronze coins, the former mainly tetradrachms or shekels on the old Phœnician standard (220-224 grs.). As the nearest equivalent of the Heb. shekel these Tyrian coins were much in demand for the payment of the Temple tax of one half-shekel (see next §). Besides all these, the procurators issued small bronze coins, probably the quadrans (¼ of an as), from their mint at Cæsarea, not to mention the numerous cities, such as Samaria-Sebaste, which had similar rights.

7. The money of NT.—This article may fitly close with a few notes on each of the various denominations mentioned in NT. The currency was in three metals: 'get you no gold nor silver nor brass (copper) in your purses' (Mt 10⁹ RV). Following this order we have (a) the gold aureus here referred to only indirectly. Its value was £1 (see § 6). (b) The silver coin most frequently mentioned is the Roman denarius (AV and RV 'penny,' Amer. RV, more correctly, 'shilling').

In value equal to a franc or 9½d., it was the day's wage of a Jewish labourer (Mt 20²). A typical denarius of our Lord's day, with which the Roman dues were paid (22¹⁴), would have on its obverse the head of the Emperor Tiberius, and for 'superscription' the following legend in Latin: 'Tiberius Caesar, the son of the deified Augustus, (himself) Augustus' (illust. No. 13 of plate in 'Money,' DB iii.). (c) The drachm on the Attic standard (§ 5) is named only Lk 15⁸: 'what woman having ten drachms (EV 'pieces of silver'), if she lose one drachm,' etc. In ordinary usage, as we have seen, it was the equivalent of the denarius, but for Government purposes it was tarified at only ½ of the denarius. The 50,000 'pieces of silver' (lit. 'silverlings') of Ac 19¹⁹ were denarius-drachms. (d) Once there is mention of a didrachm (Mt 17²⁴ AV 'tribute money,' RV 'the half-shekel'), but this was a two-drachm piece on the Phœnician standard, and was now very rare. Accordingly it was usual for two persons to join forces in paying the Temple tax of a half-shekel by presenting a Phœnician tetradrachm. This is (e) the 'piece of money' of v. 27, which RV has properly rendered by 'shekel,' with the word of the original, stater, in the margin. The thirty 'pieces of silver' for which Judas betrayed his Lord were also most probably Tyrian tetradrachms. Although these by Government tariff would be equal to only 90 denarii, their ordinary purchasing power was then equal to 120 denarii or francs, say £4, 16s. of our money.

Passing to the copper coins of the Gospels, we find three denominations in the original, the lepton, the kodrantēs, and the assarion, rendered in Amer. RV by 'mite,' 'farthing,' and 'penny' respectively. Our EV, unfortunately, renders both the two last by 'farthing,' having used 'penny' for the denarius. There are great difficulties in the way of identifying these among the copper coins that have come down to us (for details see Hastings' DB iii. 428 f., EBi iii. 3647). (f) The lepton, the widow's mite (Mk 12⁴², Lk 21⁹), was the smallest coin in circulation, probably one of the minute Maccabæan bronzes. Its value was between ⅓ and ½ of an English farthing. (g) Two mites made a kodrantēs (Lat. quadrans), the 'utmost farthing' of Mt 5²⁶, which was either the actual Roman quadrans or its equivalent among the local bronze coins. As ¼ of the denarius, it was worth a trifle more than half a farthing. (h) The assarion is the 'farthing' (Amer. RV 'penny') associated with the price of sparrows (Mt 10²⁹, Lk 12⁹), and was a copper coin on the Greek system, probably the dichalkus, of which in ordinary business 24 went to the denarius-drachm. Its value would thus be about ⅓ of a penny. The relative values of the three coins may be represented by ⅙, ⅓, and ½ of a penny respectively.

There remain the two larger denominations, the talent and the pound or mina, neither of which was any longer, as in the earlier period, a specific weight of bullion, but a definite sum of money. (i) The talent now contained 6000 denarius-drachms, which made 240 aurei or £240 (so Mt 18²⁴ RVm). It is not always realized, perhaps, how vast was the difference in the amounts owing in this parable (18^{28ff.}). The one servant owed 100 denarii, the other 10,000 talents or sixty million denarii. The one debt, occupying little more space than 100 sixpences, could be carried in the pocket; for the payment of the other, an army of nearly 8600 carriers, each with a sack 60 lbs. in weight, would be required. If these were placed in single file, a yard apart, the train would be almost five miles in length! (j) The pound, finally, of another parable (Lk 19^{12ff.}) was a mina, the sixtieth part of a talent, in other words 100 denarius-drachms or £4 sterling.

For the later coinage of the Jews, which was confined to the two periods of revolt against the Roman power, in A.D. 66-70 and 132-135, in addition to what has been said above (§ 5) regarding the shekels and half-shekels here assumed to belong to the first revolt, see Madden and Reinach, opp. cit.; Schürer, GVV i. 761 ff.; and Hastings' DB iii. 429-431. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MONEY-CHANGERS.—How indispensable were the services of the 'money-changers' (Mt 21¹², Mk 11¹⁵), 'changers of money' (Jn 2¹⁴), 'changers' (v. 14), and 'exchangers' (Mt 25²⁷ AV, RV 'bankers') in the first century of our era in Palestine may be seen from the summary of the varied currencies of the period in the preceding article (§§ 6, 7). The Jewish money-changer, like his modern counterpart the sarrāf (for whom see PEFS, 1904, p. 49 ff., where the complexity of exchange in the Palestine of to-day is graphically set forth), changed the large denominations into the smaller, giving denarii, for example, for tetradrachms, and gave silver for gold, copper for silver. An important department of his business was the exchange of foreign money and even money of the country of a non-Phœnician standard for shekels and half-shekels on this standard, the latter alone being accepted in payment of the Temple dues (cf. money, §§ 4, 6, 7). It was mainly for the convenience of the Jews of the Dispersion that the changers were allowed to set up their tables in the outer court of the Temple (Mt 21^{12ff.}). The wealthier members of the profession, the 'exchangers' (RV 'bankers') of Mt 25²⁷ (cf. Lk 19²³), received money on deposit for purposes of investment, on which interest was paid (see USURY).

The money-changers had constantly to be on their guard against false money. This gives point to the frequently quoted unwritten saying (agraphon) of our Lord to His disciples: 'Be ye expert money-changers'—be skilful in distinguishing true doctrine from false.

MONTH.—See TIME.

MONUMENT.—Is 65⁴, 'which remain among the graves and lodge in the monuments,' that is, among the tombs. In the Rhemish Version 'monument' is the usual word for tomb or sepulchre, after Vulg. monumentum. The reference in Is. is to the custom of obtaining oracles by incubation, that is, spending the night in subterranean sacred places.

MOOLI (1 Es 8⁷) = Mahli, Ezr 8¹⁸.

MOON.—The moon is 'the lesser light to rule the night' of the cosmogony of Genesis (1¹⁶). Its importance was in part due to the recurrence of its phases, which formed a measure for time. Each new moon, as it appeared, marked the commencement of a new period, and so in Hebrew the word for 'moon' and 'month' is the same. Sun and moon occur side by side in passages of Scripture, and to the moon as well as to the sun is ascribed a fertilizing power over and above the gift of light which comes from them to the earth. Just as we have in Dt 33¹⁴ 'the precious things of the fruits of the sun,' so we have there 'the precious things of the growth of the moons.' As a consequence of this, the re-appearance of the new moon was eagerly looked for, and trumpets were blown and sacrifices offered on the day of the new moon. We gather also from Ps 81⁸ (RV) that something of a similar kind took place at the full moon. The moon took its part with the sun in one of Joseph's dreams when it 'made obeisance' to him (Gn 37⁹); and it stood still, 'in the valley of Aijalon,' at the command of Joshua, at the battle of Gibeon (Jos 10^{12, 13}; cf. Hab 3¹¹). Language which must have been derived from the appearance of the moon during eclipses is used by the prophets. The moon is to be darkened or turned into blood (Jl 2^{10, 31}) before 'the day of the Lord'; and similar language is used by our Lord (e.g. Mk 13²⁴). We are told of the redeemed Zion that the light of the moon is to be as the light of the sun (Is 30²⁶), and that there is to be no need of the moon, because the glory of God is to be the light of His people (Is 60¹⁹; cf. Rev 21²³). Cautions against the worship of the moon, and punishment by death for the convicted worshippers, are to be found in Dt 4¹⁹ 174, whilst a superstitious salutation of the moon by kissing the hand, not quite unheard of even in our own day, is mentioned in Job 31^{26, 27}. Moon-worship by the burning of incense was offered in Jerusalem, and put down by Josiah (2 K 23⁵).

Mount Sinai is supposed to have derived its name from the moon-god Sin, to whom worship was paid there.

For the worship of the 'queen of heaven,' see under STARS.

In the OT we meet more than once with crescent-shaped ornaments (Jg 8²¹, Is 31⁸); whether these are an indication of the worship of the moon is uncertain.

It has been always considered baneful in the bright clear atmosphere of the warmer regions of the earth to sleep exposed to the rays of the moon (Ps 121⁶). The influence of the earth's satellite has long been considered hurtful. Our word 'lunatic' reproduces the idea of the Western world of our Lord's time, that lunacy was due to the influence of the moon: the Greek word used in Mt 4²⁴ 17¹⁵ shows this. In the RV the word is translated 'epileptic.' There are many still to be found who believe that the violence and recurrence of epileptic fits vary with the phases of the moon. H. A. REDPATH.

MOOSSIAS (1 Es 9³¹) = Maaseiah, Ezr 10³⁰.

MOPH.—See MEMPHIS.

MORALITY.—See ETHICS.

MORASHITE.—A gentilic adjective used to designate the prophet Micah (Mic 1¹, Jer 26¹⁸), probably derived from Moreseth-gath (wh. see). Cf. MICAH, p. 614^a f.

MORDECAI.—1. A cousin (?) of queen Esther, who thwarted Haman's plot against the Jews. See ESTHER and ESTHER [BOOK OF]. 2. One of those who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2², Neh 7⁷); called in 1 Es 5⁸ Mardocheus.

MOREH, the Hiphil participle from yārāh, means 'teacher' or 'one who gives direction' (2 K 17²⁸, Is 30²⁰ etc.), and so is applied to a prophet (Is 9¹⁵). Sitting in the shelter of a sacred tree, the priest or seer delivered his direction or 'oracles.' 1. The terebinth (AV, wrongly, 'plain') of Moreh (Gn 12⁶) may have been so named from the theophany vouchsafed to Abraham there. The same spot may be indicated by the terebinths of Moreh (Dt 11³⁰), mentioned as indicating the position of Ebal and Gerizim. From their conjunction with Gilgal it has been suggested that the gīlāl ('stone circle') and the terebinths were parts of the same sanctuary. There may be a reference to this place in Gn 35⁴, in Jos 24²⁶, possibly also in Jg 9⁶. Gilgal (Dt 11³⁰) may be Khīrbet Juleijl, fully 1½ mile E. of Jacob's Well. But this would not fix with certainty the position of the sanctuary of the terebinth.

2. The hill of Moreh (Jg 7¹) seems to have lain to the N. of the position occupied by Gideon, in the direction of the camp of the Midianites. Taking the narrative as it stands, the Midianites 'pitched in the valley of Jezreel' (63²), while Gideon held the lower spurs of Gilboa towards Jezreel. 'The spring of Harod' is with some probability identified with 'Ain Jalūd. The conspicuous hill on the other side of the vale, Jebel ed-Duhy, popularly now called Little Hermon, round the W. flanks of which, and northward in the plain, the Midianites would spread, may be almost certainly identified with the Hill of Moreh. The article with Moreh suggests the presence of a sanctuary on the hill. This may be represented by the modern shrine of Nebū Duhy. Questions have been raised by the condition of the Heb. text, but no more probable identification has been suggested. Cf. MOREH. W. EWING.

MORESHETH-GATH.—Mic 1¹⁴ only. It was probably the birth-place of the prophet Micah (Mic 1¹, Jer 26¹⁸), and must have been in the Shephelah. The Onomasticon locates it east of, and near to, Eleutheropolis.

MORIAH.—1. The name.—In Gn 22² Abraham was commanded to go 'Into the land of the Moriah,' and to sacrifice Isaac upon 'one of the mountains' which God would tell him of. The derivation of the name is obscure. The Peshitta (Syriac) version reads 'of the Amorites,' which may possibly be the true reading. The narrator (E), however, in v. 14 appears to connect it with the verb 'to see' (which is etymologically impossible), and some of the early translators do the same in their rendering of the name in v. 2. The Targumists emphasized the worship of Abraham at the spot, perhaps connecting the name with the verb 'to fear'—which is equally impossible.

2. The place.—The proverb recorded in v. 14 clearly implies that the writer thought that Isaac was offered on the Temple mount at Jerusalem. And hence the Chronicler (2 Ch 3¹) names the Temple hill 'Mount Moriah.' From a spiritual point of view, the analogy often drawn between the offering of Isaac and the death of Christ makes the identification very suggestive. But Gn 22⁴ certainly contemplates a mountain at a much greater distance from the Philistine country, and much more conspicuous, than the Jerusalem hill. There is some similarity between the names Moriah and Moreh, the latter of which was at Shechen' (Gn 12⁶, Dt 11³⁰), close to the hills Gerizim and Ebal. And it may have been owing to this that the Samaritans claimed Gerizim as Abraham's mountain (cf. Jn 4²⁰). Geographically, it would suit the description in Gn 22⁴; but there is no real evidence for the identification. If the Syriac reading 'Amorites' be adopted, the locality of the mountain is entirely unknown, since the name is a general term employed by E to denote the Canaanite natives of Palestine. A. H. M'NEILE.

MORNING.—See TIME.

MORTAR (AV 'morter').—See HOUSE, §§ 1. 4, and cf. BITUMEN.

MORTAR AND PESTLE.—The use, from the earliest times, of the mortar and pestle for crushing the grains of the cultivated cereals, for the preparation of spices, and probably, as at the present day, for pounding meat and vegetables (see the Comm. on Pr 27²) is attested by the constant occurrence of these articles in the remains of places recently excavated in Palestine. The mortars found at Gezer, as elsewhere, 'are simply heavy stones, a foot or two across, in whose upper surface a hemispherical hollow is cut. The pestles are cylindrical with [convex] bases, which not infrequently display marks of rough treatment (PEFS, 1903, 118; illus. in Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, 85; Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, Plates 72, 73).

The manna is expressly said to have been beaten in mortars as well as ground in mills (Nu 11⁸). Their use is implied for pounding certain spices (Ex 30³⁰) and for the 'bruised corn' for the meal-offering of the first-fruits (Lv 24¹⁴ RV). Copper mortars are also mentioned in later literature, and in Herod's Temple the incense was pounded in mortars of gold. From the Mishna (Baba bathra, iv. 3) we learn that it was customary to have larger mortars fixed into the floor of the house.

In Babylon, when a house was built, the seller handed the pestle of the house-mortar to the purchaser, in token of the conveyance of the house to its new owner. Hence the frequent occurrence, in deeds of sale, of the words 'the pestle has been handed over.' Cf. art. SHOE.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MORTIFY.—'To mortify' is in AV metaphorically 'to put to death.' Early writers could use it literally also, as Erasmus, Commune Crede, 81, 'Christ was mortified, and killed in dede, as touchyng to his fleshe; but was quickened in spirite.'

MOSERAH, MOSEROTH.—Moserah is named in Dt 10⁶ as the place where Aaron died and was buried: Moseroth in Nu 33³⁰.²¹ as a 'station' on the route to Mt. Hor. Its location is quite uncertain.

MOSES.—1. Name.—The Hebrew narrator regards Mōsheh as a participle from the vb. māshāh, 'to draw' Ex (20⁹). Jos. and Philo derive it from the Copt. mo 'water,' and ushe 'saved'; this is implied in their spelling Moses, also found in LXX and NT. It is more plausible to connect the name with the Egyptian mes, mesu, 'son.' Perhaps it was originally coupled with the name of an Egypt. deity—cf. Ra-mesu, Thoth-mes, and others—which was omitted under the influence of Israelite monotheism.

2. History.—(i.) The narrative of J.—Moses killed an Egyptian, and rebuked one of two Israelites who were striving together, and then he fled to Midian. There he helped seven daughters of the priest of Midian to water their flocks, dwelt with him, married his daughter Zipporah, and had one son by her, named Gershom (Ex 2¹¹⁻²²). The king of Egypt died (2^{23a}), and at J's bidding Moses returned. On the way, J⁹ smote him because he had not been circumcised before marriage; but Zipporah saved him by circumcising the child, and thus circumcising Moses by proxy (4¹⁹, 24-26). These verses must be put back to this point. J⁹ appeared in the burning bush and spoke to Moses. Moses was to gather the elders give them J's message, and demand permission from Pharaoh to sacrifice in the wilderness. Moses was given two signs to persuade the Israelites, and yet a third if the two were insufficient (32-1a, 5, 7, 8a, 16-18 41-9). J⁹ was angry at his continued diffidence. Moses spoke to the elders and they believed; and then they made their demand to Pharaoh, which led to his increased severity (4¹⁰⁻¹², 29-31 53, 5, 22 61). Plagues were sent, the death of the fish in the river (7¹⁴, 16, 17a, 18, 21a, 24f.), frogs (8¹⁻⁴, 8-16a), flies (9¹⁻⁷, 20-22), murrain (9¹⁻⁷), hail (13¹, 17f, 22b, 24b, 25b-34), locusts (10^{1a}, 3-11, 12b, 14b, 15a, c, 16-19). See PLAGUES OF EGYPT. Pharaoh bade Israel go with their families, but refused to allow them animals for sacrifice; so Moses announced the death of the firstborn (10²⁴⁻²⁶, 28f, 11-8). At a later time Israelite thought connected with the Exodus certain existing institutions. The ordinances relating to them were preserved by J, but their present position is due to redaction, and the result is a tangled combination in chs. 12, 13 of ordinance and narrative: the ritual of the Passover (12¹⁻²², 27b), the death of the firstborn and the hurried flight of the Israelites (12²⁹⁻³⁴, 37-39), commands concerning the Feast of Unleavened Cakes (13^{3a}, 4, 6f, 10), and the offering of firstlings (13¹¹⁻¹³). J⁹ went before the people in a pillar of cloud and fire (13^{21f.}), the water was crossed (14^{1f}, 7b, 10a, 11-14, 19b, 21b, 24, 25b, 27b, 28b, 30), and Moses sang praise (15¹). Moses made the water at Marah fresh (15^{22-25a}), and thence they moved to Elim (27). Fragments of J's story of Massah are preserved (17², 2c, 7a, c), and parts of the account of the visit of Moses' father-in-law, which it is difficult to separate from E (18⁷⁻¹¹). The narratives attached to the delivery of the laws of Sinai are in an extraordinarily confused state, but with a few exceptions the parts which are due to J can be recognized with some confidence. The theophany occurred (19^{1a}), and Moses was bidden to ascend the mountain, where J⁹ gave him directions respecting precautions to be taken (19²⁰⁻²², 24, 11b-13, 28) [v. 23 is a redactional addition of a remarkable character; due to 11b-13 having been misplaced]. Moses stayed forty days and nights on the mountain (34^{23a}); J⁹ descended, and Moses 'invoked the name of J⁹' (6). The laws given to him are fragmentarily preserved (16-28). J⁹ commanded him to write them down (27), and he obeyed (28b).

The reason for the insertion of the laws so late in the book was that the compiler of JE, finding laws in both J and E, and noticing the strong similarity between them, considered the J laws to be the renewal of the covenant broken by the people's apostasy. Hence the editorial additions in 34¹ (from 'like unto the first') and in v. 4 ('like unto the first').

A solemn ceremony sealed the covenant (24^{1f}, 9-11). Something then occurred which roused the wrath of J⁹; it is doubtful if the original narrative has been preserved; but J has inserted a narrative which apparently explains the reason for the choice of Levites for Divine service (32²⁸⁻²⁹). Moses interceded for the people (the vv. to be read in the following order, 33^{1-4a}, 17, 12f, 15-23 34⁹⁻⁹ 33¹⁴⁻¹⁶). J⁹ having been propitiated, Israel left the mountain, and Moses asked Hobab to accompany them (Nu 10²⁹⁻³⁶). Being weary of manna, they were given quails, which caused a plague (11¹⁻¹⁵, 18-24a, 31-35). Dathan and Abiram rebelled (ascribed by different comm. to J and to E, 16^{1b}, 2a, 18-15, 28f, 27b-32a, 33f.). Fragments of the Meribah narrative at Kadesh appear to belong to J (20^{2a}, 5, 25b). Moses sent spies through the S. of Palestine as far as Hebron. Caleb alone encouraged the people, and he alone was allowed to enter Canaan (13^{17b}, 18b, 19, 22, 27a, 28, 30, 31 14^{1b}, 8, 9, 11-24, 31). Moses promised that Hebron should be Caleb's possession (Jos 14⁹⁻¹⁴). The Canaanites were defeated at Hormah (perh. a later stratum of J, Nu 21¹⁻³). Israel marched by Edom to Moab, and conquered Heshbon and other cities (21¹⁶⁻²⁰, 24b, 25, 31, 32). The story of Balaam (parts of 22-24). Israel sinned with the Moabite women, and Moses hanged the chiefs (25^{1b}, 2, 25b, 4). Moses viewed the land from the top of Pisgah, and was buried in Moab (parts of Dt 34¹⁻⁴).

(ii.) The narrative of E.—The midwives rescued Israelite infants (Ex 1^{15-20a}, 21). Moses' birth; his discovery and adoption by Pharaoh's daughter (2¹⁻¹⁰). Moses was feeding Jethro's sheep in Midian, when God called to him from a bush at Horeb, and told him to deliver Israel. He revealed His name 'Ehyeh,' and promised that Israel should triumphantly leave Egypt (3^{1-4b}, 9, 12f, 13f, 21f.). Moses returned to Egypt, meeting Aaron on the way; they made their demand to Pharaoh, and were refused (4^{17f}, 20b, 27f, 51f, 4). Moses, by means of his Divinely given staff, brought plagues—the turning of the river to blood (7¹⁵, 17b, 20b, 23), the hail (9²², 23a, 24a, 25a, 35), the locusts (10¹², 13a, 14a, 15b, 20), the darkness (21-23, 27). Moses was bidden to advise the Israelites to obtain gold, etc., from the Egyptians (11¹⁻³), which they did (12^{27f}). They departed, taking with them Joseph's mummy (13⁷⁻¹⁹). They crossed the water (fragments are preserved from E's account, 13^{7a}, c, 10b, 15a, 16a, 19a, 25a), and Miriam sang praise (15²⁰, 21). On emerging into the desert, they were given manna; it is possible that E originally connected this event with the name massah, 'proving' (15^{25b}, 16⁴, 18). Then follows E's Meribah narrative, combined with J's Massah narrative (17^{1b}, 2a, 4-6, 7b). Israel fought with Amalek under Joshua's leadership, while Aaron and Hur held up Moses' hands with the sacred staff (17⁹⁻¹⁹). Jethro visited the Israelites with Moses' wife and two sons; he arranged sacrifices, and a sacrificial feast, in which the elders of Israel took part (18^{1a}, 15f, 12). Seeing Moses overburdened with the duty of giving decisions, he advised him to delegate smaller matters to inferior officers; and Moses followed his advice. Jethro departed to his own home (18²⁷). Preparations were made for the theophany (19^{2b}, 2a, 9a, 10, 11a, 16f.), which then took place (19^{1f}, 19 20¹⁸⁻²¹). Laws preserved by E and later members of his school of thought are grouped together in chs. 20-23 (see EXODUS, LAW). In the narratives in which the laws are set, two strata, E and E2, are perceptible, the latter supplying the narrative portions connected with the Ten Words of 20¹⁻¹⁷. E relates the ceremony which sealed the covenant (24¹⁻³); the usual practice of Moses with regard to the 'Tent of Trust,' where God used to meet with any one who wished to inquire of Him (33⁷⁻¹¹); and the people's act of repentance for some sin which E has not preserved (33⁴). E2 relates as follows: Moses told the people the Ten Words, and they promised obedience (19^{7f}); this must follow 20¹⁻¹⁷. Moses ascended the mountain to receive the written Words, leaving the people in the charge of Aaron and Hur (24^{15-15a} 31^{18b}). During his absence Aaron made the golden bull, and Moses, when he saw it, brake the tablets of stone and destroyed the image; Aaron offered a feeble excuse, and J^r smote the people (32¹⁻⁶. 15a. 16-24. 35). Moses' intercession has not been preserved in E, but it is supplied by a late hand in 32³⁰⁻³⁴. We here resume the narrative of E. After the departure from Horeb a fire from J^r punished the people for murmuring (Nu 11¹⁻⁹). At the 'Tent of Tryst' J^r took of Moses' spirit and put it upon 70 elders who prophesied, including Eldad and Medad, who did not leave the camp; Joshua objected to the two being thus favoured, but was rebuked by Moses (16¹. 24-30). Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses for having married a foreign woman and then for claiming to have received Divine revelations; Miriam became leprous, but was healed at Moses' intercession (12). On Dathan and Abiram (16) see above, under J. Miriam died at Kadesh (20¹). Twelve spies were sent, who brought back a large cluster of grapes, but said that the natives were numerous and powerful (13^{18a}. c. 20. 25¹. 26b. 27b. 29. 33). The people determined to return to Egypt under another captain (14^{1b}. 3¹). [Here occurs a lacuna, which is partially supplied by Dt 1¹⁹⁻⁴⁶, probably based on E.] Against Moses' wish the people advanced towards Canaan, but were routed by the Amalekites and other natives (14³⁰⁻⁴⁶). Edom refused passage through their territory (20¹⁴⁻²¹). Aaron died at Moserah, and was succeeded by Eleazar (Dt 10⁶). Serpents plagued the people for their murmuring, and Moses made the serpent of bronze (Nu 21^{4b-9}). Israel marched by Edom to Moab, and vanquished Sihon (21^{15b-18}. 21-24a. 27-30); the story of Balaam (part 22-24). Israel worshipped Baal-peor, and Moses bade the judges hang the offenders (25^{1a}. 2a. 5). J^r warned Moses that he was about to die, and Moses appointed Joshua to succeed him (Dt 31¹⁴. 23). Moses died in Moab, and his tomb was unknown. He was the greatest prophet in Israel (Dt 34⁵. 4b. 10).

(iii.) The narrative of D is based upon the earlier sources, which it treats in a hortatory manner, dwelling upon the religious meaning of history, and its bearing upon life and morals, and Israel's attitude to God. There are a few additional details, such as are suitable to a retrospect (e.g. 1⁵⁻⁶. 16¹. 20¹. 29-31. 32¹. 23-28), and there are certain points on which the tradition differs more or less widely from those of JE; see Driver, Deut. p. xxxv f. But D supplies nothing of importance to our knowledge of Moses' life and character.

(iv.) The narrative of P.—Israel was made to serve the Egyptians 'with rigour' (Ex 1⁷. 12. 14b). When the king died, J^r heard their sighing, and remembered His covenant (23-25). He revealed to Moses His name Jahweh, and bade him tell the Israelites that they were to be delivered (6²⁻⁹). Moses being diffident, Aaron his brother was given to be his 'prophet' (6¹⁰⁻¹². 7¹⁻⁷). [The genealogy of Moses and Aaron is given in a later stratum of P, 6¹⁴⁻²⁵.] Aaron turned his staff into a 'reptile' before Pharaoh (7⁸⁻¹⁹). By Aaron's instrumentality with Moses plagues were sent—all the water in Egypt turned into blood (7¹⁹. 20a. 21b. 22); frogs (8⁵⁻⁷. 15b); gnats or mosquitoes (9¹⁻¹⁹); boils (9⁸⁻¹²). [As in J, commands respecting religious institutions are inserted in connexion with the Exodus: Passover (12¹⁻¹³. 24. 28. 43-50), Unleavened cakes (14-20), Dedication of firstborn (13¹⁴).] The Israelites went to Etham (13²⁰) and thence to the Red Sea. The marvel of the crossing is heightened, the waters standing up in a double wall (14¹⁻⁴. 8¹. 15b. 16b-18. 21a. c. 22¹. 26. 27a. 28a). In the wilderness of Sin the people murmured, and manna was sent; embedded in the narrative are fragments of P's story of the quails (16, exc. vv. 4. 15). They moved to Rephidim (17^{1a}), and thence to Sinai (19¹. 2a). After seven days J^r called Moses into the cloud (24^{16b-18a}) and gave him instructions with regard to the Tabernacle and its worship (25-31¹⁷), and also gave him the Tablets of the Testimony (31^{18a}). [Other laws ascribed to Divine communication with Moses are collected in Lev. and parts of Num.] When Moses descended, his face shone, so that he veiled it when he was not alone in J^r's presence (34²⁹⁻³⁵). A census was taken of the fighting men preparatory to the march, and the writer takes occasion to enlarge upon the organization of the priestly and Levitical families (Nu 1-4). The cloud which descended upon the Tabernacle was the signal for marching and camping (9¹⁵⁻²²), and the journey began (10¹¹⁻²⁸). With the story of Dathan and Abiram (see above) there are entwined two versions of a priestly story of rebellion—(1) Korah and 250 princes, all of them laymen, spoke against Moses and Aaron for claiming, in their capacity of Levites, a sanctity superior to that of the rest of the congregation. (2) Korah and the princes were Levites, and they attacked Aaron for exalting priests above Levites (parts of 16). The former version has its sequel in 17; Moses and Aaron were vindicated by the budding of the staff for the tribe of Levi. In the wilderness of Zin Moses struck the rock, with an angry exclamation to the murmuring people, and water flowed; Moses and Aaron were rebuked for lack of faith [the fragments of the story do not make it clear wherein this consisted], and they were forbidden to enter Canaan (parts of 20^{1a}. 2-13). Joshua, Caleb, and ten other spies were sent from the wilderness of Paran; the two former alone brought a good account of the land, and they alone were permitted to enter Canaan; the other ten died by a plague (parts of 13. 14; see above under J and E). Aaron died at Mt. Hor (20^{28b-29}). Israel marched by Edom to Moab (20²². 21^{1a}. 10. 11a). Phinehas was promised 'an everlasting priesthood' for his zeal in punishing an Israelite who had brought a Midianite woman into the camp (25⁶⁻¹⁴). All the last generation having died except Joshua and Caleb, a second census was taken by Moses and Eleazar (26). Moses appointed Joshua to succeed him (27). The Midianites were defeated and Balaam was slain (31). Moses died on Mt. Nebo, aged 120 (Dt 34^{1a}. 7-9).

3. Historicity.—In the OT, there are presented to us the varying fortunes of a Semitic people who found their way into Palestine, and were strong enough to settle in the country in defiance of the native population. Although the invaders were greatly in the minority as regards numbers, they were knit together by an esprit de corps which made them formidable. And this was the outcome of a strong religious belief which was common to all the branches of the tribe—the belief that every member of the tribe was under the protection of the same God, Jahweh. And when it is asked from what source they gained this united belief, the analogy of other religions suggests that it probably resulted from the influence of some strong personality. The existence and character of the Hebrew race require such a person as Moses to account for them. But while the denial that Moses was a real person is scarcely within the bounds of sober criticism, it does not follow that all the details related of him are literally true to history. What Prof. Driver says of the patriarchs in Genesis is equally true of Moses in Ex., Nu.: 'The basis of the narratives in Genesis is in fact popular oral tradition; and that being so, we may expect them to display the characteristics which popular oral tradition does in other cases. They may well include a substantial historical nucleus; but details may be due to the involuntary action of popular invention or imagination, operating during a long period of time; characteristic anecdotes, reflecting the feelings, and explaining the relations, of a later age may thus have become attached to the patriarchs; phraseology and expression will nearly always be ascribed rightly to the narrators who cast these traditions into their present literary shape' (art. 'Jacob' in DB ii. 534^b).

Moses is portrayed under three chief aspects—as (i.) a Leader. (ii.) the Promoter of the religion of J^r, (iii.) Lawgiver, and 'Prophet' or moral teacher.

(i.) Moses as Leader.—Some writers think that there is evidence which shows that the Israelites who went to Egypt at the time of the famine did not comprise the whole nation. Whether this be so or not, however, there is no sufficient reason for doubting the Hebrew tradition of an emigration to Egypt. Again, if Israelites obtained permission—as foreign tribes are known to have done—to occupy pasture land within the Egyptian frontier, there could be nothing surprising if some of them were pressed into compulsory building labour; for it was a common practice to employ foreigners and prisoners in this manner. But in order to rouse them, and knit them together, and persuade them to escape, a leader was necessary. If, therefore, it is an historical fact that they were in Egypt, and partially enslaved, it is more likely than not that the account of their deliverance by Moses also has an historical basis. It is impossible, in a short article, to discuss the evidence in detail. It is in the last degree unsafe to dogmatize on the extent to which the narratives of Moses' life are historically accurate. In each particular the decision resolves itself into a balance of probabilities. But that Moses was not an individual, but stands for a tribe or group of tribes, and that the narratives which centre round him are entirely legendary, are to the present writer pure assumptions, unscientific and uncritical. The minuteness of personal details, the picturesqueness of the scenes described, the true touches of character, and the necessity of accounting for the emergence of Israel from a state of scattered nomads into that of an organized tribal community, are all on the side of those who maintain that in its broad outlines the account of Moses' leadership is based upon fact.

(ii.) Moses as the Promoter of the religion of Jahweh.—Throughout the OT, with the exception of Ex 40–48, the forms and ceremonies of J^w worship observed in every age are attributed to the teaching of Moses. It is to be noticed that the earliest writer (J) uses the name 'Jahweh' from his very first sentence (Gn 2^{4b}) and onwards, and assumes that J^w was known and worshipped by the ancestors of the race; and in Ex. he frequently employs the expression 'J^w the God of the Hebrews' (3¹⁸ 5³ 7¹⁶ 9¹. 13 10³). But, in agreement with E and P, he ascribes to Moses a new departure in J^w worship inaugurated at Sinai. E and P relate that the Name was a new revelation to Moses when he was exiled in Midian, and that he taught it to the Israelites in Egypt. And yet in 3⁶ E represents J^w as saying to Moses, 'I am the God of thy father' [the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob (unless this clause is a later insertion, as in 1st. 4th)]. And in 6³ P states categorically that God appeared unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but He was not known to them by His name 'Jahweh.' All the sources, therefore, imply that Moses did not teach a totally new religion; but he put before the Israelites a new aspect of their religion; he defined more clearly the relation in which they were to stand to God: they were to think of Him in a peculiar sense as their God. When we go further and inquire whence Moses derived the name 'Jahweh,' we are landed in the region of conjectures. Two points, however, are clear: (1) that the God whose name was 'Jahweh' had, before Moses' time, been conceived of as dwelling on the sacred mountain Horeb or Sinai (3¹–5. 12 19⁴); (2) that He was worshipped by a branch of the Midianites named Kenites (Jg 1¹⁶ 4th), of whom Jethro was a priest (Ex 3¹ 18¹). From these facts two conjectures have been made. Some have supposed that Moses learned the name 'Jahweh' from the Midianites; that He was therefore a foreign God as far as the Israelites were concerned; and that, after hearing His name for the first time from Moses in Egypt, they journeyed to the sacred mountain and were there admitted by Jethro into the Kenite worship by a sacrificial feast at which Jethro officiated. But it is hardly likely that the Israelites, enslaved in Egypt, could have been so rapidly roused and convinced by Moses' proclamation of an entirely new and foreign deity. The action taken by Jethro in organizing the sacrifice might easily arise from the fact that he was in his own territory, and naturally acted as host towards the strangers. The other conjecture, which can claim a certain plausibility, is that J^w was a God recognized by Moses' own tribe of Levi. From Ex 42^a–27 it is possible to suppose that Aaron was not in Egypt, but in the vicinity of Horeb, which he already knew as the 'mountain of God.' If Moses' family, or the tribe of Levi, and perhaps (as some conjecture) the Rachel tribes, together with the Midianite branch of Semites, were already worshippers of J^w, Moses' work would consist in proclaiming as the God of the whole body of Israelites Him whose help and guidance a small portion of them had already experienced. If either of these conjectures is valid, it only puts back a stage the question as to the ultimate origin of the name 'Jahweh.' But whatever the origin may have been, it is difficult to deny to Moses the glory of having united the whole body of Israelites in the single cult which excluded all other deities.

(iii.) Moses as Prophet and Lawgiver.—If Moses taught the Israelites to worship J^w, it may safely be assumed that he laid down some rules as to the method and ritual of His worship. But there is abundant justification for the belief that he also gave them injunctions which were not merely ritual. It is quite arbitrary to assume that the prophets of the 8th cent. and onwards, who preached an ethical standard of religion, preached something entirely new, though it is probable enough that their own ethical feeling was purer and deeper than any to which the nation had hitherto attained. The prophets always held up a lofty ideal as something which the nation had failed to reach, and proclaimed that for this failure the sinful people were answerable to a holy God. And since human nature is alike in all ages, there must have been at least isolated individuals, more high-souled than the masses around them, who strove to live up to the light they possessed. And as the national history of Israel postulates a leader, and their religion postulates a great personality who drew them, as a body, into the acceptance of it, so the ethical morality which appears in the laws of Exodus, and in a deeper and intenser form in the prophets, postulates a teacher who instilled into the nucleus of the nation the germs of social justice, purity, and honour. Moses would have been below the standard of an ordinary sheik if he had not given decisions on social matters, and Ex 18 pictures him as so doing, and 33^{7–11} shows that it was usual for the people to go to him for oracular answers from God. It is in itself probable that the man who founded the nation and taught them their religion, would plant in them the seeds of social morality. But the question whether any of the codified laws, as we have them, were directly due to Moses is quite another matter. In the life of a nomad tribe the controlling factor is not a corpus of specific prescriptions, but the power of custom. An immoral act is condemned because 'it is not wont so to be done' (Gn 34⁷, 2 S 13¹⁹). The stereotyping of custom in written codes is the product of a comparatively late stage in national life. And a study of the history and development of the Hebrew laws leads unavoidably to the conclusion that while some few elements in them are very ancient, it is impossible to say of any particular detail that it is certainly derived from Moses himself; and it is further clear that many are certainly later than his time.

4. Moses in the NT.—(i.) All Jews and Christians in Apostolic times (including our Lord Himself) held that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch. Besides such expressions as 'The law of Moses' (Lk 2²), 'Moses enjoined' (Mt 8⁹), 'Moses commanded' (Mt 19⁷), 'Moses wrote' (Mk 12²⁹), 'Moses said' (Mk 7¹⁹), and so on, his name could be used alone as synonymous with that which he wrote (Lk 16²⁹. 24²⁷).

(ii.) But because Moses was the representative of the Old Dispensation, Jesus and the NT writers thought of him as something more. He was an historical personage of such unique prominence in Israel's history, that his whole career appeared to them to afford parallels to spiritual factors in the New Covenant. The following form an interesting study, as illustrating points which cover a wide range of Christian truth: 'The glory' on Moses' face (2 Co 37-18), the brazen serpent (Jn 3¹⁴), the Passover (Jn 19³⁶, He 11²⁸, 1 Co 57¹), the covenant sacrifice at Horeb (Mt 26²⁸, Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22²⁰, 1 Co 11²⁶; see also He 9¹⁸⁻²⁰, 1 P 1² with Hort's note), the terrors of the Sinai covenant (He 12¹⁸⁻²⁴), the crossing of the sea (1 Co 10²), the manna (Jn 6³⁰⁻³⁸, 41-58), the water from the rock (1 Co 10³⁻⁴), Moses as a prophet (Ac 3²²⁻²⁷, Jn 1²¹⁻²³; and see Jn 6¹⁴ 7⁴⁰ [Lk 7³⁹]), the magicians of Egypt (2 Ti 3⁸), the plagues (Rev 8⁵, 7, 8 9²⁻⁴ 15⁸ 16²⁻⁴, 10, 12, 18, 21), and 'the song of Moses the servant of God' (Rev 15³).

MOSOLLAMUS.—1. 1 Es 8⁴⁴ = Meshullam, Ezr 8¹⁶. 2. 1 Es 9¹⁴ = Meshullam, Ezr 10¹⁵.

MOST HIGH (Elyōn) occurs as an epithet of El, 'God' (Gn 14^{18f}, 20, 22, Ps 78³⁵), or Jahweh (Ps 71⁷); or it stands by itself as a title of God (Nu 24¹⁶, Dt 32⁵, Ps 21⁸ etc.). We find it first in a somewhat mysterious chapter (Gn 14) which cannot be traced to any identified source; the date is also uncertain. In this chapter Melchizedek is described as 'priest to the Most High God' (El Elyōn), and since in later times the Salem where he lived was generally identified with Jerusalem, the double function of priest and king ascribed to him caused him to be regarded by the Jews as a type of the ideal king, and by the Christians as the type of Christ. Hence the name of the God whom he worshipped (El Elyōn), which may possibly, in the first instance, have had reference merely to the lofty situation of Jerusalem, became in later generations a mysterious and exalted title of Jahweh. At the same time there is the possibility that the title Elyōn came originally from the Phœnicians: Philo of Byblus (quoted by Driver, Genesis, p. 165) mentions a deity of this name in the Phœnician theogony, and the corresponding Greek word is frequent in inscriptions of the Græco-Roman period, especially in the neighbourhood of the Bosphorus. Whatever the origin of the title Elyōn, it never occurs in strictly prose passages of the OT, though we find it in the Songs of Balaam (Nu 24¹⁶), Moses (Dt 32⁵), and David (2 S 22¹⁴). The Aramaic equivalents are fairly frequent in Daniel.

The uses of the Greek rendering in the NT are instructive. In the story of the Annunciation it is ordained that the child whom Mary is to bear shall be called Son of the Most High (Lk 1³²); and a little later on (v. 76) John the Baptist is spoken of as prophet of the Most High. The contrast is completed in the Ep. to the Hebrews, where Melchizedek is brought forward as priest of the Most High (cf. 7¹ with v. 28). It is worth noting, too, that the title is twice found in the mouth of demons (Mk 5⁷ = Lk 8²⁸, Ac 16¹⁷). The word, then, does not belong to the language of everyday life: it is reserved for poetry and elevated style, and it seems by its origin to have suggested something archaic and mysterious, whether it referred to the lofty dwelling-place or to the majestic nature and attributes of God.

NOTE.—The word chosen by Wyclif and Tindale, and accepted by all the subsequent versions as the tr. of Gr. karpophos in Mt 7³, 4, 5, Lk 6¹⁰, 42¹⁵. The root of karpophos is karpō 'to dry up,' and it signifies a bit of dried stick, straw, or wool, such as, in the illustration, might be flying about and enter the eye. In its minuteness it is contrasted by our Lord with dokos, the beam that supports (dechomai) the roof of a building.

MOTH (ʿash, Job 4¹⁹ 13²⁸ 27¹⁸, Ps 39¹², Is 50⁹ 51⁸, Hos 5¹²; Gr. asēs, Mt 6¹⁹, 20, Lk 12³³, Ja 5²).—All the references are to the clothes-moth, which is ubiquitous and extremely plentiful in Palestine. It is almost impossible to guard against its destructiveness, except by constantly using clothes, shawls, carpets, etc. Such goods, when stored for long, are found to be reduced almost to powder on being removed (cf. Job 4¹⁹ etc.). The fragile cases of these moths are referred to in Job 27¹⁸, if the MT be correct.

MOUNT.—An earthwork in connexion with siegecraft (Jer 6⁶ and oft.), also rendered 'bank' (2 S 20¹⁵ RV). In 1 Mac 12³⁶ RV has the modern form 'mound,' which Amer. RV has substituted throughout. See, further, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGE-CRAFT, § 6 (c).

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN.—Although on the whole a mountainous country, Palestine has few striking or commanding peaks to show; consequently, though we find frequent mention of mountains in the Bible, there are comparatively few names of individual summits. 'Mountain,' as well as its cognate 'mount,' is used both of isolated elevations and of extensive districts of lofty ground—such as Sinai, Horeb, Carmel on the one hand, Mount Seir or the Mountain of Gilead on the other.

Mountains served various functions to the ancient inhabitants of the land. (1) They were dwelling-places, for which the numerous caves, natural and artificial, excavated in their soft limestone sides, well fitted them: thus Esau dwelt in Mount Seir (Gn 36⁹). (2) They served the purpose of landmarks: thus Mount Hor was indicated (Nu 34⁷) as a boundary of the Promised Land. (3) They were used as platforms, for addressing large crowds of people, as in the famous ceremony at Ebal and Gerizim (Jos 8^{30f.}), in the address of Jotham to the Shechemites (Jg 9⁷), and that of Abijah to the Ephraimites (2 Ch 13⁴). (4) They were burial-places (sepulchres that were in the mount,' 2 K 23¹⁵). (5) They served as refuges (Gn 14¹⁰, Mt 24²⁰); (6) as military camps (1 S 17⁹); (7) as sources of wood and plants (2 Ch 2¹⁸, Neh 8¹⁵, Hag 1⁸); (8) as watch-towers and look-out stations (Ezk 40², Mt 4⁸); (9) as pasturage (Ps 50¹⁰, Lk 8³²); (10) as fortresses (Ps 125²). Their obvious fitness for typifying strength and endurance gives rise to metaphors and comparisons to be found in almost every book of both Testaments.

But it is in their aspect as holy places that mountains are of the deepest interest to the student of the Scriptures or of Palestine. In modern Palestine almost every hill a little loftier or more striking than its fellows is crowned by a domed shrine, now regarded as the tomb of a Moslem saint, but no doubt the representative of a sacred precinct that goes back to the earliest Semitic inhabitants of the land. Sinai, Horeb, Carmel occur to the memory at once as mountains consecrated by a theophany. The worship at 'high places' was so deeply engrained in the Hebrews that no amount of legislation could eradicate it; the severe discipline of the Exile was needed for its destruction.

MOUNT OF THE CONGREGATION.—See CONGREGATION.

MOURNING CUSTOMS.—The Oriental expression of grief has a twofold relationship. Towards God it is marked by silent and reverent submission symbolized by placing the hand on the mouth. 'The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away' (Job 1²¹); 'I was dumb . . . because thou didst it' (Ps 39⁹). But towards the relatives and neighbours the case is altogether different. It is now an event that has to be announced as quickly and publicly as possible, and a loss which love has to deplore with passionate abandonment and an accumulation of conventional ceremony. At the moment of death a loud shrill wail is raised by those present. Its meaning is understood only too well. As the piercing, tremulous shrieks are repeated, a few inquiries are made as to the locality and circumstances, and the rapidly increasing cry is accepted as an invitation and claim to proceed to the house of mourning. Immediately after death the body is washed and robed for the burial, which usually takes place within twenty-four hours. In addition to the successive outbursts of grief by members of the family, who have to be comforted and pleaded with and led away from the prostrate figure of the dead, the sustained ceremony of mourning is attended to by the neighbours. These, usually assisted by hired mourners, arrange themselves around the bier, or on opposite sides of the room, and keep up the lamentation without intermission. In this way they afford the preoccupation of a recognized routine, and give the relief of physical outlet to feelings that either are, or are considered to be, beyond control. At times one of the chief mourners leans over the body, wringing her hands or wiping away the fast falling tears, and asking why he has left them, and who will discharge the duties that belonged to him alone, pleading for love's sake to hear only once more the music of the voice now silent, or begging forgiveness on account of selfishness and imperfect service in the days that will never return. Meanwhile the band of mourners redouble their wailing, with beating of the breast and frantic clutching at their hair and clothes. As such paroxysms cannot last, the skilled mourners, usually women, endeavour to moderate and sustain the feeling of desolation by a plaintively descending chant. Among the singers there are usually one or two who are specially skilful in leading off with metrical phrases and rhymes of sympathetic appeal, which the others take up and repeat in concert. The invariable subject is the good qualities of the departed, and the extent of the loss which the family has been called upon to bear. In addition to the above allusions, new springs of tenderness are opened by referring to other members of the same family recently departed, and the loved one whose death they are lamenting is asked to bear messages of greeting to them. As the intimation of the bereavement reaches more distant parts of the town, or is carried to the neighbouring villages, companies of sympathizing friends come to show their regard for the dead. They announce their arrival by loud weeping and exclamations of grief; and as they enter the house the lamentation of the mourners in the room breaks out afresh. To the Western visitor unacquainted with the temperament and traditions of Oriental people, the whole scene is deeply distressing, and he has to check the feeling of repugnance by reminding himself that they would be equally shocked by the apparent callousness and ordered formality of our procedure on similar occasions. With cruel yet merciful swiftness the hour arrives for interment. The lamentation that was passionate before now becomes tumultuously defiant. Relatives lose all self-control, and, refusing to let the bearers discharge their sad office, have to be forcibly removed. The procession is then formed, and on the way to the cemetery is increased by those who join it to show their respect towards the family, and also to share the merit which the Lord attaches to service performed for those who can no longer reward it. Among the Jews, during the prescribed days of separation following upon a death in the family, the mourners are daily visited by the Rabbi, who reads the portions of Scripture and the prayers appointed by the synagogue. Over the door of the cemetery is inscribed in Hebrew 'The House of Eternity' or 'The House of the Living.' The explanation given in regard to the latter term is either that the life beyond the grave is the real life, or, according to others, that the grave is the place of habitation to which all the living must come.

The references to mourning in the Bible show that the custom of to-day in Palestine is the same as in ancient times with regard to the house of mourning, although special features of liturgical form now belong to the Synagogue, the Church, and the Mosque. There is the same announcement by wailing (Mic 1⁸, Mk 5³⁹). Friends come to condole (Job 2¹¹⁻¹²), and there is the same language of commendation and affectionate regret (2 S 1¹⁷⁻²⁷ 3³⁸⁻³⁹). The exclamations of to-day were then used (1 K 13³⁰, Jer 22¹⁸). Hired mourners are alluded to (Jer 9^{17, 18}, Am 5¹⁶); and such manifestations as the beating of the breast (Is 32¹²), tearing of the garments (2 S 3³¹), fasting (1 S 31¹³, 2 S 3³⁰), the putting of ashes on the head, and the wearing of sackcloth (2 S 12²⁰). The form of lamentation for the individual is applied to afflicted Israel (Jer 9¹, La 1¹⁰ 3⁴⁶, 49), to the historical extinction of Tyre (Ezk 27²⁸⁻³⁶), and to the worship of Tammuz (Ezk 8⁴). Such a rich and widely recognized symbolism of sorrow might easily be pressed into the services of religious imposture by those who wish to appear bowed down by their own devout contemplations, or as bearing upon their hearts the sins of others. Hence Christ's note of warning (Mt 6¹⁶⁻¹⁸).

The Apostle Paul commends as a Christian duty the showing of sympathy towards those in affliction (Ro 12¹⁵), but intimates that in Christ the familiar phrase of greeting to the afflicted, 'Hope is cut off!' has been made obsolete by the resurrection of the Lord Jesus (1 Th 4¹⁴). One of the features to which the New Jerusalem owes its title is the absence of mourning and tears (Rev 7¹⁷).

MOUSE ('akbār).—Probably a generic term including field-mice, hamsters, dormice, and even jerboas. The male of the last named is called 'akbār by the Arabs. All these small rodents are exceedingly plentiful in Palestine. The hamster (Cricetus phaus) and the jerboa, of which three varieties have been found in the land, are eaten by the Arabs (cf. Is 66¹⁷). Metal mice as amulets have been found in the Palestine plain (cf. 1 S 6^{4, 5}). The mouse was forbidden food to the Israelites (Lv 11²⁹).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MOUTH.—Several Heb. words are so tr. 1. gārōn (Ps 149⁶) lit. 'throat.' 2. chēk (Job 12¹ etc.) is the inward part of the mouth, the palate, or 'roof of the mouth' (Job 29¹⁰ etc.). 3. 'ād, twice in AV (Ps 32⁹ RV 'trappings,' 103⁵ RVm 'years' or 'prime'), signifies properly 'ornament.' 4. peh, the most usual word for 'mouth,' meaning also 'edge,' e.g. of the sword (Gn 34²⁶ etc.), or 'border,' e.g. of a 'garment' (Ps 133²). 5. pām, Aram.—Heb. peh (Dn 7⁵ etc.). 6. pānīm (Pr 15⁴) lit. 'face,' 7. ferā, Aram. lit. 'door' (Dn 3³⁰). In the NT the Gr. word stoma. Frequently in Scripture 'mouth' is used fig. for 'speech,' of which it is the organ.

W. EWING.

MOZA.—1. Son of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴⁶). 2. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8^{36, 37} 9^{42, 43}).

MOZAH.—A town of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁸). A possible site is the ruin Beit Mizzeḥ, close to Kulonieh, west of Jerusalem.

MUFFLERS.—The word so rendered occurs only in Is 3¹⁹, as an article of female attire. The cognate verb, in the sense of 'veiled,' is applied in the Mishna (Shabbath, vi. 6) to Jewesses from Arabia. A close veil of some sort, therefore, is evidently intended by Isaiah.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MULBERRY TREES (bēkādīm, 2 S 5^{23, 24}, 1 Ch 14^{14, 15}, Ps 84⁸ mg.).—These trees have on philological grounds been supposed to be a variety of balsam, and on grounds of appropriateness to the story (2 S 5^{23, 24}) to be poplars, whose leaves readily quiver with the slightest breath of air. Their identity is, however, quite uncertain. Mulberries they cannot be; for though plentiful to-day in Palestine, and still more so in the Lebanon, these trees were introduced to the land later than OT times. See, however, SYCAMINE.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MULE.—

(1) pered (m.) and pirddh (f.)—in all passages except three.

(2) rekeesh, RV 'swift steeds' (Est 8¹⁰⁻¹⁴). The tr. 'swift' is purely conjectural.

(3) yēmim, Gn 36²⁴, where 'mules' is certainly a mis-translation; RV 'hot springs.'

The breeding of mules was forbidden to the Israelites (Lv 19¹⁹), but from David's time (2 S 13³⁰ 18⁹) onwards (1 K 1³ 10²⁵ 18⁹) they appear to have been increasingly used. The returning Israelites brought 245 mules with them (Ezr 2⁶⁶). Mules are preferred in Palestine to-day as pack animals (cf. 1 Ch 12⁴⁰, 2 K 5¹⁷), they are hardier, subsist on less food, and travel better on rough roads. A well-trained mule is a favourite riding animal with the highest officials in the land.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MUNITION occurs in a few passages of AV in the sense of a fortified place, e.g. Is 29⁷, where RV has 'stronghold.' The word is retained in Nah 2¹, where, however, Amer. RV has the more intelligible 'fortress.' In 1 Mac 14¹⁰ 'all manner of munition' is literally 'with implements of defence' (cf. RVm), as the same original is rendered in 10¹¹.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MUPPIM.—A son of Benjamin (Gn 46²¹); called in 1 Ch 7¹². 15 26¹⁶ Shupim, in Nu 26³⁰ Shephupham, and in 1 Ch 8⁵ Shephuphan.

MURDER.—See CRIMES, § 7; REFUGE [CITIES OF].

MURRAIN.—See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

MUSHI.—A son of Merari (Ex 6¹⁹, Nu 3³⁰, 1 Ch 6¹⁹. 47 23²¹. 23 24²⁶. 30). The patronymic Mushites occurs in Nu 3³⁰ 26³⁸. See MERARI, 1.

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—1. Probable character of early Hebrew music.—Since the Dispersion, the music of the Jews has always borne the impress of the peoples among whom they have settled. Synagogue ritual thus affords us no clue to the music of early times, and we must accordingly fall back on Scripture and tradition. From these we gather that Hebrew music was of a loud and piercing nature, far removed from the sweetness which modern taste demands. There is no real evidence that the players ever advanced beyond unison in their combinations of notes, apparently reproducing the air on successively rising or falling octaves of the scale. We may suppose, however, that they would hardly fail to discover that certain combinations were pleasing to the ear, and would thus learn to strike them either simultaneously or successively (arpeggio). How far, however, they grasped the nature of a chord or of harmony must remain obscure, in spite of the attempts to solve this question, some of them altogether baseless guesses. For example, even the Hebrew accents, though of comparatively late origin, and always confined in Jewish use to acting as guides in the proper recitation of the text, have been pressed into the service, as though employed for the purpose of a kind of 'figured bass,' and thus indicating an acquaintance with musical harmony. Unfortunately, even those who have maintained this theory differ considerably as to the details of its application.

2. Rendering of Hebrew music.—It seems clear at any rate that an antiphonal setting was in use for many of the Psalms (e.g. 13. 20. 38. 68. 89); but the chanting must not be taken as resembling what we now understand by that term. The account we have in 1 Ch 15¹⁶ of the elaborate arrangements for conducting the musical services of the Temple, appears to indicate a somewhat complicated system, and to suggest that there entered a considerable element of flexibility into the composition. It is, for instance, quite possible that the long reciting note which with us may do duty on occasion for as many as twenty, thirty, or even more syllables, played no such monotonous part, but was broken up and varied to an extent suggested by the length of the verse as well as by the character of the sentiment to be conveyed.

3. Occasions on which music was used.—Hebrew religious melody had a popular origin, and was thus closely connected with the religious life of the nation.

Apart from such references to song as those in Gn 31²⁷ and Job 21¹², we find in the headings of certain Psalms (e.g. 22, 'Ayyeleth hash-Shahar, 'the hind of the morning') traces of what are in all probability in some, if not in all, cases secular songs. So Al Tasheth, 'Destroy not,' prefixed to Pss 57. 58. 59. 75, may well be the first words of a vintage song (cf. Is 65⁸). A parallel may be found in directions prefixed to Gabirol's hymns and those of other celebrated Jewish poets, when these compositions were adapted to music in the Spanish (Sephardic) ritual (see D. J. Sola, Ancient Melodies, etc., London, 1857, Pref. p. 13). Amos (6⁴) speaks of music performed at feasts, and in 1 S 18⁶ we read of its use in Saul's time in connexion with processions. As in this last case, so in general it may be supposed that music and dancing were closely connected and had a parallel development. David's careful elaboration of the Levitical music, vocal and instrumental, was employed, according to 2 Ch 5¹², with impressive effect at the dedication of Solomon's Temple. The reformation under both Hezekiah and Josiah included the restoring of the musical ritual belonging to David's time (2 Ch 29²⁶. 35¹⁵). Later, the descendants of Heman and others' Levitical leaders of music were among the exiles of the Return from Babylon, and under them the services were reconstituted as of old (Neh 12²⁷. 46¹).

4. Hebrew musical instruments.—Here our information is somewhat fuller, though involving a good deal of uncertainty in details. We may for clearness' sake divide under three heads, viz. stringed, wind, and percussion instruments.

(1) Stringed instruments.—Chief among these are the kinnōr and the nēbel (RV 'harp' and 'psaltery'), which were evidently favourites among the Jews. It is plain, in spite of doubts which have been expressed upon the point, that the two names were not used indifferently for the same instrument. The LXX in nearly all cases is careful to distinguish them (kithara or kinura, and psalterion, nabla, or nabla respectively). Both, however, were used in the main, and perhaps exclusively, to accompany songs, and those of a joyous nature. (They were unsuitable for times of mourning; see Ps 137², a passage which further shows that the instrument must have been, unlike a modern harp, easily portable.) They were doubtless the chief, if not the sole, instruments employed in the Temple services. In Solomon's time they were made from almug (algum) trees, doubtfully identified with sandal wood. The strings, originally of twisted grass or fibres of plants, were afterwards formed of gut, and subsequently from silk or metal.

(a) The kinnōr (an onomatopoeic word, derived from the sound of the strings) is the only stringed instrument mentioned in the Hexateuch, where (Gn 4²¹) its invention is attributed to Jubal, son of Lamech. The nēbel is first mentioned in 1 S 10⁶, as used by the prophets who went to meet Saul. The kinnōr (kithara or lyre [in 1 Mac 4⁴ the AV renders 'cithern,' RV 'harp']) consisted of a sound-box at the base, with wooden side-arms and a crossbar connected by the strings with the box below. It was originally an Asiatic instrument, and the earliest known representation is pre-historic, in the form of a rude model found at Telloh in southern Babylonia. There is also a very ancient one shown on a tomb in Egypt, dating from about the 30th cent. B.C. (12th dynasty). A tomb at Thebes in the same country (dating between the 12th and 18th dynasties) exhibits a similar form, which was sometimes modified later in the direction of more artistic construction and sloping of the crossbar downwards, so as to vary the pitch of the strings. Jewish coins of Maccabæan date furnish us with a close resemblance to the Greek kithara. Josephus (Ant. vii. xii. 3) distinguishes the kinnōr as a ten-stringed instrument struck by a plectrum; the nabla, on the other hand, being, he says, played with the fingers. This need not necessarily conflict, as has been thought by some, with the statement (1 S 16²³) that David played the kinnôr 'with his hand'; and Josephus's evidence in such a matter should carry much weight.

(b) The nebel. It has been sought to identify this with various instruments; among them, the lute (so RV in Is 5¹² [AV viol]; 'lute' is also RV tr. of Gr. kingra in 1 Mac 4²⁴), guitar, and dulcimer. In support of the last it is urged that the Arabic name for that instrument, santir, is a corruption of the Greek psalterion, by which, as has been said, the LXX sometimes render nebel. Having regard, however, to the testimony of Josephus (see above) that the nebel had twelve strings, and was played by the hand without a plectrum, we are safe in taking it to be a kind of harp, an instrument of larger size than the kinnôr, and used (Am 6⁵, Is 5¹² 14¹¹) at the feasts of the rich. We find, on the other hand, that it was not too large to be played by one who was walking (see 1 S 10⁵, 2 S 6⁵). The above argument from santir = psalterion is weakened by the fact that the Greek word was used generically for stringed instruments played with one or both hands without a plectrum. We may note further that the nabla (see above for this as a LXX rendering of nebel), known to the Greeks as of Sidonian origin, was played according to Ovid (Ars Amat. iii. 327) with both hands.

Egyptian monuments show us portable harps, varying in form, bow-shaped, rectangular, or triangular, though all constructed on the same general principle, and having the sound-box above, not, as the kinnôr, below. Seven of these harps, of a triangular shape, and used by a Semitic people in Assyria, are to be seen on a bas-relief found at Kouyunjik. We may add that several early Church writers (Augustine on Ps 42; Jerome on Ps 149²; Isidore, Etym. iii. 22. 2) support the above identification of nebel with a harp.

(c) There is little that can be asserted with confidence as to the nature of other instruments of this class mentioned in the Bible. In Dn 3³⁴, besides the psalterion (Gr. psalterion) and kitharis (Gr. kithara) with which we have already dealt, we have the sabbekha (Ev sackbut). This is evidently the Greek sambyke, but the latter has been variously described as a large harp of many strings and rich tone, similar to the grand Egyptian harp, and as a very small one of high pitch. After all, both descriptions may be true, if referring to different periods of its existence.

Negînôth has sometimes been taken as the name of an instrument, but is much more probably a general term for stringed music. So in Ps 68² (Heb. ²), we have a contrast between the singers (shârîm) and the players on strings (negînîm).

Gûth, the heading of Ps 8. 81. 84, has also, but somewhat doubtfully, been referred to instruments named after Gath: so the early Jewish paraphrase (Targum), 'the harp which David brought from Gath.'

(2) Wind instruments.—(a) The châlû (EV pipe) seems to have been the instrument of this class in most common use. It was played in coming from and going to the high place (1 S 10⁵, 1 K 1⁴⁰). It accompanied festal processions of pilgrims (Is 30²⁹). It was used in mourning (Jer 48³, cf. Mt 9²³), and in the ritual of twelve solemn annual occasions. According to Is 5¹², the feasts of the drunkards were enlivened by it. It may have been a simple flute, i.e. a mere tube with holes, played by blowing either into one end or into a hole in the side. It is possible, on the other hand, that it may have been a reed instrument, either, as the modern oboe, with a double and vibrating tongue, or, as the clarinet, with a single tongue. Neighbouring nations were, we know, familiar with reed pipes, as they also were with double flutes, which, for anything we know to the contrary, the châlû may have been. On the other hand, the keyed flute is of decidedly later origin, and in the times with which we are dealing the fingers must have done all the work.

(b) The 'agab', rendered uniformly in the AV as 'organ,' an instrument which was not known even in rudimentary form in OT days, seems to have become an obsolete word even in LXX times, as shown by the variety of renderings which it has there received. The instrument known as 'Pan's pipes' (Gr. syrtinx, Lat. flutula) is perhaps the best conjecture that can be offered. (c) The mashrôkîtha (EV flute) may have been similar; while (d) the sumpônya (cf. the Italian zampogna or sampogna for 'bagpipes') may well have corresponded to the modern bagpipes, as developed from the double flute. (e) The shôphâr (1 Ch 15²⁸, 2 Ch 15¹⁴, Ps 98⁵, Hos 5⁸, EV cornet; the 'cornets' of 2 S 6⁵ [AV; RV castanets]) are probably best represented by RVm 'sistra'; see (3) (c) below) was a curved horn of a cow or ram, used mainly, and till later OT times exclusively, for secular purposes, such as to give signals in war (e.g. Jg 3²⁷) or to announce important events (e.g. 1 K 1³⁴, ³⁹). It is still employed by the Jews at solemn festivals. The hatsôtsêrah, on the other hand—the one instrument of which we have an undoubtedly authentic representation, viz. on the Arch of Titus at Rome in front of the table of showbread—was a long, straight, metal trumpet, used mainly for religious purposes, especially in later times (2 K 12¹³, 1 Ch 13⁸).

(3) Percussion instruments.—(a) The tôph, 'tabret' or timbrel, was a small hand-drum, represented on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. In these instruments, unlike the modern drum, the parchment was probably rigidly fixed, and thus incapable of being tightened or loosened so as to regulate the pitch. (b) Metsûlaim and tseltsêlm were cymbals. Two shapes are found in Egypt and Assyria, the one consisting of two flat plates, played by being clashed together sideways, the other of two cones with handles at the peak, one cone being brought down on top of the other. (c) Mênâ 'anm' (RV 'castanets,' marg. sistra, 2 S 6⁵) were formed of two thin metal plates with holes, through which were passed rods with loose metallic rings at their ends. (d) Shâlîshîm in 1 S 18⁶ (RVm 'triangles, or three-stringed instruments') has been thought, from the apparent connexion of the word with the third Heb. numeral, to be a triangle, but this is quite uncertain. It is more probable that it was a particular kind of sistrum.

MUSTARD (Gr. sinopî).—The seed of this plant is used proverbially for anything exceedingly small. In this sense it occurs in the Gospels (Mt 17²⁰ etc.), and in the Talmud (Buxtorf, Lex. s.v. 'Chardal'). Jesus compares the Kingdom of heaven to the mustard seed (Mt 13³¹ etc.). The plant intended is the Sinapis nigra (Arab. khardal), which grows wild in Palestine, and is a familiar sight on the shores of Genesaret. It is also found under cultivation, and in the gardens it reaches a great size, being often from 10 to 12 feet in height. An annual, growing from seed, it is naturally compared with other garden herbs, which, although it springs from the smallest seed, it quite outgrows. It bears a profusion of minute seeds, of which the birds are very fond, sitting ('lodging') on the branches as they eat. Although it is not properly 'a tree' (Lk 13⁹), it quite accords with Oriental use to describe as such a great plant like this.

MUTILATION.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 9.

MYNDUS was a city in Caria at the extremity of the peninsula on which Halicarnassus lay. It was strong enough to resist an assault of Alexander, but played no great part in history. It is mentioned separately in 1 Mac 15²³ as one of the places to which, in B.C. 139 the Romans sent messages on behalf of the Jews. Hence it is assumed that it was independent of the Carian confederacy; and its native population seems to have descended from the race of the Leleges, and to have always maintained its independence against the Carians.

A. E. HILLARD.

MYRA was a city of Lycia situated 23 miles from the coast, but the same name is often applied to its harbour of Adriaca. In Greek times Patara surpassed it, but in Roman times Myra became the chief seaport of Lycia, and was recognized by Theodosius as the capital. It grew especially through the Alexandrian corn-trade with Italy. The Alexandrian ships did not coast round the Levant, but took advantage of the steady west winds to cross direct between Lycia and Egypt. These winds made it easier for a ship sailing from Egypt to make for Myra, but a ship sailing to Egypt would be sailing more before the wind by taking a line from Patara. Doubtless this was the usual custom. In Ac 27⁶ we read that the centurion in charge of St. Paul found at Myra 'a ship of Alexandria sailing to Italy'; whereas in Ac 21¹ St. Paul took ship direct from Patara to Tyre (though the Bezan text makes this ship touch at Myra). Myra retained its importance into the Middle Ages. Its bishop in the time of Constantine was St. Nicolas, and he became the patron saint of sailors in the E. Mediterranean, doubtless taking the place of a Lycian god to whom the sailors paid their vows on landing at Myra. There are splendid ruins on the site of Myra. A. E. HILLARD.

MYRRH.—1. mōr (Arab. murr), the dried gum of a species of balsam (Balsamodendron myrrha) growing in Arabia and India. It has a pleasant, though faint, smell (Ps 45⁸, Pr 7¹⁷, Ca 1³ 3⁶). It is still used in medicine (Mk 15²²). It was used in embalming (Jn 19³⁹). According to Schweinfurth, the myrrh of the OT was a liquid product of the Balsamodendron opobalsamum, known as balsam of Mecca. Ex 30²³ and Ca 5⁵ 13, where the 'myrrh' appears to have been liquid, support this view. See also OINTMENT.

2. lōl, tr. 'myrrh' in Gn 37²⁵ 43¹¹, is a fragrant resin from the Cistus or 'rock rose,' a common Palestine shrub. In Arab. this is called ladhan (Lat. ladanum, so RVm). As a product of Palestine it was a likely substance to send to Egypt.

MYRTLE (hūdas, Is 41¹⁹ 55¹³, Zec 1⁸ 10, Neh 8¹⁵; also as a name Hadasah = 'Esther' [Est 2⁷]).—Myrtus communis is an evergreen shrub much prized in Palestine. It grows wild in the mountains, especially on Carmel and in Gilead, but is also widely cultivated. It sometimes reaches a height of ten feet, but is usually much less. Its dark green leaves, pretty white flowers, and dark berries, which are eaten, are all much admired. It is still regularly used by the Jews in the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh 8¹⁵). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MYRIA was a district in the N.W. of Asia Minor, S. of the Propontis and Hellespont. It derived its name from the Mysi, a Thracian tribe who probably entered Asia with the Phrygians. At no period were its boundaries strictly defined. It formed part of the dominions of the Persians and of Alexander. From B.C. 280 it was part of the kingdom of Pergamus, and therefore fell to the Romans in A.D. 133, becoming part of the province of Asia. The only mention of it in the Bible is Ac 16⁷ 8, where St. Paul passed through it on his second missionary journey. A tradition assigned the evangelization of part of Mysia to a certain Onesiphorus, who was martyred at Parium when Adrian was proconsul of Asia, A.D. 109–114. See ASSOS, TROAS, ADAMANTIUM, all of which places were reckoned to Mysia. A. E. HILLARD.

MYSTERY.

The Greek mysterion in Christian Latin became mysterium, and thus passed into modern languages. The kindred mystic and mystagogue, imported directly from the Greek, point to the primary significance of this word. In 8 NT passages the Latin Vulgate replaced mysterium by the alien rendering sacramentum (the soldier's oath of allegiance), which has taken on, with modifications, the meaning of the original.

In common parlance, 'mystery' has become synonymous with 'secret' (a usage peculiar to the LXX in extant Greek: see Sir 22², 2 Mac 13¹ etc.), signifying a baffling, recondite secret. Divine doctrines or dealings of Providence are said to be 'mysterious' when we fail to reconcile them with accepted principles, though presuming the reconciliation abstractly possible. Primarily, however, the NT mysterion is not something dark and difficult in its nature, but something reserved and hidden of set purpose,—as in Ro 16²⁵ 'the mystery held in silence for eternal ages.' It connotes that which 'can only be known on being imparted by some one already in possession of it, not by mere reason and research which are common to all.'

In its familiar classical use the word amounted almost to a proper noun. 'The Mysteries' were a body of sacred observances connected with the worship of certain Hellenic deities (chiefly those representing the primitive Nature-powers), which were practised in retreat, and which bound their initiates into a religious confraternity. The higher of these Mysteries conveyed, under their symbolic dress, a connected esoteric doctrine—vague, it may have been, but impressive—bearing on the origin of life, on sin and atonement, and the bliss or woe of man's future state, the basis of which was found in the course of the seasons, in the conflict of light and darkness, and the yearly parables of the seed-corn and the vine-juice. The Eleusinian Mysteries, annually celebrated in Attica, attracted visitors from the whole civilized world, and appear to have exerted a salutary influence on Pagan society. The distinctions of country, rank, or sex were no bar to participation; only slaves and criminals were excluded from the rites. These were the most famous of a host of Mysteries, many of them of a passionate and even frantic, some of a disgraceful, character, which were rife in the Græco-Roman world at the Christian era; they formed, says Renan, 'the serious part of Pagan religion.' The Greek Mysteries were already rivalled in popularity by the Egyptian cults of Isis and Serapis, and subsequently by the Persian Mithraism, which spread in the 3rd cent. to the bounds of the Empire. These associations supplied what was lacking in the civic and family worships of ancient heathendom,—viz. emotion, edification, and moral fellowship.

The term 'mystery,' with its allied expressions in the NT, must be read in the light of these institutions, which preoccupied the ground and were known wherever the Greek language was current. Christianity found its closest points of contact with Paganism, and the competition most dangerous to it, in 'the Mysteries'; its phraseology and customs—in the case of the Sacraments, possibly, its doctrinal conceptions as these took shape during the first five centuries—bear the marks of their influence. This influence betrays itself first in the Apocrypha, when the writer of Wisdom speaks in 22² of 'mysteries of God' hidden from the unworthy, and, like the Apostle Paul, promises to disclose 'the mysteries' of Divine wisdom (6²²) to his readers; in 14¹⁵ 23, the Gentile 'mysteries and initiatory rites' are mentioned with abhorrence. The NT affords 27 or (including the dubious reading of 1 Co 2⁷) 28 examples of the word,—3 of these in Mt 13³⁵ and the Synoptic parallels, 4 in Rev. (12⁹ 10⁷ 17⁵ 7), the other 20 (or 21) in Paul; of the latter, 10 belong to Eph. and Col., 5 (or 6) to 1 Cor.

The NT usages are distinguished as they are wider or narrower in application: (1) in Rev 10⁷ 'the mystery of God' covers the entire process of revelation; in 1 Ti 3¹⁶ 'the mystery of godliness,' and in 1 Co 2⁷ 'the wisdom of God in a mystery,' embrace the whole incarnate manifestation hidden up to this epoch in the womb of time (Ro 16²⁵), which is summed up by Col 2² as 'the mystery of God, even Christ.' 'The mystery of lawlessness' (2 Th 2⁷), culminating in the 'parousia' of Antichrist, presents the counterpart of the Divine mystery in the realm of evil.

Or (2) 'the mystery' consists in some specific revelation, some previously veiled design of God—as in the Eph.-Col. passages, where St. Paul thus describes God's plan for saving the Gentile world. He points out (Ro 11²⁵) the shadow attending this great disclosure in 'the mystery' of the 'hardening' that has 'in part befallen Israel.' The institution of marriage viewed as prophetic of the union between Christ and the Church (Eph 5²³), and the bodily transformation of the saints at the Second Advent (1 Co 15^{51f.}), are Divine secrets now disclosed; they mark respectively the beginning and the end of revelation. These and such matters constitute 'the mysteries' of which the Apostle is steward' (1 Co 4¹), which enlightened Christians know' (1 Co 13²) and dwell upon in hours of rapture (14²). According to the Synoptics, מֵסֵת Lord speaks of His parables as containing, in a similar sense, 'the mysteries of the kingdom' (Mt 13³⁵ etc.).

(3) Rev 1²⁰ and 17⁷ afford examples of a narrower reference in the term: 'the seven stars' and 'the harlot woman' are mystical symbols, patent to those who are 'in the Spirit,' of great realities operative in the kingdoms of God and of Satan.

This analysis brings out certain essential differences between the Christian and non-Christian employment of the word in question. In the first place, the new 'mysteries' are no human performances, ritual or dramatic; they are Divine communications embodied in Christ and His redemption, which God's stewards are commissioned to impart. In the second place, they seek publicity not concealment—'mystery' and 'revelation' become correlative terms. These are not secrets reserved for and guarded in silence by the few; 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' long concealed from all, is now thrown open to all—hidden from the ages and generations,' but to-day 'preached to the nations. Most emphatic is St. Paul's insistence on the frankness of the gospel revelation; most earnest his disclaimer of any esoteric doctrine, such as the vendors of foreign 'mysteries' commonly professed. Nothing but moral insensibility or the false pride of the world's wisdom he asserts, bars any man from receiving his gospel—it is 'hid amongst the perishing, those whose thoughts the god of this world blinded' (2 Co 4^{3f.}; cf. 1 Co 2¹⁴, Lk 10²¹). The communication of the gospel mystery is limited by the receptivity of the hearer, not the reserve of the speaker; addressed to all men, it is 'worthy of all acceptance' (1 Ti 1⁶ 2⁴; cf. Ro 1¹⁴, Ac 26²³, Col 1²⁸). 'The mystery of iniquity' (2 Th 2⁷) and that of Israel's 'hardening' (Ro 11²⁵), however, still await solution; these will be disclosed before 'the mystery of God is finished' (Rev 10⁷).

Several other NT words had been associated in Greek usage, more or less definitely, with the Mysteries: illumination (2 Co 4⁶, Eph 1¹⁸, He 6⁴ etc.); seal (2 Co 1², Eph 1⁴, Rev 7³ etc.); perfect (scil. initiated: 1 Co 2⁶, Ph 3¹² etc.); 'I have learnt the secret' ('have been initiated,' Ph 4¹¹); and the original (cognate) words for 'behold' and 'eye-witnesses' in 1 P 2¹² 3⁴ and 2 P 1¹⁶. The association is unmistakable, and the allusion highly probable, in the last two, as well as in the other instances. In these Petrine passages the thought of the spectators being favoured with the sight of a holy secret was, seemingly, in the writer's mind. G. G. FINLAY.

N

NAAM.—A Calebite family (1 Ch 4¹⁵).

NAAMAH.—1. Sister of Tubal-cain (Gn 4²²). 2. Mother of Rehoboam (1 K 14²¹, 2 Ch 12¹³). 3. A town of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15³⁷⁻⁴¹). There is no notice of it elsewhere. Zophar the Naamathite is mentioned in Job (2¹ etc.), but there is nothing to connect him with this town. Possibly we may identify Naamah with Naneh, a small mud village on low ground 6 miles south of Ludd (Lydda).

NAAMAN (the word means 'pleasantness,' or, as an epithet, as is probable, of Adonis or Tammuz, 'darling'; cf. the Adonis plantations referred to in Is 17¹⁰ [Heb.]. The Arabs of the present day still call the red anemone, which blooms in the spring, at the time at which one of the Adonis festivals used to be held, the 'wounds of the darling, or Naaman'; the name of the flower probably comes from 'Naaman'; see W. R. Smith in the English Historical Review, April 1887).—1. One of the sons of Benjamin (Gn 46²¹), though in Nu 26⁴⁰ and 1 Ch 8⁴ he is referred to as Benjamin's grandson; in Nu 26⁴⁰ the 'family of the Naamites' is spoken of, they therefore probably formed a clan belonging to the tribe of Benjamin.

2. A Syrian general who came to Elisha to be healed of leprosy. The story is told in 2 K 5, where it appears in entire independence of the context. Through an Israelite slave-girl Naaman hears of the man of God who works miracles, and in the hope of being cured of his leprosy he comes to Elisha; it is, however, noteworthy that he comes at Elisha's request (v. 9) in order that he may learn that 'there is a prophet in Israel.' On his arrival Naaman receives a message to the effect that he is to wash in the river Jordan seven times; his objection that the prophet ought to work the miracle 'in the name of the Lord his God' seems very justifiable; upon the advice, however, of his servants he dips himself seven times in the Jordan, and is healed. His 1st words to the prophet, thereupon, are, 'Behold now, I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel.' On Elisha's refusing the gift offered to him, Naaman asks for two mules' burden of Israelitish soil upon which to worship the God of Israel; it is in entire accordance with the ideas of the time that a god of a country cannot be worshipped properly excepting upon his own soil (cf. 1 S 26¹⁹, 20). Quite natural, too, according to the beliefs of the time, is his wish to bow down in the house of Rimmon; for apart from the necessity of this on account of his attendance on the king, there is the fact that religious syncretism was considered not only permissible, but, under various circumstances, commendable. [For the unworthy conduct of the prophet's servant Gehazi, and the punishment inflicted on him, see GEHAZI.] W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

NAAMATHITE.—See NAAMAH, 3.

NAAMITES.—See NAAMAN, 1.

NAARAH ('girl').—1. One of the wives of Ashhur the 'father' of Tekoa (1 Ch 4¹⁴). 2. A town of Ephraim (Jos 16⁷; called in 1 Ch 7³⁸ Naaran). It is perhaps the ruin el-Aufeh, 6 miles N. of Jericho.

NAARAI.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11³⁷). In the parallel passage, 2 S 23³⁴, the name is Paarai, who is called 'the Arbite.' It is impossible to decide with any confidence between the rival readings.

NAARAN.—See NAARAH, 2.

NAATHUS (1 Es 9²¹) = Ezr 10³⁰ Adna.

NABAL.—A wealthy but churlish sheep-owner 'in Maon, whose business was in Carmel' (1 S 25¹ RVm). David, while living as an outlaw and freebooter, demanded at Nabal's sheepshearing his reward for defending his flocks (1 S 25³⁴). Nabal, inflamed with wine, returned an insolent answer, and David was prevented from wreaking terrible vengeance only by the timely arrival of Abigail, Nabal's wife, with large gifts and abundant flattery. The word Nabal means 'fool,' and Abigail, with wifely candour, says to David, 'Fool is his name and fool is he.' The next day Nabal was informed of all that had happened, and the shock of discovery brought on an apopleptic seizure, which caused his death. Abigail then became David's wife.

NABARIAS (1 Es 9⁴) = Neh 8⁴, Hashbaddanah.

NABAT(H)EANS (1 Mac 5²² 9³⁵).—See ARABIA, ARETAS, EDOM, NEBAIOTH.

NABOTH.—A man of Jezreel, owner of a vineyard adjoining the palace of Ahab (1 K 21¹). The king, desiring to add the vineyard to his lands, offered to buy it or exchange it for another. Naboth, however, refused to give up 'the inheritance of his fathers.' Jezebel, Ahab's wife, by using the royal authority with the elders of the city, had Naboth accused of treason and blasphemy, and stoned to death. As Ahab went to take possession of the vineyard, he was met by Elijah, the prophet, who pronounced doom on him and his house. The murder of Naboth seems to have deeply impressed the popular mind, and the deaths of Joram and Jezebel near the spot were regarded as Divine retribution on the act (2 K 9²⁵ 30). W. F. BOYD.

NABUCHODONOSOR, the Gr. form of the name Nebuchadrezzar (wh. see), is retained by RV in 1 Es 1⁴⁰, Ad. Est 11⁴, Bar 1¹⁷.

NACON.—See CHIDON.

NADAB.—1. The eldest son of Aaron (Ex 6²³, Nu 3² 26¹⁰, 1 Ch 6³ 24¹); accompanied Moses to Sinai (Ex 24¹ 9¹); was admitted to the priestly office (Ex 28¹); and on the very day of his consecration (Lv 10¹² compared with ch. 9) he and Abihu perished (Lv 10¹ 2, Nu 3⁴ 26¹⁰, 1 Ch 24⁷) for offering 'strange fire.' Wherein the transgression of Nadab and Abihu is supposed to have consisted is not clear. It is often suggested that 'strange' fire means fire taken from a common source instead of from the altar (cf. Lv 16¹², Nu 16⁴). 2. A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2³ 30). 3. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8³⁰ 9³⁵). 4. See next article.

NADAB was king of Israel two years or parts of years after his father Jeroboam I. He was assassinated by one of his generals, Baasha, who became king in his place (1 K 14²⁰ 15²⁵). H. P. SMITH.

NADABATH.—An unidentified town (?), east of the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of which a wedding party of the sons of Jambri was attacked, and many of them slain, by Jonathan and Simon (1 Mac 9²⁷).

NAGGAI.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3²⁵); cf. the Heb. name Nogah.

NAHALAL (in Jg 1³⁰ Nahr'o).—A town of Zebulun (Jos 19⁴), given to the Levites (21¹⁵). Its inhabitants were not expelled by the Philistines, but were made tributary (Jg 1³⁰). A possible site is 'Ain Mahil, north of Nazareth, on the hill which formed the limit of Zebulun to the east. Another is Ma'tul, a village west of Nazareth, and on the south border of Zebulun.

NAHALIEL.—A station in the journey from the Arnon to Jericho (Nu 21¹⁹), either Wady Waleh, a N.E. tributary of the Arnon, or the Wady Zerka Ma'in, farther north, which runs into the Dead Sea.

NAHALOL.—See NAHALAL.

NAHAM.—The father of Kellah (1 Ch 4¹⁹).

NAHAMANI.—One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community (Neh 7⁷); omitted in Ezr 2²; called in 1 Es 5⁸ Enneus.

NAHARAI.—The armourbearer of Joab (2 S 23³⁷, 1 Ch 11³⁹).

NAHASEH.—1. A king of Ammon, who demanded the surrender of the men of Jabesh-gilead, with the loss of the right eye of each (1 S 11⁴). So sure was he of their helplessness that he allowed them seven days' respite in which to appeal for help. Saul, newly designated as Israel's future king, was blouphing in the fields when the news was brought to him. He sacrificed the oxen sent parts of the sacrifice to his fellow-countrymen with a command to muster, and promptly destroyed the Ammonites. Probably this is the Nahash who was kind to Saul's enemy David (2 S 10², 1 Ch 19¹), and whose son Shobi (2 S 17²⁷) brought supplies to David at Mahanaim. 2. Father of David's half-sisters, Abigail and Zeruah, if the text of 2 S 17²⁵ is correct, which is doubtful. According to Buchanan Gray, 'daughter of Naha:h' may have crept into the text from 'son of Nahash' in v. 27; cf. 1 Ch 2¹⁴. J. H. STEVENSON.

NAHATH.—1. A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36¹³, 1 Ch 1³⁷). 2. A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 6²⁴, called in v. 24 Toah, and in 1 S 1¹ Tohu). 3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹³).

NAHBI.—The Naphtalite spy (Nu 13¹⁴).

NAHOR.—1. Father of Terah and grandfather of Abraham (Gn 11²² 26, 1 Ch 1²⁶, Lk 3³⁴). 2. Grandson of the preceding and brother of Abraham and Haran (Gn 11²² 2, cf. Jos 24³). He is said to have married Milcah, daughter of Haran (Gn 11²⁹), and twelve sons are enumerated, eight by Milcah and four by Re'umah his concubine (Gn 22²⁰ 24). In Gn 24¹⁰ we read of 'the city of Nahor' i.e. Haran, where Rebekah was found. Laban, in making a covenant with Jacob, swears by the 'God of Abraham and the God of Nahor' (Gn 31⁴⁴). The sons ascribed to Nahor (Buz, Uz, Aram, etc.) are for the most part names of tribes. It has been questioned if Nahor is a historical character at all. Some think we have, instead, the name of a lost tribe once resident in the neighbourhood of Haran, from which the Aramæan tribes were descended. While Abraham appears as the common ancestor of the Israelites and Edomites, Nahor is represented as the father of the Aramæans.

W. F. BOYD.

NAHSHON.—Brother-in-law of Aaron (Ex 6²³), descendant in the 5th generation from Judah (1 Ch 2¹⁰), and prince of the tribe of Judah (Nu 1⁷ 2³ 7¹², 17 10⁴); mentioned as one of the ancestors of David (Ru 4¹⁸, 1 Ch 2¹⁰), and of Christ (Mt 1⁴, Lk 3³²).

NAHUM.—I. THE MAN.—The word Nahum means 'full of comfort' and is probably a contraction of a longer Heb. term meaning 'God is a comforter.' Of the man so named nothing is certainly known. He is called 'the Elkoshite,' but the exact meaning of the term cannot at present be determined. It is made in the Targum a kind of patronymic, recording the assumed descent of the prophet from an unknown ancestor Koshi. It is more likely to preserve the name of the prophet's birthplace or place of residence, of which the identification is still lacking. Three or four conjectures have been made.

(1) The prophet's tomb is shown at Elkosh, 24 miles to the N. of Nineveh; and accordingly he is said to have lived there, a descendant of a member of the ten tribes who was deported in B.C. 721. But the tradition that buries Nahum there is not met with before the 16th cent., and is sufficiently accounted for by the interest in the city shown by the prophet.

(2) Capernaum is really a transliteration of Heb. words which mean 'village of Nahum.' But a Galilean origin for our prophet is unlikely (Jn 7⁵²), and is not supported by any allusions in the prophecy.

(3) The same objection applies to Jerome's identification of Elkosh with a village Elkozeh in N. Galilee, which on other grounds is precarious.

(4) The most probable tradition associates Nahum with Elkosh 'of the tribe of Simeon,' and locates the hamlet near Beth-Gabre, the modern Beit-Jibrin, about half-way between Jerusalem and Gaza. The tradition occurs in a Syrian version of the biographies of the prophets, ascribed to Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus towards the close of the 4th cent., but probably of much later date.

II. THE BOOK.—1. Analysis of contents.—In the analysis of the book, a line of division can be best drawn at the close of 2². The latter section is the actual prophecy or oracle. It is preceded by a psalm or poem consisting in two parts, of which the one is general in its assertion of God's universal judgment, the other particular in its specific messages to Judah and to Assyria. Jehovah as the jealous Avenger is the opening theme. This fact holds good of His administration (1³); and as He passes on to the overthrow of the wicked, physical proofs of His power become evident everywhere (14-9). Tenderness towards those who wait upon Him, but an overwhelming flood upon His enemies (17-10), are the two great characteristics of His rule. 'What think ye of Jehovah?' (1⁹, where RV does not preserve the sequence of thought) is the point of passage to the section dealing with His particular acts, in which section either the text is corrupt through the displacement of some of the verses, or the two messages, of deliverance to Judah (1¹³, 15 2²) and of vengeance upon Israel (1¹¹, 14 2¹), were meant to be entangled in repeated antitheses. Already the bearer of the good news is speeding over the hills (1¹⁵; cf. Is 52⁷, Ro 10¹⁵).

The oracle proper consists also of two sections, corresponding with the division into chapters. The second chapter is a swift and vivid description of the siege of Nineveh, its capture and sack, with the complete desolation that followed.

A second oracle is contained in the third chapter, which there is no need to regard as compacted of several prophecies, but of which the unity in theme and sequence of thought is conspicuous. The mention of the city of blood, full of lies and rapine, is followed by one of the most vivid battle-pictures in Heb. literature (3¹⁻⁷). The cause of destruction is to be found in the diplomatic harlotry, whereby nations and races had been lured and sold; and so richly merited will be the woe, that none will be left or disposed to pity or bemoan Nineveh (3⁷). The analogy of No-amon (Thebes) makes it certain that a similar fate is awaiting the Assyrian city (3⁸⁻⁹). Her outposts and defences are already falling before the invader, just as the first-ripe figs fall at the mere shaking of a fig-tree; and her people have become women (3¹¹⁻¹²). The time to prepare for the siege is past, adds the prophet, with his sarcastic appeal, 'Tread the mortar, lay hold of the brick-mould.' The swarming merchants, the 'crowned ones' (floating foreign population, according to Wellhausen; more probably the princes and prosperous men, cf. Is 10⁸), the 'marshals' or high officials, are like locusts or grasshoppers, that camp in the hedges and walls, but vanish with the sunrise. Finally, the prophet addresses the king himself, and on the eve of the destruction of the city proclaims her disappearance from history amidst the joy of all who had suffered under her tyranny: 'There is no assuaging of thy hurt . . . all that hear the bruit of thee clap the hands over thee.'

2. Authenticity of the first chapter.—That Nahum was the author of the two oracles is hardly open to question, but of late years some doubt has been thrown upon the authenticity of the prologue. Against Nahum's authorship the plea is of a technical character, that the first chapter is really, in Heb., an alphabetic poem, and that its right metrical division yields, with a few alterations and transpositions, a series of stanzas, of which the first words commence with the letters of the Heb. alphabet in order. This plea is followed by the statement that such a literary form points to a late origin; and consequently the prologue is held to have been composed or constructed in the post-exilic period, and prefixed as an appropriate introduction to the oracle of Nahum on account of its expression of the general principle of God's avenging justice, of which the drama of Nineveh was supposed to afford a striking illustration.

On the other side, the re-arrangements necessary to restore an alphabetical form are difficult, though perhaps possible as far as 1⁹, after which resort has to be had to processes that are scientifically indefensible. The order of the verses and of the words within the has to be altered, words are omitted or intro- duced with freedom, and on the whole A. B. Davidson's verdict stands—that the attempt to restore the alphabetical form 'can never be more than an academical exercise.'

Even if an alphabetical form be conceded, a necessary lateness of date cannot be successfully inferred. Instances of the use of such a form occur, e.g., in Pss 9, 10, where the tone and teaching are distinctly pre-exilic; and history would allow of the appearance of such a form, or at least of tentative efforts at its construction, at a comparatively early period in the development of a literature. The language and atmosphere of the prologue are those of the succeeding oracles. Alleged parallels with the post-exilic psalms are in reality parallels with earlier writings, which possibly supplied both Nahum and the writers of the psalms in question with their common phrases. Vividness and force, severity towards sin, fervent confidence in God, are features of all three chapters, which are further knit together by their theme, the first setting up God's throne of judgment and announcing His sentence on Nineveh, the others portraying the execution of that sentence. And the attempts to destroy the unity of the book, able as they have been and full of valuable contributions to its exegesis and to Biblical science generally, must be regarded as having so far failed.

3. Date.—The question of the authenticity of the first chapter does not seriously affect the further question of the date at which Nahum composed the two oracles by general consent ascribed to him. Two points may be fixed at once; and in the period between them the actual date must be found. Nahum prophesied after the capture of No-amon or Thebes (3⁸⁻⁹) by Ashurbanipal in B.C. 664-663, but before the fall of Nineveh in B.C. 606. The interval, within which the exact date must be sought, may be shortened with great probability. Ashurbanipal's brilliant reign terminated in B.C. 626, and before that date there cannot be said to have been any great decline in the strength of Assyria. The Medes and the Scythians were beginning to threaten the empire, but its most serious difficulties arose from dynastic rivalries and the revolt of Ashurbanipal's brother. Had that revolt been the occasion of Nahum's prophecy, he would have directed his words against the king in person and not against the city. After the death of Ashurbanipal the Medes rapidly grew in strength, and laid siege to Nineveh, but were called away by an invasion of their own country; and the city was spared for nearly twenty years. The right date for Nahum seems to be a little after the death of Ashurbanipal, when the signs of Assyrian weakness were multiplying, and the outlying parts of the empire had already recovered their independence or been appropriated by other powers. At a later date the language of a prophet in Judah would be likely to be affected by the Deuteronomic style, of which there are no traces in Nahum; an earlier date would fail to supply the historic conditions, which are always an essential feature of Jewish prophecy. About 623 or 624 Nahum would need no great discernment to see the approaching fall of Assyria, and in the equipment and quick movements of the Medes and Scythians he would find the imagery which he uses to such good effect in his oracles.

4. Literary character and religious value.—Picturesqueness and force have been described as the most prominent characteristics of Nahum's poetry. Compact thought, vivid description (2³⁻⁵ 3¹⁻⁷), effective imagery (2¹¹ 3¹⁷) separate him sufficiently from the prophets of the Chaldaean period, and give him a position not far behind that of Isaiah. Obscurity is sometimes met with (e.g. 1¹⁰ 2⁹), but the cause is probably quite as often the high specific gravity of the sentence as an error in transcription. Findlay says (Books of the Prophets, II. 191) that Nahum is neglected by the Bible-reader, as though the story of Nineveh had little connexion with the progress of the Kingdom of God, and were merely a complete and isolated fact of the past with no relation to present needs. Yet if Nahum is not a religious teacher like Micah or Isaiah, he focuses the truth of God's moral government of the world, concentrating the light upon a single typical instance; and he does not fail to defend confidence in God as the eventual Avenger of wrong and the perpetual defence of those who love Him. Where he differs chiefly from the other prophets is in the complete outwardness of his gaze. He has no eye for the short-coming or sin of Judah, and no revelation to make of the inner history or moral character of his own generation. In this respect he contrasts especially with his contemporary Zephaniah, who also looked for the collapse of the Assyrian kingdom, but saw clearly a similar fate about to overtake the sinners of Israel. For Nahum, Nineveh fills up the whole canvas. The prophecy is a stern song of war, a shout of triumph over the conquered and slain; and though thereby it stands in contrast with the kindlier temper and spirit of the NT, in which no citation from the book occurs, it accords well with the traditions of its own age. And its great lesson, from which attention is not allowed to be diverted, is that the mills of God grind 'exceeding small,' and for nations as for individuals 'sin, when it is full grown, bringeth forth death' (Ja 1st).

NAIDUS (1 Es 9th) apparently = Benaiah, Ezr 10th.

NAIL.—1. Among the ancient Arabs it was the custom for a widow to allow her nails to grow during her term of mourning. To pare them was a formal indication that this period was at an end. From Dt 21st and 2 S 19th (LXX) it may be inferred that such was also the custom among the Hebrews. The former passage, however, refers only to the case of a foreign captive whom a Hebrew might take to wife after a month's seclusion, during which the care of the person was neglected in token of mourning for the captive's condition. The latter passage in its better Gr. form (see Cent. Bible, in loc.) tells us that Mephibosheth showed his sympathy with David by, inter alia, omitting to trim his 'toe-nails and his finger-nails' during the latter's absence from Jerusalem.

2. The Heb. word most frequently rendered 'nail' is properly a tent-peg, or, as Jg 4th RV, tent-pin. This is also the better rendering in Zec 10th, where it is synonymous with 'corner-stone,' both terms signifying the princes or leading men of the State as its supports. The figure of Is 22nd, on the other hand, is derived from the custom of driving a nail into the house-wall upon which to hang (v. 2) domestic utensils or the like.

NAIN.—The town where Jesus raised the widow's son to life (Lk 7th). The name is found in the modern Nein, a small, squalid village, 6 miles S.E. of Nazareth, on the N. slope of the Hill of Moreh, the so-called 'Little Hermon.' The summit of the hill is 1690 feet high, with a white-domed sanctuary, the tomb of the saint from whom the mountain takes its modern name, Jebel ed-Duhy. The village is 744 feet above the sea. Sir W. M. Ramsay thinks 'there can be little doubt that the ancient city was on the top' of the hill (The Education of Christ, Preface, ix), but the evidence is not stated. The present village is insignificant. Ruins stretch to the north, showing that the place was once of some importance; but they are comparatively modern. The rock-cut tombs to the East, however, bespeak a much higher antiquity. The small sanctuary, Maqām Sīdān 'Isa, 'Place of our Lord Jesus,' on the north, doubtless commemorates the visit of the Saviour. There is no trace of city walls. Tristram was misled by the shape of the ruins (Land of Israel, 125). 'The Gate' was probably the usual entrance from that direction. The site commands an interesting view. Across a narrow bay of Esdraelon rises Mt. Tabor, over the eastern shoulder of which the white summit of Hermon is visible; while to the N.W. and W. the eye ranges over the hills of Lower Galilee, and the rolling breadths of the great plain, to Mt. Carmel by the sea.

NAIOTH.—A place 'in Ramah,' where was a 'company of the prophets.' Here David fled to Samuel after Saul had attacked him with a javelin; hither Saul pursued him, and was seized with an ecstatic fit of some kind (1 S 19^{th-21}). Nothing is known of the situation of the place. It is not even absolutely certain that Naioth is a proper name; but opinions differ respecting its possible meaning. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

NAME, NAMES.—1. The names of God.—See GOD, p. 299 f.

2. Personal names.—From the earliest times the name given to a child was supposed to indicate some characteristic of the person; of the circumstances, trivial or momentous, connected with his or her birth; of the hopes, beliefs, or feelings of the parents. This is evident from the etymologies (Gn 21st, 27th, Ex 2nd, 1 S 4th 25th etc.), not always reliable, but testifying to the impression that name and facts should correspond. There are many indications of the persistence of this idea. For instance, there is the frequency of names denoting personal qualities, Adin, Amasai, Jaddua, Korah, Solomon, etc.; or pointing to occupations, Asa, Sophereth, etc. Again an Isaiah (7th 8th) or a Hosea (2nd 1st) is quite ready to bestow symbolical names on his children; a Jeremiah (20th) predicts the change from Pashhur to Magor-missabib, because the latter will more accurately correspond to the surroundings; and the same prophet sums up all his hopes for the future in the title which he bestows on the Messianic King and the holy city (23rd 33rd; cf. Rev 19th). The new name promised to the faithful (Rev 21st) corresponds to the fresh glory bestowed on him, which differs in each recipient and is known only to himself (Rev 14th).

Analogous convictions prevailed among other Eastern nations. Nomen est omen was an influential conception. When a man was wanted to milk a camel, Mohammed disqualified one applicant after another till a man came whose name meant 'Long Life'; if one of his converts was called 'Rough,' he called him 'Smooth'; he was even guided in his strategy by the names of the places en route (Margoliouth, Mohammed, p. 61 f.).

Generally the name was fixed immediately after birth, as it still is with the Arabs. The mother usually exercised this privilege (Gn 4th 19th, 29th, 30th, 1st 35th, 1 S 1st 42nd, Is 7th), sometimes the father (Gn 4th 16th 17th 21st, Ex 2nd, 2 S 12th, Hos 1st), occasionally other interested persons (Ru 4th, Lk 1st 57-63). Some names were bestowed indifferently on men and women: Abiah, (1 K 14th, 1 Ch 2nd); Abihail (Nu 3rd, 1 Ch 2nd); Zibiah (2 K 12th, 1 Ch 8th).

Beginning at a fairly early date, there are a moderate number of names derived from the vegetable world: Elah ('terebinth'), Zuph ('sedge'), Tamar ('palm-tree'), etc. The majority, however, belong to more recent documents: Asnah ('bramble'), Coz ('thorn'), Hadassah ('myrtle'), Susannah ('lily'), Shamir ('thorn'), etc. Other natural objects are also drawn upon: Geshem ('rain'), Barak ('lightning'), etc.; curiously enough, Jurah ('autumn-rain,' Ezr 2nd) is identical with Hariph ('autumn,' Neh 7th). A few, of peculiarly difficult interpretation, point to family relationships: Ahah = 'father's brother,' but the question is whether it signifies 'uncle' or whether it is an indication that the child closely resembles his father or is to be as a brother to him. Ahban = 'brother is son,' Ahiam = 'a maternal uncle,' belong to this class. But Moses, if, as is most probable, of Egyptian origin and signifying 'son,' is a shortened form of a theophorous name; cf. MOSES, ad init.

Names which have a religious import are more characteristic of the Semite races than of ours, and this is especially true of the Israelites all through their national life. A certain number of those found in the OT have heathen associations: Anath (transferred to a man from a well-known goddess worshipped in Syria, etc.), Ahi-shahar ('Shahar [i.e. 'Dawn'] is brother'), Baal (1 Ch 5⁸⁰), Bildad (Job 21), Balaam, Obed-edom ('servant of [the god] Edom'), Reu and Reuel (Gn 11¹⁸, Ex 2¹⁸). Among the earliest clan names are those of animals: Rachel ('ewe'), Hamor ('ass'), Caleb ('dog'), etc. This may well be a survival from a pre-historic age of totemism. In David's day we find individuals, possibly members of such clans, called Eglah ('calf'), Laish ('lion'), Bichri (from becher, 'a young camel'). And the curious crudeness of words of this class in and about the reign of Josiah (Huldah, 'weasel,' Shaphan, 'rock-badger,' etc.), might be accounted for on the supposition that animal-worship had considerable vogue during that age of religious syncretism (cf. Ezk 810-12). Names like Hezir ('swine'), Achbor ('mouse'), Parosh ('flea') favour this explanation. At the same time, it must be admitted that animal-names were in many instances bestowed as terms of endearment, or as expressions of a wish that the child might have swiftness, strength, gracefulness, or whatever might be the creature's peculiar quality.

There is an important class of compounds in which relationship—originally conceived as physical—with the god of the nation or clan is asserted: Ammiel ('kinsman is El'), Abijah ('father is Jah'), Ahijah ('brother is Jah'). These compounds ceased to be formed long before the Exile, owing, no doubt, to the sense that they infringed on the Divine dignity. Others now appear, containing an element which referred to the Divine sovereignty: Adonijah ('Jah is lord,' like the Phoen. Adoneshmun, 'Eshmun is lord'), Malchiah ('Jah is king'), Baaljah ('Jah is baal' [or 'lord']). Turning now to the two great groups in which El or Jahweh forms part of the name, it is to be noted that the former had the first run of popularity. From David until after the Exile, Jah, Je, or Jeho is more common. From the 7th cent. b.c. onwards El is seen to be recovering its ground. Altogether there are 135 names in El, and, according to Gray (HPN, p. 163), 157 in one of the abbreviations of Jahweh [Jastrow (ZATW xvi. p. 2) has sought to reduce the latter number to about 80]. Abbreviations of both these classes are fairly common: Abi, for Abijah; Palti, for Paltiel; Nathan, for Jonathan or Nathanael, etc. The nations which were related to the Hebrews acknowledged or invoked their gods in the same fashion: Babylonian and Assyrian proper names containing the elements, Bel, Asshur, Nebo, Merodach, etc.; Phœnician having Ashtoreth, Bel, Eshmun, Melch, etc.; Aramaic Hadad, Rimmon, etc.; Palmyrene, Sabæan, and Nabatæan exhibit the same features.

Special mention ought perhaps to be made of the curious words found in the Books of Chronicles. Ewald observes that they remind us of the nomenclature affected by the English Puritans of the 17th century. They were meant to express the religious sentiments of the Chronicler and those like-minded. Thus we have Jushab-hesed ('kindness is requited'), Tob-adonijah ('good is the Lord Jahweh'), Elioëni ('to Jahweh are mine eyes'), Hazzelepomi ('Give shade, Thou who turnest to me'; cf. the Assy. Pān-Bēl-adagāl ['I look to Bel'] and Pān-Asshur-lāmūr ['I will look to Asshur']). But the climax is reached in 1 Ch 25, where, with very slight alteration, the list which begins with Hananiah reads, 'Be gracious unto me, Jahweh! Be gracious unto me! Thou art my God! Thou hast given great and exalted help to him who sat in hardship. Thou hast given judgments in multitudes and abundance.' These phenomena differ from the Shear-jashub and Mahershalal-hash-baz of Isaiah, in that the latter were formed for the express purpose of symbolical prediction. We save, however, something resembling them in other late documents. P gives us Bezalel ('in the shadow of God'. cf. Bab. Ina-silli-Bēl, 'under the protection of Bel'), Ex 31², and Lael ('to God'; cf. Bab. Sha-Bēl-at-ta, 'thou belongest to Bel'), Nu 3³⁴. And Neh 3⁸ has Besodetah ('in the counsel of God').

From about the close of the 4th cent. b.c. it was a common practice to call children after their relatives (Lk 1⁶⁰⁻⁶¹). When we read such a list as this: Hillel, Simon, Gamaliel, Simon, Gamaliel, Simon, Judah, Gamaliel, Judah, we get the impression that the grandfather's name was more often adopted than the father's (cf. To 1⁹, Lk 1⁶⁰; Jos. Ant. xiv. l. 3, BJ v. xi l. 21). To the same period belong the Aramaic names Martha, Tabitha, Meshezabel (Bab. Mushizib-ilu), and those with the prefix bar, of which we have many examples in the NT. Foreign names abound in Josephus, the Apocrypha, and the NT. In some instances a person has two separate designations: Alcimus, Jacimus; John, Gaddis; Diodotus, Tryphon, etc. 'Saul, who is called Paul' (Ac 13⁹), is a typical case. In some of the examples the reason for the second choice is obscure; in others there is an obvious similarity of sound or meaning. Double names were now frequent: Judas Maccabæus, Simon Zelotes, etc. Non-Jewish names were substituted for Jewish: Jason for Jesus; Simon for Simeon (Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 315, note).

After the birth of a son an Arab father will adopt an honorific name (kunya). If he had been called Abdallah, he is henceforth Abu Omar, or the like. There is no trace of this custom in Heb. family life, but the idea of a distinguishing and honourable surname is not altogether wanting; see Is 44⁵, Job 32², and some of the familiar double names. It is also possible that the Heb. original of Sir 44²³ signified 'I gave him the surname Birthright.' And the sense of Sir 47⁶ is 'They gave him the surname The Ten Thousand.'

3. Place Names.—The majority of these were no doubt fixed by the tribes whom the Hebrews dispossessed. From their great antiquity and the alterations to which they have been subjected, it is sometimes impossible to determine the meaning. Many places, however, got their designation from a salient natural feature, a well (beer), a fountain (en, in En-gedi), a meadow (abel), a vineyard (karmel), woods (gearim), in Kirath-jearim), a hill (Gibeath, Gibeon, Ramah), trees (Bethphage, Beth-tappuah, Anab, Abel-hussittim, Etlah, Allon-baruch); from some circumstance belonging to the history or legends of the locality, an encampment (Mahanaim), a watch-tower (Migdal, Meqiddo, Mizpah), a village (Hazer), a temporary abode of shepherds (Succoth), a place of refuge (Adullam), a vision (Beer-lahai-roi); from the clan which dwelt there (Samar'a). Of the fifty-three names of animals in Gray's list (pp. 88-96), twenty-four are applied to towns or districts. On the totem-theory this would mean that the clan bestowed the name of its totem-animal on the place of its abode. Other names evidently imply the existence of local sanctuaries, some of which must have been pre-Israelite: Beth-anath, Anathoth, Bethel, Gilgal, Kedesh-naphtali, Migdal-el, Migdal-gad, Nried, Penud, Beth-shemesh. Almost all the compounds with Baal belong to this class: Baal-beer, Bamoth-baal, B-dagon, B-hamon, B-hazor, B-meon, B-perazim, B-sha isha, B-tamar. One, Baal-judah (the correct reading of 2 S 6²; cf. 1 Ch 13⁹), is clearly of Heb. origin, Baal here being a name for Jahweh. Special interest attaches to the names of two clans in the S. and centre of Palestine, Jacob-el and Joseph-el, mentioned by Thothmes III. (c. 1500 b.c.) in his inscription at Thebes. Corresponding with these forms are Israel, Ishmael, Jezreel, Jabned, Jiphthah-el, Jekabzeel, Jokthed, in the OT. The el of the termination was the local deity, invoked (Gray, p. 214 ff.), or declared to have conferred some boon on his worshippers (Meyer, ZATW, 1886, p. 5).

J. TAYLOR.

NANĒA (2 Mac 1¹⁸, 19).—A goddess worshipped in Syria, Persia, Armenia, and other parts of Asia. By the Greeks this goddess was identified sometimes with Artemis, sometimes with Aphrodite. She seems to have represented the productive powers of nature. In 2 Mac 119-127 we have a legendary account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is said to have attempted to plunder a temple of Nanea in Persia, and to have been treacherously killed in the temple by the priests.

NAOMI.—The wife of Elimelech the Ephrathite, of Beth-lehem-judah, who was driven by famine into the land of Moab. After the death of her husband and her two sons, she returned, accompanied by Ruth, to her own land. Her return was a matter of surprise to the people of Beth-lehem, and they said, 'Is this Naomi?' Her answer included a double play of words on her own name, 'Call me not Naomi ('pleasant'), call me Mara ('bitter'); for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me . . . why call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath testified ('andah) against me?' (Ru 12-21).

NAPHISH.—A son of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁶ = 1 Ch 1³¹). In all probability it is his descendants who are mentioned in Ezr 250 as 'the children of Nephisim' (RV) or Nephusim (AV and RVm). In the parallel passage (Neh 722) the reading is Nephuseshim (RV) or Nephishesim (AV and RVm). The reading in 1 Es 531 is Nephisi.

NAPHISI (1 Es 531) = Nephisim, Ezr 250; Nephuseshim, Neh 722.

NAPHTALI.—The second son of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, and the sixth son of Jacob (Gn 3074 [J]). The tradition connects the story in a vague way with the word 'twist, wrestle': Naphtali 'elohtu niphalti—Wrestlings of God (or mighty wrestlings)—'I have wrestled with my sister and I have prevailed.' Rachel exclaimed when Naphtali was born, 'and she called his name Naphtali.'

The information which we have of Naphtali is very meagre. P ascribes to him four sons when Jacob and his family entered Egypt (Gn 4624). These four have developed into 'families' at the time of the Exodus, and their number is given as 53,400 in the Sinai census (Nu 142). At Moab, however, they had decreased to 45,000 (264). None of these clan-names given here, except Guni, appears again outside of the genealogy repeated in 1 Ch 713. In the march through the desert Naphtali formed with Dan and Asher the 'Camp of Dan,' which constituted a total of 157,000 men of war.

While the genealogical lists cannot be relied on, there is no apparent reason for linking together Dan and Naphtali. But that they are both traced to Bilhah indicates that they were tribes of minor importance, inferior in strength, and of less consequence in the national development at the time when these relationships were created, than the tribes which sprang from Rachel.

Naphtali was the sixth in order to receive its lot (Jos 1922-39). It is somewhat more definitely defined than the others, though few of the places mentioned can be identified. No fewer than nineteen cities are said to lie within its territory, the most of which are not found again in the OT, doubtless because the history of Israel was wrought out mainly in the regions to the south. The territory reached on the north almost to the Lebanon. Southward it extended along the Jordan until it reached the point below the Sea of Galilee where the Wady el-Bireh joins the Jordan. The greater part lay to the north-west of the Sea, and in this direction (N. and W.) its boundaries appear to have been shifting. 'Ancient and modern writers' (writes Driver, Deut. 413) 'vie with one another in praising the soil and climate of the territory owned by Naphtali: it was abundantly irrigated; and its productions rich and varied. Lower Galilee was, however, yet more fertile and beautiful than Upper Galilee. The vegetation in the neighbourhood of the lake is semi-tropical.' Modern writers join with Josephus in praising it, and Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. p. 180) quotes a saying from the Talmud: 'It is easier to raise a legion of olives in Galilee than to bring up a child in Palestine.' No wonder that Naphtali was 'like a hind let loose' (Gn 4921, if this be the correct translation; see the Comm.). Besides these advantages, it was fortunate in location in times of peace. Roads ran in every direction, connecting it with the outer world.

The heroism and warlike daring of the tribe is sung in Jg 5. In that decisive struggle with the Canaanites the tribe wrote its name high on the roll of Israelitish fame. But this was in the days of its pristine vigour. At a later period it performed nothing worthy of record. The Blessings of Jacob (Gn 4921) and of Moses (Dt 3321, 'Satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of Jahweh') dwell only upon its productivity. The captain to whom the honour of leading the Israelites to victory over the hosts of Sisera is ascribed in the prose narrative, Jg 4, was Barak of Kedesh-naphtali. This is probable in view of the readiness with which Naphtali and Zebulun its neighbour responded to his call, though Jg 513 points rather to a connexion with Issachar. According to 1 K 74, Hiram, the worker in metals, etc., whom Solomon brought from Tyre to work on the house of Jahweh, was the son of a widow of the tribe of Naphtali (2 Ch 24, it is true, says she was of Dan. The shifting of boundaries may be the cause of the divergence). Few names of prominence, however, from members of this tribe appear in connexion with the national life.

According to the Chronicler (1 Ch 124) 37,000 warriors with 1000 captains went to the support of David at Hebron. Under the Syrian king Bir-Idri (Benhadad), 'all the land of Naphtali,' together with certain cities of Israel, were smitten with the sword (1 K 1520). When the Syrian kingdom fell before the Assyrian armies, northern Israel was exposed, as never before, to the relentless legions of the East; and 'in the days of Pekah, king of Israel, came Tiglath-pileser [III. B.C. 734] king of Assyria, and took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maacah, and Janoah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali, and he carried them captive to Assyria' (2 K 1529). See also TRIBES.

JAMES A. CRAIG.

NAPHTUHM.—Fourth son of Mizraim (Gn 1013, 1 Ch 114). Many suggestions have been made to account for the name, which does not appear exactly in Egyptian or Assyrian inscriptions, but in Ashurbanipal's Annals (col. 14. 99) a district Nathu, probably in Lower Egypt, occurs, which may be the same. An Egyptian n-idhu, 'the marshes,' used in contrast to Pathros, may be intended; but the discovery of Caphtor, so long a puzzle, may warn us to wait for further evidence.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

NAPKIN (soudarion).—The cloth in which the unprofitable servant wrapped the money of his lord (Lk 1920); used to bind the face of the dead (Jn 114 207); carried, possibly as indicated by the name (Lat. sudarium), to wipe off perspiration (Ac 1912). The Arabic renders mandil, which may be either 'towel,' 'napkin,' 'veil,' or 'head-band.' See also DRESS, §§ 5 (a), 8.

W. EWING.

NARCISSUS.—St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans (ch. 161) salutes, among others, 'them that be of the household of Narcissus that are in the Lord.' The name was not uncommon, but many have identified the person mentioned here with the secretary of the Emperor Claudius, who was put to death by Agrippina in the first year of Nero's reign, about three years before this Epistle was written. According to the custom of those times, the household of the freedman of Claudius would pass into the possession of Nero, retaining the name of their deceased owner. It will be noted that the salutation is not addressed to Narcissus himself, but to the members of his household. MORLEY STEVENSON.

NASBAS.—Apparently the nephew of Achiacharus, who was the nephew of Tobit (To 11¹⁹). He came with Achiacharus to the wedding of Tobias. About his identity there is some little uncertainty. The Vulgate speaks of him as brother of Achiacharus, while others have regarded the two as identical. It has been suggested also that he is the same as Aman or Nadan, the ward of Achiacharus (To 14¹⁰), in which case the uncle adopted the nephew and brought him up as his son. T. A. MOXON.

NASI (1 Es 5²²) = Neziah, Ezr 2⁴, Neh 7²⁴.

NATHAN.—1. Third son of David by Bath-sheba (2 S 5⁴, but note 2 S 12²⁴). In Zec 12⁸ the Nathan who is recognized as head of a house is probably David's son. In Lk 3³¹ the genealogy of Jesus is traced through Nathan to David. 2. The prophet, a confidential adviser of David. The king desired to build the Temple, and Nathan at first agreed, but later received a revelation forbidding the enterprise (2 S 7). The next appearance of Nathan is in connexion with the parable of the ewe lamb, by which David was self-convicted of his sin with Bath-sheba (2 S 12¹⁻¹⁶). Later, in token that an atonement has been made, he adds to Solomon's name the significant title Jedidiah ('beloved of Jah'). The third service was rendered alike to David and to Solomon. Adonijah had planned a coup by which to grasp the sceptre, now falling from the hands of his aged father. It was Nathan's watchfulness that discovered the plot, and his ingenuity that saved the kingdom for Solomon (1 K 1). It was fitting that a Life of David should come from this friendly hand (1 Ch 29²⁹). His service to Solomon was recognized by the king, who appointed his sons, Azariah and Zabud, to important offices (1 K 4⁶). 3. Father of Igal, one of David's heroes (2 S 23³⁶). The text of 1 Ch 11²⁸ reads, 'Joel brother of Nathan.' 4. One of the chief men who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8¹⁶, 1 Es 8⁴⁴). 5. One of the Bani family, who had taken strange wives (Ezr 10³⁹); called in 1 Es 9³⁴ Nathanias. 6. A Judahite (1 Ch 2²⁶). J. H. STEVENSON.

NATHANAEL.—1. 1 Es 1⁹ = 2 Ch 35³ Nethanel. 2. 1 Es 9²² = Ezr 10²² Nethanel. 3. An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8¹). 4. Nathanael of Cana in Galilee (Jn 21²) appears twice in the Fourth Gospel. (1) When told by Philip, 'We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write—Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph,' Nathanael hesitated. 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?' he asked. Philip thereupon conducted him to meet Jesus, and, when he looked on that wondrous face, his doubt vanished, and he hailed Him as the Messiah, 'the Son of God, the King of Israel.' See Jn 1⁴³⁻⁵¹. (2) Nathanael was one of the seven to whom the risen Lord manifested Himself at the Lake of Galilee (Jn 21²). His name occurs only in Jn, but the following are reasons for believing that he was identical with Bartholomew, who is never mentioned by St. John, and by the other Evangelists only in their catalogues of the Apostles (Mt 10³ = Mk 3¹⁸ = Lk 6¹⁴). (a) Bartholomew is not a name, but a patronymic—Bar Talmai, 'the son of Talmai.' (b) Nathanael appears in St. John's narrative as a friend of Philip, and Bartholomew is coupled with Philip in the lists of the Apostles. (c) Since the others of the seven at the Lake whose names are indicated by St. John were Apostles, it is probable that Nathanael also was an Apostle. His title would thus be Nathanael bar Talmai. DAVID SMITH.

NATHANIAS (1 Es 9³⁴) = Nathan, Ezr 10³⁹.

NATHAN-MELECH.—An official in the reign of Josiah, whose name is used to designate one of the halls or chambers of the Temple (2 K 23¹¹).

NATIONS.—In many places where in the AV we have Gentiles and 'heathen' the RV has rightly substituted

'nations,' and it might with advantage have carried out the change consistently.

The Heb. (goy) and Greek (ethnos) words denote invariably a nation or a people, never a person. Where in the AV (only NT) we find 'Gentile' in the singular (Ro 2¹⁴), the RV has 'Greek,' following the original. In nearly every example the singular 'nation' stands for 'Israel,' though we have a few exceptions, as in Ex 9²⁴ (of Egypt), Pr 14²⁴ (general), and Mt 21⁴³. It is often applied to Israel and Judah when there is an implication of disobedience to God, sinfulness and the like: see Dt 32²⁸, Jg 2¹⁶, Is 1⁴ etc. This shade of meaning became very common in the later writings of the OT. Quite early in Israelitish history the singular as a term for Israel was discarded for the word translated 'people' ('am'), so that 'am' ('people') and goy ('nation') came to be almost antithetic terms = 'Israelites' and 'non-Israelites,' as in Rabbinical Hebrew. For the reason of the change in the use of goy ('nation'), see below.

In the AV 'Gentiles' often corresponds to 'Greeks' in the original, as in Jn 7³⁵, Ro 3⁹ etc. In the RV the word 'Greeks' is rightly substituted, though the sense is the same, for to the Jews of the time Greek culture and religion stood for the culture and religion of the non-Jewish world.

The two words (Heb. and Greek) translated 'nation' have their original and literal sense in many parts of the OT and NT, as in Gn 10¹⁶, 10 etc., Is 2⁴ (= Mic 4²¹), Job 12²³ 34²⁰, Ac 17²⁶, Gal 3¹⁴. In other passages this general meaning is narrowed so as to embrace the descendants of Abraham, e.g. in Gn 12² 18¹⁸ 17⁴ b. e. 16. But it is the plural that occurs by far the most frequently, standing almost invariably for non-Israelitish nations, generally with the added notion of their being idolatrous and immoral: see Ex 9²⁴ 34¹⁰, Lv 25⁴⁴, Nu 14¹⁴, Dt 15⁴, 1 K 4³, Is 11¹⁰, 12, and often. These are contrasted with Israel 'the people of Jahweh' in 2 S 7², 1 Ch 17²¹ etc.

This contrast between Israel (united or divided into the kingdoms of Israel and Judah) as Jahweh's people, and all the rest of the human race designated 'nations,' runs right through the OT. Such a conception could have arisen only after the Israelites had developed the consciousness of national unity. At first, even among the Israelites, each nation was thought to be justified in worshipping its deity (see Dt 3¹⁷ 10¹⁷, 1 K 8²³, Is 19¹ etc.). As long as this idea prevailed there could be no necessary antagonism between Israelites and foreign nations, except that which was national, for the nation's god was identified with the national interests. But when the belief in Jahweh's absolute and exclusive claims possessed the mind of Israel, as it began to do in the time of the earliest literary prophets (see Am 9¹, Mic 7¹⁸ etc.), the nations came to be regarded as worshippers of idols (Lv 18²⁰), and in Ps 96¹⁶, 17 (cf. Ezk 7²¹) 'nations' and 'wicked people' are, as being identical, put in parallelism. It will be gathered from what has been said, that the hostile feelings with which Israelites regarded other peoples varied at various times. At all periods it would be modified by the laws of hospitality (see art. STRANGER), by political alliances (cf. Is 7¹⁸, and 2 K 16⁶), Ahaz and Assyria against Israel and Syria), and by the needs of commerce (see Ezk 27¹¹ [Tyre], 1 K 9²⁸ 10¹¹ 22²⁸ etc.).

The reforms instituted by king Josiah in the Southern Kingdom (2 K 22¹⁷), based upon the Deuteronomic law newly found in the Temple, aimed at stamping out all syncretism in religion and establishing the pure religion of Jahweh. This reformation, as also the Rechabite movement (Jer 35), had a profound influence upon the thoughts and feelings of Jews, widening the gulf between them and alien nations. The teaching of the oldest prophets looked in the same direction (see Am 2¹¹ 3¹⁶ 5¹¹, 26 8⁵, Hos 2¹⁹ 8¹⁴ 9¹⁰ 10¹³ 12⁷, 14¹, Is 2⁶ 10¹⁷ 17¹⁰, Zeph 1⁸, 11, Jer 35¹⁷, 37¹⁷ etc.).

But the Deuteronomic law (about a.c. 620) made legally obligatory what earlier teachers had inculcated. Israelites were not to marry non-Israelites (Dt 7³), or to have any except unavoidable dealings with them.

The feeling of national exclusiveness and antipathy was intensified by the captivity in Babylon, when the prophetic and priestly instructors of the exiled Jews taught them that their calamities came upon them on account of their disloyalty to Jahweh and the ordinances of His religion, and because they compromised with idolatrous practices and heathen nations. It was in Babylon that Ezekiel drew up the programme of worship and organization for the nation after the Return, laying stress on the doctrine that Israel was to be a holy people, separated from other nations (see Ezk 40-48). Some time after the Return, Ezra and Nehemiah had to contend with the laxity to which Jews who had remained in the home land and others had yielded; but they were uncompromising, and won the battle for nationalism in religion.

Judaism was in even greater danger of being lost in the world-currents of speculation and religion soon after the time of Alexander the Great. Indeed, but for the brave Maccabean rising in the earlier half of the 2nd cent. B.C., both the religion and the language of the Jew might, humanly speaking, have perished.

The Apocrypha speaks of the 'nations' just as do the later writings of the OT. They are 'uncircumcised,' 'having sold themselves to do evil' (1 Mac 1¹⁰); they break the Sabbath, offer no sacrifice to Jahweh, eat unclean food and such as has been offered to idols (2 Mac 5⁶, 9, 18, 15¹¹ etc. etc.).

The NT reveals the same attitude towards foreign nations on the part of the Jews (see Ac 10⁴⁶ et passim). In Rabbinical writings Jewish exclusiveness manifested itself even more decisively (see Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, vol. I, esp. ch. xvi.). But, as in the OT a broader spirit shows itself constantly, culminating in the universalism of Christianity, so enlightened and broadminded Jews in all ages have deprecated the fanatical race-hatred which many of their compatriots have displayed.

NATURAL.—The contrast between 'natural' (Gr. psychikos) and 'spiritual' (pneumatikos) is drawn out by St. Paul in 1 Co 15⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶. The natural body is derived from the first Adam, and is our body in so far as it is accommodated to, and limited by, the needs of the animal side of the human nature. In such a sense it is especially true that 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God' (1 Co 2¹⁴). Man derives his spiritual life from union with Christ ('the last Adam'), but his present body is not adapted to the needs of this spiritual existence; hence the distinction made by St. Paul between the natural body (called the 'body of death,' Ro 7²⁴) and the spiritual body of the resurrection. The transference from the one to the other begins in this life, and the two beings are identical in so far as continuity creates an identity, but otherwise, owing to the operation of the union with Christ, distinct.

T. A. MOXON.

NATURE.—The term 'nature' is not used in the OT, nor was the conception current in Hebrew thought, as God alone is seen in all, through all, and over all. The idea came from the word physis from Hellenism. Swine's flesh is commended for food as a gift of nature in 4 Mac 5⁷. In the NT the term is used in various senses: (1) the forces, laws, and order of the world, including man (Ro 1²⁶ 11²¹, 24, Gal 4⁵); (2) the inborn sense of propriety or morality (1 Co 11¹⁴, Ro 2¹⁴); (3) birth or physical origin (Gal 2¹⁵, Ro 2²⁷); (4) the sum of characteristics of a species or person, human (Ja 3⁷), or Divine (2P 1⁴); (5) a condition acquired or inherited (Eph 2³, 'by nature children of wrath'). What is contrary to nature is condemned. While the term is not found or the conception made explicit in the OT, Schultz (OT Theol. ii. 74) finds in the Law 'the general rule that nothing is to be permitted contrary to the delicate sense of the inviolable proprieties of nature,' and gives a number of instances (Ex 23¹⁹ 34²⁶, Lv 22²⁸ 19¹², Dt 22⁹ 11, Lv 10⁹ 19²⁸ 21⁸ 22⁴, Dt 14¹ 23²). The beauty and the order of the world are recognized as evidences of Divine wisdom and power (Ps 8¹ 19¹ 33⁶, 7 90² 104, 136⁶, 147, Pr 8²²⁻³⁰, Job 38, 39); but the sum of created things is not hypostatized and personified apart from God, as in much current modern thinking. God is Creator, Preserver, and Ruler: He makes all (Is 44²⁴, Am 4¹³), and is in all (Ps 139). His immanence is by His Spirit (Gn 1²). Jesus recognizes God's bounty and care in the flowers of the field and the birds of the air (Mt 6²⁶, 28); He uses natural processes to illustrate spiritual, in salt (5¹³), seed and soil (13³⁻⁹), and leaven (13³³). The growth of the seed is also used as an illustration by Paul (1 Co 15³⁷, 38). There is in the Bible no interest in nature apart from God, and the problem of the relation of God to nature has not yet risen on the horizon of the thought of the writers.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

NAUGHT.—'Naught' is 'nothing' (from A.S. na 'not,' and whit 'a whit or a thing'). Sometimes the spelling became 'nought' (perhaps under the influence of 'ought'). In the earliest editions of AV there is no difference between 'naught' and 'nought'; but in the ed. of 1638 a difference was introduced, 'naught' being used in 2 K 2¹⁹, Pr 20⁴, because there the meaning is 'bad'; 'nought' everywhere else, but with the meaning 'worthlessness.' This distinction was preserved by Scrivener, in his Cambr. Par. Bible, and is found in most modern English Bibles.

'Naughty,' however, is simply 'worthless,' as Jer 24² 'very naughty figs.' But 'naughtiness' always means 'wickedness,' as Pr 11⁶ 'transgressors shall be taken in their own naughtiness.'

NAVE.—The form in which (possibly by a primitive error in transcription of the Greek) the Heb. name Nun appears in AV of Sir 46¹.

NAVY.—See SHIPS AND BOATS, p. 849^b.

NAZARENE.—A title applied to Christ in Mt 2²³, apparently as a quotation from a prophecy. Its significance is a matter of controversy. Apart from the primary meaning of the word, 'an inhabitant of Nazareth,' there may have been, as is often the case in prophetic quotations, a secondary meaning in allusion to the Heb. word nāṣar, 'a branch,' in which case the reference may have been to the Messianic passage Is 11¹; or possibly the reference may have been to the word nāṣar, 'to save.' The epithet, applied often in scorn (cf. Jn 1⁴⁶), was used of Christ by demoniacs (Mk 1²⁴, Lk 4³⁴), by the people generally (Mk 10⁴⁷, Lk 18³⁷), by the soldiers (Jn 18³⁻⁷), by the servants (Mt 26⁷¹, Mk 14⁶⁷), by Pilate (Jn 19¹⁹), as well as by His own followers on various occasions (Lk 24¹⁹ etc.). The attempt to connect the word with 'Nazirite' is etymologically impossible, and has no meaning as applied to Jesus Christ.

T. A. MOXON.

NAZARETH (mod. en-Nāṣira).—A town in the north border of the Plain of Esdraelon. It was a place of no history (being entirely unmentioned in the OT, Josephus, or the Talmud), no importance, and, possibly, of bad reputation (Jn 1⁴⁶). Here, however, lived Mary and Joseph. Hither, before their marriage, was the angel Gabriel sent to announce the coming birth of Christ (Lk 1²⁶⁻³⁸), and hither the Holy Family retired after the flight to Egypt (Mt 2²³). The obscure years of Christ's boyhood were spent here, and in its synagogue He preached the sermon for which He was rejected by His fellow-townsmen (Mt 13⁵⁴, Lk 4²⁹). After this, save as a centre of pilgrimage, Nazareth sank into obscurity. The Crusaders made it a bishopric; it is now the seat of a Turkish lieutenant-governor. Many traditional sites are pointed out to pilgrims and tourists, for not one of which, with the possible exception of the 'Virgin's Well' (which, being the only spring known in the neighbourhood, was not improbably that used by the Holy Family), is there any justification.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

NAZIRITE (AV Nazarite).—The primary meaning of the Heb. verb nāṣar is to separate. Hence the nāṣir is 'the separated,' 'consecrated,' 'devoted.' Joseph is 'the Nazirite,' i.e., the consecrated prince, among his brethren (Gn 49²⁶); the nobles of Jerusalem bear the same title (La 4⁷); the untrimmed vine, whose branches recall the long hair of the Nazirite proper, is called 'thy Nazirite' (Lv 25¹¹). But, above all, the name belongs to a class of persons devoted by a special vow to Jahweh (Am 2¹¹, Jg 13⁵, 7 16¹⁷, Nu 6, Sir 46¹³, 1 Mac 3⁴⁹⁻⁵³). According to Jg 13 and Nu 6, the details of outward observance covered by the vow were: (1) abstinence from the fruit of the vine, (2) leaving the hair uncut, (3) avoidance of contact with the dead, and (4) of all unclean food.

Opinions differ as to whether the abstinence from wine or the untrimmed hair was the more important. Am 2¹¹ mentions only the former. 1 S 1¹¹, on the other hand, refers only to the latter (the LXX 'and he shall drink no wine or strong drink' being an interpolation). If we look outside the OT, we see that among the ancients generally the hair was regarded as so important an outcome of the physical life as to be a fit offering to the deity, and a means of initiating or restoring communion with Him. There is evidence for this from Syria, Arabia, Egypt, Greece, Rome, and, in recent times, even among the Maoris. This, then, seems to have been the original observance. If Am 2¹¹ does not mention it, the reason is that the most attractive temptation was found in the wine. Jg 13⁷ states that Samson's mother was bidden to abstain, but the same is not affirmed of Samson himself; all the stress, in his case, is laid on the hair being untouched (Jg 16¹⁷). Nu 6² puts the abstinence first, but even here the significance of the other point appears in the directions for the ceremonial shaving and oblation of the hair (Nu 6¹⁸). The vine stood for the culture and civilization of Canaan, and was specially associated with the worship of the nature-gods. Hence it was a point of honour with the zealots of Jahweh to turn away from it utterly. The luxury and immorality connected with a more advanced civilization threatened the simplicity of Israel's life and faith. Martial devotion coalesced with the ascetic spirit to produce such men as Jonadab, son of Rechab, who resembled the Nazirites very closely (2 K 10¹⁵, Jer 35⁶).

The Nazirite vow was originally a life-long obligation. Young and enthusiastic men were moved by the Spirit of God to take it up, as others were inspired to be prophets, and it was an offence against Him to tempt them to break it (Am 2¹¹). Women were divinely bidden to devote their promised offspring (Jg 13⁷). Others prayed for children and promised that they should then be consecrated to this service (1 S 1¹¹); it is noteworthy that in the Heb. and Syr. of Sir 46¹³, Samuel is expressly called a Nazirite. In course of time, however, a great change came over the purpose and spirit of the institution. The vow was now taken to gain some personal end—protection on a journey, deliverance from sickness, etc. Women, too, became Nazirites. And the restrictions were only for a certain period. Nu 6 represents this stage, but the information which it gives needs supplementing. For instance, it fails to prescribe the manner in which the vow should be entered on. The Talmud asserts that this was done in private, and was binding if one simply said, 'Behold, I am a Nazirite,' or repeated after another, 'I also become one' (Nazir, i. 3, iii. 1, iv. 1). Nu 6 does not determine the length of these temporary vows. Here, again, a rule had to be made, and it was decided that the person himself might fix the period; otherwise, it should be thirty days (Nazir, i. 3, iii. 1; Jos. BJ ii. xv. 1). In case of accidental defilement, the Nazirite had to undergo seven days' purification, cut off his hair on the seventh day and have it buried (Temura, vi. 4), on the eighth day bring two turtle-doves or two young pigeons, one for a sin-, one for a burnt-offering, as well as a lamb for a guilt-offering, and thus begin the course of his vow afresh (cf. Nazir, iii. 6; Jos. Ant. xx. ii. 5). At the expiration of the time he was brought to the door of the sanctuary, with a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a ewe-lamb for a sin-offering, a ram for a peace-offering, ten unleavened cakes and ten unleavened wafers anointed with oil, a meat-offering, and a drink-offering. When the sacrifices had been offered his hair was shaved and he put it in the fire which was under the peace-offering, or under the caldron in which the latter was boiled (Nazir, vi. 8). Then a wave-offering was made, consisting of the sodden shoulder of the ram, a cake, and a wafer. The fat was then salted and burned on the altar, and the breast and the foreleg were eaten by the priests, who also ate the waved cake and the boiled shoulder; the rest of the bread and meat belonged to the offerer (Maimonides, Hilchoth Maase ha-Corbanoth, ix. 9-11). A free-will offering followed (Nu 6²¹). In the second Temple there was a chamber in the S.E. corner of the women's court, where the Nazirites boiled their peace-offerings, cut off their hair and cast it into the caldron.

The following historical notices are of some interest: (1) 1 Mac 3⁴⁹⁻⁵³ enables us to realize the importance which came to be attached to the punctilious performance of every one of the ceremonies. Just before the battle of Emmaus, the Nazirites, being shut out of Jerusalem, could not offer the concluding sacrifices there. Evidently this was regarded as a serious public calamity. (2) The important tractate of the Talmud entitled Brakhoth tells a story of slightly later date than the above, which illustrates the ingenuity which the Tabbis displayed in finding reasons for releasing from their vows persons who had rashly undertaken them (vii. 2). (3) John the Baptist has been claimed as a Nazirite, but this is doubtful; we read nothing about his hair being untouched. (4) A custom grew up for wealthy people to provide the requisite sacrifices for their poorer brethren. Thus, when Agrippa came from Rome to Jerusalem to enter on his kingdom, 'he offered many sacrifices of thanksgiving; wherefore also he ordered that many of the Nazirites should have their heads shaven' (Jos. Ant. xix. vi. 1). This throws light on Ac 21²⁰⁻²⁶. (5) Eusebius (HE ii. 23) appears to represent James the Just as a lifelong Nazirite: 'He was holy from his mother's womb. Wine and strong drink he drank not, neither did he eat flesh. A razor passed not over his head.' But the further statement that he alone was permitted to enter the Holy of Holies is so improbable as to lessen our confidence in the narrator.

JOHN TAYLOR.

NEAH.—Named only in Jos 19¹³. The name has not been recovered. It is prob. identical with Neiel of v. 27.

NEAPOLIS.—The harbour of Philippi, at which St. Paul landed (Ac 16¹¹) after sailing from Troas. It lay on the coast of Macedonia opposite Thasos, being situated on a promontory with a harbour on each side. It was about 10 miles from Philippi. The Via Egnatia from Dyrhachium, after passing through Thessalonica, Amphipolis and Philippi, reached the coast again at Neapolis, and the regular course of travellers to Asia was not to continue farther by land, but to cross by ship to Troas. The modern name of Neapolis is Kavalla.

A. E. HILLARD.

NEARIAH.—1. A descendant of David (1 Ch 3²¹). 2. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4⁴²).

NEBAIOTH.—An important tribe of North Arabians. In Gn 25¹³ (= 1 Ch 1²⁹) Nebaioth is the eldest son of Ishmael; also the representative of the Ishmaelite tribes in Gn 28⁹ 36³. The people of Nebaioth have an important place among the Arabian tribes subdued by Ashurbanipal of Assyria, named by him along with the people of Kedar (wh. see), just as in the genealogy of Genesis. It is about this date (B.C. 650) that they come into prominence among the competing tribes of the peninsula—a position which they retained for centuries.

Their exact location cannot be definitely determined, but the inscriptions tell us that they were very remote from Assyria, and their place at the head of the tribes of Ishmael, as well as their affiliation with the Edomites (Gn 28 and 36), makes it probable that they were well known to the Hebrews. Hence they are to be sought for not far from the south-eastern borders of Palestine. The time when they flourished agrees with the fact that in the Bible they are mentioned only in the late Priestly Code and by the 'Third Isaiah' (Is 607). They are usually, but wrongly, identified with the Nabateans (the Nabathæans of I Mac 5²⁹ 9²⁶). J. F. M'CURDY.

NEBALLAT.—A town inhabited by Benjamites (Neh 11²⁴); prob. the modern Beit Nebāla, 3½ miles N.E. of Lydda.

NEBAT.—Father of Jeroboam 1. (1 K 11²⁶ and onwards). The constant designation of Jeroboam 1. as 'ben-Nebāt' is probably the usage of a writer later than Jeroboam ben-Joash. It is intended, doubtless, to distinguish the two kings.

NEBO (Assyr. Nabā, 'Announcer').—A Bab. deity who presided over literature and science. The cuneiform system of writing was credited to his invention. He was the son and messenger of Bel-Marduk; whose will to mortals he interpreted. The planet Mercury was sacred to Nebo. The chief centre of his worship was the temple of E-Zida in Borsippa, between which and the temple of Marduk in Babylon took place the great annual processions of which we find a reminiscence in Is 46¹. The name Nebo appears as an element in many Babylonian names—Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzaradan, Abed-nego (properly Abed-nebo), etc.

W. M. NESBIT.

NEBO.—The name of a Moabite town, a mountain in Moab, and (according to the Hebrew text) of a city of Judah. It is probable, though not quite certain, that these places were named after the Babylonian deity Nebo (see preced. art.), and thus point to the influence of the Babylonian cult at a remote period both E. and W. of the Jordan.

1. Nebo, a city of Judah (Ezr 2²⁹ 10⁴ [1 Es 9³⁶ No-mias], Neh 7²⁹), identified by some with Beit Nubā, 12 miles N.W. of Jerusalem. This Nebo is the Nobai (a signatory to the covenant) of Neh 10²⁰. Whether either form exactly corresponds to the original name is uncertain.

2. The Moabite town called Nebo is mentioned in Nu 32²⁹ 33⁴⁷, Is 15², Jer 48¹ 22, 1 Ch 5⁴, and also in the inscription of Mesha, who says: 'And Chemosh said unto me, Go take Nebo against Israel.' The exact site is unknown, but the town probably lay on, or near, Mt. Nebo.

3. Mount Nebo is the traditional site of Moses' view of Canaan (Dt 34¹) and of his death (Dt 32⁵⁰). It is described as being 'in the land of Moab over against Jericho' and as reached from the 'steppes of Moab' (Dt 34¹). There can be no question that this description implies some point on the edge of the great plateau of Moab, which drops steeply some 4000 feet to the Jordan Valley or the Dead Sea. Two related problems call for solution: Which point in particular on this edge of the plateau is Mt. Nebo? How does the actual view thence agree with the terms of Dt 34¹? There appears to be most reason for identifying Mt. Nebo with the point now called Nebā, and the identification might be regarded as certain if we could feel sure that Nebā is really an ancient name, and not merely (as it may be) the name attached to the summit after tradition had claimed it as the Nebo of the Bible. Nebā lies about 12 miles almost due E. of the Jordan at the point where the river enters the Dead Sea, and is one of the summits most easily ascended from the steppes of Moab. In this respect it satisfies the description better than the other sites which have been proposed, (1) the somewhat loftier Mt. Atārus 10 miles farther south, and (2) Mt. Oshā some 20 miles north of Mt. Nebā and a finer point of view, but outside Moab. The view from each of these great points and from several others along the great mountain wall which encloses the Jordan Valley on the E. is extensive and impressive; but its limitations in some directions are also sharply defined. Northward (or, strictly, between N. and N.N.W.) the view extends far; from Mt. Nebā, for example, it is possible to see Mt. Tabor, 70 miles away. Westwards, on the other hand, it is blocked at from 30 to 40 miles by the great wall formed by the sharp declivity of the Judean plateau to the Jordan Valley. This western mountain wall is of approximately the same height as the Moabite wall on the E. Consequently from no point in Moab is it possible to see the 'hinder sea,' i.e. the Mediterranean; nor is it possible to see more than about one-third of the country between Jordan and the Mediterranean. It follows that the description in Dt 34¹ is inaccurate not only in mentioning specific features (the Mediterranean, Dan, probably Zoar) which are out of sight, but in giving the general impression that the view commanded the whole of Western Palestine, whereas it actually commands but a third. The difficulty could be in part overcome by considering Dt 34² (together with the words 'of Gilead unto Dan' in v.1) an editor's note explaining the phrase 'all the land.' It is significant that this detailed description is absent from the Samaritan text, which has, instead, a shorter description which defines the land of Israel but not the view. For a further discussion of the view from Nebā, see Expositor, Nov. 1904, pp. 321-341. See also art. PISGAH. G. B. GRAY.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR.—See next article.

NEBUCHADREZZAR.—The Nabū-kudur-uzur of the Babylonians, for which 'Nebuchadnezzar' (the familiar form often retained in the present work) is an error, was son and successor of Nabopolassar, founder of the New Bab. empire (b.c. 604-561). The fall of Nineveh gave Egypt a chance to reclaim Syria, and Pharaoh-Necho made an attempt to regain it. Josiah fell in a vain effort to repel him (2 K 23²⁹), but Nebuchadnezzar defeated him at Carchemish (b.c. 605). He then recovered the whole of the West, and seems to have been threatening Egypt when recalled to Babylon by news of his father's death. At this time he first captured Jerusalem (Dn 1¹ 2). We know little of his wars from his own inscriptions, which deal almost entirely with his buildings and pious acts at home. According to classical historians, he made Babylon one of the wonders of the world. He fortified it with a triple line of walls and a moat; he restored temples and cities throughout his kingdom. A fragment of his annals records that in his 37th year he fought against Amasis in Egypt (cf. Jer 46¹³⁻²⁶, Ezk 29²⁻¹⁰). For his relations with Judah, see JEHOIAKIM, JEHOIACHIN, ZEDEKIAH, GEDALIAH. He certainly was the greatest king of Babylon since Hammurabi. For his madness, see MEDICINE, p. 599². C. H. W. JOHNS.

NEBUSHAZBAN (Jer 39¹³).—The Bab. Nabū-shezib-anni, 'Nabu save me,' was Rab-saris (wh. see) at the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

NEBUZARADAN.—The Bab. Nabū-zer-iddin, 'Nabū has given seed,' the chief of the bodyguard to Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25¹⁸⁻²⁰, Jer 52³⁰). He was charged with the pacification of Judah after the fall of Jerusalem.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

NEC(H)O.—2 K 23²⁹ 32, 2 Ch 35²³⁻³⁶, Jer 46², Egypt. Neko or Nekoou, son of Psammetichus 1. and second king of the 26th Dyn. (b.c. 610-594). Continuing the development of Egypt that had gone on in his father's long reign, Necho commenced a canal joining the Nile and the Red Sea, but abandoned it unfinished. Early in his reign he also endeavoured to revive the dominion of Egypt in Syria, seizing the opportunity afforded by the collapse of Assyria: his army reached the Euphrates having brushed aside the force with which Josiah endeavoured to oppose him at Megiddo, and slain that king. Returning, he deposed Jehoahaz, the son and successor of Josiah, at Riblah, substituted for him his elder brother Eliakim, whose name he changed to Jehoiakim, and exacted tribute from the new king at the expense of the people. But Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, was now secure enough in the east to send his son Nebuchadnezzar to dispute the prize with the Egyptian king. Nebuchadnezzar routed Necho's forces at Carchemish (in B.C. 605), and took from him all his Syrian possessions, from 'the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates.'

NECK.—The most usual words are 'drepn and tsarvār in Heb., and trachēlos in Greek. Chains upon the neck were a common ornament (Pr 1⁹ etc., Ezk 16¹¹). To fall upon one another's neck has from old time been an affectionate form of greeting in the East (Gn 33⁴ etc.). The neck under yoke meant subjection and servitude (Dt 28¹⁸ etc.); breaking of the yoke meant deliverance (Gn 27⁴⁰, Jer 30⁸). Stiff or hard of neck (Dt 31²⁷ etc.) signified one difficult to guide, like a hard-necked bullock in the furrow. To put the foot upon the neck of a foe, meant his utter overthrow (Jos 10²⁴ etc.). To put the neck to work (Neh 3³) was a phrase equivalent to our own 'put a hand to.'

W. EWING.

NECKLACE.—See ORNAMENTS, § 3.

NECROMANCY.—See MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY.

NEDABIAH.—A descendant of David (1 Ch 3¹⁸).

NEEDLE'S EYE.—See CAMEL, ad fin.

NEEDLEWORK.—See EMBROIDERY.

NEESING.—The vb. 'to neese' (mod. 'sneeze') occurs in the 1611 ed. of AV at 2 K 4³⁸, 'the child neesed seven times.' But the 'neesing' (Job 41¹⁸) of leviathan (the crocodile) means hard breathing, snorting, and does not come from the same A.S. verb as 'neese' meaning 'to sneeze.'

NEGEB. originally meaning 'the dry land,' is in most passages in the OT the name of a definite geographical area (Dt 1⁷ 34³, Jos 10⁴⁰ 12⁸ etc.); the word is, however, used also in the sense of 'South' (Gn 13¹⁴). The Negeb was often the scene of Abraham's wanderings (Gn 12⁹ 13¹ 3 20¹); here Hagar was succoured by the angel (Gn 16⁷⁻¹⁴); Isaac (Gn 24⁶²) and Jacob (Gn 37¹ 46⁸) both dwelt there; through this district passed the spies (Nu 13¹⁷⁻²²). In Nu 13²⁹ the Negeb is described as belonging to the Amalekites. Later the land was allotted to Simeon, and its cities are enumerated (Jos. 19¹⁻²); later they reverted to Judah (Jos 15²¹⁻²²). David was stationed by Achish at Ziklag on the borders of the Negeb (1 S 27⁶). At this time the Negeb is described as of several parts, the Negeb of Judah, of the Jerahmeelites, and of the Kenites (1 S 27¹⁰); while in 1 S 30¹⁴ we read of the Negeb of the Cherethites and of Caleb. Jeremiah (13¹⁹) prophesied trouble as coming on the cities of this region, but on the return from captivity they too were to participate in the blessings (32⁴ 33¹³).

The district in question was an ill-defined tract of country lying S. of Hebron, and extending some 70 miles to the Tih or desert. It was bounded on the E. by the Dead Sea and the 'Arabah, while W. it faded away into the Maritime Plain. It was a pastoral region, wedged between the cultivated lands on the N. and the wilderness, and formed a most efficient barrier to the land of Israel towards the South. Attacks of large armed forces could not come from this direction, but only by the 'Arabah to the S.E. (Gn 14), via Gaza on S.W., or by the E. of the Jordan. The Israelites themselves were compelled to take the last route. The country consists of a series of mountainous ridges running in a general direction E. and W., with open wadys in which a certain amount of water collects even now; in ancient days dams were constructed in places to collect and store the rainfall, which to-day soon runs off. Though now little better than a wilderness, the numerous ruins of towns and broken terraces witness to days of large population and good cultivation; the OT, too, in the stories of Saul's and David's captures from the Amalekites (1 S 15²⁷), witnesses to a great wealth of cattle. In Byzantine times the land attained its highest prosperity. Under neglect it has become again little better than a desert: the Bedouin of these parts are known in Palestine for their skill in making rough cisterns on the hillsides to catch the surface water, and have in recent years been employed to construct many such in the 'wilderness of Judaea.' Beersheba and the district around have recently been greatly improved: a rough carriage road has been made from there to Gaza.

NEGINAH, NEGINTOH.—See PSALMS, p. 772^a.

NEHELAMITE.—An epithet applied to Shemaiah, a false prophet who opposed Jeremiah (Jer 29²⁴ 31 32). According to analogy the word should mean 'an inhabitant of Nehelam,' but there is no place of that name mentioned in the Bible.

NEHEMIAH.—1. One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community (Ezr 2² = Neh 7⁷). 1 Es 5⁸ Nehemias. 2. One of those who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3⁶). 3. See the following article.

NEHEMIAH.—Son of Hacaliah and cupbearer to king Artaxerxes. Our sole source of information regarding this great Jewish patriot is the book that bears his name. According to this, in the 20th year of Artaxerxes (i.e., as usually understood, of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, 464-424), B.C. 445-444, Nehemiah is at Susa, the chief city of Elam and the winter residence of the Persian court. Here, in consequence of a report that reaches him regarding the ruined condition of Jerusalem and its people, Nehemiah is, on his own initiative, appointed governor (pechah) of the province of Judaea by the king. He is granted a limited leave of absence by the latter, furnished with royal letters and an escort to assure his safe passage; and also with a royal rescript to Asaph, the keeper of the king's forests, commanding that he shall be furnished with sufficient supplies of timber. On arriving at Jerusalem, having satisfied himself as to the ruinous condition of the city walls, he energetically begins the task of rebuilding them, and, in spite of much opposition from without (from Sanballat and others), he, with the aid of the entire Jewish population drawn from the outlying villages, successfully accomplishes his undertaking within two months (Neh 1-7). All this, according to the usually accepted chronology, happened in the year 444. The wall was 'finished' on the 25th day of the 6th month (6¹⁴), and on the first day of the following month the events of the religious reform described in chs. 8-10 apparently began. The Book of the Law was read by Ezra in the presence of Nehemiah before the people in solemn assembly; the Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated (8¹³⁻¹⁸); national confession of sin was made (ch. 9); and the 'covenant' was sealed, the people pledging themselves to observe its obligations (ch. 10). In 12²⁷⁻⁴³ a description of the solemn dedication of the completed walls is given. If 2 Mac 1¹⁸ can be relied on as preserving a true tradition, the dedication took place on the 25th of Chislew (December), i.e. three months after the completion, and two months after the reading of the Law and the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles.

The exact sequence of these events is uncertain. Some would place the reading of the Law, etc., subsequent to the Dedication, in the following year. Rawlinson proposed to place the Dedication 12 years later, in Nehemiah's second governorship. But this view is improbable.

Shortly after these events, it would seem, Nehemiah returned to the Persian court, and was absent from Jerusalem for some years.

How long exactly Nehemiah's first governorship lasted, and for how great an interval he was absent from Jerusalem, are uncertain. In 5¹⁴ it seems to be stated definitely that he was governor in the first instance for 12 years. But in 13¹ Nehemiah says: 'But all this time I was not at Jerusalem: for in the two-and-thirtieth year of Artaxerxes, king of Babylon, I went unto the king, and, after certain days, asked I leave of the king.' On the whole it seems probable that 5¹⁴ means that during the twelve years Nehemiah, though absent on court duty, was actually governor, ruling by deputies; and that in the 32nd year of the king's reign he again secured leave of absence, and came to Jerusalem (b.c. 433). The evils he found on his return must have taken some considerable time to develop.

On his return to Jerusalem in 433 Nehemiah found various abuses and internal disorders rampant in the community. Eliashib 'the priest' had provided Tobiah with quarters in one of the Temple-chambers (13⁴), the Levites had not received their dues, the Sabbath was openly desecrated in and around Jerusalem (13¹⁴), and, in spite of Ezra's great puritanical movement, mixed marriages were still common, and the children of such marriages spoke 'half' in their mothers' foreign speech (13²⁴). Possibly information as to these developments had impelled Nehemiah to return. At any rate, on his arrival he asserted himself with characteristic vigour, and inaugurated drastic measures of reform. One characteristic sentence vividly illustrates this relentless zeal: 'And one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high priest, was son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite: therefore I chased him from me' (13²⁸). 'Thus cleansed I them'—he proceeds—from every thing strange, and appointed wards for the priests and for the Levites, every one to his work: and for the wood offering at times appointed, and for the first-fruits' (13³⁰).

The Book of Nehemiah (see next article) is composite in character, and the narrative is in part fragmentary. Hence the actual course of events is by no means always clear and certain. Some scholars are of opinion that the Artaxerxes referred to is Artaxerxes II. Mnemon (reigned b.c. 404-358), and suppose that Nehemiah was governor for the 12 years 384-372, and again at a later period. Josephus places Nehemiah in the time of Xerxes.

The personality of Nehemiah, as revealed in his memoirs, is in many respects strangely attractive. He appears as a gifted and accomplished man of action, well versed in the ways of the world, and well equipped to meet difficult situations. The combination of strength and gracefulness, the generosity, fervent patriotism, and religious zeal of the man contributed to form a personality of striking force and power. He is a unique figure in the OT, and rendered services of incalculable value to the cause of Judaism. Even his limitations reveal a certain strength (e.g. his naïve prayer: 'Remember unto me, O my God, for good all that I have done for this people'). Like all great men, he has become the subject of legend (cf. 2 Mac 1¹⁸). But he deserves in every respect the eulogium pronounced upon him by ben-Sira (Sir 49¹) and by Josephus, who (Ant. xi. v. 8) says of him: 'He was a man of good and righteous character, and very ambitious to make his own nation happy; and he hath left the walls of Jerusalem as an eternal monument of himself.'

G. H. Box.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF.—The two books, separated in our Bible and appearing there as Ezra and Nehemiah, originally formed a single book (as appears from the Talmud, the LXX, and from internal evidence), which was the sequel to Chronicles. In fact Ezra verbally continues the narrative of 2 Ch 36 (cf. 2 Ch 36²²⁻²³ with Ezr 1¹⁻³), and the whole work—1 and 2 Chron., Ezra, and Nehemiah—forms a single continuous narrative from Adam to Nehemiah's second visit to Jerusalem, and was probably compiled by the Chronicler. That part of this voluminous work which now bears the title Nehemiah is so called because it deals largely with the career of the Jewish patriot whose name it carries, and embodies excerpts of considerable extent from his personal memoirs.

1. Extracts from the memoirs embodied in Nehemiah.

—(a) 1¹⁻⁷. At the outset we meet with a long section where the first person sing. is used throughout, viz. 1¹⁻⁷. These chapters are indubitably authentic extracts from Nehemiah's personal memoirs. They are distinguished by individual characteristics which help us to form a distinct idea of the writer's personality. Enthusiasm for a great idea, and unstinting and unselfish devotion to its realization, are marked features. From 5¹⁴ it is clear that the narrative can not have been put into its present form till some years after the events recounted. Doubts have been raised as to the authenticity of 6¹ (the walls finished in 52 days), but the objection is not a fatal one. It should be noted, however, that according to Josephus (Ant. xi. v. 8) the building of the walls lasted 2 years and 8 months. On what authority Josephus bases this assertion is not known. (3¹⁻²², a list of persons who helped to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, has also been the subject of doubt.)

(b) 7^{5-72a}. This section contains a list of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel, which Nehemiah (7⁵) says he 'found': it also appears in Ezra's memoirs (Ezr 2), with slight differences. It forms a natural and easy continuation to 7⁴, and probably from the very first stood as a constituent element in Nehemiah's memoirs.

(c) Ch. 11. This chapter, which contains a list of persons who drew lots to reside at Jerusalem, and other details regarding the settlement of the capital, probably also stood in the original memoirs. The list—which partly recurs in 1 Ch 9³⁻¹⁷—is to be regarded as the immediate continuation of ch. 7 (with Ewald), and refers to measures taken by Zerubbabel. Doubtless it was followed in the memoirs by an account of what Nehemiah did to resume and complete these measures (cf. 7⁴⁻⁹), but this has, unfortunately, not been preserved to us.

(d) 12¹⁷⁻⁴³. Account of the dedication of the walls. Notice the resumption of the 1st pers. sing. (vv. 31, 38, 40). This passage is an excerpt from the memoirs, but has been abridged and revised by the compiler.

(e) 13¹⁻³¹. Another extract from the memoirs, giving details of a time some 12 or more years later than that referred to in the earlier extracts. It deals with Nehemiah's second visit.

2. Passages in Nehemiah not derived from the memoirs.

—(a) 7^{72b-10⁴⁰} (3³¹). This long section breaks the connexion which it is generally agreed exists between 7^{72a} and ch. 11. In its present form it is doubtless due to the compiler; but it contains so many details of an apparently authentic character, its representation is often so vivid, that it is probable that the work of an eye-witness has been used and worked up by the compiler in producing the present narrative. Probably 9^{24-10⁴⁰} has been taken over directly from the memoirs of Ezra (the LXX ascribes the prayer beginning in 9² to Ezra: 'And Ezra said'). The whole section, therefore, can be regarded as of first-rate authority.

(b) 12¹⁻¹⁶. A list of priests and Levites who returned with Zerubbabel. Notice how the priestly genealogy is carried far down below Nehemiah's time, as far, in fact, as the reign of Darius the Persian (v. 22), i.e. Darius III. Codomannus (reigned b.c. 335-331). The high priest Jaddua mentioned in v. 11 is known from Josephus to have been a contemporary of Alexander the Great.

3. Historical value of the Book.—On the whole, recent criticism has been favourable to the older view as to the essential trustworthiness of the narrative of events given in Ezra-Nehemiah. Reference has already been made in the previous article to the view that the Artaxerxes mentioned is the second of that name. If this is accepted, Ezra's visit and work of reform fall in the year 398. Kesters goes much further than this.

'According to him, a return of exiles in the second year of Cyrus did not take place at all; the building of the Temple and the walls was rather the work of the population that had remained behind in the land (2 K 25¹²), of whom Zerubbabel and Nehemiah were governors; Ezra's visit and work of reform fall in the second governorship of Nehemiah, after the events narrated in Neh 13¹⁻³¹. Ezra arrived for the first time after 433; first of all the community was reconstituted by the dissolution of the mixed marriages, and then solemnly bound to the observance of the Law which had been brought with him by Ezra: the first return-journey under Zerubbabel, with all those who joined themselves with him, has been invented by the Chronicler, who reversed the order of events. Finally, according to Torrey, the 'I' passages, with the exception of Neh 1.2 (mainly) and 3²⁻⁶ (mainly), have been fabricated by the Chronicler, who in them created his masterpiece; and Nehemiah also belongs to the reign of Artaxerxes II. (Cornill).

Kesters' theory has been energetically opposed by Wellhausen, and since Ed. Meyer's demonstration of the essential authenticity of the documents embodied in Ezra 4-7, the extreme form of the critical theory may be regarded as having lost most of its plausibility.

NEPHEW.—In AV 'nephew' means 'grandson.' It occurs in Jg 12¹⁴, Job 18¹⁹, Is 14²², 1 Ti 5⁴.

NEPHILIM.—A Heb. word, of uncertain etymology, retained by RV in the only two places where it occurs in OT (AV 'giants'). In Gn 6⁴ we read: 'The Nephilim were in the earth in those days, and also afterwards, when the sons of God went in to the daughters of men and they bare to them; these are the heroes which were of old, the men of renown.' The verse has the appearance of an explanatory gloss to the obscure mythological fragment which precedes, and is very difficult to understand. But we can hardly be wrong in supposing that it bears witness to a current belief (to which there are many heathen parallels) in a race of heroes or demigods, produced by the union of divine beings ('sons of God') with mortal women. The other notice is Nu 13³³, where the name is applied to men of gigantic stature seen by the spies among the natives of Canaan. That these giants were popularly identified with the demigods of Gn 6⁴, there is no reason to doubt. See also art. GIANT.

NEPHTHAI.—See NEPHTHAR.

NEPHTHAR.—The name given by Nehemiah to a 'thick substance' which was found in a dry pit after the return from Babylon (2 Mac 1¹⁸⁻²⁰). The legend relates how certain priests, before the Captivity, took the sacred fire and hid it. On the Return, when a search was made, there was found in its place this highly inflammable substance, which seems not to have differed much from the naphtha of commerce. Some of it was poured over the sacrifice, and was ignited by the great heat of the sun and burned with a bright flame. The name nephthar or nephthal [v.²⁸] has not been satisfactorily explained, although it is said by the writer to mean 'cleansing.'

NEPHTOAH.—A town on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15⁹ 18¹⁴), usually identified with Lifta, about 2 miles N.W. of Jerusalem (so Tobler, Baedeker-Socin, Guthe, etc.). The Talmud identifies Nephtoah with Etam, the modern 'Ain 'Atam, at what are popularly called the Pools of Solomon, S. of Bethlehem (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. p. 146). This latter is favoured by Conder, who would place Eleph at Lifta. The phrase 'the fountain of the waters of Nephtoah' would lead us to expect abundant supplies of water. In this respect the claim of 'Ain 'Atam is certainly stronger than that of Lifta.

NEPHUSHESIM, NEPHUSIM.—See NAPHISH.

NER.—The father of Abner (1 S 14^{50f}. 26⁵. 14 etc.).

NEREUS.—A Roman Christian, to whom, along with his sister, St. Paul sends greeting in Ro 16¹³. The expression 'and all the saints that are with them' seems to point to some community of Christians accustomed to meet together. MORLEY STEVENSON.

NERGAL.—The god of the city of Cutha in Babylonia, hence worshipped by the captive Cuthaeans who were transplanted to Samaria by Sargon (2 K 17³⁰). In the Bab.-Assyr. pantheon he was a god of war and pestilence, and of hunting, and the planet Mars was sacred to him.

The name Nergal is probably of Sumerian origin, namely, Ner-gal—'great warrior.' The god is sometimes in the non-Semitic texts called Ner-unu-gal, 'hero of the lower world,' evidently indicating his connexion with death and destruction.

W. M. NESBIT.

NERGAL-SHAREZER.—The Bab. Nergal-shar-uzur 'Nergal preserve the king,' the Rab-mag (wh. see), who, with Nebuzaradan and Nebushazban, released Jeremiah from prison (Jer 39¹³). It is tempting to suppose that he was the Nergal-shar-uzur who married a daughter of Nebuchadrezzar, and later came to the throne of Babylon, and is known from classical writers as Neriglissar (B.C. 559-556).

NERI.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³²).

NERIAH.—The father of Baruch (Jer 32¹². 16 36¹. 3 43³. 5 45¹ 51⁵⁹). In Bar 1¹ the Greek form of the name, Nerias, is retained.

NERIAS.—See NERIAH.

NERO is not mentioned by name in the NT, but his connexion with St. Paul's trial (Ac 25-28, where 'Cæsar' is Nero), the mention of his household (Ph 4²²), and the general consensus of opinion that the number of the Beast 666 (Rev 13¹⁸) is a cypher indicating Nero Kesar (the Gr. way of pronouncing the Emperor's name), are sufficient reasons for including him here. Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, son of Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus (consul 32 (died 40 A.D.) and Iulia Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus (the adopted son of the Emperor Tiberius), who became wife of the Emperor Claudius in 48 A.D., was born on 15 Dec. in the year 37 A.D. On adoption by his step-father on 25 Feb. 50 he received new names, by one of which, Nero, he has since been known. On the murder of Claudius his sole rule began in 54, and during it he was officially known as Emperor Nero Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus. His death took place on 9 June, 68, in his thirty-first year.

Nero inherited evil qualities from his father and mother, which for the first five years of his reign, when he was a mere youth, were kept in check by his two tutors, Burrus an experienced soldier, and Seneca the distinguished philosopher. His mother, a woman of very strong will, who had successfully schemed for his advancement, had no good influence on him, and, when of age to throw off all restraints, he plunged into follies and excesses which suggest that madness had unhinged his mind. His defects, however, seem to have done little more than scandalize and amuse Rome: the prosperity of the provinces, thanks to the excellence of the bureaucratic machine, continued. Space permits only a reference to some important events in his reign.

The question of the Eastern frontier, which was a problem ever present to the Emperors, demanded settlement from Nero. The safety of this frontier could be secured only if Armenia were under the suzerainty of Rome. It was therefore the object of their perpetual rivals, the Parthians, to obtain this suzerainty. The Romans dared not annex Armenia, because it would inevitably become necessary to annex also the whole of the country on the west of the Tigris. At the opening of Nero's reign, Tiridates, a Parthian, had established himself securely on the throne of Armenia, and the possession of Armenia by the Romans was thus seriously threatened. The ultimate intention of Rome was to offer Armenia to Tiridates as a gift, but as a necessary preliminary to this they made the most vigorous preparations for war. Cn. Domitius Corbulo, one of the ablest generals of the 1st cent., was appointed by Nero to conduct the campaign, and the governor of Syria and the other officials and client-princes in the neighbourhood of Armenia were instructed to co-operate with him. The condition of the Eastern troops caused a delay of two and a half years. After a terrible winter passed in tents in the uplying plain of Armenia, Corbulo was ready to strike in spring 58, and as the result of this first campaign Tiridates asked for terms. He was offered his kingdom as a gift from Rome, but refused to accept it, and in the second campaign (59) the Roman general marched upon Tiridates' capital Artaxata, which surrendered, and proceeded thence by a long and difficult march to Tigranocerta, the second capital, in the extreme south, which in its turn surrendered. In the year 60, which was occupied in pacification, Tigranes, who was educated in Rome, was placed on the throne by Nero. The folly of this king and the cowardice and incompetence of the Roman general Petrus threatened to undo all that Corbulo had achieved; but Corbulo, as supreme commander-in-chief for the whole Eastern frontier, retrieved the loss in the year 63 and following on this successful campaign Tiridates received the crown as the gift of Rome. The long peace with Armenia which followed is to the credit of Corbulo's consummate generalship and Nero's skilful diplomacy. The Roman hold on Britain, which his predecessor Claudius had obtained, was further strengthened under Nero. It was in his reign that the justly aroused rebellion under Boudicca (better known by the incorrect form Boadicea) in East Anglia was crushed, after terrible massacres by the Britons, by the governor Suetonius Paulinus (60). There was henceforth, for a considerable time, peace in Britain. The Germany and Danube frontiers also engaged attention in Nero's time.

In the city Nero exercised a wise care for the corn and water supplies. He also increased the power of the Senate, and may be said to have constituted an Imperial Cabinet. He was fond of the arts, especially music and poetry, but he never attained more than a respectable standard in either. On 19 July, 64, fire broke out in Rome, and raged for nine days in all, leaving great parts of the city in ashes. On the evidence Nero must be acquitted of all connexion with the fire, which was due to chance. The populace, however, suspected the Emperor, and were anxious to bring retribution on the originators of the fire. Nero selected the Christians as scapegoats, and he may have believed them guilty, as some of them were understood to have confessed their guilt. They were subjected to every imaginable variety of cruel death. These punishments did not remove suspicion from Nero, and, as the populace soon became sated, other charges had to be brought against them. Of these charges, hostility to civilized society was the chief. At a later stage in history we find evidence to justify the conclusion that the name 'Christian' was held to be a sufficient charge in itself. A conspiracy against the Emperor's life, in which some of the chief men in the State were implicated, failed of its purpose through treachery in 65; the effect on the Emperor's mind issued in a reign of terror, and a number of the noblest persons, particularly Stoics, were put to death. The later days of Nero saw the rise of the Jewish insurrection against the Roman power, which culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem and the massacre of countless Jews in A.D. 70. Two years before that, however, the revolt of Gaul under Vindex had been the prelude to Nero's death. His life of ease and luxury had weakened a nature never inured to hardship, and when the hour of danger came he sought a refuge in suicide. Not long after his death there arose a curious rumour in the East, that he had come to life again, or had not really died. The East had seen nothing but his best side, and this rumour, born of a desire to see him emperor again, seriously endangered the peace of the Empire, as more than one person came forward claiming to be Nero.

Of the trial or trials of St. Paul we know nothing certain. It is highly probable that his appeal was heard either before a committee of the Emperor's privy council, or before the Emperor's deputy, the prefect of the city. A. SOUTER.

NEST (qēn).—Used literally of birds' nests (Dt 22² 32¹, Job 39², Ps 84³ 104¹⁷, Pr 27⁵, Is 16⁷); metaphorically for a lofty fortress (Nu 24², Jer 49⁴, Ob 4, Hab 2³); Job refers to his lost home as a nest (29¹⁵); in Gn 6⁴ the 'rooms' of the ark are (see Mg.) literally 'nests' (qinnīm). In Mt 8²⁰, Lk 9⁵⁸ our Lord contrasts His wandering, homeless life with that of the birds which have their 'nests' (kataskēdēsets, R.Vm 'lodging-places'). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

NETHANEL.—1. The 'prince' of Issachar (Nu 18²⁵ 71⁵, 22¹⁰). 2. One of David's brothers (1 Ch 24⁴). 3. A priest in the time of David (1 Ch 15²⁴). 4. A Levite (1 Ch 24⁶). 5. One of Obad-edom's sons (1 Ch 26⁴). 6. A 'prince' sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁷). 7. A chief of the Levites under Josiah (2 Ch 35⁹ [1 Es 1⁹ Nathanael]). 8. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²² [1 Es 9²² Nathanael]). 9. A priest in time of Joiakim (Neh 12²¹). 10. A Levite musician (Neh 12³⁶).

NETHANIAH.—1. The father of Ishmael the murderer of Gedaliah (2 K 25²³, 28, Jer 40⁸, 14, 18 41¹, 61, 9, 108, 181, 19). 2. An Asaphite (1 Ch 25¹², 19). 3. A Levite (2 Ch 17⁹). 4. The father of Jehudi (Jer 36¹⁴).

NETHINIM.—The word is a late form of a passive participle nēthūnim, and denotes 'men who are given.' In early days, when sacrifices were offered in the open air, there was little difficulty occasioned by the odour and dirt arising from the blood, fat, and ashes. But when they were offered within the walls of a temple, and offered with great frequency and with large numbers of victims, some very disagreeable drudgery was always necessary. The chopping of wood, lighting of fires, sharpening of knives, drawing of water, the cleansing not only of the altar and its surroundings and utensils, but of the whole of the Temple precincts, and the performance of many menial offices for the priests, required a large staff of servants. The analogy of other lands suggests that these offices would be performed by slaves, procured either by purchase or capture. The Greeks had hierodouloi, 'temple slaves,' and the Mohammedans at Mecca similarly. It is not known at what date the practice arose in Israel; but there seem to have been three stages in the history of Temple servants. (1) They were slaves in the strict sense; (2) they were admitted to Israelite privileges, being circumcised, and treated as free men holding an official position in the Church; (3) they rose in standing and prestige so as to become practically equivalent to the Levites.

1. The name Nethinim is not used before the Exile. Ezr 8²⁰ speaks of the Nethinim as those 'whom David and the princes had given for the service of the Levites,' which shows, at least, that common belief traced their origin back to David. A very similar class of persons, 'the children of Solomon's servants,' is mentioned in Ezr 2³⁵⁻³⁸, Neh 7²⁷⁻⁴⁰ 11²; their descent was evidently traced to the non-Israelite slaves employed by Solomon in connexion with his buildings, some of whom must have laboured in the new royal sanctuary (cf. 1 K 9¹⁹⁻²¹). This employment of foreign slaves in the Temple continued till the beginning of the Exile (Ezk 44¹⁻¹¹).

2. A change in the status of these men was brought about by the Exile. When the people were far from the land, every one who had held any sort of position in the Temple must have gained a certain prestige. The former Temple-slaves seemed to have formed themselves into a guild. By the very fact of their exile, they were freed from their slavery to the Temple, and thus when they and their sons returned to Jerusalem, they returned as free men, who were recognized as part of the nation. As a guild, they acquired for themselves the title Nethinim, owing to their traditional origin. In Ezr 2³⁵⁻³⁸, 70 = Neh 7⁴⁵⁻⁵⁸, 73 are given the names of the Nethinim who are reported to have returned with Zerubbabel; and they are mentioned together with priests, Levites, singers, and porters. Some of the names in the list are undoubtedly of foreign origin. Again, Ezra relates (8³⁰) that on his return, 220 Nethinim from Caspasia accompanied him. After a time we find them so completely established as a sacred official class, that privileges are accorded to them. They shared with priests, Levites, singers, and porters, immunity from taxation (Ezr 7²⁴). They lived in a special quarter of the city, named Ophel, i.e. the southern and eastern slope of the Temple hill, or more particularly that part of it which reached to the Water-gate on the east, and to the tower projecting from the royal palace (Neh 3²⁸). They were thus near the Temple, and Bp. Ryle (Ezra, etc., p. lviii) points out the appropriateness of assigning to 'drawers of water' the position by the Water-gate, which communicated with the Virgin's Spring. And v. 31 mentions 'the house of the Nethinim,' which must have been an official building used by them during their periods of duty. They were under the command of two chiefs—of whom one, at least, was a member of their own body—Ziha and Gishpa (Neh 11²⁰); the former is the first in the list, in Ezr 2³⁵ = Neh 7⁴⁶, and Gishpa may possibly be the same as Hasupha, the second name. Further, only a portion of them, like the priests, Levites, singers, and porters, dwelt in Jerusalem; the others 'dwelt in their cities' (Ezr 2⁷⁰ = Neh 7⁷³, 1 Ch 9²). And so far were they from being regarded as foreign slaves, that they joined, as full members of the community, in the oath that they would not (among other things) allow their sons and daughters to marry any but Israelites (Neh 10³⁰⁻³²).

3. From this point the Nethinim gradually rose in official position, until they were indistinguishable from the Levites. In 1 Ch 23²⁸ the Levites are spoken of in such a way as to suggest that the term included all Temple-servants. And conversely, since singers and doorkeepers (who are quite distinct from Levites in Ezr-Neh.) were explicitly reckoned by the Chronicler as Levites (1 Ch 15¹⁶ 26¹⁻¹⁹), it is probable that the same was the case with the Nethinim. Finally, in

1 Es 1⁸ the Levites, and in 8²²⁻²⁵ the Nethinim, are described by the same term, hierodouloi.

NETOPHAH.—A town, the name of which first occurs in the list of the exiles who returned under Zerubbabel (Ezr 2²² = Neh 7²⁶ = 1 Es 5¹⁸ Netophas). Perhaps the name is preserved in the modern Beit Netif at the entrance to the Wady es-Sunt or Vale of Elah. The gentile name the Netophathite(s) occurs in 2 S 23²⁸, 2 K 25²³, Jer 40⁸.

NETOPHAS (1 Es 5¹⁸) = Netophah of Ezr 2²² || Neh 7²⁶.

NETS were used in taking wild animals (see HUNTING), and birds (see SNARES); but their main use has always been in fishing. The ancient Hebrews were not fishermen, nor do they seem to have eaten much fish. There is no reference in OT to fishing in the inland waters of Palestine. The fishermen and the implements named are either Egyptian or Phœnician. The 'fisher-partners' of Job 41⁶ are Phœnicians; the fishermen of Is 19⁸ are Egyptians. Fish were taken along the Mediterranean coast with 'line and hook' (Job 41¹, Is 19⁸, Am 4²), and the 'fish-spear' or 'harpoon' (Job 41⁷). But sufficient quantities for commercial purposes could be obtained only by means of nets. (a) Heb. mikmār (Is 51²⁰) and makmār (Ps 141¹⁰) and the fem. forms mikmāreth (Is 19⁸) and mikmereth (Hab 1¹⁵⁻¹⁶) is probably = Gr. sagēnē (Mt 13⁴⁷), the Arab. jarf, 'draw-net.' It is as much as 400 metres long, 20 ft. deep, and of fine mesh, so that it sweeps everything before it. From the stern of a boat it is paid out in a great semicircle, the lower edge carried down by lead sinkers, the upper sustained by cork floats. It is then drawn ashore, with its contents, by ropes attached to the ends. Fishermen swim behind, diving to ease it over stones and other obstructions. This accounts for Simon Peter's condition (Jn 21⁷). (b) Heb. chērem (Ezk 26⁵, Hab 1¹⁵ etc.), Gr. amphiblēstron (Mt 14¹⁸ etc.), the mod. shabakh, 'cast-net.' It is circular, of close mesh, with a cord attached to the centre. The fisherman gathers it together, arranges it on his arm and shoulder, and moves, or wades, stealthily along the shore until he sees signs of fish within reach; then, with a skilful cast, the net flies out and drops full circle on the water; lead beads round the circumference carry it to the bottom, enclosing the fish, which are then secured at leisure. (c) A net used to-day, called m'batten, consists of three nets strung on a single rope, the two outer being of wide, the inner of close, mesh. It is let down in fairly deep water, parallel with the shore. The fish pass through the outer net, pushing the inner before them through the wide meshes on the other side, thus being entangled. The net is pulled up and emptied into the boats. (d) Gr. diktyon (Mt 4²⁰ etc.) is a term used for nets in general. In the LXX amphiblēstron and sagēnē are used indiscriminately as tr. alike of chērem and mikmār, etc.

A tax is levied on all fish caught in the Sea of Galilee. The favourite fishing-grounds are near 'Ain el-Fūlyeh, south of el-Mejdel; the bay at el-Tabigha; and the waters of el-Batiah in the N.E. The Upper Jordan and el-Hāleh lie within the private lands of the Sultan, to whom payment is made for fishing rights. See an excellent account of 'The Fisheries of Galilee' in PEFSI, Jan. 1908, p. 40 ff., by Dr. Masterman of Jerusalem.

NETTLE.—1. chārūl (Job 30⁷, Pr 24³¹, Zeph 2⁹), more probably a generic name for thorn bushes growing in the wilderness, such as the Zizyphus and varieties of acacia. 2. qimmōs (Is 34¹³, Hos 9⁶), qimmēsōnīm (Pr 24³¹ EV 'thorns'). These words all refer probably to nettles, which are abundant in deserted places in Palestine.

NEW BIRTH.—See REGENERATION.

NEW MOON.—See FEASTS, § 2, and MOON.

NEW TESTAMENT.—See BIBLE, CANON OF NT, TEXT OF NT.

NEZIAH.—The name of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁵⁴, Neh 7⁵⁴); called in 1 Es 5²² Nasi or Nasith (the latter form in AV and RVm).

NEZIB.—A town in the Shephēlah of Judah (Jos 15⁴⁸); the present Beit Nusib, 7 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis on the road to Hebron.

NIBHAZ.—An idol of the Avvites (2 K 17³¹). But the Heb. text is corrupt, and no identification of this deity is possible.

NIBSHAN.—A city in the desert of Judah (Jos 15⁶²). The name has not been recovered.

NICANOR.—1. Son of Patroclus, a Syrian general who was engaged in the Jewish wars (1 Mac 3³⁸). He was sent by Lysias in B.C. 166 against Judas Maccabaeus, but was defeated. Five years later he was sent on the same errand by Demetrius; this time he endeavoured to win by strategy what he had failed to gain by force. Again he was compelled to fight, and was twice defeated, once at Capharsalama (1 Mac 7²⁶⁻³²), and again at Adasa, where he lost his life. The day of his death was ordained to be kept as a festival as 'Nicanor's Day.' The account in 2 Mac (esp. 14¹²⁻³⁰) differs in several details. 2. One of the 'Seven' (Ac 6⁵).

T. A. MOXON.

NICODEMUS.—A Pharisee and a member of the Sanhedrin (Jn 3¹⁻²¹), elderly (3⁴) and evidently well-to-do (19²⁹). He is mentioned only in the Fourth Gospel, and there he figures thrice. (1) At the outset of His ministry Jesus went up to Jerusalem to keep the Feast of the Passover, and His miracles made a deep impression on Nicodemus, half persuading him that He was the Messiah; inasmuch that he interviewed Him secretly under cover of the darkness (Jn 3¹⁻²¹). He began by raising the question of the miracles, which, he allowed, proved Jesus at the least a God-commissioned teacher; but Jesus interrupted him and set him face to face with the urgent and personal matter of regeneration. Nicodemus went away bewildered, but a seed had been planted in his soul. (2) During the third year of His ministry, Jesus went up to the Feast of Tabernacles (October). The rulers were now His avowed enemies, and they convened a meeting of the Sanhedrin to devise measures against Him (7⁴⁶⁻⁵²). Nicodemus was present, and, a disciple at heart but afraid to avow his faith, he merely raised a point of order: 'Doth our law judge a man, except it first hear himself and know what he doeth?' (RV). (3) At the meeting of the Sanhedrin which condemned Jesus to death Nicodemus made no protest; probably he absented himself. But after the Crucifixion, ashamed of his cowardice, he at last avowed himself and joined with Joseph of Arimathea in giving the Lord's body a kingly burial (19³⁹).

DAVID SMITH.

NICOLAITANS.—See next article.

NICOLAS (lit. 'conqueror of the people').—Among the Seven chosen in Ac 6 to minister to the Hellenists or Greek-speaking Jews, was Nicolas, a 'proselyte of Antioch.' The remaining six, we infer, were of Jewish birth, for 'proselyte' is the emphatic word (6⁹). At a later age the Jews divided converts to Judaism into two classes, 'proselytes of righteousness,' who were circumcised and who kept the whole Law, and 'proselytes of the gate,' who had only a somewhat undefined connexion with Israel. It is probable that this difference in its essence also holds in NT, where the latter class are called 'God-fearing' or 'devout,' a description which in Acts appears to be technical (so Lightfoot, Ramsay; this is disputed, however). If the view here stated be true, there were three stages in the advance towards the idea of a Catholic Church: (1) the admission of Nicolas, a full proselyte, to office in the Christian Church, followed by the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, also probably a full proselyte (8²⁷); (2) the baptism of Cornelius, a 'God-fearing' proselyte, i.e. of the latter class; (3) the direct admission of heathen to the Church without their having had any connexion with Judaism.

Nicolas is not further mentioned in NT, but Irenæus and Hippolytus assert that he was the founder of the Nicolaitans of Rev 2¹⁵ (if indeed a real sect is there meant); and Lightfoot thinks that 'there might well be a heresiarch among the Seven' (Galatians, p. 297). It is, however, equally probable that this was only a vain claim of the late 2nd cent. sect of that name mentioned by Tertullian, for both heretics and orthodox of that and succeeding ages apocryphally claimed Apostolic authority for their opinions and writings; or it is not unlikely that the Nicolaitans of Rev 2 were so called because they exaggerated and distorted in an antinomian sense the doctrine of Nicolas, who probably preached the liberty of the gospel. Irenæus and Hippolytus are not likely to have known more about the matter than we do. A. J. MACLEAN.

NICOPOLIS, or the 'city of victory,' was founded by Augustus in B.C. 31, on the spot where he had had his camp before the battle of Actium. It was made a Roman colony, and was peopled by citizens drawn from various places in Acarnania and Ætolia.

In Tit 3¹² St. Paul writes, 'Give diligence to come unto me to Nicopolis; for there I have determined to winter.' It may be taken as certain that this means Nicopolis in Epirus, from which doubtless St. Paul hoped to begin the evangelization of that province. No other city of the name was in such a position, or so important as to claim six months of the Apostle's time.

The importance of Nicopolis depended partly on the 'Actian games,' partly on some commerce and fisheries. It was destroyed by the Goths, and, though restored by Justinian, it was supplanted in the Middle Ages by Prevesa, which grew up a little farther south. There are extensive ruins on its site. A. E. HILLARD.

NIGER.—The second name of Symeon, one of the prophets and teachers in the Church of Antioch (Ac 13¹). His name Symeon shows his Jewish origin, and Niger was probably the Gentile name which he assumed. Nothing further is known of him.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

NIGHT.—See TIME.

NIGHT-HAWK (tachmās).—An unclean bird (Lv 11¹⁶, Dt 14¹⁶). What the tachmās really was is merely a matter of speculation. A species of owl, the ostrich, and even the cuckoo, have all been suggested, but without any convincing reasons. 'Night-hawk' is merely another name for the familiar night-jar or goat-sucker (Caprimulgus), of which three species are known in Palestine. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

NIGHT MONSTER.—See LILITH.

NILE.—The Greek name of the river, of uncertain derivation. The Egyptian name was Hopi, later Yer-o, 'Great River,' but the Hebrew generally designates the Nile by the plain Egyptian word for 'river,' Ye'ôr. The Nile was rich in fish, and the home of the crocodile and hippopotamus. It bore most of the internal traffic of Egypt; but it was pre-eminently the one source of water, and so of life and fertility, in a land which, without it, would have been desert. The White Nile sends down from the Central African lakes a steady stream, which is greatly increased in summer and autumn, when the half-dry beds of the Bahr el-Azrek and the Atbara are filled by the torrential rains annually poured on the mountains of Abyssinia. The waters of these tributaries are charged with organic matter washed down by the floods, and this is spread over the fields of Egypt by the inundation. The height of the Nile rise was measured and recorded by the Egyptians from the earliest times: on it depended almost wholly the harvest of the year, and a great excess might be as harmful as a deficiency. The rise begins about June 19, and after increasing slowly for a month the river gains rapidly till September; at the end of September it becomes stationary, but rises again, reaching its highest level about the middle of October. The crops were shown as the water retreated, and on the lower ground a second crop was obtained by artificial irrigation. Canals and embankments regulated the waters in ancient times. The water was raised for the irrigation of the fields by shadufs, i.e. buckets hung from the end of dipping poles, and hand-scoops, and carried by small channels which could be opened or stopped with a little mud and cut herbage: by this means the flow was directed to particular fields or parts of fields as might be required. Water-wheels were probably introduced in Greek times. In modern days, vast dams to store the water against the time of low Nile, and steam pumps (in Lower Egypt) to raise it, have changed the aspect of high Nile and revolutionized the system of irrigation; but for the smaller operations the old methods are still practised. The Nile had seven mouths, of which the western (the Canopic) and the eastern (the Pelusiac) were the most important. The former secured most of the traffic with Greece and the islands, the latter with the Phœnicians. The Pelusiac arm, on which Tahpanhes and Pi-beseth lay, would be best known to the inhabitants of Palestine. Now the ancient mouths are silted up; only a western (Rosetta branch) and a central one (Damiatta branch) survive. The worship of the Nile-god must have been prominent in popular festivals, but has not left much monumental trace. The Nile was not one of the great gods, and his figure appears chiefly as emblematic of the river, e.g. bringing offerings to the gods; the figure is that of an obese man with water-plants on his head.

The Egyptians seem to have imagined a connexion of the Nile southwards with the Indian Ocean, and the priests taught the absurd notion that it gushed out north and south from two springs at the First Cataract. They also fancied a Nile in heaven producing rain, and another underground feeding the springs. The 'seven lean years' in Genesis is paralleled by an Egyptian tradition of a much earlier seven years' famine under the 3rd Dyn., and years of famine due to insufficient rise of the Nile are referred to in more than one hieroglyphic text.

NIMRAH.—See BETH-NIMRAH.

NIMRIM, THE WATERS OF (Is 15⁶, Jer 48³⁴).—Named along with Zoar and Horonaim, and must therefore be sought in the S. of Moab. The Onomasticon ('Neimerim') places it to the N. of Zoar. The name seems to be found in Wady N'meirah, which opens on the E. shore, at Burj en-N'meirah, about three miles from the S. end of the Dead Sea. W. EWING.

NIMROD (Gn 10⁸⁻¹², 1 Ch 1¹⁰, Mic 5⁶).—A legendary personage, described in Gn 10^{8ff.} as the first of the 'heroes,' 'a mighty hunter before the Lord,' the ruler of four ancient Babylonian cities, and the founder of the Assyrian Empire. In the statement that he was begotten by Cush, we have probably a reference to the Kash or Kasshu who conquered Babylonia about the 17th cent. B.C., and set up a dynasty which lasted 600 years: the rise of Assyria is said to date from the decline of Babylonia under the later Kassite kings. The nearest Babylonian parallel to the figure of Nimrod as yet discovered is Gilgamesh, the tyrant of Erech, whose adventures are recorded in the famous series of tablets to which the Deluge-story belongs, and who is supposed to be the hero so often represented on seals and palace-reliefs in victorious combat with a lion. It was at one time hoped that the actual name Nimrod might be recovered from the ideogram commonly read as IZ.DU.BAR; and though this expectation has been dispelled by the discovery of the true pronunciation Gilgamesh, there is enough general resemblance to warrant the belief that the original of the Biblical Nimrod belongs to Babylonian lore. The combination of warlike prowess with a passion for the chase is illustrated by the numerous hunting scenes sculptured on the monuments; and it may well be imagined that to the Hebrew mind Nimrod became an ideal personation of the proud monarchs who ruled the mighty empires on the Euphrates and the Tigris.

NIMSHI.—Grandfather of king Jehu (1 K 9¹⁶ 2 K 9². 14. 20, 2 Ch 22⁷).

NINEVEH (Assyr. Ninā, Ninūa) is said in Gn. 10¹¹ to have been founded by Nimrod in Assyria. Nineveh was included in the dominions of Hammurabi, who restored the temple of Ishtar there. It was early an important city, and is frequently referred to in the royal inscriptions, but Sennacherib first raised it to the position of capital of Assyria. It lay on the E. of the Tigris, opposite the modern Mosul. Its chief remains are buried beneath the mounds of Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus, but the outline of the old walls can be traced. They enclosed some 1,800 acres, with a circumference of about 8 miles. The mound of Kouyunjik is separated from the mound of Nebi Yunus by the Khoser, and overlies the palaces of Sennacherib to the S., and Ashurbanipal to the N. The southern mound, Nebi Yunus, covers palaces of Sennacherib and Esarhaddon. The Nineveh of Sennacherib's day lay largely outside this area, and included the Rabit Ninūa, or Rehoboth-ir, which extended as far as Khorsa bad, where Sargon built a great city, Dūr-Sargon. The traditions of its great size may be due to a reminiscence of this outer girdle of inhabited country. The fall of Nineveh (B.C. 606) is referred to by Nahum and Zephaniah (21³⁻¹⁵). 2 K 19³⁶ and Is 37³⁷ know it as the city of Sennacherib. For Jonah's mission, see JONAH. Later, Tobit (1¹⁰. 17 etc.) and Judith (1) refer to it, and the Ninevites are named in Mt 12⁴, Lk 11³⁰. 32.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

NIPHIS (1 Es 5²¹) perhaps = Magbish in Ezr 2³⁰.

NISAN.—See TIME.

NISROCH.—An Assyrian deity in whose temple Sennacherib was worshipped when assassinated (2 K 19³⁷, Is 37³⁸).

Gesenius compared the name with the Arabic nīsr ('eagle'), and conjectured that it referred to one of the eagle-headed divinities that appear in the bas-reliefs. In later times attempts have been made to identify Nisroch with Nusku (the fire-god)—whose name would naturally be most familiar in the construct form Nusuk,—and even with Marduk. But Nusku did not at this period occupy a sufficiently prominent position in the Assyrian pantheon; and the idea of Marduk, the great god of Babylon, being the patron of Sennacherib, the arch-enemy of that city, is manifestly incongruous. The deity that should logically hold this place is Ashur. Accordingly Prince suggests that Nisroch is a hybrid form due to a confusion of Ashur with Nusku. But comparison with the Greek forms seems to indicate that the original reading was something similar to Asorach. This Schrader explains as Ashurach, a hypothetical lengthened form of Ashur. And Meinhold conjectures a compound (Ashur-Aku) of Ashur with Aku, the Sumerian name of the moon-god, whose Assyrian nan Sin is an element in the name Sennacherib.

W. M. NESBIT.

NITRE, in its modern usage, denotes saltpetre, nitrate of potash, but the nitron or nitrum of the ancients was a different substance, natron, carbonate of soda. 'Nitre' occurs twice in AV. In Pr 25²⁰ the effect of songs on a heavy heart is compared to the action of vinegar upon 'nitre' (RVm 'soda'). Vinegar has no effect upon saltpetre, but with carbonate of soda it produces effervescence. In Jer 2²² 'nitre' (RV 'lye') is referred to as a cleansing agent. Here, again, natron rather than modern nitre suits the connexion.

NO.—Jer 46², Ezk 30¹⁴. 15. 16, the name of Thebes (Diospolis Magna), Egypt. N2: also No-amon, Nah 3⁴, Amon (Ammon) being the god of the city. Nahum seems to imagine Thebes as resembling the cities of the less remote Delta surrounded by canals, which were their chief protection; in reality it lay on both banks of the Nile, with desert bounding it on either side, and water probably played little part in its defence. Thebes was of no importance until the Middle Kingdom (Dyans. 11, 12), during which the royal families were much connected with it. It was the capital of the local 17th Dyn., struggling against the Hyksos in the name of its god Ammon; and the great warriors of the succeeding 18th Dyn. enriched Thebes with the spoils of conquest, built temples there that surpassed all others in size and magnificence, and made it the greatest city of the Empire. Under the 19th and 20th Dynasties, Ammon was still the national god, and Thebes the capital of Egypt. Later, Memphis again took the first place, but Thebes was at least the religious centre of the wide-spread Ammon worship, and the temples retained much of their wealth until the sack of the city by king Ashurbanipal (about B.C. 666), referred to in Nahum. The temples of Thebes continued to be added to until insurrections under the Ptolemys led to its destruction and final abandonment as a city. In Jer 46²³ (RV) 'I will punish Ammon of No and Pharaoh and Egypt with her gods and their kings,' Ammon is probably not taken as the representative god of Egypt, a position which he no longer held in the 6th cent. B.C.: the passage rather indicates the completeness of Egypt's fall by the punishment of the remote Thebes, which could not be accomplished till Lower Egypt was prostrate. The Theban Ammon was often entitled 'Amen-Rê, king of the gods,' being identified with the sun-god Rê. His figure is that of a man, generally coloured green. The ram was his sacred animal. In Ethiopia he was adopted as the national god, and his worship was established in the Oases, especially in the Oasis of Ammon (Siwa), where his oracle was visited by Alexander.

NOADIAH.—1. A Levite in time of Ezra (Ezr 8²³); called in 1 Es 8²³ Moeth. 2. A prophetess, who opposed Nehemiah (Neh 6¹⁴).

NOAH.—1. Nôach, 'rest.' The name is explained in Gn 5²⁹ by a play on nicham, 'to comfort'; but perhaps the reading supported by the LXX should be adopted, 'This same shall give us rest.' In one tradition Noah is the hero of the Flood, and answers to Ut-napishtim in the Bab. legend. See DELUGE. Ut-napishtim was translated to immortality; and this is perhaps referred to in 6⁹ (cf. 5²⁴ and see ENOCH). In another tradition he is the discoverer of the art of making wine (9²⁰⁻²⁷). Elsewhere in the Bible, besides the references to the Flood, Noah is mentioned in 1 Ch 1⁴, Ezk 14¹⁴, 2¹⁰, Lk 3³⁶. 2. Nô'ah (Nu 26³³ 27¹ 36¹, Jos 17³). One of the daughters of Zelophehad, of the tribe of Manasseh. They claimed their father's inheritance because he had died leaving no sons. It was given to them, on condition that they were not married into another tribe.

A. H. M'NEILE.

NO-AMON.—See No.

NOB.—A place of this name is mentioned in three passages—1 S 21, 22, Neh 11³³, Is 10³² (text not quite certain). The context in the two latter passages points to a place near Jerusalem. In 1 Sam., David passes Nob, which has become 'the city of priests' after the destruction of Shiloh, on his way from Saul (in Gibeah, wh. see) to Gath; this would suit a site near Jerusalem, though it does not demand such a position, unless, indeed, we infer (cf. 1 S 20⁶) that David went to Nob with the intention of proceeding to Bethlehem (5 miles S. of Jerusalem). There is no strong reason against assuming that in all three passages the same place is referred to. In Neh 11³³ and Is 10³² Nob is closely connected with Anathoth, 2½ miles N. of Jerusalem. Since in Is 10³² Nob is the last point reached by the Assyrian army and the place from which it threatens Jerusalem, the site is best sought for on an eminence a little N. of the city, perhaps in particular (with Driver) on 'the Ras el-Meshârif, about 1½ miles S.W. of Anathoth, the ridge from the brow of which the pilgrim along the north road still catches his first view of the holy city.'

The name has not survived; and the identification suggested stands or falls with the correctness of the Hebrew text in Is 10³².

G. B. GRAY.

NOBAH.—1. The clan name of the Israelites who conquered the city of Kenath (wh. see). 2. A place named with Jorjebah in the account of Gideon's pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 6³¹), possibly also in Nu 21³⁰, where the Syr. reads 'Nobah which is on the desert,' instead of 'Nophah which reacheth unto Medeba.' This may have been the original settlement of the clan of that name. It should be sought, probably, near the upper reaches of the Jabbok; but the site has not been recovered.

W. EWING.

NOBAI.—One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹⁹). Cf. NEBO, 1.

NOD.—According to Gn 4¹⁴, the country in which Cain the fratricide took up his abode after his sentence of banishment. The place is unknown. It is probably connected in some way etymologically with the epithet nâd of v. 14 (RV 'wanderer'). The addition 'eastward of Eden' is of little help for its location.

J. F. M'CURDY.

NODAB.—The name of a tribe mentioned in 1 Ch 5¹⁰, along with Naphish and Jetur, as among the foes encountered and subdued by the Reubenites. A comparison with various readings of LXX shows that the vowels of the word are uncertain. An identification with the Nabatæans is excluded both on phonological grounds and by the fact that the latter, whose position was in any case too remote from Reuben, did not appear in history till long after the tribal period of the Hebrews had come to an end. Somewhat more plausible is a combination with a modern village Nudbe in the Hauran.

J. F. M'CURDY.

NOEBA (1 Es 5²¹) = Nekoda Ezr 2¹⁸, Nekodan 1 Es 5²⁷.

NOGAH.—One of David's sons, born at Jerusalem (1 Ch 37 14⁶).

NOHAH.—Fourth 'son' of Benjamin (1 Ch 8²). See also MENUHAH.

NOISOME.—'Noisome' is literally 'annoy-some.' The adj. means 'offensive,' 'injurious' in AV; the word is now rather rarely used, but when it is used it means 'loathsome' rather than 'hurtful.'

NOOMA (1 Es 9³⁸) = Nebo in Ezr 10⁴.

NOPH.—See MEMPHIS.

NOPHAH.—See NOBAH.

NORTH COUNTRY, LAND OF THE NORTH.—A phrase of somewhat vague application, but denoting in a general fashion—1. The source or region from which dangerous foes were to come upon Palestine (so in Jer 6²² 10²², Zec 6⁵ 8). 2. The regions to which the people of Israel or Judah had been exiled, and whence they were to be restored (so in Jer 31⁸ 16¹⁴ 23³ 31⁸, Zec 2⁹). 3. Northern Syria (so Jer 46¹⁰). The last-named instance explains itself. The other applications of the term may be further illustrated by the usage of the word 'north' generally in OT. Here it is sufficient to recall the general fact that, while in the early history of Israel the land was invaded by many small peoples from the east and south, after the rise of the Assyrian and Chaldean powers the attacks were made by larger armies which came in the course of their march down through Syria or the Mediterranean coast-land, the eastern desert route being impossible. Deportations of captives were naturally effected by the same routes, and by the same routes they would return. Thus, though Babylonia was in the same latitude as Palestine, it was included among the countries of the 'north.'

J. F. M'CURDY.

NOSE, NOSTRILS ('aph is the usual word; nêchtrîm only in Job 41²; nachar in Job 39²⁰, Av 'nostrils,' RV, correctly, 'snorting').—To have a flat, or more probably 'slit' nose (Lv 21¹⁸), disqualified a man for the making of offerings. The nose is the organ of the breath by which men live (Gn 2⁷ etc.). The breath is easily stopped or expelled, hence the fact signifies the transiency of human life (Is 2²). Excited breathing, with distention of the nostrils when moved by indignation, led to the nose being used fig. for anger (Gn 27⁴, and very often). Ezk 8¹⁷ refers to the custom of putting a twig to the nose, apparently in idolatrous worship, the significance of which is now obscure. For 'nose-ring,' see ORNAMENTS, § 2.

W. EWING.

NOUGHT.—See NAUGHT; and notice, further, the phrase 'set at nought' (Pr 1², Mk 9¹²). 'To set' is 'to value,' and 'nought' is 'nothing,' so the phrase means to reckon of no value.

NOVICE.—In 1 Ti 3⁶ it is enjoined that the bishop must not be a novice. The Gr. word (neophytos, lit. 'newly planted') was afterwards used in the technical sense of one who has not yet taken religious vows. Here it is general—one newly introduced into the Christian community.

NUMBER.—1. Notation.—The decimal scale of notation was used by the Israelites, Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and, so far as we know, by the other nations mentioned in the Bible, i.e. they reckoned by units, tens, hundreds, etc.

2. Variety and range of numerical terminology.—The Heb. language expressed the integers from one to any amount by words denoting units, tens, a hundred, two hundred, a thousand, two thousand, ten thousand, twenty thousand, and by combinations of these words. Thus the highest number expressed by a single word 'twenty thousand,' the word used meaning double ten thousand. The word 'millions' in AV of Gn 24⁶⁰ is a mistranslation; it should be 'ten thousands' as in RV. The number referred to in this verse, 'thousands of ten thousands,' for the descendants hoped for from Rebekah, and the number of the angels in Dn 7¹⁰, Rev 5¹¹, 'thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him,' if taken literally, would be the largest numbers mentioned in the Bible, but they are merely rhetorical phrases for countless, indefinitely large numbers. In Rev 7⁹ the redeemed are 'a great multitude which no man could number' (cf. Gn 13¹⁶)—the nearest approach which the Bible makes to the mathematical idea of infinity.

The largest literal number in the Bible is the number of Israelites fit for warlike service, ascertained by David's census as 1,100,000, in addition to the men of Judah 470,000 (1 Ch 21⁵). In 2 S 24⁹, however, the numbers are 800,000 and 500,000 respectively. Close to this comes the army of Zerah (2 Ch 14⁹), 'a thousand thousand,' i.e. 1,000,000; and in 2 Ch 17¹², Jehoshaphat has an army in five divisions, of 300,000, 280,000, 200,000, 200,000, 180,000 respectively. The number of fighting men amongst the Israelites is given in Nu 2²⁵ as 603,550; and later on in Nu 26⁴¹ as 601,730.

Hebrew also possessed a few special forms for the ordinals, first, second, etc., and to denote 'seven times,' etc.; in other cases, especially for the higher numbers, the cardinals are used. There are also a few words for fractions, 'a third,' 'a quarter.'

The Biblical Greek calls for no special comment; the writers had at their disposal the ordinary resources of Hellenistic Greek. We may, however, call attention to the disputed rendering in Mt 18²², where RV has 'seventy times seven,' RvM 'seventy times and seven.'

3. Symbols.—In the Heb. text of the OT, and also for the most part in the Gr. text of the NT, numbers are denoted by words. This method is also the only one used in the two ancient Heb. inscriptions—the Moabite Stone (rather later than Ahab), and the Siloam inscription (usually ascribed to the time of Hezekiah). As the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Phoenicians used figures as well as words to denote numbers, it is possible that the Israelites also had arithmetical figures; but at present there is no positive evidence of such a usage.

In later times the Jews used consonants as numerical signs; the units from one to nine were denoted by the first nine letters, the tens from ten to ninety by the next nine, and the hundreds from one hundred to four hundred by the remaining four letters. Other numbers were denoted by combinations of letters. A curious feature of this system is that the natural combination for 15, viz. Yod = 10, He = 5, was not used because 'Yod, He,' or Yah was a form of the sacred name Yahweh, which might not be pronounced; accordingly Teth = 9 and Waw = 6 were substituted. This system is still commonly used to number the chapters and verses in Heb. Bibles. A similar system was also used by the Greeks, and is occasionally found in the NT; thus the Number of the Beast, 666, in Rev 13¹⁸, is written by means of three letters.

4. Arithmetic.—There is no evidence of proficiency in arithmetic beyond the simplest operations, but we have examples of addition in connexion with the census in the wilderness, the numbers of the separate tribes being given first and then the total (Nu 1²⁸, 26⁵⁴); subtraction is referred to in Lv 27¹⁸; an instance of multiplication is Lv 25⁸, 7 × 7 = 49; and Lv 25¹⁰ implies a kind of rule of three sum.

5. Round Numbers.—As in other languages, 'round numbers,' exact tens, hundreds, thousands, etc., must often have been used by the Israelites, on the understanding that they were only approximately accurate; and in the same way smaller numbers were sometimes used indefinitely for 'a few'; cf. our 'half a dozen.' For instance, the exact ten thousands of Jehoshaphat's armies given above are doubtless round numbers. Again, in Lv 26⁸, 'five of you shall chase a hundred,' merely means, 'a handful of you shall put to flight many times your own number.' This indefinite use of a small number is specially common where two consecutive units are given as alternatives, e.g. Is 17⁶, 'two or three,' 'four or five.' A variety of this idiom is the use of two consecutive units to introduce emphatically the higher of the two; e.g. Pr 30²¹ 'For three things the earth doth tremble, and for four which it cannot bear'; then four things are enumerated. In addition to hundreds and thousands and ten thousands, the most common number used in this approximate way is 'forty': people constantly live or reign for 'forty years' or multiples of forty years. It is a matter of opinion how far the numerous 'sevens,' 'tens,' and 'twelves' were originally intended as exact numbers. Probably, however, in many cases what were originally round numbers were taken afterwards to be exact. For instance, David's reign is given as 40 years, 2 S 5⁴; in the next verse this period is explained as made up of 7½ years at Hebron and 33 at Jerusalem—an explanation which implies that, apart from some odd months, the 40 years were the actual length of the reign. There are some indications, too, that the various 40's and 80's were added in with other numbers to obtain a continuous chronology. Again, in Nu 3³⁹ the census gives 22,000 Levites, which one would naturally understand as a round number; but in vv. 43-51 it is taken as an exact number, inasmuch as it is ordained that because the 22,273 firstborn exceed the Levites by 273, redemption-money shall be paid for the surplus.

In view of the references to captains of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens in Dt 1⁸, it has been suggested that these terms are sometimes not numerals but names corresponding to our regiment, company, squad, etc., and denoting bodies of men whose numbers varied. 'Thousand' especially has been held to be a term denoting 'tribe' or 'clan' (see Jg 6¹⁸, 1 S 10¹⁹); so that 'a thousand' might contain comparatively few men. This view has been applied to make the census in the Bk. of Numbers more credible by reducing the total amounts; but it is clear that the narrative as it stands intends 'thousand' to be a numeral, and does not use the word for a 'clan.'

6. Accuracy of numbers.—Without attempting an exhaustive consideration of the accuracy of numbers as given by the original authors, we may point out that we should not expect a large measure of mathematical accuracy even in original numbers. Often, as we have seen, they are apparently given as round numbers. Moreover, in the case of large numbers they would seldom be ascertained by careful enumeration. The numbers of armies—especially hostile armies—of slain, and so forth, would usually be given on a rough estimate; and such estimates are seldom accurate, but for the most part exaggerated. Moreover, primitive historical criticism revelled in constructing hypothetical statistics on the slightest data, or to put the matter less prosaically, the Oriental imagination loved to play with figures, the larger the better.

But apart from any question as to the accuracy of the original figures, the transmission of the text by repeated copying for hundreds and thousands of years introduces a large element of uncertainty. If we assume that numbers were denoted by figures in early times, figures are far more easily altered, omitted, or added than words; but, as we have seen, we have at present no strong ground for such an assumption. But even when words are used, the words denoting numbers in Hebrew are easily confused with each other, as in English. Just as 'eight' and 'eighty' differ only by a single letter; so in Hebrew, especially in the older style of writing, the addition of a single letter would make 'three' into 'thirty', etc. etc. And, again, in copying numerals the scribe is not kept right by the context as he is with other words. It was quite possible, too, for a scribe to have views of his own as to what was probable in the way of numbers, and to correct what he considered erroneous.

A comparison of the various manuscripts, versions, etc., in which our books have been preserved, shows that numbers are specially subject to alteration, and that in very many cases we are quite uncertain as to what numbers were given in the original text, notably where the numbers are large. Even where the number of a body of men, the length of a period, etc., are given twice over or oftener in different passages of the Bible itself, the numbers are often different: those in Chronicles, for instance, sometimes differ from those in Samuel and Kings, as in the case of David's census mentioned above. Then, as regards manuscripts, etc., we may take one or two striking instances. The chief authorities for the text of the Pentateuch are the Heb. text in Jewish MSS, the Hebrew text in Samaritan MSS, and the Greek translation, the Septuagint. Now the numbers connected with the ages of the patriarchs are largely different in these three authorities; e.g. in the Jewish text Methuselah lives to the age of 969, and is the longest lived of the patriarchs; in the Samaritan he lives only to be 720, and is surpassed by many of the other patriarchs; and the interval from the Creation to the Flood is 2262 years in the Septuagint, 1656 in the Jewish text, 1307 in the Samaritan text. Again, the number of persons on board the ship on which St. Paul was shipwrecked is given in some MSS as 276, and in others as 76 (Ac 27^b); and similarly the number of the Beast is variously given as 666 and as 616 (Rev 13^a).

The probability that many mistakes in numbers have been introduced into the Bible by copyists in the course of the transmission of the text has long been admitted. For instance, in the fifth edition of Home's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, published in 1825, a thoroughly old-fashioned apologetic work, we are told that 'Chronological differences, i.e. discrepancies, do undoubtedly exist in the Scriptures. . . . Differences in chronology do not imply that the sacred historians were mistaken, but they arise from the mistakes of transcribers or expositors'; and again, 'It is reasonable to make abate-ments, and not always to insist rigorously on precise numbers, in adjusting the accounts of scriptural chronology' (i. 550 f.).

7. Favourite numbers and their symbolism.—Naturally the units, and after them some of the even tens, hundreds, and thousands, were most frequently in use, and came to have special associations and significance, and a fraction would in some measure share the importance of its corresponding unit, e.g. where 'four' occurred often we should also expect to meet with a 'fourth.'

One, suggesting the idea of uniqueness, self-sufficiency, and indivisibility, is specially emphasized in relation to the Divine Unity: 'Jahweh our God, Jahweh is one' (Dt 6^a); and similarly Eph 4^a. 'one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father'; and other like passages.

Two.—There were two great lights; men frequently had two wives (Lamech, Jacob, Elkanah); two sons (Abraham, Isaac, Joseph); two daughters (Lot, Laban, Saul). Or again, where a man had one wife, there was a natural couple; and so with animals; in one account of the Flood they go in 'two by two.' Two men often went together, e.g. Joshua's spies (Jos 2^b); and the Twelve and the Seventy went out by twos. The fact that men have two eyes, hands, etc., also gave a special currency to the number. Two objects or animals are often required for ritual purposes (e.g. Lv 14²²). There were two tables of stone. Similarly, a half would be a familiar fraction; it is most common in 'the half tribe of Manasseh.'

As sets of two were common in nature and in human society, so in a somewhat less degree were sets of three, and in a continuously lessening degree sets of four, five, etc. etc. In each case we shall refer only to striking examples.

Three.—Three is common in periods; e.g. David is offered a choice between three days' pestilence, three months' defeat, and three years' famine (1 Ch 21¹²; 2 S 24¹⁸ has seven years); Christ is 'three days and three nights' in the tomb (Mt 12⁴⁰, cf. Jn 2⁹).

Deities often occur in groups of three, sometimes father, mother, and child; e.g. the Egyptian Osiris, Isis, and Horus. There are also the Babylonian triads, e.g. Bel, Anu, and Ea. Division into three is common; an attacking army is often divided into three parts, e.g. Gideon's (Jg 7¹⁸; cf. also Rev 8^{10, 12}).

Four.—The square, as the simplest plane figure, suggests four, and is a common shape for altars, rooms, etc.; hence four corners, pillars, the four winds, the four quarters of the earth, N., S., E., W. Irenaeus argues that there must be four canonical Gospels because there are four cherubim, four winds, and four quarters of the earth.

Five, Ten, and multiples obtain their currency through the habit of reckoning in tens, which again is probably derived from counting on the ten fingers. The fraction tenth is conspicuous as the tithe; and fifth and tenth parts of measures occur in the ritual.

Six, Twelve, and multiples are specially frequent in reference to time: 12 months, and its half, six months, 12 hours, sixth hour, etc., partly in connexion with the 12 signs of the Zodiac, and the approximate division of the solar year into 12 lunar months. It is suggested that the number 12 for the tribes of Israel was fixed by the Zodiac; in the lists the number 12 is obtained only by omitting Levi or Dan, or by substituting Joseph for Ephraim and Manasseh. When the number 12 was established for the tribes, its currency and that of its multiples were thus further extended; e.g. the 12 Apostles, the 144,000 of the Apocalypse, etc.

Seven and multiples.—A specially sacred character is popularly ascribed to the number seven; and although the Bible does not expressly endorse this idea, yet it is supported by the frequent occurrence of the number in the ritual, the sacred seventh day, the Sabbath; the sacred seventh year, the Sabbatical year; the Jubilee year, the year following seven times seven years; the seven-branched candlestick; sevenfold sprinkling (Lv 4⁶ etc.); seven lambs offered (Nu 28¹¹⁻¹²); forgiveness till 70 times 7 (Mt 18²²); the seven churches of Asia; seven angels; seven stars, etc.; fourteen generations (Mt 1¹⁷); 70 descendants of Jacob (Ex 1⁵); 70 years' captivity, etc. (Jer 25¹¹, Dn 9², Zec 7⁹); 70 missionaries (Lk 10¹). A similar use of 'seven' is found in the Egyptian, Assyrian, and Persian religions, and is often derived from astral worship of the seven heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and the five planets known to the ancients. It is also connected with the seven-day week as roughly a quarter of the lunar month, seven being the nearest integer to the quarter of 29¹. The Pleiades also were thought of as seven (cf. Am 5⁸).

Eight.—There were eight persons in the ark; a boy was circumcised on the eighth day. Ezekiel's ritual has a certain predilection for the number eight.

Forty.—This number apparently owes its vogue to the view that 40 was the approximate or perhaps average length of a generation; at least this is a common view. It is a little difficult to reconcile with the well-known Oriental custom of early marriage. The number might perhaps be obtained by taking the average of the years of a man's age at which his children were born, though such an explanation does not appear very probable. Or the use of 40 for a generation might be a relic of the period when the youngest born succeeded to the family tent and sacra. At any rate 40 is well established as a moderate round number between 'a few' and 'a very great many.' Thus, in addition to the numerous reigns, oppressions, and deliverances of 40, 80 years, etc., Isaac and Esau marry at the age of 40; there are 40 years of the wandering; Ezekiel's 40 years' captivity (29¹¹); 40 days was the period Moses spent in the Mount, Elijah and Christ fasted in the wilderness, etc.

A certain mystical value is attached to numbers in later Jewish and Christian philosophy and superstition, perhaps due partly to the ideas suggested by the relations of numbers to each other, and to the practical power of arithmetic; the symbols which aided men so effectually seemed to have some inherent force of their own. Or, again, if 'seven' is sacred, to pronounce a formula seven times must be more effective than to pronounce it six or eight times.

Great importance is attached to numbers in the mediæval Jewish mystical system, the Kabbala. There are ten sephiroth or primary emanations from God, one original sephira, and three derivative triads; there are twelve channels of Divine grace; 613 commandments, etc.

8. Gematria, a Hebraized form of the Greek geometria, used to mean 'reckoning by numbers,' was a late development of which there are traces in the OT. It consisted in indicating a word by means of the number which would be obtained by adding together the numerical values of the consonants of the word. Thus in Gn 14¹⁴ Abraham has 318 'trained servants,' 318 is the sum of the consonants of the name of Abraham's steward Eliezer in its original Hebrew form. The number is apparently constructed from the name.

The Apocalyptic number of the Beast is often explained by Gematria, and 666 has been discovered to be the sum of the numerical values of the letters of some form or other of a large number of names written either in Hebrew, or Greek, or Latin. Thus the Beast has been identified with hundreds of persons, e.g. Mohammed, Luther, the Pope, Napoleon I., Napoleon III. etc., each of whom was specially obnoxious to the ingenious identifier. Probably by a little careful manipulation, any name in some form or other, in Hebrew, Greek, or Latin, could be made by Gematria to yield 666. The two favourite explanations are Lateinos=Latinus (the Roman Empire or Emperor), and Nero Cæsar. The latter has the special advantage that it accounts not only for 666, but also for the various reading 616 mentioned above; as Neron Cæsar it gives 666, and as Nero Cæsar, 616.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF.—1. The Book of Numbers forms the sequel to the Book of Exodus; it carries on the history of the Israelites from the stay at Sinai till the arrival at the borders of Moab. The name 'Numbers' is due to the repeated numberings in chs. 1, 3, 4, 26. The book is composed of writings from the prophetic schools of J and E, and the Priestly school of P. One passage is from D—21³²⁻³⁵—Dt 31²⁻³. A minute analysis of the sources, not only distinguishing J, E, and P, but also separating the different strata of P, is necessary for a full understanding of the book. The present article, however, can only accept in broad outline the results reached by scholars. The reader is referred to The Hexateuch ed. by Carpenter and Battersby, the art. 'Numbers' by the latter in Hastings' DB iii., and Gray's Com. on Numbers.

2. Although the narrative begins at Sinai and ends in Moab, the period of the 40 years' wanderings is a blank, and the events are confined to the two periods before and after it. The book consists of three parts: 1-10¹⁰, 10¹¹⁻²¹, 21¹⁰⁻³⁶.

A. 11-10¹⁰. Ordinances at Sinai.—The section is entirely from P.

Contents.—Chs. 1-4: (a) The census; (b) arrangement of the camp; (c) functions of the Levites. Chs. 5-6: Laws concerning (d) three unclean classes of persons who must be excluded from the camp (5¹⁻⁴); (e) some priestly dues (6¹⁻¹⁰); (f) the ordeal of jealousy (11-21); (g) the law of the Nazirite (6¹⁻²¹); (h) the priests' formulas of blessing (22-27). (i) Ch. 7: The offerings (identical in each case) of the twelve tribal princes. (j) Ch. 8¹⁻⁴: The golden lampstand. (k) Ch. 8⁵⁻²⁶: Dedication of the Levites, and age of their service. (l) Ch. 9¹⁻¹⁴: The supplementary Passover. (m) Ch. 9¹⁵⁻²²: The cloud over the Tabernacle. (n) Ch. 10¹⁻¹⁰: The two silver trumpets.

Notes.—Two passages in this section are retrospective, viz. 7 and 9¹⁻¹⁴. The rest cover the last 19 days (11 10¹¹) spent at Sinai.

(a) The census is referred to by anticipation in Ex 30³²⁻³³. The strange position of Gad in the lists (12¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 26) is explained by the position assigned to it in ch. 2, next to Reuben and Simeon on the S. of the camp. The figures of the census are artificial and impossible; they are investigated by Gray, Numbers, pp. 10-15. (b) The arrangement of the camp is based upon the same principle as that in the ideal picture of Ezekiel (ch. 48). (c) The Levites are instituted as a class of priests' servants—a conception quite at variance with all earlier representations. They are accepted by J' in lieu of the firstborn of Israel. The transport duties of the three Levitical families, Kohath, Gershon, and Merari, are detailed. Notice that the period of service in 42²⁰ differs from that in 33²⁻³. (d) The three classes are dealt with in detail in Lv 13, 15 and Nu 19 respectively. (e) The section is supplementary to Lv 52²⁻²⁶. It deals with the cases in which the injured party is dead, and there is no next-of-kin. It further lays down that every sacred gift is to belong to the particular priest to whom it is paid. (f) A woman suspected by her husband of adultery which cannot be proved, is made to drink a potion which will be harmful if she is guilty, but will result in fruitfulness if she is innocent. This and the Nazirite vow (g) are instances of very ancient practices which have survived, in the form of law, only in P. (h) The priestly blessing is probably earlier in origin than P, and may have been used in the Temple before the Exile. Ps 87 appears to be influenced by it. (i) See Ex 25³⁴⁻³⁶ 27^{20f}; (j) reads like a later expansion of the commands in chs. 3, 4.

B. 10¹¹⁻²¹. From Sinai to the desert W. of the 'Arabah.

Contents.—(a) 10¹¹⁻²⁸ P. The move to the Wilderness of Paran in marching order. (b) 10²⁹⁻³⁶ J. Departure from the mountain; Moses asked Hobab to accompany them. Words which Moses used to address to the ark. (c) 11¹⁻³ E. Taberah. (d) 11⁴⁻³⁵ JE. Kibroth-hattaavah; the 70 elders, Eldad and Medad; the quails; Hazeroth. (e) 12¹⁻¹⁶ E. Aaron and Miriam attacked Moses; Miriam's leprosy. (f) 12¹⁶ J. The move to the wilderness of Paran. (g) 13, 14 JEP. The sending of the spies; their evil report, and its sequel. 15 P. Laws concerning: (h) Meal-offerings and libations (1-16), (i) cake of first of 'wheat' (17-21), (j) propitiation for sins of ignorance (²²⁻²³), (k) punishment for Sabbath-breaking (²²⁻²⁶), (l) tassels (²⁷⁻⁴¹), (m) 16 JEP. Rebellion of Korah (P) and of Dathan, Abiram, and On (JE). (n) 17 P. Aaron's rod budded. (o) 18¹⁻⁷ P. Levites to be the priests' servants. (p) 18⁸⁻²² P. Dues to the Levites. (q) 19 P. Ritual of the red cow, to remove defilement by the dead. (r) 20¹⁻¹³ JEP. The move to the Wilderness of Zin (P); Miriam died at Kadesh (JE); want of water (JE); the sin of Moses and Aaron at Meribah (P). (s) 20¹⁴⁻²¹ JE. Edom refused passage through their territory. (t) 20²²⁻²⁹ P. Aaron died at Mt. Hor, and was succeeded by Eleazar. (u) 21¹⁻³ JE. Hormah. (v) 21⁴⁻⁹ JEP. Departure from Mt. Hor (P); circuit round Edom; and the bronze serpent (JE).

Notes.—(b) Hobab, not Reuel, is Moses' father-in-law; cf. Jg 4¹¹ (RVm). Hobab's answer after v. ²² has been lost; but Jg 1¹⁶ makes it probable that he consented to accompany them. (d) Into the story of the quails have been interpolated vv. ¹⁰, ¹¹, ¹², and also the account of the elders, vv. ¹⁶, ²⁰, ²¹, ²². Some think that the former should follow Ex 33¹⁻³ and the latter Ex 33⁷⁻¹¹. (g) The narratives of JE and of P have been combined. In JE spies went to the S. of Canaan, as far as Hebron only. They brought back a cluster of grapes, and said that the land was fertile, but invincible with its giants and great cities. Caleb alone declared that they would be able to conquer it. The people determined to return to Egypt under another captain. Moses entreated J^e not to smite them with pestilence. J^e consented, but condemned all except Caleb to die in the wilderness. They were commanded to go by the Red Sea, whereupon they suddenly repented, and made an attack upon the Amalekites and Canaanites, but were repulsed with loss. In P, the spies, whose names are given, went through the whole of Canaan unmolested. They reported that the land was so barren as it was in the days of P that its inhabitants could not live. The people murmured, but Caleb and Joshua here first mentioned in P tried to encourage them. The glory of J^e appeared, and the people were condemned to wander 40 years, in which all over 20 years of age, except Caleb and Joshua, should die. (h) A scale of amounts of meal, oil, and wine to accompany various animals in sacrifice. It is a later, and more carefully graduated, system than that in Ezk 46⁷⁻¹¹, ¹⁴. (i) 'arisōth perhaps means barley meal. 'First' appears to refer to the first lump of dough made from the material. (m) Distinct incidents from JE and from P have been woven together. In JE a rebellion was raised by some Reubenites—Dathan, Abiram, and On—against the civil authority of Moses. Moses warned the people to depart from the tents of the conspirators, who were then swallowed up in the earth. In P, Korah with 250 princes, who were representatives of all the secular tribes, rebelled against the claim for the special sanctity of the tribe of Levi. At J^e's challenge they burned incense on censers in front of the Tabernacle; the whole congregation were present, and the glory of J^e appeared. Moses told the mass of the people to depart from the Tabernacle, and the fire of J^e devoured the 250 men. On the next day the people assembled, and murmured against Moses and Aaron. A plague began, which was checked by Aaron's action in running among the people with a lighted censer. The superiority of the tribe of Levi was then vindicated by the budding of Aaron's staff (ch. 17), and the dues to be paid to the Levites were laid down (ch. 18). Into P's story, however, later passages have been interpolated (10⁸⁻¹¹, ¹⁶, 17¹⁻⁵), which represent Korah's company as Levites, who rebel against the claim of superior sanctity for the family of Aaron. (r) The events are at the end of the wanderings, but no movements have been recorded since the events before the 40 years (ch. 13). The difficulties with regard to Kadesh and the wanderings may be studied in Driver, Deut. pp. 31-33. The Meribah narrative in the present section is a combination of J and P. (A Meribah story from E is combined with a Massah story from J in Ex 17¹⁻⁷). The sin of Moses and Aaron has not been fully preserved; v. ¹⁰ relates only ill-temper (referred to in Ps 106²¹), though v. ¹² describes it as unbelief, and 27¹⁴ as rebellion. (s) The sequel of this is 21¹⁰ ¹²¹ (JE). (u) Hormah is connected with hērem, 'ban,' because of the vow to destroy—ban—the Canaanite cities. The section appears to be misplaced, for it is difficult to understand why the Israelites should have turned away from Canaan immediately after such a striking victory. (v) The story was probably to explain the existence of the bronze serpent which Hezekiah afterwards destroyed; it is difficult to see how such a figure in bronze could have been manufactured in the desert with the rapid haste which the occasion would demand.

C. 21¹⁰⁻³⁶. Marches and events E. of the 'Arabah and the Jordan.

Contents.—(a) 21¹⁰⁻²⁰ JEP. Itinerary, and two songs. (b) 21²¹⁻²² JE. Amorites refused passage and were defeated. Song of triumph. (c) 21²³⁻²⁶ D. Defeat of Og. (d) 22¹ P. Arrival at Moab. (e) 22²⁻²⁴ JE. Balaam. (f) 25¹⁻⁵ JE. Immorality and idolatry owing to seduction by the Moabite women; the worship of the Baal of Peor. (g) 25⁶⁻¹⁸ P. Perpetual priesthood promised to the line of Phinehas for his zeal in killing the Israelite and the Midianites. (h) 26 P. The second census. (i) 27¹⁻¹¹ P. Case arising out of the daughters of Zelophehad. (j) 27¹²⁻²³ P. Moses bidden to prepare for death; Joshua appointed to succeed him. (k) 28. 29 P. A scale of public offerings. (l) 30 P. Conditions of validity of a vow. (m) 31 P. The war with Midian. (n) 32 P. Gad and Reuben, and (J) Manassah, settled on the E. of Jordan. (o) 33¹⁻⁴⁹ P. Itinerary from Egypt to Moab. 33⁵⁰⁻³⁶ P. Laws relative to the settlement in Canaan, viz.: (p) 33⁵⁰⁻⁵⁴. Destruction of Canaanite objects of worship, and division of land by lot. (q) 34¹⁻¹⁶. The boundaries of Canaan. (r) 34¹⁶⁻²⁹. Persons to superintend the allotment. (s) 35¹⁻⁸. Levitical cities. (t) 35⁹⁻³⁴. Cities of refuge. (u) Ch. 36. Heirresses (Zelophehad's daughters) not to marry outside their own tribe.

Notes.—(a) vv. 10, 11 P take the Israelites from Mt. Hor straight to a point on the E. of the 'Arabah, apparently disregarding the detour by the Red Sea and by the E. of Edom. Vv. 10¹⁰⁻²⁰ E contain places on the northward march from Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Akabah; Dt 10⁶⁻⁸ gives the previous march southward from Kadesh. (b) The last clause of the song (²⁰) may be a gloss. The whole interpretation of the song depends upon its presence or absence (see Gray on the passage). (c) Practically identical with Dt 3¹⁻⁴; the only passage from D in the book. (g) The introduction of a Midianite as hardly have occurred in Moab. The mention of foreign wives in v. ¹ may have caused the passage to be placed here. The narrative is only partially preserved, for nothing is said of the sending of 'the plague' (¹⁸). (j) Vv. ¹², ¹³ are closely related to Dt 32¹⁸⁻³⁰; whether they are incorporated in, or derived from, Dt, is uncertain. (k) The scale of offerings incidentally contains a list of the fixed feasts or sacred seasons, viz. Sabbath (28¹⁻⁵), New Moon (¹¹), Passover (¹⁶), Unleavened Cakes (¹⁷), Feast of Weeks (²⁶), Feast of Trumpets (29), Day of Atonement (?), Feast of Booths (32-35). (l) These are concerned chiefly with women's vows, which are treated nowhere else. (m) The story is of the nature of a midrash; the numbers of the Israelites, and of the slain and the spoils, are artificial; nothing is said of the march to Midian, or of the place of fighting. The narrative appears mainly intended to illustrate the rules of the distribution of booty (²⁶⁻³⁰), and the removal of uncleanness by contact with the dead (¹⁰⁻²⁰). (n) The term 'Gilead' is very elastic. In 1¹⁻²⁹ it refers to land south of the Jabbok, but in 3⁹ to land north of it, while in Jos 22⁹, ¹³ it covers the whole land E. of the Jordan. The towns assigned to Reuben and Gad conflict with P's theory in Jos 13¹⁵⁻³⁸, which is represented in most maps of Palestine, according to which Gad is to the north and Reuben to the south of the N. end of the Dead Sea. In the present passage the towns of Reuben lie between Gadite towns situated to the N. and the S. of them. Vv. 39-42 (J) represent the Manassite settlement on the W. of Jordan as older than that on the E. The verses are a fragment, similar to Jg 1 and the older parts of Joshua. (o) The itinerary falls into four parts: 1-10, Rameses to the Wilderness of Sinai; 16-26, thence to Ezion-geber on the E. arm of the Red Sea; 26, thence to Kadesh = Wilderness of Zin (one stage of 70 miles); 27-49, thence to the steppes of Moab. (p) The objects mentioned are 'figured stones' (if that is the right rendering; Lv 26¹ only), molten images, and 'high places'. (q) The boundaries are ideal, at least on the west, for the Israelites never occupied a spot on the coast until Simon Maccabæus captured Joppa (1 Mac 14⁴). (s) The Levites receive 48 plots of land, each of about 207 acres, and containing a town and pasture land. Jos 21 states the number of plots allotted in each tribe. Like Ezekiel's scheme (48¹⁻¹⁴), the arrangement is purely ideal—for (1) in a mountainous country like Palestine plots of 207 acres would be impossible; (2) earlier writings show that Levites had no landed property, but were commended to the charity of the rest of Israel; (3) priests are found living in such towns as Nob, Shiloh, and Bethel, which are not in the list of Levitical cities. (t) The earlier laws of asylum are given in Ex 21¹²⁻¹⁴, Dt 19¹⁻¹³; the development of the procedure is noteworthy. (u) A supplement to 27¹⁻¹¹.

3. Broadly speaking, the value of JE's narratives lies in their portrayal of character, that of P's in its embodiment of ecclesiastical ideas. In JE the character of Moses is strongly marked, in its strength and its occasional weakness: e.g. his humble piety (12³), his trust in J^r (10²⁹⁻³²), his faithfulness to and intimacy with Him (12⁸⁻⁹), his affection for his people (11², 10-16, 21⁷), his generosity and public spirit (11²⁷⁻²⁹, 12); and with this his despondency (11¹⁰⁻¹⁵) and provocation by the people (parts of 20¹⁻¹³). And no less vivid is the portrayal of the character of the people—their dislike of restraint, their selfish murmurings, their vehement repentance followed by wilful self-assertion. The narratives of JE were not compiled for the sake of recording history; the compiler was a prophet with a keen sense of the religious meaning of history. And his view of personal character revealed in events is not an incidental, but a primary, element in his work. And side by side with this is his conception of the relation between J^r and Israel. J^r, as Israel's only God, commands every action and step in the drama; and obedience to Him is followed by prosperity, while disobedience always brings trouble.

The spontaneity and simplicity of the earlier narratives are in marked contrast with the artificial idealism of P. The writings which we know collectively as P extend over centuries, but they were one and all the work of ecclesiastics. Narratives and laws alike were methods of representing the hierocratic conditions either actually prevalent after the Exile, or contemplated by the writers as desirable. Ecclesiasticism entered also into their conceptions of J^r. In early days any man might 'meet' with J^r and inquire of Him at the Tent, which was pitched outside the camp (Ex 33⁷⁻¹¹ E). But now the presence of J^r is protected from pollution by the sacred barrier of the priests and Levites, 'that there be no wrath upon the congregation' (Nu 13³). Real matters of abiding consequence to man—sin, and J^r's attitude towards it, and the means of forgiveness—are hardly touched. And if this description seems to leave in P little of spiritual value, it must be answered that its value lies partly in the very evidence that it affords of the deadening influence produced upon spiritual life, and even upon literary art, by a narrow ecclesiasticism which has itself as its only aim. The age and the writings of the Priestly school are an invaluable background, to show up all the more clearly the brightness of the age which followed it, when universal approach to God was thrown open by 'another priest, who hath been made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an indissoluble life' (He 7¹⁴).

A. H. M'NEILE.

NUMENIUS.—One of an embassy sent (c. B.C. 144) by the Jews to Rome and Sparta (1 Mac 12¹⁻¹⁸). He visited Rome on a similar errand a few years later (1 Mac 14²⁴, 15¹⁵⁻²⁴).

NUN.—The fourteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 14th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

NUN.—The father of Joshua (Ex 33¹¹, Nu 11²⁸, Jos 1¹ etc.).

NURSE.—Healthy women among the Hebrews in ancient times were accustomed to suckle their own children (Gn 21⁷). As in Palestine to-day, the child was suckled for a long time, sometimes as much as three years (1 S 13²¹, 2 Mac 7²⁷). Weaning was the occasion of a joyful feast (Gn 21⁸, 1 S 13²¹). But the nurse was also found in olden times in Israel, and was often held in great affection and honour (Gn 24⁹, 35⁸, Ex 2⁷, 2 K 11², Is 49²³, 1 Th 2⁷). The nurse, māneqeth, must be distinguished from the ōmēneth, tr. 'nurse' in Ru 4⁶, 2 S 4⁴, which means the attendant in charge of the child.

W. EWING.

NUTS.—1. ēgōz (Ca 6¹¹), without doubt the fruit of the walnut-tree (Juglans regia), called to-day in Arab. jauz. 2. botm (Gn 43¹¹) means pistachio nuts, the fruit of Pistacia vera, a tree widely cultivated in Palestine. The nuts, known in Arab. as fistug, are very great favourites; they are eaten raw, and also made into various sweets and confectionery.

NYMPH(S).—An influential Colossian Christian (Col 4¹⁵). His house was used as a meeting-place for Christians. The question of the correct reading is a difficult one, and it is uncertain whether it should be Nymphas or Nympha, a man or a woman. Nothing further is known of the person named. OAK.—

(1) ēlāh, Gn 35⁴, Jg 6¹¹, 19, 2 S 18²⁶, 14, 1 K 13³⁴, 1 Ch 10¹³, Is 1³⁰, Ezk 6¹³, Hos 4¹³; (Vale of) Elāh [RVm 'terebinth'], 1 S 17², 19, 21⁹, Is 6¹³ [AV 'tell tree']; ēlāh elsewhere always tr. 'oak' [RVm 'terebinth']; allāh, a slight variant, Jos 24²⁸.

2. ēlīm, perhaps pl. of ēlāh, Is 1²⁸, 'oaks' [RVm 'terebinths'] 57⁵ [AV 'idols', mg. 'oaks', RV 'oaks'] 61³ 'trees'. The meaning of ēlīm in Ezk 31¹⁴ is obscure, if the text be correct. These words, ēlāh, allāh, and ēlīm, all apparently refer to the terebinth (wh. see).

3. allōn, cannot be the same as ēlāh, because it occurs with it in Is 6¹³, Hos 4¹³; see also Gn 35⁴, Is 44¹, Am 2⁹. In Is 2³, Ezk 27⁷, Zec 11² the allōnim ('oaks') of Bashan are mentioned. In Jos 10²⁸ (AV) allōn is treated as a proper name.

4. ēlōn, probably merely a variation of allōn, is in Gn 12⁶, 13¹⁸, 14¹³, 18¹, Dt 11¹⁰, Jg 4¹¹, 9⁷, 1 S 10² (AV) tr. 'plain' or 'plains,' but in RV 'oak' or 'oaks', mg. 'terebinth' or 'terebinths.' allōn and ēlōn apparently refer to the oak.

Oaks have always been relatively plentiful in Palestine. Even to-day, in spite of the most reckless destruction, groves of oaks survive on Carmel, Tabor, around Banias, and in ancient Bashan; while whole miles of country are covered with shrub-like oaks produced from the roots of trees destroyed every few years for fuel. Among the nine recognized varieties of oak in Syria, the evergreen Quercus coccifera or 'holm oak' is the finest—it is often 30 to 35 feet high. Its preservation is usually due to its being situated at some sacred wely. 'Abraham's oak' at Hebron is of this kind. Other common oaks are the Valonia oak (Q. Egilops), which has large acorns with prickly cups, much valued for dyeing; and the Oriental gall oak (Q. cerria), a comparatively insignificant tree, especially noticeable for the variety of galls which grow on it. Both these latter are deciduous, the leaves falling from late autumn to early spring. Oak wood is used for tanning skin bottles and also as fuel, while the acorn cups of the Valonia oak and the galls of the various oak trees are both important articles of commerce in N. Syria.

OATHS.—How the need of oaths must first have arisen can be seen in such a passage as Ex 22¹⁰⁻¹¹: 'If a man deliver unto his neighbour an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or a beast, to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it: the oath of the Lord shall be between them both, whether he hath not put his hand unto his neighbour's goods; and the owner thereof shall accept it, and he shall not make restitution.' As there is no witness to substantiate the innocence or prove the guilt of the suspected person—no man seeing it—God is called to witness. An oath is really a conditional curse, which a man calls down upon himself from God, in the case of his not speaking the truth or not keeping a promise. The use of oaths was not restricted to judicial procedure, but was also connected with a variety of everyday matters; to swear by the name of Jahweh was regarded as a sign of loyalty to Him (cf. Is 48¹, Jer 12¹⁶, Dt 6¹³).

There are two words in Hebrew for an oath: (1) šēbū'ah, which comes from the same root as the word for 'seven' (šēba'); the Heb. word for 'to swear' comes likewise from the same root, and means literally 'to come under the influence of seven things.' Seven was the most sacred number among the Hebrews (cf. šābū'a', 'week' of seven days), and among the Semites generally. Among the Babylonians the seven planets each represented a god. Originally, therefore, there must have been a direct connexion between this sacred number and the oath. (2) 'alah, which, strictly speaking, means a 'curse,' and was a stronger form of oath. The combination of both words was used on especially solemn occasions, e.g. Nu 5²¹ (cf. Mt 26⁷² of Peter's denial).

There were various forms used in taking an oath, e.g. 'God do so to me and more also if . . .' (1 K 2²⁹); the punishment called down in the case of the oath not being observed is left indeterminate in this form; this is to be explained from the fact that there was a fear lest the mention of the curse should ipso facto bring it to pass; it is a remnant of animistic conceptions (i.e. there was the fear that a demon might think his services were required). In later times, however, the nature of the curse is sometimes mentioned, e.g. ' . . . saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire' . . . (Jer 29²²; cf. Is 65¹⁴, Zec 8¹³). Another form was: 'God is witness betwixt me and thee' (Gn 31⁵⁰), or, 'The Lord be a true and faithful witness amongst us, if . . .' (Jer 42¹⁵); a more common form is: 'As the Lord liveth' (Jg 8¹⁹), which is sometimes varied by the addition of a reference to the person to whom the oath was made: 'As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth' (1 S 20³, cf. 2 S 15²¹). Another form was: 'God . . . judge between us' (Gn 31⁵⁴). God Himself is conceived of as taking oaths: 'By myself have I sworn . . .' (Gn 22¹⁶). The usual gesture in taking an oath was to raise the arm towards heaven (Dt 32⁴⁰, Dn 12⁷), the motive being to point to the dwelling-place of God; to 'raise the hand' became an expression for 'to swear' (Ex 6⁸, Nu 14³⁰). Another gesture is referred to in Gn 24² 47²⁹, viz. putting the hand under the thigh; the organ of generation was regarded as peculiarly holy by the Hebrews.

With regard to the breaking of an oath see Lv 6⁴⁻⁷; and for the use of oaths in ratifying a covenant see Gn 21²⁷⁻³¹ 26³¹ 31⁴⁴, Jos 9¹⁴, 2 K 11⁴.

OBADIAH is a name of a type common among the Semitic peoples; it occurs frequently in the OT, for the most part as the name of persons of whom little or nothing is known. It has also been found on an ancient Hebrew seal. For the meaning of the name, 'servant of Jahweh,' see art. SERVANT OF THE LORD, § 2. The different persons thus named are—1. The author of the Vision of Obadiah: see following article. 2. Ahab's steward, the protector of Jahweh's prophets against Jezebel (1 K 18³⁻¹⁴). This person lived in the 9th cent. B.C. 3. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³³), who lived, to judge from his position in the genealogy, about B.C. 700. On the probable genuineness of the genealogy see G. B. Gray, Studies in Heb. Proper Names, p. 241 f. 4. An Issacharite (1 Ch 7⁹). 5. A descendant of David in the 5th cent. B.C., if the Hebrew text (1 Ch 3²⁴) correctly makes him a grandson of Zerubbabel, but in the 4th if the LXX is right and he belonged to the sixth generation after Zerubbabel. 6. The head of a family who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8⁹ = Abadiah of 1 Es 8³⁶). 7. A priestly contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh 10⁶). 8. A door-keeper (Neh 12²⁶). 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. Various persons in the genealogies or stories of the Chronicler (1 Ch 9¹⁶ [= Abda, Neh 11¹⁷] 12⁹ 27¹⁹, 2 Ch 17⁷ 34¹²). On the Chronicler's use of such names, see G. B. Gray, op. cit., pp. 170-190. G. B. GRAY.

OBADIAH, BOOK OF.—The questions as to the origin and interpretation of this, the shortest book of the OT, are numerous and difficult. The title describes the book as 'a vision' (cf. Is 1¹, Nah 1¹) and ascribes it to Obadiah. Obadiah is one of the commonest of Hebrew names, and occurs both before and after the Exile: see preceding article. Some fruitless attempts have been made to identify the author of the book with one or other of the persons of the same name mentioned in the OT.

The book of Obadiah stands fourth in order (in the Greek version, fifth) of the prophets whose works were collected and edited in (probably) the 3rd cent. B.C.; the collection since the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. has been known as 'The Twelve' (see CANON OF OT; cf. MICAH [B.K.], ad init.). By the place which he gave this small book in his collection the editor perhaps intended to indicate his belief that it was of early, i.e. pre-exilic, origin. But the belief of an editor of the 3rd cent. B.C. is not good evidence that a book was written earlier than the 6th century. The relative probabilities of the different theories of its origin must be judged by internal evidence; this, unfortunately, is itself uncertain on account of ambiguities of expression.

It will be convenient to state first what appears on the whole the most probable theory, and then to mention more briefly one or two others.

The book contains two themes: (1) a prophetic interpretation of an overwhelming disaster which has already befallen Edom (vv. 1-7, 10-14, 15b); (2) a prediction of a universal judgment and specifically of judgment on Edom which is now imminent (vv. 8, 9, 15a, 16-21).

1. The prophetic interpretation of Edom's fall.—The prophet describes the complete conquest of the Edomites and their expulsion from their land (v. 7) by a number of nations (v. 1) once their friends and allies (v. 7). In this calamity the writer sees Jahweh's judgment on Edom for gloating over the fall of the Jews—described as Edom's brother (v. 12)—and participating with foreign and alien enemies (v. 11) in the infliction of injuries on them. This interpretation is stated in simple and direct terms in vv. 10, 11, and dramatically in vv. 12-14, where the writer, throwing himself back to the time of the Edomites' ill-treatment of the Jews, adjures them not to do the things they actually did. The section closes with the effective assertion of the retributive character of the disasters that had befallen Edom and still affect it—'As thou hast done, is it done unto thee; thy dealing returns upon thine own head' (v. 15b).

The verses thus summarized have these points in common: (a) the tenses are historical except in v. 10 ('shame doth cover thee, and thou art cut off for ever') and v. 15b, which may be rendered as presents, and interpreted as at the end of the preceding paragraph; and (b) after v. 1, where Edom, in the present text, is spoken of in the 3rd person, Edom is throughout addressed in the 2nd pers. sing. Among these verses are now interspersed others,—v. 8, which speaks of Esau (= Edom) in the 3rd person (pl. in clause a, sing. in b) and which may be aside in the midst of the address, but is more probably an interpolation; and vv. 8-9 (together with the last clause of v. 7), which speak of Edom in the 3rd person and unmistakably regard the disaster as still future: these verses are best regarded as an addition by an editor who wished the prophetic interpretation of past fact to be read as a prophetic description of the future.

If now vv. 1-7 (or vv. 1-3, 7) 10-14, 15b, which are held together by the common features just noticed, be a unity; the prophecy is later than B.C. 586; for v. 11 cannot well be interpreted by any other disaster than the destruction of Jerusalem in that year. The prophecy also appears in vv. 8-9 to allude to the extrusion of the Edomites from ancient Edom owing to the northward movement of Arabs—people who had often satisfied themselves with plundering expeditions (cf. v. 5), but now permanently evicted settled populations from their lands (cf. v. 7). This northward movement was already threatening at the beginning of the 6th cent. B.C. (Ezk 25⁴ s. 10); before B.C. 312, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus, Arabs had occupied Petra, the ancient capital of Edom. Between those two dates, perhaps in the first half of the 5th cent. B.C. (cf. Mal 1²⁻³), the prophecy appears to have been written.

2. The prediction of universal judgment.—In contrast with vv. 1-7, 10-14, the tenses in vv. 15a, 16-21 are consistently imperfects (naturally suggesting the future), the persons addressed (2nd pl.) are Israelites, not Edomites, and Edom is referred to in the 3rd person. The prophecy predicts as imminent: (a) a universal judgment (vv. 15a, 16, in which the annihilation of Edom by the Jews (not [nomadic] nations as in vv. 1-5, 7) and Israelites forms an episode which is specially described (v. 18), and (b) the restoration of the exiles alike of the Northern and of the Southern Kingdom (v. 19, cf. v. 17), who are to re-occupy the whole of their ancient territory—the Negeb in the S., the Shephelah in the W., Ephraim to the N., Gilead in the E. (v. 19, which after elimination of glosses reads, 'And they shall possess the Negeb and the Shephelah, and the field of Ephraim and Gilead'); in particular, the Israelites will re-occupy as far N. as Zarephath (near Tyre), and the Jews as far south as the Negeb (v. 20). The prophecy closes with the announcement of Jahweh's reign from Zion (v. 21).

The prediction (vv. 15a, 16-21) scarcely appears to be the original and immediate continuation of the former part of the chapter, but is, like vv. 8-9, a subsequent addition. The theory of the origin and interpretation of the book just described is substantially that of Wellhausen; it has been adopted in the main by Nowack and Marti; and, so far as the separation of vv. 16-21 (with 15b) from the rest of the chapter is concerned, and the assignment of the whole to a date after the Exile, by Cheyne (EBi).

One fact has appeared to many scholars an insuperable difficulty in the way of assigning the whole book to a date after 586. It is admitted by all that the resemblances between Ob 1-4, 5, 6, 8 and Jer 49¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 9, 10a, 7 are so close as to imply the literary dependence of one of the two passages on the other; it is further admitted by most, and should be admitted, that the common matter is in its more original form in Obadiah, and that therefore so much at least of Obadiah is prior to Jer 49¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 9, 10a, 7, and therefore prior to the year B.C. 604, if the theory that was commonly held with regard to the date of Jer 46-49 be admitted. But of recent years many have questioned whether Jer 46-49, at least in its present form, is the work of Jeremiah at all, and consequently whether it was necessarily written before 586.

If the argument that Ob 1-4, 8 is pre-exilic be accepted, it is necessary to account for what are now generally admitted to be the allusions to the events of 586 in Ob 10-14. This has been done by assuming that Ob. and Jer. alike quote from a pre-exilic prophecy, but that Obadiah himself prophesied after B.C. 586. As to the amount of matter cited by Obadiah, scholars differ: e.g. Driver considers that Ob 1-9 is derived from the old prophecy; G. A. Smith, that vv. 1-4, 8-10 are quotations, but that v. 7, which he admits presupposes later conditions, is by Obadiah himself. The weakness of these theories lies in the fact that the distribution of the parts to the two authors does not follow the concrete differences of style indicated above, and that v. 7 either receives no adequate interpretation, or is torn away from v. 8, with which it certainly seems closely connected. As to the more precise date of vv. 1-9 (10) or so much of the verses as may be pre-exilic, no agreement has been reached among those who hold them to be pre-exilic; no known circumstances explain the allusions. It is also very uncertain whether any inference can safely be drawn from the allusion to Sepharad (wh. see) in v. 20.

For further discussion of many details, some of which have of necessity been left unmentioned here, and for an account of other theories as well as those described above, the English reader will best consult Driver, LOT; G. A. Smith, Book of the Twelve, ii, 163-184 (with a critical translation); Selbie's art. in Hastings' DB; and Cheyne's in EBi. G. B. GRAY.

OBAL (Gn 10²⁸).—See EBAL, No. 1.

OBEDE.—1. The son of Boaz and Ruth, the father of Jesse and grandfather of David (Ru 4¹⁷), and an ancestor of our Lord (Mt 1³, Lk 3³²). 2. A descendant of Sheshan (1 Ch 27⁷). 3. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁷). 4. A son of Shemaiah (1 Ch 26⁷). 5. The father of Azariah (2 Ch 23¹).

OBEDE-EDOM.—1. A Philistine, a native of Gath, who lived in or near Jerusalem. In his house David deposited the ark after the death of Uzzah, and here it remained three months, bringing a blessing by its presence (2 S 6¹⁰, 1 Ch 13¹⁴). It is in all probability the same O. that appears as—2. The eponym of a family of door-keepers in the Temple (1 Ch 15¹⁸, 21, 16¹⁸, 26¹, 18, 2 Ch 25²⁴). 3. The eponym of a post-exilic family of singers (1 Ch 15²¹, 16⁶).

OBEEDIENCE.—Occasionally this word occurs in Scripture to express the duty of one person to another, as in Dt 21¹⁸, 19, 2 S 22²⁴, 2 Th 3¹⁴, Ph 2¹², Eph 6¹, 5, 1 P 3⁶. Much more frequently it expresses the duty of man to God (1 S 15²², Jer 17, Jn 14²³, 23). The spirit of obedience is the primal and indispensable requirement for acceptance by the Father. The Son of God Himself was made perfect through obedience (He 5⁹), and only thus. It was the motto of His earthly life, 'I am come to do thy will, O God' (He 10⁷). The one lesson of the life of Jesus is the one lesson of the word of God from first to last—God must be obeyed. Absolute obedience was essential to the fulfilment of His mission. Absolute obedience is essential to our own salvation. Having learned obedience, He became a Saviour to those who obey (He 5⁹). Obedience is as necessary with us as it was with Him. Obedience is as possible with us as it was with Him. For He is able to work in us now the very same mind that was in Him, the same disposition and spirit He had upon earth. D. A. HAYES.

OBEISANCE.—Obeisance is obedience (coming into Eng. through the French). It occurs only in the phrases 'do obeisance' and 'make obeisance,' and only in the OT. The meaning of the Heb. so translated is to prostrate oneself in token of reverence or for worship.

OBEISK.—See PILLAR, 2 (c).

OBEETH (1 Es 8²²)—Ebed, Ezr 8⁴.

OBI.—The overseer of David's camels (1 Ch 27³⁰).

OBLATION.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

OBOETH.—A 'station' of the children of Israel (Nu 21¹⁰, 11, 33⁴⁴). Nothing definite is known as to its position.

OBSERVE.—Mk 6³⁰ 'Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him.'

The meaning of the Eng. word 'observed' is 'reverenced.' Tindale's translation is 'gave him reverence.' Cf. Shaks. 2 Henry IV. iv. iv. 30, 'he is gracious, if he be observed.' But the more probable meaning of the Greek is 'protected him,' or, as RV, 'kept him safe.'

OCCUPY.—The 'occupier' of Ezk 27²⁷ is a 'trader,' and 'to occupy' (Ezk 27², Lk 19¹³) is 'to trade.' The original meaning of the Eng. word is 'to engage in anything.'

OCHIELUS (1 Es 1⁹) = Jeiel, 2 Ch 35⁹.

OCHIRAN.—Father of Pagiel (Nu 1¹⁸ 22⁷ 77², 17 10²⁶).

OCHIDELUS (1 Es 9²²) = Jozabad in Ezr 10²².

OCINA.—Taking the towns mentioned in order as fearing the advance of Holofernes (Jth 2²⁸), Sidon and Tyre are well known. With some certainty Sur may be identified with Umm el-Amūd, S. of Iskanderāna, which seems to have been formerly called Turān. The next step takes us naturally to Acre, in later times known as Accon, in which we may find an echo of the earlier Ocina. W. Kwing.

ODED.—1. The father of the prophet Azariah (2 Ch 15¹). In v. 8 'Oded' of MT is a mistake (through wrong marginal gloss or otherwise) for 'Azariah.' 2. A prophet who successfully protested against the proposal to enslave Judahites (2 Ch 28²⁶).

ODOMERA.—A chief, slain by Jonathan (1 Mac 9⁶⁶).

OF.—As already noted, under By, the prep. 'of' is generally used in AV for the agent, as Mt 2⁶. 'He was mocked of the wise men.' But there are other obsolete or archaic uses of 'of,' which should be carefully observed. Thus (1) it sometimes means from (the proper meaning of the A.S. 'of'), as Mk 11⁸. 'Others cut down branches of the trees,' Jn 15¹. 'All things that I have heard of my Father,' Jn 16¹³. 'He shall not speak of himself'; (2) concerning, as Ac 5⁴. 'They doubted of them, whereunto this would grow,' Mt 18¹⁵. 'He rejoiceth more of that sheep than of the ninety and nine,' Jn 2¹⁷. 'The zeal of thine house'; (3) with, Ca 2⁵. 'I am sick of love.'

OFFENCE.—The Greek word skandalon is properly used of a 'stick in a trap on which the bait is placed, and which, when touched by the animal, springs up and shuts the trap' (Liddell and Scott). The word is used by Christ (Mt 18⁷, Lk 17¹) of offences in the form of hindrances to the faith of believers, especially of Christ's little ones. The context makes it clear what kind of stumbling-blocks are referred to. In the corresponding passage in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5²⁹, 30; cf. Mk 9⁴⁵, 47) the right eye and right hand are given as instances of the kind of offences that may arise. The members here cited are not only in themselves good and serviceable, but necessary, though they are capable, in certain circumstances, of becoming the occasion of sin to us. In the same way the Christian may find pursuits and pleasures, which in themselves are innocent, bringing unexpected temptations and involving him in sin. The possible applications of this are numerous, whether the warning be referred to artistic gifts (the 'hand' and 'eye'), or abuses of certain kinds of food and drink, or any other circumstances which may lead a man from the higher life or divert him from his aims. All these may be compared to the stumbling-blocks which cause a man to fall. Such things must be dispensed with, for the sake of entering the 'eternal life,' which is the Christian man's goal.

OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

OFFICER.—By this somewhat indefinite expression are rendered some eight or ten different Heb. and Gr. words, several of which seem to have had an equally wide application. Of the Heb. words the commonest is shōṭer, from a root which in Assyrian means 'to write.' The shōṭer, accordingly, was originally, it would seem, a subordinate official attached to the higher military, civil, and judicial officers of the State for secretarial purposes (see Driver's summary of their duties in his Com. on Dt 1¹⁶). In the narrative of the oppression of the Hebrews in Egypt, the 'officers' are the Hebrew subordinates of the Egyptian taskmasters (see Ex 5¹⁴); one of their duties, it may be assumed, was to keep account of the tale of bricks made by each of their compatriots.

In Gn 37³⁶ and elsewhere 'officer' is the tr. of the usual word for 'eunuch' (wh. see), but, as 39¹ shows, the original (sārīs) must here signify, more generally, a court official. Still another word, rendered 'officer' in 1 K 4⁵, 7 etc., denotes the heads of the twelve administrative districts into which Solomon divided his kingdom, corresponding somewhat to the 'collectors' in our Indian administration.

In NT 'officer' is, with one exception (Lk 12⁶⁸), the tr. of a Gr. word of equally wide application. In the account of our Lord's betrayal and capture the 'officers' are members of the Temple police (Jn 7⁵² etc.), as also in the account of the imprisonment of Peter and John (Ac 5²², 26; cf. 4¹). The same word is elsewhere rendered 'minister,' either in the more general sense of 'attendant' (so Ac 13⁸ RV), or in the special sense of the 'minister' (RV 'attendant') or officer of the Jewish synagogue (Lk 4²⁰), for whom see SYNAGOGUE.

OG.—The king of Bashan, who, with his children and people, was defeated and destroyed by the Israelites at Edrei, directly after the defeat of Sihon. His rule extended over sixty cities, of which the two chief were Ashtaroth and Edrei (Jos 12⁴). The whole of his kingdom was assigned to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh (Dt 3¹³, Nu 32²⁴; see also Dt 1⁴ 47³¹, Jos 2¹⁰ 9¹⁰ 13¹², 20). The conquest of this powerful giant king lingered long in the imagination of the Israelites as one of the chief exploits of the conquest (Ps 135¹¹ 136²⁰). The impression of the gigantic stature of Og is corroborated by the writer of Dt 3¹¹, who speaks of the huge 'iron bedstead' (or sarcophagus) belonging to him. According to the measurements there given, this sarcophagus was nine cubits long and four cubits broad. It is, however, impossible to estimate his stature from these dimensions, owing to the tendency to build tombs unnecessarily large in order to leave an impression of superhuman stature. The 'iron' of which the sarcophagus was made, probably means black basalt. Many basaltic sarcophagi have been found on the east of the Jordan.

OHAD.—A son of Simeon (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁵).

OHEL.—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3³⁰ [text doubtful].

OHOLAH AND OHOLIBAH (AV Aholah, Aholibah).

—Two sisters who were harlots (Ezk 23). The words appear to mean 'tent' and 'tent in her,' the allusion being to the tents used for idolatrous purposes. The passage is figurative, the two harlots representing, the one Samaria and the other Jerusalem. Though both were wedded to Jehovah, they were seduced by the gallant officers of the East, Samaria being led astray by Assyria and Jerusalem by Babylon. The whole of the allegory is a continuation of ideas already expounded in chs. 16 and 20, and is intended as a rebuke against Israel for her fondness for alliances with the great Oriental empires, which was the occasion of new forms and developments of idolatry. The main idea of the allegory seems to have been borrowed from Jer 3¹⁻¹³.

OHOLIAB (AV Aholiab).—The chief assistant of Bezalel (Ex 31¹ 35³⁴ 36¹, 3 38²²).

OHOLIBAH (AV Aholibah).—See OHOLAH.

OHOLIBAMAH (AV Aholibamah).—1. One of Esau's wives (Gn 36², 5, 14, 18, 23). 2. An Edomite 'duke' (Gn 36⁴).

OIL.—With one exception (Est 2¹² 'oil of myrrh') all the Scripture references to oil are to 'olive oil,' as it is expressly termed in Ex 27²⁰, Lv 24¹ etc., according to the more correct rendering of RV. Considering how very numerous these references are—some two hundred in all—it is surprising that there should be so few that throw light on the methods adopted in the preparation of this indispensable product of the olive tree.

1. Preparation of oil.—By combining these meagre references with the fuller data of the Mishna, as illustrated by the actual remains of oil-presses, either still above ground or recently recovered from the soil of Palestine, it is possible to follow with some minuteness the principal methods adopted. The olives were either shaken from the tree or beaten down by striking the branches with a light pole, as illustrated on Greek vases (illust. in Vigouroux, Dict. de la Bible, art. 'Huile'). The latter method supplies Isaiah with a pathetic figure of Israel (17⁶ RVm).

The finest quality of oil was got by selecting the best berries before they were fully ripe. These were pounded in a mortar, after which the pulp was poured into a basket of rushes or wickerwork. From this, as a strainer, the liquid was allowed to run off into a receiving vessel. After the oil had floated and been purified, it formed 'beaten oil,' such as had to be provided for the lighting of the Tabernacle (Ex 27²⁰, Lv 24²; cf. 1 K 5¹¹ RVm).

In the preparation of the oil required for ordinary domestic use, however, the methods adopted closely resembled those for the making of wine. Indeed, it is evident that the same apparatus served for the making both of wine and of oil (see WINE for the names of the parts, and note the phrase, JI 22⁴, 'the fats [vats] shall overflow with wine and oil'). From evidence, literary and archaeological, it is clear that there were various kinds of oil-presses in use in different periods. A very common, if not quite the simplest, type consisted of a shallow trough hewn in the native rock, from which, as in the similar, if not identical, wine-press, a conducting channel carried the expressed liquid to a slightly lower trough or oil-vat. In early times it appears as if a preliminary pressing was made with the feet alone (Mic 6¹⁵).

In the absence of a suitable rock-surface, as would naturally be the case within a city of any antiquity, a solid block of limestone—circular, four-sided, and eight-sided (Megiddo) are the shapes recovered by recent explorers—was hollowed to the depth of a few inches, a rim being left all round save at one corner. Such presses were found at Taanach (illust. Sellin, Tell Ta'annek, 61, reproduced in Benzinger's *Heb. Arch.*² [1907] 144), and elsewhere. In these the olives were crushed by means of a large round stone. The liquid was either allowed to collect in a large cup-hollow in the surface of the trough, from which it was baled out by hand (PEFS, 1903, p. 112), or it was run off into a vessel placed at the corner above mentioned (see Sellin's illust., and op. cit. 60 f., 93). At a later period, as we learn from the Mishna, a stone in the shape of the modern millstone was used. Through the centre a pole was inserted, by which it was made to revolve on its narrow side round the circular trough—a method still in use in Syria.

From the oil-mill, as this apparatus may be termed, the product of which naturally, after purification, produced the finer sort of oil, the pulp was transferred to the oil-press properly so called. Here it was placed in baskets piled one above the other. Pressure was then applied for the extraction of a second quality of oil, by means of a heavy wooden beam worked as a lever by ropes and heavy weights, or by a windlass. Details of the fittings of these 'press-houses,' as they are named in the Mishna, and of another type of press formed of two upright monoliths with a third laid across, the whole resembling the Gr. letter Π, have been collected by the present writer in the art. 'Oil' in EB iii. 3467, and may now be controlled by the account of the elaborate underground 'press-house' described and illustrated by Bliss and Macalister in Excavations in Palestine, p. 208 f. and plate 62 (cf. ib. 196 f. and Index).

The expressed liquid, both from the oil-mill and from the oil-press, was collected either in a rock-cut vat or in separate jars. In these it was allowed to settle, when the oil rose to the top, leaving a bitter, watery liquid, the amurca of the Romans, and other refuse behind. Oil in this fresh state is distinguished in OT from the refined and purified product; the former is yilshār, so frequently named along with 'new wine' or must (Brōsh, see WINE, § 1) and corn as one of the chief products of Canaan; the latter is always shemen, but the distinction is not observed in our versions. The fresh oil or yilshār was refined in the same manner as wine, by being poured from vessel to vessel, and was afterwards stored in jars and in skins. A smaller quantity for immediate use was kept in a small earthenware pot—the vial of 1 S 10¹ and of 2 K 9¹ RV (AV 'box')—or in a horn (1 S 16¹³, 1 K 1⁹).

2. Uses of oil.—Foremost among what may be called the secular uses of oil may be placed its daily employment as a cosmetic, already dealt with under ANOINTING (see also OINTMENT). This was the oil that made the face to shine (Ps 104¹⁵). As in all Eastern lands, oil was largely used in the preparation of food; familiarity with this use of it is presupposed in the comparison of the taste of the strange manna to that of the familiar 'cakes baked with oil' (Nu 11⁹ RVm; see, further, MEATS, § 1, end). Oil was also indispensable for the lighting of the house after nightfall. In addition to the universal olive oil, the Mishna (Shabbath, ii. 1 f.) names a variety of other oils then in use, among them oil of sesame, fish oil, castor oil, and naphtha. That used in the Temple (1 Ch 9²⁰) was no doubt of the finest quality, like the 'beaten oil' for the Tabernacle above described. The medicinal properties of oil were early recognized (Is 1⁶ RV); the Good Samaritan mixed his with wine (Lk 10³⁴), producing an antiseptic mentioned also in post-Biblical Jewish writings.

Oil has a prominent place in the ritual of the Priests' Code, particularly in the preparation of the 'meal-offering' (Lv 2¹⁻⁴ etc.). It also appears in connexion with the leprosy-offering (14¹⁰⁶⁻⁷) and in other connexions, but is absent from the sin-offering (5¹⁷⁻¹⁸) and the jealousy-offering (Nu 5¹¹⁶). For the special case of the 'holy anointing oil' (Ex 30²³⁻²⁵), see OINTMENT.

As might have been expected from the extensive cultivation of the olive by the Hebrews, oil not only formed an important article of inland commerce, but was exported in large quantities both to the West, by way of Tyre (Ezk 27¹⁷), and to Egypt (Hos 12⁵).

This abundance of oil furnished the Hebrew poets with a figure for material prosperity in general, as in Dt 33²⁴ 'He shall dip his foot in oil.' From its being in daily use to anoint the heads of one's guests at a festive meal (Ps 23⁵ etc.), oil became by association a symbol of joy and gladness (Ps 45⁷ = He 1⁹, Is 61³).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

OIL TREE ('šlš-shemen', 1 K 6²¹)²¹⁻²² [plur. 'šlš-shemen'], AV 'olive tree,' mg. 'trees of oil' or 'oily trees,' RV 'olive wood'; Neh 8¹⁵ AV 'pine branches,' RV 'branches of wild olive'; Is 41¹⁹ AV and RV 'oil tree,' RVm 'oleaster'. Where there is such variation in translation, it is evident that what particular 'tree of oil' is here referred to is far from determined. The olive itself is improbable from Neh 8¹⁵, where the olive tree is mentioned just before; and that the branches of 'wild olive' should be specially specified, where so like those of the cultivated variety, is improbable. The oleaster (Eleagnus angustifolia), a beautiful and common shrub, would suit, except that it is difficult to see how it could ever have furnished a block of wood sufficient for the two cherubim 'each ten cubits high' (1 K 6²¹); olive wood (as RV suggests) would certainly seem more appropriate. Perhaps Post's suggestion tha' it was some kind of pine—the 'oil' or 'fat' being the resin—is as likely as any.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

OINTMENT.—With two exceptions, 'ointment' in our EV is the rendering, in OT, of the ordinary word for 'oil,' and in some passages the ointment may have consisted of oil only. In most of the references, however, perfumed oil is undoubtedly meant. The two are distinguished in Lk 7³⁶: 'My head with oil thou didst not anoint; but she hath anointed my feet with ointment (myron).' The extensive use of myron in NT in the sense of 'ointment' shows that myrrh was then the favourite perfume. The dead body, as well as the living subject, was anointed with this ointment (Lk 23⁵⁶). Another 'very costly' unguent is described as 'ointment of spikenard' (Mk 14³, Jn 12³), for which see SPIKENARD. These much-prized unguents were kept in pots of alabaster, as in Egypt, where they are said to retain their fragrance for 'several hundred years' (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i. 426, with illust.).

In the Priests' Code there is repeated reference to a specially rich unguent, 'the holy anointing oil,' the composition of which is minutely laid down in Ex 30²³⁻²⁵. The ingredients, in addition to a basis of olive oil, are rendered in RV as 'flowing myrrh,' sweet cinnamon, sweet calamus, and cassia. The penalty for the unauthorized manufacture and sacrilegious use of this sacred chrism was excommunication.

OLIVE (zayith, cf. Arab. zeit 'oil,' and zeitūn 'olive tree').—This tree (Olea europaea) is the first-named 'king of the trees' (Jg 9⁸ 9), and is, in Palestine at any rate, by far the most important. The scantily covered terraced hillsides, the long rainless summer of blazing sunshine, and the heavy night moisture of late summer, afford climatic conditions which appear in a very special degree favourable to the olive. This has been so in all history: the children of Israel were to inherit 'olive-yards' which they planted not (Jos 24³, Dt 6¹¹), and the wide-spread remains of ruined terraces and olive-presses in every part of the land witness to the extent of olive culture that existed in the past. A large proportion of the fuel consumed to-day consists of the roots of ancient olive trees. In recent years this cultivation has been largely revived, and extensive groves of olives may be found in many parts, notably near Beit Jala on the Bethlehem road, and near Nablus. The peculiar grey-green foliage with its silver sheen, and the wonderful twisted and often hollow trunks of the tree, are very characteristic of Palestine scenery. The OT writers admired the beauty of the olive (see Hos 14⁶, Ps 52⁸ 128³ Jer 11¹⁶). In some parts, notably at Nablus, a large proportion of the trees are invaded by parasitic mistletoe. The cultivation of the olive requires patience, and presupposes a certain degree of settlement and peace: perhaps for this reason it was the emblem of peace. Destruction of a harvest of cereals is a temporary loss, but when the vines and, still more, the olives are destroyed, the loss takes many years to make good (Rev. 6⁴ 8¹).

The olive tree, grown from a slip taken from below the grafted branches of a selected fruitful olive, has to be grafted when three years old, but it does not bear fruit for some three or four years more, and not plentifully until it is about seventeen or eighteen years old; it may then, when well cared for, continue bearing for many years. The soil, however, must be carefully ploughed and manured every spring, and on the hillsides the water of the early rains must be conducted to the very roots by carefully arranged channels. When, after some years, the stem becomes too hollow from rotting of the wood, and the crop fails, it is sometimes cut sharp off at the root, and new shoots are allowed to spring up, which, after re-grafting, become a fruitful tree. It has been stated by Prof. Ramsay (Expositor, Jan. and Feb. 1905) that it is a custom in Syria to graft a branch of wild olive into the stem of a cultivated tree (cf. Ro 11¹⁷⁻²⁴). How this can be of any benefit to the tree it is difficult to see. Nor can the present writer, after careful inquiries all over Palestine, find any knowledge of such a custom. Cf. art. GRAFTING.

The wild olive is a kind of reversion to the primitive plant—such as occurs also with the fig and the almond—and it takes place whenever the growth of the olive is neglected. Thus the little shoots which grow around the main trunk (perhaps the origin of Ps 128³) are of the wild variety, and also those growing from the self-sown drupe. According to the fellahn of Galilee, the drupe germinates in the soil only after passing through the alimentary canal of the hooded crow.

In most neglected olive groves numerous little bushes of the 'wild olive' may be seen, which, though very unlike the cultivated tree—having a shorter, smaller, and greener leaf and a stiffer, more prickly stem—are nevertheless derived from it. As a rule the wild olive is but a shrub, but it may grow into a tree and have small but useless 'berries.' Where groves of wild olives are found in Palestine, they are probably always the descendants of cultivated trees long ago destroyed.

The young wild olive trees, scattered over the mountains in Galilee, are gathered by the fellahn and sold for olive plantations. Such plants are grafted three years after transplantation, and always in the late spring or early summer.

The 'olive berries' (Ja 3¹² AV) ripen in the autumn and are harvested in November or December. They are beaten from the trees with a long pole (Dt 24¹⁰) and collected in baskets. Olives are eaten pickled in brine, either when green and unripe or when soft and black. They are universally eaten by the fellahn with bread—sometimes the oil is eaten instead, much as butter is used in our home lands. The oil is also used extensively for making soup, for frying meat, and for illumination. See ORL. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF.—The range of hills east of Jerusalem, separated from the Temple mountain by the Kidron Valley. It is scarcely mentioned in the OT. David crossed it when fleeing from Absalom (2 S 15³⁰). Here branches were cut to make booths for the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh 8¹⁶). Ezekiel (11²) and Zechariah (14⁴) make it the scene of ideal theophanies: the literal interpretation of the latter prophecy has given rise to many curious and unprofitable speculations.

The chief interest of the mountain, however, is its connexion with the closing years of our Lord's life. Over this He rode on His triumphal entry to Jerusalem; and wept over the city as it came into view (Lk 19⁴¹); and during the days when He lodged in Bethany and visited Jerusalem He must necessarily have passed over it daily (Lk 21³⁷). The fig-tree which He cursed (Mt 21¹⁹) was most probably on the mountain slopes; and in one of these daily pilgrimages He delivered to His disciples the great eschatological discourse (Mt 24. 25). On the side of the mountain was Gethsemane, where took place the first scene of the final tragedy.

The ridge is formed of hard cretaceous limestone, surmounted by softer deposits of the same material. It is divided, by gentle undulations and one comparatively deep cleft, into a series of summits. There is no reason to apply the name Olivet (Ac 1¹², 2 S 15³⁰ [AV only]) exclusively to any one of these summits. The southernmost, which is separated from the rest by the cleft just mentioned, on the slope of which stands the village of Siloam (Sāwān), is traditionally known (by the Franks) as the 'Mount of Offence,' and is considered to be the scene of Solomon's idolatry. The peak north of this is commonly called Olivet proper; it is unfortunately spoilt by a hideous bell-tower and some other modern monastic buildings. The next peak, the Viri Galilæi, is the traditional site of the Ascension; and the next is popularly, but erroneously, called Scopus.

Ecclesiastical tradition has, as might be expected, been busy with the Mount of Olives, and the places pointed out have by no means remained unaltered through the Christian centuries, as becomes evident from a study of the writings of the pilgrims. To-day are shown the tomb of the Virgin; the grotto of the Agony; the Garden of Gethsemane (two sites); the chapel of the Ascension (a mosque, with a mark in the floor said to be the 'foot-print of Christ'); the tomb of Huldah; the site (an impossible one) of Christ's weeping over the city; the place where He taught the Lord's Prayer; the place where the Apostles' Creed was composed, etc. etc. Far more interesting than these ecclesiastical inventions are the numerous ancient Jewish and early Christian tombs (especially the tomb of Nicanor—the donor of the 'Beautiful Gate' of the Temple; the extraordinary labyrinth commonly known as the 'Tomb of the Prophets'); and the fragments of mosaic found here from time to time which testify to the pious regard in which the mount was naturally held from early times. OLYMPAS.—The name of a member of the Roman Church greeted by St. Paul in Rom 16¹⁴.

OLYMPIUS.—An epithet of Zeus derived from Mt. Olympus in Thessaly, the legendary home of the gods. Antiochus Epiphanes caused the Temple at Jerusalem to be dedicated to Zeus Olympius in B.C. 168 (2 Mac 6⁴), and the setting up of his image is the 'abomination of desolation' (Dn 9²⁷). Cf. JUPITER. OMAR (perhaps = 'eloquent').—A grandson of Esau (Gn 36^{11, 15}, 1 Ch 1²⁸).

OMEGA.—See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

OMENS.—See MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY.

OMER.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

OMRI.—1. See following article. 2. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 7⁸). 3. A Judahite (1 Ch 9⁴). 4. A prince of Issachar (1 Ch 27¹⁸).

OMRI was one of the most important kings of Israel, and the founder of a dynasty. He was one of the generals of the army under Elah, son of Baasha. This king was assassinated by Zimri, another of the officers. Omri was at the siege of Gibbethon at the time, and his troops acclaimed him king instead of his rival. A civil war of some duration followed, in which (apparently after the death of Zimri) one Tibni took part, himself aspiring to the throne. Omri finally prevailed, and for a time occupied the old capital Tirzah (1 K 16²⁴). But he had the intelligence to perceive the advantages of Samaria as a site for the capital, and removed thither, enlarging and fortifying the city.

Omri's political measures included an alliance with the Phœnicians, in which he had the example of David and Solomon, though subsequent generations condemned him for it. The alliance was cemented by the marriage of Ahab and Jezebel, so important for the later history. Omri seems to have been an able soldier, and he subdued Moab to Israel. This is acknowledged by the Moabite king Mesha in an inscription which has come down to us. The wars with Damascus were not so successful. The Assyrians first became acquainted with Israel in the time of Omri, and they call the country 'the land of the house of Omri' even after the extinction of his dynasty. The length of this king's reign is given as twelve years, but some think it to have been more. H. P. SMITH.

ON.—A Reubenite associated with Dathan and Abiram (Nu 16¹) [text doubtful].

ON.—The city of Heliopolis, On also in Egyptian, Gn 41^{46, 50} 46²⁰. The same name in Ezk 30¹⁷ has been intentionally misvocalized as Aven, i.e. 'idolatry'; in Jer 43¹³ it is called Beth-shemesh, meaning 'House of the Sun,' like its Egypt. sacred name P-Rê, and the Gr. Heliopolis. The city lay on the east border of the Delta, a little below the fork of the river. As the centre of sun-worship in Egypt, its temple was of the highest importance: it was favoured by the kings and served by the most learned priesthood in the land. Tradition makes Plato and other Greek philosophers study in Heliopolis; later, the foundation of the Alexandrian library, on the one hand, deprived Heliopolis of the glory of learning, and, on the other, the old traditions of royal descent from the Sun-god had little weight with the Ptolemys. Early in the Roman period Heliopolis is described by Strabo as almost deserted. Besides enclosure walls of crude brick and mounds of rubbish, the site of the temple is now marked by one conspicuous monument, an obelisk set up by Senwosri I. about B.C. 2000. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

ONAM.—1. The eponym of a Horite clan (Gn 36²³ = 1 Ch 1¹⁰). 2. A son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2^{26, 28}).

ONAN.—A son of Judah (Gn 38⁴ 46¹², Nu 26¹⁹, 1 Ch 2²). After the decease of his elder brother, Er, he was instructed by his father to contract a levirate marriage with Tamar. The device by which he evaded the object of this marriage 'was evil in the sight of the Lord, and he slew him' (Gn 38⁸⁻¹⁰).

ONESIMUS.—The name of the slave in whose behalf St. Paul wrote the Epistle to Philemon. As in his Epistle to the Colossians, St. Paul speaks of Onesimus as 'one of you' (Col 4⁹), we may infer that he was a native of Colossæ. His name means 'profitable' or 'helpful'—not an uncommon name for slaves. The Apostle plays upon this word in his letter to Philemon: 'which in time past was unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me' (Philem 1¹). He ran away from his master, probably after having robbed him (v. 18). He fled to Rome, the common hiding-place of criminals. There in some way he came under the influence of St. Paul, and was by him converted to Christianity (v. 19). There grew up a deep affection between the two (v. 12). The Apostle would gladly have kept him to minister to him (v. 13), but would not do so without the consent of Philemon, and therefore sends Onesimus back with the letter to obtain his master's forgiveness and his permission to return to St. Paul. MORLEY STEVENSON.

ONESIPHORUS.—The name of a Christian mentioned twice in St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy (2 Ti 1¹⁶⁻¹⁸ and 4¹⁹). From the first reference we learn that he showed special kindness to the Apostle during his imprisonment at Rome, when others, from whom he might have expected sympathy and help, held aloof from him; from the second we infer that he and his family lived at Ephesus. From St. Paul's expression 'the household of Onesiphorus,' it has been inferred that Onesiphorus himself was dead, and this text has been urged in proof of the lawfulness of prayers for the dead. There is much probability in this view, but the breathing of such a pious wish has nothing in common with the later abuses which gathered round this practice.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

ONIAS.—Four high priests bore this name. Onias I. was son of Jaddua and father of Simon the Just (Sir 50¹, where, however, the Heb. reads John in place of Onias). In his time a letter was said to have come from the Spartan king Areus I. claiming kinship and suggesting alliance (1 Mac 12¹⁷ [RV. Arius]; cf. Jos. Ant. xii. iv. 10).—Onias II. was son of Simon the Just. His reluctance to pay the tribute of 20 talents to Egypt would have led to great trouble if his shrewd and self-seeking ephew Joseph had not conciliated Ptolemy (Ant. xii. vi. 1).—ONIAS III. was son of Simon II., and entered on his office about B.C. 198. According to 2 Mac 3¹⁻⁴, he ruled the city well. A dispute arose between him and a man named Simon. The latter persuaded king Seleucus to send Heliolodorus (4 Mac 4¹⁻⁴ substitutes Apollonius) to seize the Temple treasury. Heliolodorus being supernaturally repulsed, Onias went to Antioch to defend himself. He was deposed from his office. In B.C. 175 he was murdered (Dn 9²). The esteem in which his memory was held appears from 2 Mac 15¹²⁻¹⁴.—His son Onias IV. fled to Egypt and was welcomed by Ptolemy Philometor, who gave him a disused temple in Leontopolis, which he re-built after the model of the one in Jerusalem, to serve as a centre of unity for the Hellenistic Jews (Ant. xiii. iii. 1, 3, BJ i. 1, vii. x. 2).

ONIONS (betsallim, Nu 11⁴).—The onion (Allium cepa, Arab. busal) is and has always been a prime favourite in Palestine and Egypt. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ONO.—A Benjamite city (1 Ch 8¹²) named with Lod and Hadid (Ezr 2³ etc.), to which his enemies invited Nehemiah to conference (6²). It was reoccupied after the Exile. It is identified with Kefr 'And, to the N. of Ludd, the ancient Lod or Lydda. W. EWING.

ONUS (1 Es 5²) = Ono (wh. see).

ONYCHA (shēchēleth, Ex 30⁹).—One of the ingredients of the sacred composition which gave a sweet smell when burned (cf. Sir 24¹⁶, where apparently the same substance is referred to as onyx). Onycha was obtained from the claw-like [hence the name from Gr. onyx nail] operculum of some mollusc of the genus strombus. A similar product is still used in Upper Egypt for fumigations. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ONYX.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES, ONYCHA.

OPHEL.—See JERUSALEM, II. § 1. 2.

OPHIR.—A region most probably in Arabia (as it is mentioned between Sheba and Havilah in Gn 10²⁹), famous for the excellence of its gold, which was brought to Solomon by his Red Sea navy (1 K 9²⁸). Jehoshaphat, essaying to send to Ophir, lost his ships (1 K 22⁴⁹). It has been disputed whether South or East Arabia was the true Ophir; the only datum is the length of the voyage thither from Ezion-geber—eighteen months, as the double voyage took three years (1 K 10²²). As the vessels probably coasted from port to port, the journey would naturally occupy a considerable time. It need not be supposed that the other imports—sandalwood, ivory, apes, and peacocks—all came from the same place. The most careful study that has been given to the subject is that of Glaser (Skizze der Gesch. und Geog. Arabiens, ii. pp. 353-387), who has concluded that it was in S.E. Arabia, in the territory of the Gulfs of Oman and of Persia.

Other theories have been put forward in plenty. The most popular recent view sees in Ophir certain parts of Mashonaland. This theory, apart from other difficulties which it presents, stands or falls with the explanation of certain ruins at Zimbabwe, about 200 miles from Sofala. Like Stonehenge and the Great Pyramid, these remains have been made the centre of much visionary speculation, but their true character seems to have been settled by the recent researches of Randall-MacIvor, who has shown that they are native structures of no great antiquity.

Besides S. Africa, various places in India have been fixed upon, such as the mouth of the Indus, Supara in Goa, and 'Mount Ophir' in Johore. Nothing convincing has been said in support of any of these views. For instance, we are reminded that the peacocks are confined to India and Malaya; but it is nowhere said that the peacocks came from Ophir, and even if they did, they may well have been brought thither by further

ORNAMENTS

Eastern trade quite independently of Solomon's Phœnician navigators.

On the whole, the view that Ophir was in Arabia (known to the Phœnicians as auriferous, Ezk 27²²) is the simplest and most in accordance with the scanty data.

OPHENI.—A town of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁴); unknown.

OPHRAH.—1. A town in Benjamin (Jos 18²²) which was somewhere near Michmash, and is only once elsewhere referred to, as an indication of the direction of a Phillistine raid (1 S 13¹⁷). The data for its identification are insufficient: Jerome states that it was 5 Roman miles east from Bethel. 2. Ophrah 'that pertaineth unto Joash the Abiezrite'—i.e. to a member of a sept of the tribe of Manasseh (Jos 17²), was the native village of Gideon. It is not mentioned except in connexion with the history of him and of his son Abimelech (Jg 6-9). No satisfactory identification has been proposed. 3. A name in the genealogy of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 4¹⁴).
R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ORACLE.—See MAGIC, etc., TEMPLE.

ORATOR.—The term applied in Ac 24¹ to Tertullus, who was the advocate for the high priest and elders against St. Paul. Men of this class were to be found in most of the provincial towns of the Roman Empire, ready to plead or defend any cause, and generally possessed of a certain amount of glib eloquence, with a due admixture of flattery. MORLEY STEVENSON.

OREB AND ZEEB.—Two princes of Midian in the invasion of Israel, mentioned as inferior to the kings Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 7⁸ 8³, Ps 83¹¹; cf. also Is 10²⁶). The meaning of the names is 'raven' and 'wolf.' Associated with the invasion put down by Gideon, these two princes were killed by the men of Ephraim, who rose at Gideon's suggestion and intercepted the princes and their followers at the river Jordan. That their death, so briefly narrated in Judges, was accompanied by great slaughter may be inferred from the incidental references by the writers of Ps 83 and Is 10. Isaiah compares the destruction to that of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, while the Psalmist compares the flying Midianites to the whirling dust or chaff driven before the wind. The rock Oreb and the wine-press Zeeb took their names from this incident. T. A. MOXON.

OREN.—A son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2²⁶).

ORGAN.—See MUSIC, etc., § 4 (2) (b).

ORION.—See STARS.

ORNAMENTS.—1. The custom of wearing ornaments, either as personal adornment or as amulets, or for both purposes combined, is almost coeval with the appearance of man himself. In historical times in Palestine, as elsewhere, these ornaments were chiefly of gold, silver, bronze, and paste, but the excavations have shown that in the neolithic age a favourite ornament was a string of sea-shells. The Hebrews, especially the Hebrew women, shared to the full the Oriental love of ornaments, which are denoted in OT by two comprehensive terms, kēlî, generally rendered 'jewels' (Gn 24²⁴, Ex 3²² and oft.), and 'adî', rendered 'ornaments' (Ex 33⁴, Ezk 16¹¹ etc.). Lists of individual ornaments are found in such passages as Ex 35²², Nu 31¹⁰, Is 3¹⁸, Ezk 16¹¹⁻¹², Jth 10⁴, although the identification of each article is not always certain.

2. Ear-rings, always of gold or silver where the material is stated, are frequently named, from Gn 35⁴ onwards. In this passage their character as amulets is clearly implied. Among the Hebrews ear-rings were apparently confined to women, and to children of both sexes (Ex 32⁹), for the 'rings' of Job 42¹¹ RV are not necessarily ear-rings as AV. The only men expressly mentioned as wearing them are Midianites (Jg 8^{24a}). For illustrations of gold ear-rings found at Gezer see Macalister, Bible Sidights from Gezer, Fig. 32, reproduced in Benzinger, *Heb. Arch.*² (1907) 83. The 'ear-rings' of Is 3²⁰ AV rightly appear in RV as 'amulets' (see AMULET). The pendants of Jg 8²⁴ RV (AV 'collars') and Is 3¹⁰ RV (AV 'chains'), to judge from the etymology of the original term, had the form of drops or beads, although it is unknown whether they were worn in the ears or as a necklace.

The custom still observed by the Bedouin women of wearing a ring through the right nostril (Doughty, Arab. Deserta, i, 240; ii, 220, 297) was also in vogue among the Hebrew women. Such was the nose-ring presented to Rebekah, wrongly given in AV as an earring (Gn 24²², note v.⁴⁷), as also the 'nose-jewels' worn by the ladies of Jerusalem (Is 3²¹). Although Ezk 16¹², as correctly rendered by RV, cannot be cited in support of wearing ornaments on the forehead as AV suggests ('a jewel on thy forehead'), this practice is attested by the figure in Ex 13¹⁶, Dt 6⁸ 11¹⁶, where the word rendered 'frontlets' (between the eyes) really denotes a jewel or amulet (see Hastings' DB iii, 872, now confirmed by Smend's reading of the Heb. text of Sir 36³). For a real frontlet, see § 6 below.

3. Several varieties of neck ornament occur, but here again the precise nature of each escapes us. The 'chains' of Pr 1⁹, Ca 4⁹ are clearly necklaces; the same word is used of the chains hung as amulets about the necks of the Midianite camels (Jg 8²³). The 'strings of jewels' of Ca 1¹⁰ RV were probably a necklace of beads. A special form of necklace or breast ornament was composed of crescents of gold (Jg 8²³, Is 3⁸, both RV). Cf. AMULET, § 4, and illust. PEFSI, 1905, 314, Pl. IV. The wide-spread custom of wearing a gold chain of office on neck and breast is met with in Egypt (Gn 41⁴²) and Babylon (Dn 5⁷, 16, 29).

4. Like other Eastern peoples, the Hebrews were fond of decking the arms and hands with ornaments. The term most frequently used for the finger-rings (tabba'at) properly denotes a signet-ring, as in Gn 41⁴² RV, Est 3¹², for which see art. SEAL. From the use of an engraved cylinder for this purpose was developed a form of ring found in the excavations, consisting of a small cylinder of stone or paste, or of more than one, fitted into a ring of silver or gold (see illust. PEFSI, 1905, 314, Pl. IV., and Benzinger, op. cit. 83, from Sellin's work cited in § 6). Ordinarily, however, tabba'at denotes a plain finger-ring (Ex 35²², Nu 31¹⁰, Is 3²¹, Lk 15²²) such as those found at Taanach (§ 6).

Of the various terms rendered bracelet in AV, the most common is tsamda; Rebekah's weighed 10 shekels, and was of gold (Gn 24²², 30, 47; cf. Nu 31¹⁰, Ezk 16¹¹ 23⁴²). The bracelets of Is 3¹⁰ seem to have been made of twisted strands of gold wire. The word 'bracelet' in 2 S 1¹⁰ more probably denotes an armlet or arm-band, worn on the upper arm. It is rendered 'ankle-chains' in Nu 31¹⁰ RV, while a cognate word of the same meaning occurs in Is 3³⁰ (AV 'ornaments of the legs'), and in the emended text of 2 K 11², where the crown and the arm-band (EV 'testimony') are named as insignia of royalty. Similarly, the bracelet worn 'upon the right arm' (Sir 21²¹ EV) is an armlet, as is seen from the list of Judith's ornaments, who 'decked herself bravely' with her armlets (EV 'chains'), 'and her bracelets, and her rings, and her ear-rings, and all her ornaments' (Jth 10⁴). The nature of the ornament given in AV as tablets and in RV as 'armlets' (Ex 35²², Nu 31¹⁰), is quite uncertain. RV rightly finds anklets in Is 3¹⁰; these the ladies of Jerusalem rattled as they walked (v.¹⁶ end).

5. In a separate category may be placed such articles as, in addition to being ornamental, served some useful purpose in connexion with dress. Among these may be reckoned the gold brooches of Ex 35²² RV (AV 'bracelets,' lit. hooks), and the 'buckle of gold' of 1 Mac 10⁸⁹ etc. There seems to be no reference in OT to the ornamental pins in gold, silver, and bronze which are found in considerable numbers at Gezer and elsewhere. For illustrations of typical pins and brooches found at Gezer, see Macalister, op. cit. Fig. 34.

6. This article would be incomplete without a fuller reference to the countless specimens of ancient jewelry, recovered from the sands of Egypt and the soil of Palestine, which serve to illustrate the ornaments above mentioned. The jewelry of the early Egyptian goldsmiths (Ex 32⁹), as is well known, has never been surpassed in variety and delicacy of workmanship. The excavations at Gezer, Taanach, and Megiddo have revealed an unexpected wealth of gold and silver ornaments. One of the most remarkable of these recent finds is that described by its fortunate discoverer, Dr. Sellin, in his Nachlese auf dem Tell Ta'anek, 1906, 12 ff. (cf. PEFSI, 1905, 176). Beneath the debris of a Canaanite house were found a mother and her five children, and beside the former the following ornaments: a gold band for the forehead, 8 gold rings, of which 7 were simple bands of gold wire, while the eighth was of several strands of wire, 2 silver rings, 2 larger bronze rings, perhaps bracelets, 2 small cylinders of crystal, 5 pearls, a scarab of amethyst and another of crystal, and finally a silver fastener (all illustrated op. cit. Pl. IV. and Fig. 16).

The ornaments found in still greater variety in the mounds of Gezer are described and illustrated in the PEFSI from 1902 onwards. A special interest attaches to certain recently discovered graves, probably of Philistine origin and of a date c. B.C. 1000, in which a profusion of jewelry has been found similar in character and workmanship to the ornaments of the Mycenaean age found in Cyprus and Crete. For a description of the armlets, bracelets, anklets, rings, etc., found in these graves, see PEFSI, 1905, 318 ff. and Pl. VI.; 1907, 199 ff. and Pl. I., 240 ff.

ORNAN.—See ARAUNAH.

ORPAH.—A Moabitess, sister of Ruth and daughter-in-law of Naomi. When the latter was returning to her own country, Orpah, following Naomi's advice, elected to go back to her own people and to her god (or gods), while her sister went with her mother-in-law (Ru 1⁴⁻¹⁵).

OSNAPPAR (so written in RV of Ezr 4¹⁰. Asnapper of AV is more correct; but the best reading of the Hebrew is Asenappar).—A curiously distorted form of Ashurbanipal, the name of the last great king of Assyria (B.C. 668-626), the son of Esarhaddon, and grandson of Sennacherib. He is distinguished chiefly as the great conservator of the ancient Babylonian literature, whose rich and varied collections have come to us from his own library in Nineveh. He succeeded by great efforts in keeping together the empire of his father; and he added thereto the country of Elam in a fierce campaign which ended with the capture of Susa (Shushan), about B.C. 645. It was after this event that the deportation, alluded to in Ezr 4⁹⁻¹⁰, of 'Shushanchites' and 'Elamites' to Samaria and the vicinity took place. The war against Elam was the conclusion of a great conflict with Babylonia, with which country Elam on the east and most of the western subject States, including Judah, were in alliance. And it was before Ashurbanipal, as victorious king of Babylonia, that the rebel Judahite Manasseh was brought in fetters to Babylonia, as related in 2 Ch 33¹⁴—an event whose historicity has been unnecessarily called in question. OSPRAY ('oznyyāh, Lv 11¹², Dt 14¹²).—Probably the fish-eating Pandion haliaetus, which is still found in the Plain of Acre and at the Huleh. The Heb. name may have included also one or more of the smaller eagles.

OSSIFRAGE (peres = 'the breaker,' Lv 11¹³, Dt 14¹², RV gier eagle).—This is the Lämmergeier (Gypaetus barbatus), a great bird with a spread of ten feet across, distinguished from the true vultures by its neck being covered by dirty-white feathers. It occurs in the ravines around the Dead Sea, but is apparently gradually becoming extinct in Palestine. The Heb. peres and Latin ossifragus are both due to its habit of carrying large bones, tortoises, etc., to a great height and then dropping them upon the ground in order that it may get access to the soft contents.

OSTRICH.—

1. bath ya'ānāh, Lv 11¹⁶, Dt 14¹⁵, Job 30²⁹, Is 13²¹, 34¹³, 43²⁰, Jer 50²⁹, and Mic 1⁸. In all these references AV has 'owl,' but RV 'ostrich.' Lit. tr. of Heb. is 'daughter of greed.'

2. yē'ēnim, 'ostriches,' La 4³.

3. rēnānim, Job 39¹³ AV 'peacocks,' RV 'ostrich.' (In same verse chūsīdāh 'kindly' is in AV mistranslated 'ostrich'.)

The ostrich (Struthio camelus) still exists in the deserts to E. and S.E. of Syria; a live specimen was brought into Jerusalem a few years ago, and their eggs are from time to time offered for sale by the Bedouin.

The popular view of the ostrich's neglect of her eggs appears in Job 39¹³⁻¹⁵, but the following is her real habit. The ostrich is polygamous, and a group of three or four hens, jealously guarded by a cock, lay some thirty or forty eggs in a common nest in the ground, covering them over with sand. During the day the heat of the sun is a sufficient incubator, but at night the birds take turns in keeping the eggs warm. A few scattered eggs, said to be used for food for the young chicks, are laid after the nest is closed, and these have given rise to the popular view. The feathers (Job 39¹³), the swift pace (v. 18), and the mournful cry (Mic 1⁸) of the ostrich are all referred to in Scripture, and in Job 30²⁹ its cry is associated with that other melancholy night-cry—the 'wailing' of the jackals.

OTHNI.—

A son of Shemalah (1 Ch 26⁷).

OTHNIEL (meaning unknown).—According to Jg 1¹² the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. As a reward for taking Kiriath-sepher, he receives Achsah, the daughter of Caleb, for his wife. Othniel is the first mentioned among the 'Judges' of Israel; Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, had oppressed the Israelites for eight years, when Jahweh 'raised up a saviour' in the person of Othniel, who fought against the oppressor and overcame him, thus bringing rest to the land.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

OTHONIAS (1 Es 9²²) = Mattaniah in Ezr 10²⁷.

OUCH.—The word 'ouch' is used in AV for the setting of a jewel, but it is also used in Old Eng. for the jewel itself. See BREASTPLATE (of the High Priest).

OVEN.—See BREAD.

OWL.—

1. bath ya'ānāh, RV 'ostrich' (wh. see).
2. yānshūph, Lv 11¹⁷, Dt 14¹⁶, 'great owl'; [yānshōph] Is 34¹¹ 'owl,' RVm 'bittern'; commonly thought to be the ibis.
3. kōs, Lv 11¹⁷, Dt 14¹⁶, 'little owl'; Ps 102⁶ 'owl.'
4. qippōz, Is 34¹⁵, AV 'great owl,' RV 'arrowsnake.' The description 'make her nest, and lay, and hatch' certainly seems to point to some bird, but what kind is uncertain.
5. tīnshemeth, Lv 11¹⁸, Dt 14¹⁶, AV 'swan,' RV 'horned owl.' See SWAN.
6. lūlith, Is 34¹⁴, AV 'screech owl,' AVm and RV 'night monster,' RVm 'Lilith,' the fabulous monster which is in Jewish folklore such an enemy of children.

Owls are very plentiful in Palestine. Most common of all is the little bōmeh (Athene glauca), whose melancholy cry can be heard anywhere in the open country when twilight begins. It is a general favourite and very tame. The great Egyptian eagle-owl, the next most common species, is a large bird, nearly two feet long, with long ear tufts (see No. 5). It haunts ruins, and has a prolonged and desolate cry.

OX, OXEN, HERD, CATTLE.—

1. shōr, Gn 32², 1 S 22¹⁹ etc.; Aram. tor (cf. Arab. thaur) is used in Ezr 6⁹, 17⁷ and Dn 4²², 22, 23; shōr is used collectively and also for a single member of the bovine species of any age and either sex.
2. ālāphim (only in pl.); a general term for 'oxen,' Dt 7¹³, 28¹⁸, 31, Ps 87, Pr 14⁴, Is 30²⁹.
3. par 'young bull,' 'bullock'; and pārāh 'young cow.' See HEIFER.
4. abbir (in plur.) 'bulls' in Ps 22¹³, 50¹³, Is 34⁷; but 'strong ones' or 'horses' elsewhere.
5. teō, Dt 14⁵ AV 'wild ox,' RV 'antelope'; wō, Is 51²⁰ AV 'wild bull,' RV 'antelope.'
6. 'ēdher herd'; in Jl 1¹⁸ conjoined with bāqār = herds of oxen; and in same verse with teōn = herds (EV 'flocks') of small cattle (sheep and goats).
7. migneh usually tr. 'cattle'; in Gn 47¹⁷ conjoined with bāqār = 'herds' (AV and RVm 'cattle of the herds').
8. bēhēmāh 'cattle'; in Gn 47¹⁸ conjoined with migneh = 'herds of cattle.'

Oxen are specially valuable in Palestine for ploughing (Dt 22⁹, 1 K 19¹⁹) and for threshing, i.e. 'treading out the corn' (Dt 25⁴, Hos 10¹¹). They were used for carts (Nu 7²); the Circassians, recently settled in Palestine, use them extensively in this way, but not the fellahīn. In 1 Ch 12⁴⁰ oxen are also mentioned as burden-bearers. Their use for sacrifice is repeatedly referred to (see 1 K 8⁶³, 2 Ch 29²³). The cattle of Palestine are small and mostly lean, owing to poor food and much work. They are most plentiful in Galilee, where the pasture is better; and a much larger breed, the cows of which give excellent milk, flourishes around Damascus. In several parts of the Jordan Valley, notably in el-Batīah, N. of Lake of Tiberias, and near Lake Huleh, the buffalo or jāmus (Bos bubalus) is kept by the Bedouin; it yields excellent milk.

PACHON (month).—See TIME.

PADDAN, PADDAN-ARAM (the former in Gn 48⁷ only).—The name used by P for the region (or a part of it) designated by J Aram-Naharaim (see ARAM): see Gn 28². 6. 7 31¹⁸ 33¹⁸ 35⁹. 46¹⁸. Padanu in Assyrian denotes a measure of land (cf. 'field of Aram' in Hos. 12¹³).

PADDLE occurs only in Dt 23¹⁸, where it is used of a wooden tool for digging, a spade. In earlier English a small spade used for cleaning the plough-share was called a 'paddle,' which explains the choice of this word in the Geneva Bible, whence it reached AV and RV.

PADON.—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub., Ezr 2⁴⁴—Neh 7⁷; called in 1 Es 5²⁸ Phaleas.

PAGIEL.—Chief of the tribe of Asher (Nu 1¹⁸ 22⁷ 7¹². 7¹⁷ 10²⁶).

PAHATH-MOAB.—The name of a Jewish clan which consisted of two branches, Jeshua and Joab. Part of it returned with Zerubbabel, part with Ezra, and part remained in Babylon. The word has been read to mean 'governor of Moab,' and referred to a dominion once exercised over Moab. It is, however, more probable that we have a corrupted text. See Ezr 2⁸⁴, Neh 7¹¹; in 1 Es 5¹¹ 8⁴ Phaath Moab. W. F. COBB.

PAI.—The capital city of Hadad (1 Ch.) or Hadar (Gn.) (1 Ch 1⁴⁰). In the parallel passage, Gn 36⁹, the name occurs in the form Pau. The site is unknown.

PAINFULNESS.—In Ps 73¹⁶ 'When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me' as well as in 2 Es 7¹², 2 Mac 2²⁸ 'painful' means 'laborious' and so 'painfulness' in 2 Co 11²⁷ means 'laboriousness.' Hooker says, 'The search of knowledge is a thing painful, and the painfulness of knowledge is that which maketh the will so hardly inclinable thereto.'

PAINT, PAINTING.—See EYE, ART.

PALACE.—Primarily 'palace' denotes simply a large house; so the Egyptian royal title Pharaoh or Palace (cf. Sublime Porte) means 'great house'; and the ordinary OT term for 'palace,' in its strict sense of 'royal residence,' is 'the king's house' or 'his house,' 1 K 7⁹ 10⁹. The only royal residence of which we have any details in the Bible is Solomon's palace, 1 K 7¹⁻¹², which took thirteen years to build. This included the 'House of the Forest of Lebanon,' a great hall, 100 cubits long, 50 broad, 30 high, with four rows of pillars; a 'porch of pillars,' 50 cubits by 30; the 'porch of the throne' for a court of justice; a dwelling-house for himself, and another for Pharaoh's daughter. Round about the whole was a great court of hewn stones and cedar beams.

In Egypt the palace was not only the royal residence, but also the seat of government. The royal apartments were in an inner, the halls of audience in an outer, court. If we include all the buildings required for courtiers and officials, the 'palace' becomes not a house, but a royal city. A characteristic feature was a balcony on which the king would show himself to his people.

The Assyrian and Babylonian palaces were large and magnificent. In Babylonia, the palaces, like the temples, were built on the top of artificial mounds of crude bricks; and were groups of buildings forming a great fortress.

PALAL.—The son of Uzal (Neh 3³⁶).

PALESTINA.—See next art., § 1.

PALESTINE.—1. Situation and name.—The land of Palestine is the territory which lies between the Mediterranean Sea and the Arabian Desert as E. and W. boundaries, and whose N. and S. boundaries may be approximately stated at 31° and 33° 20' N. Lat. respectively. These boundaries have not always been clearly fixed; but the convention is generally agreed upon that Palestine is separated from Egypt by the Wady el-'Arish or 'River of Egypt,' and from Syria by the Kasmych or Litani River, the classical Leontes. Biblical writers fixed the limits of the territory by the towns Dan and Beersheba, which are constantly coupled when the author desires to express in a picturesque manner that a certain event affected the whole of the Israelite country (e.g. Jg 20¹). The name 'Palestine' [AV in JI 3⁴; in Ex 15¹⁴, Is 14²⁹. Palestina; RV Philistia], being derived from that of the Philistines, properly belongs only to the strip of coast-land south of Carmel, which was the ancient territory of that people. There is no ancient geographical term covering the whole region now known as Palestine: the different provinces—Canaan, Judah, Israel, Moab, Edom, etc.—are enumerated separately when necessary. The extension of the word to include the entire Holy Land, both west and east of the Jordan, is subsequent to the introduction of Christianity.

2. Geology and geography.—The greater part of the country is of a chalky limestone formation, which overlies a layer of red sandstone that appears on the E. shore of the Dead Sea and elsewhere. Under the red sandstone are the archaic granitic rocks which form a large part of the Sinai Peninsula. Above the chalk is a layer of nummulitic limestone, which appears on some mountains. Volcanic rock, the result of ancient eruptions, appears in the Hauran, Galilee (especially in the neighbourhood of Safed), and elsewhere. For fuller information on the geology of the country, see art. GEOLOGY. With respect to the surface, Palestine divides naturally into a series of narrow strips of country running from north to south, and differing materially from one another in character. (a) The first of these is the Maritime Plain running along the coast of the Mediterranean from the neighbourhood of Sidon and Tyre southward, and disappearing only at the promontory of Carmel. This plain widens southward from Carmel to a maximum breadth of about 20 miles, while to the north of that promontory it develops into the great plain of Esdraelon, which intersects the mountain region and affords the most easy passage into the heart of the country. This plain is covered with a most fertile alluvial soil. (b) The second strip is the mountainous ridge of Judæa and Samaria, on the summit of which are Hebron, Jerusalem, and other important towns and villages; and which, with the single interruption of the plain of Esdraelon, runs continuously from the south border of the country to join the system of the Lebanon. (c) The third strip is the deep depression known as the Ghôr, down which runs the Jordan with its lakes. (d) The fourth strip is the great plateau of Bashan, Moab, and Edom, with a lofty and precipitous face towards the west, and running eastward till it is lost in the desert.

3. Water supply, climate, natural products.—There is no conspicuous river in Palestine except the Jordan and its eastern tributaries, and these, being for the greater part of their course in a deep hollow, are of little or no service for irrigation. In consequence, Palestine is dependent as a whole for its water supply on springs, or on artificial means of storage of its winter rains. Countless examples of both exist, the former especially in Galilee, parts of which are abundantly fertile by nature, and would probably repay beyond all expectation a judicious expenditure of capital. The case of Judaea is a little different, for here there are extensive tracts which are nearly or quite waterless, and are more or less desert in consequence.

The climate of Palestine is, on the whole, that of the sub-tropical zone, though, owing to the extraordinary variation of altitudes, there is probably a greater range of average local temperature than in any other region of its size on the world's surface. On the one hand, the summits of Hermon and of certain peaks of the Lebanon are covered with snow for the greater part of the year; on the other hand, the tremendous depression, in the bottom of which lies the Dead Sea, is practically tropical, both in climate and in vegetation. The mean local temperature is said to range from about 62° F. in the upland district to almost 100° F. in the region of Jericho.

Rainfall is confined to the winter months of the year. Usually in the end of October or November the rainy season is ushered in with a heavy thunderstorm, which softens the hard-baked surface of the land. This part of the rainy season is the 'former rain' of the Bible (as in Jl 23). Ploughing commences immediately after the rains have thus begun. The following months have heavy showers, alternating with days of beautiful sunshine, till March or April, when the 'latter rain' falls and gives the crops their final fertilization before the commencement of the dry season. During this part of the year, except by the rarest exception, no rain falls: its place is supplied by night dews, which in some years are extraordinarily heavy. Scantiness of the rainfall, however, is invariably succeeded by poverty or even destruction of the crops, and the rain is watched for as anxiously now as it was in the time of Ahab.

Soon after the cessation of the rains, the wild flowers, which in early spring decorate Palestine like a carpet, become rapidly burnt up, and the country assumes an appearance of barrenness that gives no true idea of its actual fertility. The dry summer is rendered further unpleasant by hot east winds, blowing from over the Arabian Desert, which have a depressing and enervating effect. The south wind is also dry, and the west wind damp (cf. 1 K 18, Lk 12). The north wind, which blows from over the Lebanon snows, is always cold, often piercingly so.

As already hinted, the flora displays an extraordinary range and richness, owing to the great varieties of the climate at different points. The plants of the S. and of the Jordan Valley resemble those found in Abyssinia or in Nubia: those of the upper levels of Lebanon are of the kinds peculiar to snow-clad regions. Wheat, barley, millet, maize, peas, beans, lentils, olives, figs, mulberries, vines, and other fruit; cotton, nuts of various species; the ordinary vegetables, and some (such as solanum or 'egg-plant') that do not, as a rule, find their way to western markets; sesame, and tobacco—which is grown in some districts—are the most characteristic crops produced by the country. The prickly pear and the orange, though of comparatively recent introduction, are now among its staple products. The fauna includes (among wild animals) the bat, hyæna, wolf, jackal, wild cat, ibex, gazelle, wild boar, hare, and other smaller animals. The bear is now confined to Hermon, and possibly one or two places in Lebanon; the cheetah is rare, and the lion (1 S 17, 1 K 13 etc.) is extinct. So also is the hippopotamus, bones of which have been found in excavations. Among wild birds we may mention the eagle, vulture, stork, and partridge: there is a great variety of smaller birds. Snakes and lizards abound, and crocodiles are occasionally to be seen in the Nahr ez-Zerka near Cæsarea. The domesticated animals are the camel, cow, buffalo (only in the Jordan Valley), sheep, horse, donkey, swine (only among Christians), and domestic fowl. The dog can scarcely be called domesticated: it is kept by shepherds for their flocks, but otherwise prowls about the streets of towns and villages seeking a living among the rubbish thrown from the houses.

4. History, races, antiquities.—The earliest dawn of history in Palestine has left no trace in the country itself, so far as we can tell from the limited range of excavations hitherto carried out. There was, however, a Babylonian supremacy over the country in the fourth millennium B.C., of which the records left by the kings of Agade speak. These records are as yet only imperfectly known, and their discussion in a short article like the present would be out of place. A very full account of all that is as yet known of these remote waifs of history will be found in L. B. Paton's excellent History of Syria and Palestine.

About B.C. 3000 we first reach a period where excavation in Palestine has some information to give. It appears that the inhabitants were then still in the neolithic stage of culture, dwelling in caves, natural or artificial. The excavation of Gezer has shown that the site of that city was occupied by an extensive community of this race. They were non-Semitic; but as they practised cremation, the bones were too much destroyed to make it possible to assign them to their proper place among the Mediterranean races. Further discoveries may ultimately lead to this question being settled. It is possible that the Horites of Gn 14 and elsewhere may have been the survivors of this race.

About B.C. 2500 the first Semitic settlers seem to have established themselves in the country. These were the people known to Bible students as Canaanites or Amorites. The success of attempts that have been made to distinguish these names as indicating two separate stocks must be considered doubtful, and it is perhaps safer to treat the two names as synonymous. About B.C. 2000, as appears by the reference to 'Amraphel, king of Shinar' (= Hammurabi), occurred the battle of the four kings and five recorded in Gn 14—the first event on Palestinian soil of which a Palestinian record is preserved.

The dominion of Egypt over S. Palestine, or at least the influence of Egyptian civilization, must early have been felt, though no definite records of Egyptian conquest older than Tahutmes III. (about B.C. 1500) have come to light. But scarabs and other objects referable to the Usertesens (about B.C. 2800–2500, according to the opinions of various chronologists) are not infrequently found in excavations, which speak of close intercourse between the Canaanites and the civilization of the Nile valley. Of the Canaanites very extensive remains yet await the spade of the excavator in the mounds that cover the remains of the ancient cities of Palestine. The modern peasantry of the country closely resemble the ancient Canaanites in physical character, to judge from the remains of the latter that excavation has revealed; indeed, in all probability the substratum of the population has remained unchanged in racial affinities throughout the vicissitudes that the country has suffered. By the conquests of Tahutmes III. (c. 1500), and Amenhotep III. (c. 1450), Palestine became virtually an Egyptian province, its urban communities governed by kings (i.e. local sheiks) answerable to the Pharaoh, but always quarrelling among themselves. The 'heretic king' Amenhotep IV. was too busy with his religious innovations to pay attention to his foreign possessions, and, city by city, his rule in Palestine crumbled away before the Aramæan tribes, named in the Tell el-Amarna tablets the Khabiri. This name is identical with that of the Biblical Hebrews; but it has not yet been possible to put the Khabiri and the Hebrews into their proper mutual relations. The Hebrews represent themselves as escaped slaves from Egypt who (about the 13th cent. B.C.) were led as a solid whole under a single leader (Joshua) to the complete conquest of Canaan—this is the account of the Book of Joshua. According to the older tradition preserved in Jg 1, they entered the country without an individual leader, as a number of more or less independent tribes or clans, and effected only a partial conquest, being baffled by the superior strength of certain specified cities. This account is more in accordance with the events as related by the Tell el-Amarna tablets, but further discoveries must be made before the very obscure history of the Israelite immigration can be clearly made out.

The Israelite occupation was only partial. The important Maritime Plain was in the hands of a totally distinct people, the Philistines. The favourite, and most probable, modern theory regarding the Philistines is that they were of Cretan origin; but everything respecting that mysterious race is veiled in obscurity. As above mentioned, it is not likely that the change of ownership affected the peasants—the Gibeonites were probably not the only 'hewers of wood and drawers of water' (Jos 9²¹) that survived of the older stock. And lastly, we cannot doubt that an extensive Canaanite occupation remained in the towns expressly mentioned in Jg 1, as those from which the various tribes 'drove not out' their original inhabitants. So far as we can infer from excavation—an inference thoroughly confirmed by a consideration of the barbarous history of the Judges—the effect of the Israelite entrance into Canaan was a retrogression in civilization, from which the country took centuries to recover.

The history of the development of these incoherent units into a kingdom is one of ever-fresh interest. It is recorded for us in the Books of Judges and 1 Samuel, and the course of events being known to every reader, it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. It is not unimportant to notice that the split of the short-lived single kingdom into two, after the death of Solomon, was a rupture that had been foreshadowed from time to time—as in the brief reign of Abimelech over the northern provinces (Jg 9), and the attempt of the northerners to set up Ish-bosheth as king against David (2 S 2, 3), frustrated by Ish-bosheth's ill-timed insult to Abner (2 S 37); Abner's answer (v.¹⁰) recognizes the dichotomy of Judah and Israel as already existing. This division must have had its roots in the original peopling of the country by the Hebrews, when the children of Judah went southward, and the children of Joseph northward (Jg 13²¹ 22²⁴).

Space will not permit us to trace at length the fortunes of the rival kingdoms, to their highest glory under the contemporary kings Uzziah and Jeroboam II., and their rapid decline and final extinction by the great Mesopotamian empires. We may, however, pause to notice that, as in the case of the Canaanites, many remains of the Israelite dominion await the excavator in such towns as lay within Israelite territory; and the Siloam Tunnel epigraph, and one or two of minor importance, promise the welcome addition of a few inscriptions. On the other hand, the remains of the population are scantier—for it need hardly be said that the modern Jewish inhabitants of Palestine are all more or less recent importations.

The Northern Kingdom fell before Assyria, and was never heard of again. Tangible remains of the Assyrian domination were found at Gezer, in the shape of a couple of contract-tablets written there in the Assyrian language and formulæ about B.C. 650; and the modern sect of Samaritans is a living testimony to the story of the re-settling of the Northern Kingdom under Assyrian auspices (2 K 17²⁴⁻⁴¹).

The Southern Kingdom had a different fate. It was extinguished by Babylon about 135 years later, in B.C. 586. In 538 the captives were permitted to return to their land by Cyrus, after his conquest of Babylon. They re-built Jerusalem and the Temple: the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are the record of this work of restoration.

In B.C. 333 Syria fell to Alexander, the Great after the battle of Issus. After his death followed a distracting and complicated period of conflict between his successors, which, so far as Palestine was concerned, had the effect of opening the country for the first time to the influence of Greek culture, art, and religion. From this time onward we find evidence of the foundation of such buildings as theatres, previously quite unknown, and other novelties of Western origin. Although many of the Jews adopted the Greek tongue, there was a staunch puritan party who rigidly set their faces against all such Gentile contaminations. In this they found themselves opposed to the Seleucid princes of Syria, among whom Antiochus Epiphanes especially set himself deliberately to destroy the religion of Judaism. This led to the great revolt headed by Mattathias the priest and his sons, which secured for the Jews a brief period of independence that lasted during the second half of the 2nd cent. B.C., under John Hyrcanus (grandson of Mattathias) and his successors. The kingdom was weakened by family disputes; in the end Rome stepped in, Pompey captured Jerusalem in B.C. 63, and henceforth Palestine lay under Roman suzerainty. Several important tombs near Jerusalem, and elsewhere, and a large number of remains of cities and fortresses, survive from the age of the family of Mattathias. The conquest of Joppa, under the auspices of Simon Maccabaeus, son of Mattathias (1 Mac 13⁹), was the first capture of a seaport in S. Palestine throughout the whole of Israelite history.

The Hasmonæan dynasty gave place to the Idumæan dynasty of the Herods in the middle of the 1st cent. B.C. Herod the Great becoming sole governor of Judæa (under Roman suzerainty) in B.C. 40. It was into this political situation that Christ was born B.C. 4. Remains of the building activities of Herod are still to be seen in the sub-structures of the Temple, the Herodian towers of Jerusalem, and (possibly) a magnificent tomb near Jerusalem traditionally called the Tomb of Mariamme. Herod died shortly after Christ's birth, and his dominions were subdivided into provinces, each under a separate ruler; but the native rulers rapidly declined in power, and the Roman governors as rapidly advanced. The Jews became more and more embittered against the Roman yoke, and at last a violent rebellion broke out, which was quelled by Titus in A.D. 70, when Jerusalem was destroyed and a large part of the Jews slain or dispersed. A remnant remained, which about 60 years later again essayed to revolt under their leader Bar Cochba: the suppression of this rebellion was the final deathblow to Jewish nationality. After the destruction of Jerusalem many settled in Tiberias, and formed the nucleus of the important Galilean Rabbinic schools, remains of which are still to be seen in the shape of the synagogues of Galilee. These interesting buildings appear to date from the second century A.D.

After the partition of the Roman Empire, Palestine formed part of the Empire of the East, and with it was Christianized. Many ancient settlements, with tombs and small churches—some of them with beautiful mosaic pavements—survive in various parts of the country: these are relics of the Byzantine Christians of the 5th and 6th centuries. The native Christians of Syria, whose families were never absorbed into Islam, are their representatives. These, though Aramaean by race, now habitually speak Arabic, except in Ma'hlula and one or two other places in N. Lebanon, where a Syriac dialect survives.

This early Christianity received a severe blow in 611, when the country was ravaged by Chosroës II., king of Persia. Monastic settlements were massacred and plundered, and the whole country reduced to such a state of weakness that without much resistance it fell to Omar, the second Caliph of Islam. He became master of Syria and Palestine in the second quarter of the seventh century. Palestine thus became a Moslem country, and its population received the Arab element which is still dominant within it. It may be mentioned in passing that coins of Chosroës are occasionally found in Palestine; and that of the early Arab domination many noteworthy buildings survive, chief of which is the glorious dome that occupies the site of the Hebrew Temple at Jerusalem.

The Moslem rule was at first by no means tyrannical; but, as the spirit of intolerance developed, the Christian inhabitants were compelled to undergo many sufferings and indignities. This, and the desire to wrest the holy places of Christendom from the hands of the infidel, were the ostensible reasons for the invasions of the brigands who called themselves Crusaders, and who established in Jerusalem a kingdom on a feudal basis that lasted throughout the 12th century. An institution so exotic, supported by men morally and physically unfit for life in a sub-tropical climate, could not outlast the first enthusiasm which called it into being. Worn out by immorality, by leprosy and other diseases, and by mutual discussions, the unworthy champions of the Cross disappeared before the heroic Saladin, leaving as their legacy to the country a score or so of place names; a quantity of worthless ecclesiastical traditions; a number of castles and churches, few of which possess any special architectural interest, and many of which, by a strange irony, have been converted into mosques; and, among the Arab natives, an unquenchable hatred of Christianity.

We must pass over the barbarous Mongolian invasions, the last of which was under Timur or Tamerlane at the end of the 14th century. But we must not omit to mention the Turkish conquest in 1516, when Syria obtained the place which it still holds in the Ottoman Empire.

PALLU.—One of the sons of Reuben (Gn 46⁹, Ex 6¹⁴, Nu 26⁵, 8, 1 Ch 5⁹). The patronymic Palluites occurs in Nu 26⁵. We should probably read Pallu for Peleth in Nu 16¹.

PALM TREE (tāmār).—The date palm (Phoenix dactylifera) is a tree essential to existence in the deserts of Arabia, and was therefore held sacred among the Semites from the earliest historic times. It flourishes in Egypt, Mesopotamia, and the oases of Arabia (Ex 15²⁷, Nu 33⁹), but its cultivation has for long been much neglected in Palestine. It is still found in considerable numbers in the Maritime Plain, e.g. at the Bay of 'Akka and at Gaza; and small scattered groups occur all over the land in the neighbourhood of springs. In the valleys east of the Dead Sea, many sterile, dwarfed palms occur. Both in the OT (Dt 34⁹, Jg 1⁶ 3¹², 2 Ch 28¹⁸) and in Josephus (BJ iv. viii. 2-3), Jericho is famous for its vast groves of palms; to-day there are but few, and these quite modern trees. Not only are dates a staple diet in Arabia and an important article of export, but the plaited leaves furnish mats and baskets, the bark is made into ropes, and the seeds are ground up for cattle. From the dates is made a kind of syrup, date-honey or dibs, a valuable substitute for sugar. The method of fertilization of the female (pistillate) flowers by the pollen from the male (staminate) flowers was known in very ancient times, and nature was then, as now, assisted by shaking out the pollen over the female flowers. The palm tree is referred to (Ps 92¹²) as a sign of prosperity and (Ca 7⁷, 8) of beauty. Figures of palm trees were used to ornament the Temple (1 K 6); at a later period they occur on Jewish coins and in the sculpture of the ancient Jewish synagogues, notably in the recently excavated synagogue at Tell Hām (Capernaum). The sacredness of this tree thus persisted from the early Semite to late Jewish times. Palm branches were used at the rejoicings of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lv 23⁴⁰, Neh 8¹⁵), as they are among the modern Jews, who daily, during this feast, wave branches of palms in their synagogues. In 1 Mac 13⁴¹

we read of the bearing of palm branches as the sign of triumphant rejoicing—an idea also implied in their use in Jn 12¹³ and Rev 7⁹. To-day these branches are used by the Moslems especially at funeral processions, and to decorate graves.

PALMER-WORM.—Old Eng. for 'caterpillar,' see Locust.

PALSY.—The modern form of this word is 'paralysis.' See MEDICINE, p. 599^a.

PALTI.—1. The Benjamite spy (Nu 13⁹). 2. The man to whom Michal, David's wife, was given by Saul (1 S 25⁴⁴). In 2 S 3¹⁸ he is called Paltiel. See following article under No. 2.

PALTIEL.—1. The prince of Issachar (Nu 34²⁶). 2. 2 S 3¹⁸, the same as Palti of 1 S 25⁴⁴.

PALTITE, THE.—A native of Beth-pelet in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15²⁷, Neh 11²⁶). To this town belonged Helez, one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23³⁹). In the parallel lists (1 Ch 11²⁷ 27¹⁹) he is described, probably incorrectly, as 'the Pelonite.'

PAMPHYLIA.—The name of a district on the S. coast of Asia Minor, lying between Lycia and Cilicia. Strictly speaking, it consisted of a plain 80 miles long and (at its widest part) 20 miles broad, lying between Mt. Taurus and the sea. After A.D. 74 the name was applied to a Roman province which included the mountainous country to the N., more properly called Pisidia, but until that time it was used only in the narrower sense. The plain was shut in from all N. winds, but was well watered by springs from the Taurus ranges. Through lack of cultivation it has in modern times become very malarious, and in ancient times, though better cultivated, the district was never favourable to the development of a vigorous population. Moreover, it was very isolated except by sea, for the mountains to the N. had no good roads, and were infested by brigands. Even Alexander had to fight his way through them.

The name is probably derived from the Pamphylî, one of the three Dorian tribes, and it is likely that Dorian settlers entered Pamphylia at the time of the other Dorian migrations. But the Greek element never prevailed, and though Side and Aspendos were half-Greek cities in the 5th cent. B.C., the Greek that they spoke was very corrupt and was written in a corrupt alphabet. Side is said to have earned its prosperity as the market of Cilician pirates. The town of Attalia was founded in the 2nd century. But more important was the native town of Perga, situated inland and having apparently a port of its own on the river Cestrus at a distance of 5 miles. It was a religious centre, where a goddess 'Artemis of Perga' was worshipped, her rites corresponding to those associated with Diana of the Ephesians, and being therefore more Asiatic than Greek. The ruins of the city date from the period of the Seleucid kings of Syria. Pamphylia was in turn subject to Persia, Macedonia, Syria, Pergamus, and Rome.

Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey crossed from Cyprus to Perga, but seem to have gone straight on to Antioch without preaching. It was at Perga that John Mark left them (Ac 13¹³). On the return journey, before taking ship at Attalia, they preached at Perga (Ac 14²⁵), but by this time they had definitely determined to 'turn to the Gentiles' (cf. 13⁴⁶). Christianity was slow in taking hold of Pamphylia,—there is no mention of it in 1 P 1¹—and this was probably due partly to the absence of Jewish centres, partly to the backwardness of the district. Christianity made way most quickly in the chief centres of thought. See PERGA.

PAPHOS was the name of two cities in Cyprus, Old Paphos about a mile from the sea, New Paphos (now Baffo) about seven miles N.W. of this. The Phœnician origin of the former need not be doubted; the latter was by tradition a Greek settlement, but in both the chief object of worship was the Paphian goddess, undoubtedly of Syrian origin, and worshipped under the form of a conical stone, though identified by the Greeks with Aphrodite. Old Paphos was desolate in the time of Jerome. New Paphos was the centre of the Roman administration in Cyprus. It was here that St. Paul encountered the Roman proconsul Sergius Paulus in his first missionary journey—the first presentation of Christianity before Roman authorities (Ac 13¹⁻¹²).

PAPYRI AND OSTRACA.—Until almost the end of the 19th cent., the most important records of antiquity, apart from the authors, that had been preserved for literary reasons, were the inscriptions on stone and metal. Published in great collections, and utilized by scholars of all civilized countries, they have given new life to all branches of the study of antiquity, to history in the widest sense of the word, and in particular to the history of States, law, economics, language, and religion. The age of modern epigraphy has been extraordinarily productive of knowledge that never could have been discovered from the authors alone. And the end has not yet come. The researches and excavations of European and American archaeological institutes and of special archaeological expeditions, in which the Governments of almost all civilized countries and many wealthy individuals have taken part, bring to light innumerable inscribed stones every year. Then there are the engineering enterprises for opening up the countries of the Levant to traffic and commerce. In the construction of railways particularly, but also in other similar undertakings, a quantity of epigraphical material is discovered and made accessible to scholars.

These epigraphical records were reinforced in the last quarter of the 19th cent. by two quite new groups of records, both of which have ushered in a new epoch in the science of antiquity, viz. the Papyri and the Ostraca. Both have led to the development of entirely new branches of study. In comparison with the inscriptions they not only constitute an enormous quantitative increase of our materials, but also qualitatively they are of quite special importance: they allow us to see into the private life of the men of antiquity—their most private life, in fact—much deeper than we could ever have done by aid of the authors and the inscriptions.

Suppose for a moment that chance excavations in an absolutely dry mound of rubbish were to lead to the discovery of whole bundles of original private letters, contracts, wills, judicial reports, etc., relating to our own ancestors of the 10th cent. A.D.—what a wave of excitement would run through the whole of the learned world! How few are the documents that we do possess of the private life of those times! History preserves the old inscribed stones, the archives of kings, the chanceries of the great churches and municipalities, but suffers the written memorials of peasants, soldiers, women, artisans, to disappear after a few years without a trace. It was exactly the same in antiquity. The tradition that had come down to us was on the whole the tradition preserved in the history of what was great—the history of nations, potentates, the intellectual leaders in art, science, and religion; and that is true in great measure of the inscriptions, which for the most part owe their origin to princes, cities, and wealthy individuals.

Only those rare inscriptions that originated in the middle and lower classes of ancient society had to some extent counterbalanced the one-sidedness of the materials available as sources. The papyri and ostraca, however, have remedied the defect in a most unexpected manner. Rubbish mounds such as that which we just now assumed hypothetically to be discoverable in our own country, but which in reality, owing to the dampness of our climate, probably do not exist anywhere in the West, occur in large numbers in Egypt. In ancient times the dumping grounds for rubbish and refuse were on the outskirts of the cities, towns, and villages. Whole bundles of documents that were too old to be worth preserving were thrown on these rubbish heaps by the authorities, instead of being burned; and private persons did the same when they wished to get rid of written matter that had accumulated and was considered valueless. The centuries have covered these ancient rubbish-shoots with layers of dust and sand, and this covering has united with the great dryness of the climate to preserve most excellently the old sheets of papyrus and the inscribed fragments of pottery. Of course these texts, when re-discovered in our own day, throw a flood of light upon the upper cultivated class, but for the most part they are documents of the middle and lower classes.

It had long been known that papyrus was in antiquity a very popular writing material. The pith of the papyrus plant, which thrives excellently in the damp levels of the Nile, was cut into strips, and from these strips, laid cross-wise, horizontally and vertically, upon each other, the sheets of papyrus were manufactured by gumming and pressing. Perishable as the material seems, it is in reality excellent. We possess Egyptian papyri of the time of king Assa (c. B.C. 2600 according to Eduard Meyer's chronology); and most of the papyri now in our museums have lain more than 1500 years in the earth of Egypt. It is therefore not such a fantastic plan that has lately been suggested in Italy, viz., to re-introduce the manufacture of papyrus and establish it as a State monopoly in connexion with the making of bank notes. It is hoped in this way to obtain a material as durable as it would be difficult to counterfeit.

The first discoverers of written papyri must have been Egyptian fellahin, digging in the old rubbish mounds for good earth and treasure. In the year 1778 a European noticed a number of papyrus documents in the hands of some of these peasants; he bought one, and watched them burn some fifty others in order that they might enjoy the aromatic smoke. The one document came to Europe; it is the Charta Borgiana, the decipherment of which marks the first beginning of papyrology. Though a good number of other papyri reached the European museums in the course of the 19th cent., only a few scholars took any trouble to cultivate papyrology further, until in 1877, a hundred years after the acquisition of the Charta Borgiana, many thousands of papyri came to light from the rubbish mounds near the 'City of Crocodiles' or 'City of the Arsinoites,' the old capital of the province of el-Fayyum in Middle Egypt.

This was the beginning of a new epoch that has led to a gigantic development of the infant science of papyri. The period of chance discoveries, the harvest of which used from merely financial considerations to be scattered hither and thither, has been succeeded by a period of systematic excavations carried out by highly trained specialists, who keep together the documents they discover and publish them in collected form. British scholars particularly have performed signal services by discovering and publishing papyri. Flinders Petrie has obtained magnificent specimens from mummy-wrappings which had been made by sticking papyri together. Grenfell and Hunt have carried out splendid excavations at Oxyrhynchus and other places, and have published their treasures with a rapidity and accuracy that place them in the front rank of editors, as the world of scholarship acknowledges. Besides these there are many other editors, and every year adds to the army of workers on the texts; philologists and historians, lawyers and theologians, all have found and are finding abundant work. The young and hopeful science has found a centre in the Archiv für Papyrusforschung, a journal edited by the leading German papyrologist, Ulrich Wilcken.

The papyri fall into two great classes according to the nature of their contents, viz. literary texts and non-literary texts.

Literary texts have come to light in large numbers, though generally only in fragments. They comprise not only very ancient MSS of well-known authors, but also a large number of lost authors; and lost writings by known authors have been partially recovered. These finds would suffice to show the extreme importance of the papyrus discoveries. And many scholars have considered these literary finds to be the most valuable.

But for scholarship as a whole the second group, the non-literary texts, is no doubt the more important. As regards their contents, they are as varied as life itself. Legal documents of the most various kinds, e.g. leases, accounts and receipts, contracts of marriage and divorce, wills, denunciations, notes of trials, and tax-papers, are there in innumerable examples; moreover, there are letters and notes, schoolboys' exercise-books, horoscopes, diaries, petitions, etc. Their value lies in the inimitable fidelity with which they reflect the actual life of ancient society, especially in its middle and lower strata.

The oldest papyri date from c. B.C. 2600, and are among the most precious Egyptological records. To the 5th cent. B.C. belong the Aramaic papyri from Assuan, published by Sayce and Cowley in 1906, and those from Elephantine, published by Sachau in 1907—documents that have furnished astonishing information relative to the history of Judaism. In the 4th cent. B.C. the main stream, as it were, begins, consisting of Greek papyri, and extending from the time of the Ptolemys till the first centuries of the Arab occupation, i.e. over a period of more than 1000 years. Associated with them there are Latin, Coptic, Arabic, Hebrew, Persian, and other papyri—so that, taken all together, they confer an immense benefit, and at the same time impose an immense obligation, upon the science of antiquity.

What is the importance of the papyri to Biblical science? It is twofold. In the first place, they increase our stock of Biblical MSS in a most gratifying manner; and secondly, they place new sources at the disposal of the philological student of the Greek Bible.

Beginning then with Biblical MSS, and first of all MSS of the Hebrew Bible, we have in the Nash Papyrus a very ancient copy of the Ten Commandments. As regards the Greek Old Testament, we have numerous Septuagint fragments (e.g. the Leipzig fragments of the Psalms, the Heidelberg fragments of the Minor Prophets), together with isolated remains of other translations. For the New Testament we possess an equally fine series of ancient fragments. But besides these we have acquired quite new material, in particular the various remains of lost Gospels and two papyrus fragments and one vellum fragment with sayings of Jesus, some of which are not to be found in the NT. Of course with such finds as these it is always a question how far they contain ancient and genuine material; and the opinions of specialists, e.g. with regard to these sayings of Jesus, are at variance. But in any case, even if, as is not at all likely, they should prove to be of quite secondary importance as regards the history of Jesus, they would be valuable documents in the history of Christianity. Quite a number of the papyri throw fresh light on early Christianity as a whole. Fragments of the Fathers, Apocryphal and Gnostic writings, liturgical texts, homiletic fragments, remains of early Christian poetry, have been recovered in large numbers, both in Greek and Coptic. But to these must be added the large number of non-literary documents, both Jewish and Early Christian, which are to be reckoned among the oldest relics of our religion. From the time of the persecution of the Christians under the Emperor Decius, we possess, for example, no fewer than five libelli issued to libellatici, i.e. official certificates by the authorities responsible for the pagan sacrifices, that the holder of the papyrus had performed the prescribed sacrifices. To the time of the Diocletian persecution belongs probably the letter of Psenosiris, a Christian presbyter in the Great Oasis, relating to a banished Christian woman named Politike. Then comes a long series of other early Christian original letters in Greek and Coptic, from the 3rd cent. until late in the Byzantine period. Centuries that had long been supposed to be knowable only from the folios of Fathers of the Church are made to live again by these original documents—documents of whose complete naïveté and singleness of purpose there can be no doubt.

The direct value of the papyri to Bible scholarship and ecclesiastical history is thus very considerable. Less obvious, however, but none the less great, is the indirect value of the papyri, and chiefly the non-literary documents of private life.

This value is discoverable in two directions. The papyri, as sources of popular, non-literary Late Greek, have placed the linguistic investigation of the Greek Bible on new foundations; and, as autograph memorials of the men of the ancient world from the age of the great religious revolution, they enable us better to understand these men—the public to whom the great world-mission of Primitive Christianity was addressed.

As regards the first, the philological value of the papyri, these new texts have caused more and more the rejection of the old prejudice that the Greek Bible (OT and NT) represents a linguistic entity clearly determinable by scholarship. On the contrary, the habit has arisen more and more of bringing 'Biblical' or 'New Testament' Greek into relation with popular Late Greek, and it has come to be realized that the Greek Bible is itself the grandest monument of that popular language.

The clearest distinctive features of a living language fall within the province of phonology and accidence. And in the phonology and accidence we see most readily that the assumption of a 'Biblical' Greek, capable of being isolated from other Greek for purposes of study, was wrong. The hundreds of morphological details that strike the philologist accustomed only to classical Attic, when he begins to read the Greek Bible, are found also in the contemporary records of the 'profane' popular language, especially in the papyri and ostraca. The recent Grammars of the NT by Winer-Schmiedel, Blass, and James Hope Moulton, have furnished an extremely copious collection of parallel phenomena. Helbing's Grammar of the Greek Old Testament (Septuagint) does the same. The Septuagint was produced in Egypt, and naturally employed the language of its surroundings; the Egyptian papyri are therefore magnificent as parallel texts, especially as we possess a great abundance of texts from the Ptolemaic period, i.e. the time when the Septuagint itself originated. The correspondence between them goes so far that Mayser's Grammar of the Greek Papyri of the Ptolemaic Period might in many particulars be used as a Septuagint Grammar.

Questions of Biblical orthography, which seem unimportant to the layman, but cause much worry to an editor of the Biblical text, are of course illumined by the contemporary papyri. The matter is not unimportant to the scientific scholar, who must work with the fidelity of the wise steward.

In the same way problems of syntax and of style are considerably advanced by the papyri. It is possible, for example, to place the whole theory of the prepositions on a new basis. The use of the prepositions in Late Greek is very interesting. To mention but one small point, we are now able to make much more exact statements with regard to those prepositions in the NT which denote a vicarious relation—and how important these are in the Apostles' personal confessions of faith! The syntactical peculiarities of the NT, which used often to be traced back to Semitic influence, can also as a rule be paralleled from the papyri. The whole question of Semitisms will now be able to be treated afresh. Formerly, when the NT used to be 'isolated' far too much, the question was generally answered in such a way that the influence of the so-called 'genius' of the Hebrew or Aramaic language, especially on the Primitive Christians, was greatly exaggerated. Linguistic phenomena that could not be found recorded in the ordinary Greek Grammars were described summarily as Semitisms. It was forgotten that the NT and the Septuagint are for the most part documents of the popular language, and that the popular language in Greek and in Semitic has much in common. For example, the so-called 'paratactic' style of St. John's Gospel and St. John's Epistles, which used generally to be pronounced strongly Semitic, is in fact simply popular style, and has its parallels in inscriptions and papyri which certainly are not under Semitic influence. The existence of Semitisms in the Greek Bible is of course not denied by recent Biblical investigators—in the books translated from Semitic originals they are really numerous—but the number of Semitisms has been considerably reduced, and in proportion as the Semitic character of the NT recedes, its popular character is made to advance.

It is lexicography, perhaps, that derives most benefit from the new documents. Late Greek is rich in new words and new meanings of old words: the virgin soil of the life of the people is inexhaustible. Grammarians of a later age—the so-called Atticists—lured by Attic Greek of the classical period as by a phantom, fought against these new words and meanings, branded them as 'bad,' and tried to root them out. A number of littérateurs suffered themselves to be bound by the rules of the Atticists, as if they had been living in the 5th cent. B.C. This unhistorical, pedantic, and dogmatic tendency left the men of the NT practically untouched. Men of the people themselves, they spoke as the people spoke, and in the Gospels, for example, they for the first time introduced the language of the people with vigour into literature. By reason of its popular character, the language of the first Apostles is pre-eminently a missionary language, and this language it was that really enabled Christianity to rise to a world-religion. All this is confirmed most amply by the new discoveries. Words that we used formerly to regard as specifically 'Biblical' or 'New Testament,' we find now in the mouth of the people. Besides the papyri the inscriptions are also rich sources. Illustrative quotations from the papyri are for us particularly lifelike, because we can generally date them even to the day. Turn over the pages of the second volume of Oxyrhynchus Papyri published by Grenfell and Hunt, and you find that the non-literary examples are almost exclusively documents of the 1st cent. A.D., i.e. the exact time in which the NT grew up. It will be possible from these and other papyri to enrich very greatly the future Lexicon of the NT.

Thus we see the justification of the statement that the new texts of popular Late Greek have placed the linguistic investigation of the Greek Bible on new foundations. In yet another direction they yield an important harvest to theology. The more we realize the missionary character of Primitive Christianity, the more clearly we grasp the greatness of the Apostle Paul working among the proletariat of the great centres of the world's commerce—Ephesus, Corinth, etc.—the more we shall feel the necessity of studying the men to whom the gospel was preached, i.e. of obtaining, where possible, insight into their life, not only into their economic position and their family life, but into their very soul. As regards Egypt, we now possess wonderful documents among the papyri, especially in the numerous private letters, which were not intended for publicity, but reflect quite naively the mood of the moment. As they have made clearer to us the nature of the non-literary letters of St. Paul—and this alone constitutes a large part of the value of the papyri to NT study—so they make live again for us the men of the middle and lower classes of the age of the Primitive Christian mission to the world, especially for him who has ears to hear the softer notes between the lines. But we may assume that the civilization of the Imperial age was tolerably uniform throughout the whole range of the Mediterranean lands, and that if we know the Egyptians of the time of St. Paul, we are not far from knowing the Corinthians and the men of Asia Minor of the same period. And thus we possess in the papyri, as also in the inscriptions, excellent materials for the re-construction of the historical background of Primitive Christianity.

In conclusion, reference may be made once more to the fact that recently, in addition to the papyri, a great number of similar ancient texts, written on fragments of pottery, have been discovered in Egypt, viz. the Ostraca. As the potsherds cost nothing (anybody could fetch one from the nearest rubbish heap), it was the writing material of the poor man, and revenue officials were fond of using it in transactions with the poor. The ostraca, which are also numbered by thousands, are on the whole even more 'vulgar' than the papyri, but for that very reason valuable to us in all the respects already specified with regard to the papyri. The real founder of the study of ostraca on the great scale is Ulrich Wilcken, who has collected, deciphered, and historically elucidated the Greek ostraca. Next to him W. E. Crum has rendered similar services to the Coptic ostraca. To show that the ostraca, besides their indirect importance, have also a direct value for the history of Christianity, we may refer to the potsherds inscribed with texts from the Gospels, or the early Christian legal documents recently discovered at the town of Menas, but chiefly to the Coptic potsherds containing numerous Christian letters and illustrating particularly the inner history of Egyptian Christianity.

The whole study of papyri and ostraca is still in its infancy. The scholar still sees before him a large portion of the field of work uncultivated. The layman also who loves his Bible may still expect much light from the wonderful texts from the period of the origin of the Septuagint and the NT, and there is no need to fear that the Light of the world (Jn 8:12) will pale before the new lights kindled for us by research. The more we set the NT in its own contemporary world, the more we shall realize, on the one hand, the contact between it and the world, and the more we shall feel, on the other hand, the contrast in which it stands with the world, and for the sake of which it went out to fight with and to conquer that world.

ADOLF DEISSMANN.

PARABLE (IN OT).—1. The word represents Heb. māšāl, which is used with a wide range of meaning, and is very variously tr. both in LXX and in EV. The root means 'to be like,' and Oxf. Heb. Lex. refers the word to 'the sentences constructed in parallelism,' which are characteristic of Heb. poetry and gnomic literature; i.e. it refers to the literary form in which the sentence is cast, and not to any external comparison implied in the thought. Such a comparison, however, is often found in the māšāl, and, according to many scholars, is the main idea underlying the word. We are concerned here with the cases where the EV tr. 'parable'; it is important to notice that in OT 'parable' has the varying senses of māšāl, and is never used in the narrow technical sense of the NT. In Nu 23⁷ etc. it is used of the figurative discourse of Balaam (cf. Is 14¹ [RV], Mic 2¹, Hab 2¹); in Job 27¹ 29¹ of Job's sentences of ethical wisdom, differing little from the 'proverbs' of 1 K 4²², Pr 1¹ 10¹ (the same word māšāl). So in Lk 4²² (RV) it is used of a proverb. Pr 26⁷⁻⁹ speaks of 'a parable in the mouth of fools,' which halts and is misapplied. In Ps 49⁴ 78² 'parable' is coupled with 'dark saying' and implies something of mystery; cf. the quotation in Mt 13³⁵ and Jn 16²⁵ AVin, RVm, where it represents a Gr. word usually tr. 'proverb.' In Wis 5⁸ (AVm, RV), 'parable' means 'by-word,' a sense which māšāl often has. In Ezk 17² we have 'the parable' of the eagle, really an allegory (see below); cf. the use in Jn 10⁶, He 9⁹ RV, 11⁹ RV, where it represents a figure or allegory. Closely connected is Ezk 24³, the parabolic narrative of the caldron; the action described was probably not actually performed. Such mysterious figures are characteristic of Ezekiel, and he is reproached as 'a speaker of parables' (20⁴⁹).

2. The meaning of 'parable' in the technical sense.—If Christ did not create the parabolic type of teaching, He at least developed it with high originality, and gave it a deeper spiritual import. His parables stand as a type, and it is convenient to attach a technical sense to the word, as describing this special type. As distinguished from fable (wh. see), it moves on a higher ethical and literary plane. Fables violate probability in introducing speech of animals, etc., in an unnatural way, and their moral is confined to lessons of worldly wisdom. The allegory, again, is more artificial. It represents something 'other' than itself (the Gr. word means 'speaking other'), the language of the spiritual life being translated into the language, e.g., of a battle, or a journey. 'The qualities and properties of the first are transferred to the last, and the two thus blended together, instead of being kept quite distinct and placed side by side, as is the case in the parable' (Trench, On Parables, ch. 1). Hence each detail has its meaning, and exists for that meaning, not for the sake of the story. In the parable, particularly in those of the NT, the story is natural and self-sufficient as a story, but is seen to point to a deeper spiritual meaning. The details as a rule are not to be pressed, but are simply the picturesque setting of the story, their value being purely literary. In the allegory, each figure, king or soldier, servant or child, 'is' some one else without qualification; each detail, sword or shield, road or tree, 'means' something perfectly definite. It is not so in most of the parables; the lesson rests on the true analogy which exists between the natural and the spiritual world. Without requiring any fictitious 'licence,' the parable simply assumes that the Divine working in each sphere follows the same law. Like an analogy, it appeals to the reason no less than to the imagination.

3. OT parables.—There are five passages in the OT which are generally quoted as representing the nearest approach to 'parables' in the technical sense. It is noticeable that in none of them is the word used; as we have seen, where we have the word, we do not really have the thing; in the same way, where we have the thing, we do not find the word. The first two passages (2 S 12¹⁻⁴ [Nathan's parable], 14⁶ [Joab's]) are very similar; we have a natural story with an application. The first is exactly parallel to such a parable as 'the Two Debtors,' but the second has no deep or spiritual significance. The same is true of 1 K 20³⁵ [the wounded prophet], where the story is helped out by a piece of acting. In all three cases the object is to convey the actual truth of the story, and by the unguarded comments of the listener to convict him out of his own mouth. The method has perhaps in the last two cases a suspicion of trickery, and was not employed by our Lord; the application of the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mt 21³³) was obvious from the first in the light of Is 5¹⁻⁶. This passage is the fourth of those referred to, and is a true parable, though only slightly developed. It illustrates well the relation between a parable and a metaphor; and a comparison with Ps 80⁶ shows how narrow is the border-line between parable and allegory. The last passage is Is 28²⁴⁻²⁵, where we have a comparison between the natural and the spiritual world, but no story. It should be noted that post-Biblical Jewish literature makes a wide use of parable, showing sometimes, alike in spirit, form, and language, a remarkable resemblance to the parables of the NT.

C. W. EMMET.

PARABLE (IN NT).—1. Meaning and form.—(1) The constant use of a word, meaning resemblance both in Hebrew and in Greek, makes it evident that an essential feature of the parable lay in the bringing together of two different things so that the one helped to explain and to emphasize the other. In the parables of Christ the usual form is that of a complete story running parallel to the stages and divisions of a totally different subject. Thus in the parable of the Sower (Mt 13¹⁻⁹) the kinds of soil in the narrative are related to certain distinctions of character in the interpretation (13¹⁹⁻²³). The teaching value thus created came from an appeal to the uniformity of nature. In the Oriental thought of the Bible writers this contained a factor or field of illustration often grudgingly conceded by the materialistic provincialism of modern Western science. It was recognized and believed by them that the Lord of all had the right to do as He pleased with His own. Instead of being an element of disruption, this was to them the guarantee of all other sequences. He who gave to the frail grass its form of beauty could be relied upon with regard to higher forms of life. The attention given to the fall of the sparrow would not be withheld from the death of His saints. The conception gave solidarity to all phenomenal sequences, and forced into special notice whatever seemed to be subject to other influences. Such was the parable value of contrast between the behaviour of Israel towards God and the common sentiment of family relationship, and even the grateful instincts of the beasts of burden (Is 12²⁻³). Thus also Christ spoke of His own homelessness as a privation unknown to the birds and the foxes (Mt 8²⁰). This effect of contrasting couples formed a literary feature in some of Christ's parables where opposing types of character were introduced side by side (Mt 21²⁸⁻³², Lk 18¹⁰).

(2) The use of the word paroimía in LXX and in the Gospel of John indicates that a proverb or parable, being drawn from common objects and incidents, was available and meant for public use. What was once said in any particular case could always be repeated under similar circumstances.

(3) Occasionally the public parable value was reached by making an individual represent all others of the same class. The parable then became an example in the ordinary sense of the term (Lk 14¹⁵⁻¹⁶, 13¹³). In Jn 10¹⁻⁶ 15¹⁻⁷, there is no independent introductory narrative dealing with shepherd life and the care of the vineyard. Certain points are merely selected and dwelt upon as in the interpretation of a parable story previously given. Here there is all the explanatory and persuasive efficiency of the appeal to nature and custom, but, as in this case the reference is to Christ Himself as Head of the Kingdom, the parable has not the general application of those belonging to its citizenship. It is nevertheless a parable, though 'the Door' and 'the Vine' are usually called emblems or symbols of Christ.

2. Advantages and Disadvantages.—In the parable two different planes of experience were brought together, one familiar, concrete, and definite, the other an area of abstractions, conjectures, and possibilities. At the points of contact it was possible for those who desired to do so to pass from the known to the unknown. Imagination was exercised and the critical faculty appealed to, and sympathy was enlisted according to the merits of the case presented. A moral decision could thus be impartially arrived at without arousing the instinct of self-defence, and when the parallelism was once recognized, the hearer had either to make the desired application or act in contempt of his own judgment (2 S 12¹⁻⁴). In Christ's parables as distinct from the ordinary fable which they otherwise completely resembled in form, the illustrations were always drawn from occurrences that were possible, and which might therefore have belonged to the experience of the hearer. When the meaning was perceived, this fact gave to the explanation the persuasive value of something sanctioned by the actualities of life. But, on the other hand, the meaning might not be understood. Its acceptance was limited by the power to discover it. Only he who could see the prophet's chariot could use the prophet's mantle. The transition of responsibility from the speaker to the hearer was sometimes indicated by the words, 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' (Mt 13⁹). Christ's most solemn utterances were directed towards the insensibility that took its music without dancing, and sat silent where the wall for the dead was raised (Mt 11¹⁷). His last act towards such imperviousness was to pray for it and to die for it (Lk 23^{34, 47}, Ro 5⁸).

3. The special need of Parables in Christ's teaching.—If the teaching of Christ had been devoted to matters already understood and accepted as authoritative, such as the conventional commentary on the law of Moses, such a presentation of moral and spiritual truth, while imparting the charm of freshness to things familiar, would not have been actually necessary. The Scribes and Pharisees did not require it. Even if, passing beyond the Jewish ceremonial observance and externalism, He had been content to speak of personal salvation and ethical ideas after the manner so prevalent in the Western Church of to-day, He would not have needed the vehicle of parable instruction. But the subject which, under all circumstances, privately and publicly, directly and indirectly, He sought to explain, commend, and impersonate, was that of a Kingdom that had for its destiny the conquest of the world. Alike in His preaching and in His miraculous works, His constant purpose was to reveal and glorify the Father (Jn 15¹⁸, 16²⁵) and to unfold the mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 4²³, 13³⁵, Lk 8⁹). These mysteries were not in themselves obscure or remote (Mt 16¹⁻⁴, Lk 17²¹, 18¹⁶), but its principles and motives and rewards were so opposed to all that had entered the mind of man, that it had to be characterized as a Kingdom that was not of this world (Jn 18³⁶). It was this Kingdom of Messianic expectation that united Christ with the historic past of the elected nation to which according to the flesh He belonged. Its appearance had been the chief burden of prophecy, and its expansion and attendant blessing to humanity had been dwelt upon as the recompense for the travail of Zion. The Messiah was to be the Prince of Peace in that Kingdom of exploded and exhausted evil, where in symbol the wolf and the lamb were to feed together (Is 65²⁵). The princes of the people of the earth were to be gathered together to be the people of the God of Abraham (Gn 12¹, Ps 47⁹). But the same mysteries of the Kingdom, which connected Christ with the prophetic utterances and developed history of Israel, also brought Him into a relationship of antagonism towards the religious teaching of His own time. The people recognized in His words the authority that belonged to Moses' seat, but they saw very clearly that another than Moses was there. The point of distinction between Him and the Pharisees was that in His hands the Law was no longer an end in itself, but became a minister to what was beyond and greater than itself. While the Rabbinical teaching boasted that the world had been created only for the Torah, He taught that the Law had been created for the world. This radical opposition appeared in what He said about the proper use and observance of the Sabbath day, and in His condemnation of those who would neither enter the Kingdom nor allow others to do so. They taught with pride and complacency that the Kingdom of God had reached its final consummation and embodiment in their own exclusive circle, whereas the message of Christ was to be borne over new areas of progress and expansion until it reached and conquered the uttermost parts of the earth. It was a parting at the fountain-head. One teaching meant the extinction of the other. Of this Kingdom and its mysteries Christ spoke in parables. He thereby turned the thoughts of men from the Mosaic succession of Rabbinical precedents and their artificial mediation of the Law of God, and discovered a new source of illumination and authority in the phenomena of the seasons, the relationships of the family, and the industries of village life. Faith, obedience, and love took the place of technical knowledge and official position. The Kingdom of heaven was at hand, and the King's invitation to enter was always wider than the willingness to accept it. To His disciples He more intimately explained that it was a Kingdom of relationship to God, and of men's relation ship, in consequence, towards one another. This, along with the story of His own life and ministry and resurrection, was to be the gospel they were to preach, by the power of the Spirit, as the message of God's salvation to the whole world. In the Sermon on the Mount those mysteries of the Kingdom were indicated in outline, and in the parables the theme was still the same, whether the story started from the initiative of the Teacher in the presence of the multitude, or was suggested by some incident of the hour. In the long warfare of the world's kingdoms men had grown familiar with the cry, 'Woe to the vanquished!' but, in that Kingdom of which He spoke, a new social instinct, created and nourished by its citizenship, was to inflict an intolerable pain on those who could relieve misery and uplift the down-trodden and cheer the despairing, and did it not. It was to take upon itself the world's estrangement from God and hardness of heart, and make its own the Christless shame of moral defeat, and social discord, and all unloveliness of life. In the citizenship of that Kingdom the sorest impoverishment would not be in the humble byways of the lame and the blind, but in the homes of selfish luxury and privileged exemption. The chief crime of the Kingdom, involving a complete negation of discipleship, would be an evaded cross. 'I was sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not' (Mt 25⁴⁴). Both from the novelty of the vision thus presented, and from its hostility to the spirit and authority of the religious leaders, it is evident that teaching by parable was the form best adapted to Christ's purpose and subject, and to the circumstances of the time. It was an efficient and illuminating method of instruction to those who were able to receive it. The petition once presented by two of His disciples indicates what might have become general if the rewards of the Kingdom had been announced to those who had not the true spirit of its service (Mt 20²¹). By leaving altogether the traditions and controversies of the exhausted Church of that day, He gave a fresh positive re-statement of the nature and dimension of the Kingdom of God.

4. The following selection from Christ's parables indicates some of the points of relationship to the Kingdom. Whatever is stated generally applies also to the individual, and the latter should not regard anything as essential and vital which he cannot share with the whole membership. The humblest service is regarded as done directly to the King. (1) The parable of boundaries, the conditions and environment of the Kingdom: the Sower and the Seed (Mt 13¹⁻²³); difficulties and dangers arising from inattention, superficiality, and divided allegiance. Failure abnormal. (2) Accepted circumstance: Wheat and Tares (Mt 13²⁴⁻³⁰); malignity progressively revealed in the advancing stages of the Kingdom; the patience of the Spirit. (3) Continuous development and adaptation: Growing Seed (Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹); union in the service of the Kingdom not an artificial pattern commending itself to a particular age, but a new circle of growth around the parent stem which moves onwards and upwards towards flower and fruit. (4) The appointed task: Talents (Mt 25¹⁴⁻³⁰), Pounds (Lk 19¹²⁻²⁷); faith accepting personal responsibility; the servant of the Kingdom, being relieved from the dangers of success and failure, labours so that he may present his account with joy in the presence of the King, being prepared for that which is prepared for him. (5) The parable of office: The Husbandmen in the Vineyard (Mt 21³³⁻⁴⁴, Lk 12¹⁻⁹); names and claims in the Church that dispossess and dishonour Christ. (6) The King's interest: Lost Sheep (Lk 15¹⁻⁷), Lost Coin (15⁸⁻¹⁰), Lost Son (15¹¹⁻³²); forfeited ownership sorrowfully known to the owner; social relationship to the Kingdom indicated by the fact that the sheep was one of a hundred, the coin one of ten, and the son a member of a family. (7) Cost and recompense of citizenship: Hidden Treasure (Mt 13⁴⁴), Pearl of Great Price (13⁴⁵); self is eliminated, but 'all things are yours.' (8) Fulfilment: The Great Supper (Lk 14¹⁵⁻²⁴); the King's purpose must be carried out; if individuals and nations of civilized pre-eminence hold back, others will be made worthy of the honour of the service. (9) Rejected membership and lost opportunity: Rich Fool (Lk 12¹⁴⁻²¹), Rich Man and Lazarus (16¹⁹⁻³¹). (10) Personality in the Kingdom: (a) humility (Mt 18¹⁻⁴, Lk 18⁹⁻¹⁴); (b) sincerity (Mt 7¹⁸⁻²⁷); (c) usefulness (Lk 13⁹⁻⁹); (d) gratitude (Mt 18²³⁻³⁵, Lk 7⁴¹⁻⁴⁹); (e) readiness to help (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁷); (f) assurance of faith (Lk 11¹⁴⁻¹⁸, 18¹⁻⁸); (g) patient hope (Mk 13²⁴⁻²⁷, Lk 12³⁴⁻³⁹).

PARACLETE.—See ADVOCATE, PAUL, p. 693.

PARADISE.—A Persian word for 'park' or 'garden' (see ORCHARD), used in later Jewish and Christian thought to represent the abode of the blessed dead.

1. In the OT.—While the word pardēs occurs only 3 times in the OT (Ca 4¹², Ec 2⁸, Neh 2⁹), and then with no reference to the Garden of Eden, it is unquestionable that Eden serves as the basis for the later conception. The transition from the usage of Genesis to one less literal is to be seen in Ezk 31, which is doubtless modified to a considerable degree by Babylonian conceptions. These, undoubtedly, are also to be seen in the Genesis picture of Eden. The significance of Ezekiel's conception is that it shows the anticipation of the apocalyptic conception of Eth. Enoch (chs. 23-28) and other apocalypses both Jewish and Christian.

2. In Jewish apocalyptic literature and in the NT.—In the apocalypses there are elaborate descriptions (particularly Eth. Enoch, Apoc. Bar 4, and 2 Es 8²) of Paradise as the opposite of Gehenna. In the Rabbinical conception of the universe, Paradise is the abode of the blessed dead. There is the tree of life, and there also the righteous feast. Gehenna and Paradise are, according to the Rabbls, close together, being separated only by a handbreadth. This view, however, is difficult to harmonize with other conceptions, and the adjustment is probably to be made by the other view of a twofold Paradise, one in Sheol and the other in Heaven. Such a view would harmonize with the conception that the righteous would rise from the nether Paradise to the heavenly. The word is never used by Jesus or St. Paul except in Lk 23⁴² and 2 Co 12⁴. From some points of view it would be more natural to make these two passages refer to the two Paradises respectively, but a final conclusion is prevented by lack of evidence. The reference of Paul (2 Co 12⁴) is undoubtedly to the upper Paradise—that is, the third heaven. Here again, however, it is not safe to derive dogma from what may be a merely conventional expression.

3. In Christian theology the term is commonly used as identical with 'heaven,' although in some cases it is distinguished as the 'temporary abode of the saints, either in some place on earth or above the earth. It has been particularly developed in connexion with the speculation as to the intermediate state as the place where the righteous live between their death and the Parousia. Lack of data, however, makes it impossible to reach certainty in the matter, and the most modern theology maintains an attitude of reverent agnosticism regarding the state of the dead, and uses the term 'Paradise' as a symbol rather than with precise definition.

PARAH.—A city in Benjamin (Jos 18²³). Now the ruin Fārah, near the head of the Valley of Michmah.

PARALYSIS, PARALYTIC.—See MEDICINE, p. 599.

PARAN.—El Pārān, 'the oak or terebith (LXX) of Paran' (Gn 14⁹), is probably identical with Elath, the ancient seaport on the Gulf of Akabah. Perhaps in this region should be sought 'Paran' of Dt 33², Hab 3¹ (Driver, 'Deut.' [ICC], 392). Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, p. 510) identifies it with Jebel Magrah, c. 29 miles S. of Ain Kadts. If Dt 2⁹ refers to a place in Moab, no trace of it has yet been found. A city may be intended in 1 K 11¹⁸, lying between Edom and Egypt, which cannot now be identified. The exiled Ishmael settled in the 'Wilderness of Paran,' evidently S. of Beersheba (Gn 21²¹). Israel's first march from Sinai brought them to this wilderness (Nu 10¹²). Within it lay Taberah, Kibroth-hattaavah, Mazereth, Kadesh, and what is called the 'Wilderness of Zin.' The spies went from the 'Wilderness of Zin' (13²¹), in which lay Kadesh (20¹ 27¹⁴, cf. 33³), and this again is identified with the 'Wilderness of Paran' (13²⁹). It corresponds to the great limestone plateau of et-Tih, stretching from the S. of Judah to the mountains of Sinai, having the Arabah on the E. and the desert of Shur on the W. Hither David fled after Samuel's death (1 S 25¹). LXX B here gives Maan = Heb. Ma'ān. See Smith, 'Samuel' [ICC], 220 f.). W. EWING.

PARBAR.—A term identified with parvārim (AV 'suburbs,' RV 'precincts') of 2 K 23¹¹ and applied to part of the Temple buildings lying on the W., where two Levites were stationed (1 Ch 26¹⁸). The word is supposed to be of Persian origin and to have been taken over into Hebrew to indicate a colonnade or portico open to the light. The pl. form parvārim (2 K 23¹¹) describes the situation of the 'chamber of Nathan-melech,' and might be translated 'in the colonnades,' but it is difficult to understand how a Persian word could occur so early. Either the word is a late explanatory addition to the text, or perhaps we have a different word altogether, describing the office of Nathan-melech. If we read bappērādīm instead of bapparvārim, we get the meaning 'who was over the mules.'

PARCHED CORN (qārā, or more fully 'ābīb qālūi bārēsh [Lv 24], Lv 23¹⁴, Jos 5¹¹, Ru 2¹⁴, 1 S 17¹⁷ 25¹⁸, 2 S 17²⁸) is often made from the harvest field by holding a bundle of ears in a blazing fire or by roasting them over a piece of metal. Cf. FODDER, 2. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PAROSH

PAROSH.—The name of a post-exilic family (Ezr 2³—Neh 7⁷) Ezr 8³ 10²⁵, Neh 3²² 10¹⁴. The Gr. form Phoros is adopted in 1 Es 5⁹ 8³⁰ 9²⁸.

PAROUSIA.—The 'appearance,' Advent, or Second Coming of Christ at the end of 'this age' in order to establish His Kingdom. 1. Origin of the expectation.—The Messianic interpretation given to Jesus by the Apostles was essentially eschatological. No one of them understood Him to be engaged in the work of establishing the Kingdom of God during the period culminating in His death. He was the Christ in the sense that (a) He was anointed (empowered) by God to deliver men; (b) He was gathering and preparing men for His Kingdom; (c) He died and rose to manifest the justice and love of God, and thus save those who accepted Him as Christ; (d) He would return to conquer Satan, judge both the living and the dead, and establish His Kingdom either in heaven or on a renewed earth. How far we are to believe that this view was held or countenanced by Jesus Himself will be determined by the view taken as to the authorship of Mk 13 and other apocalyptic sections of the Synoptic Gospels. At this point Christian scholars are divided into three groups: first, those who believe that Jesus was thoroughly in sympathy with the eschatological views of His contemporaries; second, those who hold that He rejected those views, and that the eschatological sayings attributed to Him are the result of reading back into His word the admitted eschatological expectation of the Apostles and the early Church as a whole. There seems little likelihood at present of agreement between these two groups, for the reason that the second group uses as critical criteria dogmatic or highly subjective presuppositions concerning Jesus. The nearest approach to a compromise view is to be found in the position of the third group, who hold that Jesus to some extent utilized the eschatology of His day, but that His references have been developed and made specific by the Evangelists. However these larger questions may be answered, an impartial criticism and exegesis can hardly deny that Jesus referred to His future in terms which, if interpreted literally, would mean His return in judgment (cf. particularly Mk 14⁶¹⁻⁶², Mt 23³⁷⁻³⁹). As to the exact time at which He expected His return we have no information, except such sayings as Mk 8³⁴⁻³⁵ [Mt 16³⁴⁻³⁵, Lk 9²³⁻²⁷ show influence of Apostolic interpretation] and Lk 17²².

2. Expectation in the early Church.—The elements in the expectation of the Parousia found in the Gospels and in the Epistles can be formulated without serious difficulty. It was expected within the lifetime of the writers (except 2 P 3⁴⁻⁵): 1 Th 4¹⁵, 1 Co 15⁵¹⁻⁵²; or immediately: Ja 5⁸, Ph 4⁵, Ro 13¹¹, 1 Co 7²⁹, 1 P 4⁷. The exact day is, however, not known (1 Th 5²), but will be preceded by sorrows and the appearance of Antichrist (2 Th 2³) and the conversion of the Jews (Ro 11²⁵⁻²⁶). The order of events awaited is the descent of Jesus with His angels from the upper heavens to the lower; the sounding of the trumpet and the voice of the archangel which will summon the dead from Sheol; the giving to the saints of the body of the resurrection; the catching up of the living saints, who have been changed in the twinkling of an eye, to meet Jesus and the risen saints in the air; the general judgment of both living and dead; the establishment of the Messianic Kingdom, which, after a period of struggle, is to be victorious over the kingdom of Satan; and finally the fixing of the eternal supremacy of God. Among certain Christians this view was further elaborated, so that the appearance of Christ in the sky was followed by the resurrection of the martyrs, a thousand years of peace, during which Satan was to be bound, then the conquest of Satan, the general resurrection, and the establishment of the final conditions of eternity. This latter view, however, although popular in the 2nd cent., does not appear in the NT except in

PARTRIDGE

Rev 20¹⁻⁷ (see MILLENNIUM). It easily passed over into the sensuous chiliastic views which were finally rejected from the main current of Christian thought largely through the influence of Augustine, but which have continued to exist among different sects or groups of Christians.

3. Various identifications of the Parousia.—(a) With Christ's resurrection. Such a view, however, disregards many of the elements of the NT expectation, and has never been widely accepted. (b) The coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost—a view commonly held by those who reject the literalistic interpretation of the apocalyptic elements of the NT, and identify the influence of the risen Jesus in the world with the Holy Spirit. This view makes such passages as Jn 14²³ and 16⁷ the exegetical point of approach to the entire question. (c) The destruction of Jerusalem. This is generally combined with (b) and said to be forecast in Mk 13 and 14⁶¹⁻⁶². (d) The theory of the successive comings of the Christ in judgment. Thus various historical crises, such as the destruction of Jerusalem and the fall of the Roman Empire, are regarded as due to the immediate influence of the Christ and as a part of the new dispensation of the Spirit. (e) The death of the believer—a view exegetically untenable. (f) The historical-critical view sees in the expectations of the NT Christianity survivals of Jewish eschatology. Such a view does not deny an element of truth in the expectation, but regards the belief as due to the attachment to Jesus of Jewish expectations (cf. Eth. Enoch 48) now seen to be impossible of realization.

The view probably most generally held at the present time involves elements from several of these specific explanations, and is to the effect that, while the Apostles doubtless expected the eschatological cataclysm to occur in their day, they saw the future in prophetic rather than historical perspective. As a consequence the Second Coming with its attendant events is still to be expected. At different times men have endeavoured by the interpretation of the Book of Daniel to determine the precise date at which it will occur; but among those who still await a literal appearance of Christ in the air it is usual to regard the Parousia as likely to occur immediately, or at any time during an indefinite future period.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

PARSHANDATHA.—The eldest of the sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews (Est 9⁷).

PARTHIANS.—The founders of a powerful dynasty in Persia which overthrew the yoke of the Syrian Seleucids B.C. 250, and maintained itself against all external enemies till A.D. 226, defying even the Romans. They came from northern Iran, and their language or dialect greatly affected the cultivated speech of the empire, which was known as Pahlavi during their régime. But the exact form of the language of the Jews or proselytes who came to Jerusalem from Parthia, referred to in Ac 2⁹, cannot be ascertained. J. F. M'CURDY.

PARTRIDGE (qwr, 1 S 26⁹, Jer 17¹).—Two kinds of partridge abound in Palestine. The chukar or rock partridge (Caccabis chukar) is the commonest of game birds. Its cry may be heard all over the land, and large coveys may be encountered in the autumn. It is distinguished by its red legs. It is excellent eating. Hey's sand partridge (Ammoperdix heyi) occurs in enormous numbers around the Dead Sea. It is probably the partridge referred to in 1 S 26⁹: its short flights from place to place when hunted; its hiding, trusting to its invisibility on account of its colour being so like the environment; its quick run from danger before taking to wing; and its final capture when too wearied to fly—must form a very suitable image of a poor human fugitive remorselessly pursued. The reference in Jer 17¹ is hard to understand; it may perhaps refer to the fact that when disturbed from their nests such birds sometimes never return. In Sir 11³⁰ the heart of a proud man is compared to a decoy partridge in a cage. It is still customary in Palestine to hunt the red-legged partridge by the aid of such decoys.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PARUAH.—Father or clan of Jehoshaphat, Solomon's prefect in Issachar (1 K 4¹⁷).

PARVAIM.—A region whence, according to 2 Ch 3⁶, the gold was obtained which was used for ornamenting the Temple of Solomon. The name is most plausibly identified with Farwa in Yemen, or S. W. Arabia. It was possibly from this place that the 'gold of Sheba' (Ps 72¹⁵; cf. Is 60⁶) was in part derived.

J. F. M'CURDY.

PASACH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³³).

PAS-DAMMIM.—See EPHES-DAMMIM.

PASEAH.—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4¹³). 2. The father of Joiada (Neh 3³). 3. The eponym of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2³⁹ = Neh 7⁵¹); in 1 Es 5³¹ Phinoe.

PASHHUR.—1. A son of Malchiah, a prince of Judaea in the time of Jeremiah (Jer 21¹), who was opposed to the prophet (Jer 38¹⁻¹³). Perhaps he is the father of Gedaliah (Jer 38¹), and likely identical with Pashhur, mentioned in 1 Ch 9¹², Neh 11¹², as the ancestor of Adaliah. 2. The son of Immer, a Temple official and priest, who caused Jeremiah to be beaten and put in the stocks after he had predicted the fall of Jerusalem. The prophet told him his name was not Pashhur (probably 'peace,' lit. 'staying on every side') but Magor-missabib ('terror [or perhaps wandering] round about'), and added that he would die in Babylon (Jer 20⁴). Perhaps he was the father of Gedaliah (Jer 38¹). 3. The father of the Gedaliah mentioned in Jer 38¹, and may be either 1 or 2, or neither. 4. The head of a priestly family, 'the sons of Pashhur' mentioned in Ezr 2³⁸, Neh 7⁴¹, Ezr 10²², 1 Es 5²⁸ (Phassurus) 9²² (Phaisur). 5. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah, probably identical with 4, or used of the clan as a whole (Neh 10²).

W. F. BOYD.

PASSION.—In Ac 14¹⁶ 'We also are men of like passions with you,' 'passion' means 'feeling or emotion.' But in Ac 1⁵ 'He showed himself alive after his passion,' the word means 'suffering,' as in Wyclif's translation of He 2⁹ 'Ihesus for the passioum of deeth, crowned with glorie and honour.'

PASSOVER AND FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD.—1. OT references.—(1) Law and Ezekiel.—The allusions in Ex 34²⁵ and 23¹⁸ are so dubious that they can hardly give any sure ground on which to base a consideration of the Passover festival. The first certain reference to the feast is in Ex 12¹⁻²⁷. (This is probably an older account than 12¹⁻¹³, and differs from it in details.) We find that 'the passover' is assumed as known, and possibly it is the feast referred to in Ex 3¹⁸ 7¹⁴ etc. The characteristic features of the feast in Ex 12¹⁻²⁷ are: (a) a lamb is to be slain and its blood sprinkled on the lintel and side-posts of the houses; (b) the cause for this observance is found in the slaughter of the Egyptian firstborn.

In Dt 16¹⁻⁸ the Passover is directed to be observed in the month Abib (April), in commemoration of the Exodus from Egypt. The sacrifice is not to be offered in private dwellings, but 'in the place which Jehovah shall choose to place his name there.' With the Passover meal, and during seven days, no leavened bread was to be eaten. None of the flesh was to be left till morning. After the meal the worshippers were to go to their homes; the seventh day was to be a solemn assembly, and this period (v. 8) was treated as opening the 7 weeks' 'joy of harvest,' commencing from Abib, when the corn would be coming into ear. We may notice here: (a) the Passover is regarded as part of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Mazzoth), the two being apparently blended into one; (b) the sacrifice, though composed of individual sacrifices, is to be offered only at the Temple in Jerusalem; (c) the offering may be taken from flock or herd.

In Ezk 45²¹⁻²⁴ the date is precisely assigned as 14th Abib. The feast lasts 7 days, and unleavened bread only is to be eaten. The prince is to offer a bullock as a sin-offering for himself and the people, and a he-goat on each of the 7 days, as well as 7 bullocks and 7 rams daily, with other offerings of meal and oil. All takes place at the central sanctuary; there is no mention of a lamb, and the Passover is part of the Unleavened Bread festival.

Lv 23³⁻¹⁴ ordains the Passover for the evening of 14th Abib. The Feast of Unleavened Bread is treated separately; it lasts 7 days, a holy convocation is to be held on the 1st and 7th days; and 'on the morrow after the sabbath' a sheaf of new corn is to be waved before the Lord, a he-lamb is to be offered as a burnt-offering with other offerings; and till this is done, no bread or parched corn or green ears may be eaten.

According to Ex 12¹⁻¹³, the current month of the Exodus is to be regarded as the 1st month of the year. On the 10th day a lamb or a kid is to be taken for each family or combination of families, according to their size. It is to be slain at even on the 14th, and the lintel is to be stained with its blood. It is to be roasted intact, and eaten with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. Nothing of it is to remain till morning. It is to be eaten in haste, the partakers prepared as for a journey; it is a sign of the Lord's 'pass-over.'

Ex 12⁴³⁻⁴⁹ forbids any foreigner or hired servant or sojourner to eat the Passover unless he first submits to circumcision.

Nu 9¹⁻¹⁴ deals with a case recorded as arising on the first anniversary of the Exodus. It is declared that anybody who is unclean may celebrate the Passover on the 14th day of the 2nd month.

In Nu 28¹⁶⁻²⁸ the Passover is distinguished from the Feast of Unleavened Bread. The 1st and 7th days of the latter are to be days of holy convocation. On each of the 7 days two bullocks, a ram, and 7 lambs (with special offerings of meal and oil) are to be sacrificed, and a goat for a sin-offering.

(2) Historical and Prophetical books.—No certain reference is found previous to the date of the discovery of Deuteronomy. Most of the allusions in the prophets are quite general in scope (cf. Hos 2¹¹ 9⁵ 12¹⁰, Am 5²¹ 8¹⁰). The observance in 2 K 23²¹⁻²³ is stated to have conformed to the regulations of Dt 16 and to have been novel in character. 2 Ch 30. 35¹⁻¹⁹ perhaps reflects the later usages of the writer's own age. Of post-exilic witnesses Ezr 6¹⁹⁻²² may be quoted, where the priests and Levites play the prominent part in the sacrifice, and the Feast of Unleavened Bread is distinguished from the Passover.

Many of the Passover rites are undoubtedly very ancient; but Deuteronomy tends to emphasize the historical connexion of the festival with the Exodus. The various regulations and allusions in the OT are not consistent with each other, and different ideas were probably associated with the feast at different periods of the national history. Thus Ezk. lays most stress on its aim as a collective placular sacrifice. It is likely that the feast was observed during the Exile, and that its commemorative significance was then made more emphatic. This would explain the underlying conception of the account in the Priestly Code. But the Chronicler shows preference for the Deuteronomical version, perhaps owing to the growing centralization of worship at one sanctuary in his time.

2. Origin and primitive significance.—The Passover was in all probability an institution already existing when the Jewish legislation was codified, but taken up and transformed by the Legislator. (a) The most widely accepted theory is that it was in origin the shepherd's offering of the first-fruits from his flocks, the slaughter of the Egyptian firstborn being Pharaoh's punishment for hindering this observance. On this theory later tradition would then have altered the sequence, and have regarded the slaughter of the Egyptians as the reason why the Israelites should offer the firstborn of their flocks. And, finally, the connexion with the pastoral sacrifice would have been forgotten, and the Passover would be treated as instituted in order to save the firstborn of Israel. (b) Another theory finds the central idea of the Passover in the placular notion. The sacrifice would be offered as a substitute for the firstborn of man, and this conception is a common constituent of primitive spring festivals. (c) Other theories regard the observance as originating from domestic sacrifice to avert harm in times of pestilence, or from an ancient solemnization of a threshold covenant, when Jehovah was welcomed into a private dwelling.

It is quite possible that all these theories represent different parts of the truth. The Passover appears to date from very early times, and may have amalgamated features from an entire series of festivals. Thus it combines the notions of sin-offering (the sprinkling of the blood), of burnt-offering (the victim being roasted intact), and of peace-offering (the victim being eaten by the worshippers). Other noticeable features are: its date at the vernal equinox, the fact that the sacrifices were mostly or entirely of firstborn, and that an old tradition connected it with the Israelites' desire for a religious pilgrimage, which eventually led to the Exodus (cf. Ex 5:1-3). This variety of character suggests the inference that the Passover is the complex amalgamation of different feasts, in which these different elements existed separately. Its association with the Feast of Unleavened Bread is probably accidental, due to contiguity in time. The latter is plainly an agricultural festival, and falls into line with the feasts of Pentecost and Tabernacles.

3. Post-exilic observances.—The Samaritans continue to observe the detailed ordinances of Ex 12. But the Jews learned in time to disregard some of the details, as applicable only to the first or Egyptian Passover. Such details were the choice of the lamb on the 10th day, its slaughter at home, the sprinkling of the blood on the house-door, the admission of the unclean, the posture and attire of the partakers, etc. Various alterations and elaborations were introduced. The month Adar was devoted to a thorough purification of lands and houses, sepulchres being whitened, roads and bridges repaired. On the evening of 13th Abib all leaven was sought out. On the 14th the Passover was offered by indiscriminate companies of 10 to 20 people. It was slain in relays at the Temple, and the blood thrown before the altar by the priests. The lambs were then dressed, and the fat offered, while the Levites chanted the Hallel (Pss 113-118). The lambs were taken home and roasted; each of the guests brought 4 cups of red wine, and the meal was eaten with bitter herbs and unleavened cakes. The posture at the meal was recumbent (as a token, according to the Pharisees, of the rest which God had given to His people). A blessing was said over the first cup (perhaps implied in Lk 22:17). Then followed the washing of hands and offering a prayer. At the second cup came the son's question as to the significance of the feast, and the father's explanation. This was succeeded by the singing of Pss 113 and 114. Grace was said over the third cup, and with the fourth came the singing of Pss 115-118. Large numbers assembled at Jerusalem for this feast, and such occasions were always carefully supervised by the Romans for fear of insurrection. Hence perhaps would come the custom of releasing a selected prisoner; but we have no hint of the origin of the custom.

PATARA.—A great seaport on the coast of Lycia, a few miles E. of the mouth of the Xanthus. The valley of this river is the best part of Lycia, and doubtless from early times Patara had a local trade, but its importance depended on its convenient position for the trade between the West and the Levant. The prevailing winds in this part of the Mediterranean are from the west (especially in the autumn), and ships sailing from the Ægean or from Italy to Phœnicia or Egypt would often risk the voyage straight across the sea from Patara. Thus we find St. Paul on his last journey to Jerusalem (Ac 21²), after coasting in a slow vessel along the Ægean, taking a vessel that was sailing straight from Patara to Tyre. Cf. MYRA.

Lycia was never definitely colonized by Greeks, and the Lycians spoke a non-Aryan language. But Patara had an early culture,—its coins date from B.C. 440, and the chief Lycian god was identified with Apollo, whose celebrated oracle at Patara gave him the title Patareus (Hor. Od. iii. iv. 64).

PATHROS (Is 11¹¹, Jer 44¹⁹, Ezk 29¹⁴ 30¹⁴).—The name of Upper Egypt, in Egyptian Pteris, 'the South Land,' comprising both the Thebaid and Middle Egypt from somewhat south of Memphis to Syene at the First Cataract. 'Mizraim' was generally limited to Lower Egypt, i.e. the Delta and some distance up the valley to include the nome of Memphis. This division of Egypt was very ancient, corresponding, at least roughly, to the two kingdoms before Menes. While Lower Egypt was familiar to both Greeks and Hebrews, Upper Egypt was comparatively unknown, as witness Herodotus' woeful ignorance of Egypt above the Fayum, and Nahum's description of No-amon (see No). Yet there is abundant evidence in papyri of an important settlement of Jews at the southernmost extremity at Syene before 525 B.C. (cf. art. SEVENEH); and the passages in which Pathros is mentioned refer to Jews in the Upper Country more than half a century before that, after the destruction of Jerusalem. So also Greek and Phœnician mercenaries had reached Syene, and even Abu Simbel, far south in Nubia, in the 6th or 7th cent. B.C.; soldiers and traders of many nations must have passed frequently up and down the Nile in those days, yet without giving to their fellow-countrymen at home any clear idea of the Upper Country. In Gn 10¹⁴ the Pathrusim are the people of Pathros. They are represented as begotten of Mizraim. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

PATHRUSIM.—See PATHROS.

PATMOS.—An island W. of Caria, now called Patino, with an area of 16 sq. miles and a population of about 4000. In the Middle Ages its palms gained for it the title of Palmosa, but it is no longer fertile. Its Cyclopean remains show that it was very early inhabited. It is the traditional place to which St. John was banished by Domitian, and in which he wrote the Apocalypse (Rev 1²). The 'Cave of the Apocalypse' is still shown in which the Apostle is said to have seen the visions. The chief remaining interest of the island is the monastery of St. John, founded in the 11th century. It once contained a valuable library, from which was purchased in 1814 the 9th cent. Plato now in the Bodleian.

PATRIARCH.—This term is usually applied to (1) the antediluvian fathers of the human race; (2) the three great progenitors of Israel—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob (see sep. art.); (3) in the NT it is extended to the sons of Jacob (Ac 7⁹), and to David (Ac 2²⁹).

PATROBAS.—The name of a member of the Roman Church greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁴.

PATROCLUS.—The father of Nicanor (2 Mac 8⁹).

PATTERN.—This word is used to render several Heb. and Gr. terms in OT and NT, some of which denote a model, as in Ex 25⁹. 40 of the building model of the Tabernacle shown to Moses on the mount (cf. Nu 8⁴—a different original—and ARTS AND CRAFTS. § 3), others a copy of the original model as He 8^o RV. See, for a full examination of the different passages, Hastings' DB, s.v. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PAUL THE APOSTLE.—1. THE AUTHORITIES.—Before discussing the life and teaching of St. Paul, we may consider what material we have at our disposal for determining the facts. We have a history (the Acts of the Apostles) and a collection of Epistles, which have been judged by most or by many scholars to be 1st cent. writings, and to be by St. Luke and St. Paul respectively. Of the Epistles we may, however, set aside the anonymous one to the Hebrews, which the Eastern Fathers generally considered to be St. Paul's, but which is now recognized by almost all scholars not to be the work of that Apostle himself. It is even denied by many that it belongs to the immediate Pauline circle at all. We may also put aside the Apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla, which, though it may include some genuine 1st cent. information, is clearly a romance of a later age. We have thus left the canonical Acts and 13 Epistles. The genuineness of these is considered under the separate articles in this Dictionary, but we may here briefly summarize the results of critical investigation with regard to them.

1. The Tübingen theory.—F. C. Baur, the founder of the Tübingen School (1792–1860), maintained that only four, called by him 'principal,' Epistles were really St. Paul's (Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal.), and that the rest, as also Acts, were not genuine. From the 'principal' Epistles, and from a clue in the 2nd cent. pseudo-Clementine literature, he gathered that there were originally two bitterly opposed factions in the Church, Jewish and Gentile, headed respectively by St. Peter and St. Paul. Mainly because this controversy is not found in the other Epistles, but also from other minor considerations, he held that the rest of the 'Pauline' literature and Acts were writings with a purpose or 'tendency,' issued in the 2nd cent. in order to promote the idea of a Catholic Church, and to reconcile the contending parties. Baur has few, if any, followers now. It has been seen that it is bad criticism to make a theory on insecure grounds, and then to reject all the literature which contradicts it.

2. The Dutch School.—We may thus name a school of writers which has lately arisen, as their chief strength is in Holland. Prof. van Manen has popularized their teaching in Encyc. Bibl. (e.g. art. 'Old-Christian Literature,' 'Paul,' 'Philemon,' 'Philippians'; see also art. 'Acts' by Schmiedel). According to this school, all the 13 Epistles and the Acts are 'pseudepigraphic,' though some fragments of 1st cent. works, such as 'Acts of Paul' and 'Acts of Peter,' are embedded in them. The reasons given are that the 13 writings in question are not really epistles intended for definite readers, but are books written in the form of epistles for edification; that there is no trace of the impression which, if genuine, they must have made on those addressed; that St. Paul would not have written to the Romans as he did without knowing them personally; that the large experience and wide field of vision shown in the Epistles were an impossibility at so early a date; that time was required for 'Paulinism,' which was a radical reformation of the older Christianity, to spring up; that the problems discussed (the Law and the Gospel, Justification, Election, etc.) did not belong to the first age; that persecution had already arisen, whereas in St. Paul's lifetime, so far as we know, there had been none; and that the chapters Ro 9–11 presuppose a date later than the Fall of Jerusalem. In a word, the historical background of the Epistles is said to be that of a later age, perhaps A.D. 125–150. The 'Pauline' literature sprang from the 'heretical' circles of Syria or Asia Minor. Marcion was the first (van Manen alleges) to make an authoritative group of Pauline Epistles and they were not much approved by Irenæus or Tertullian, who, however, used them to vanquish the Gnostics and Marcionites with their own weapons.

One is tempted to ask, Was, then, St. Paul a myth? No, it is replied, he was a historical person, and the little that we know about him can be gathered from the older material (such as the 'we' sections of Acts) which is included in our present literature. It is enough to reply to the above reasoning that the objection already made to the Tübingen theory applies here with increased force; no criticism can be more unscientific than that which makes up its mind a priori what St. Paul ought to have done and said, and then judges the genuineness of the literature by that standard. And such a deluge of forgery or 'pseudepigraphy' in the 2nd cent. (for the Epistles of Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp must also, according to this school, go by the board) is absolutely incredible.

3. English and German criticism.—Returning to better-balanced views about the literature, we may remark that scholars in this country are more and more disposed to treat Acts and all the 13 Epistles as genuine, and that in Germany the tendency is in the same direction, though it does not go quite so far. Thus Harnack (Luke the Physician, 1906, Eng. tr. 1907) accepts Acts as Lukan, and Jülicher (Encyc. Bibl.) believes Colossians to be St. Paul's, though he is uncertain about Ephesians. The Pastoral Epistles and 2 Thessalonians are generally, but not universally, accepted in this country; they are looked on much more doubtfully in Germany, but the former are usually recognized there as containing a Pauline nucleus.

4. The thirteen Epistles.—It appears that St. Paul wrote other letters than these; references to lost ones are found, probably, in 2 Th 3¹⁷ and 1 Co 5⁹. The thirteen which remain may be divided into four groups. These are all well attested by early Christian writers, and (as van Manen remarks) the Pastoral Epistles have as good external testimony as the rest. By way of example (to take but a few instances), it may be noted that Ignatius (c. 110 A.D.), Polycarp (c. 111 A.D.), and Justin (c. 150 A.D.) use 2 Thessalonians; Clement of Rome (c. 95 A.D.) uses 1 Corinthians and probably Ephesians; Ignatius certainly uses Ephesians; Polycarp uses almost all the thirteen, including the Pastorals. In fact the external evidence is precise; and it would require convincing arguments indeed from internal evidence to overthrow it. Marcion (c. 140 A.D.) included all these Epistles except the Pastorals in his Apostolicon; but he freely excised what he did not like in them, as Tertullian (adv. Marc., e.g. v. 17 f.) tells us.

(a) First Group (1 and 2 Thess.). These were written from Corinth 52 or 53 A.D.; the early date is seen from the fact that the writer expected the Second Advent to be in his lifetime (1 Th 4¹³⁻¹⁸), and this is a real sign of authenticity, for a forger would never have put into St. Paul's mouth, after his death, the words 'we that are alive' (v. 18). A possible misconception is rectified by St. Paul in 2 Th 2²¹, for he says that the 'man of sin' must be manifested before the Lord comes.

(b) Second Group, Baur's 'principal epistles' (Gal., 1 and 2 Cor., Rom.), marked by the struggle for Gentile liberty and by the assertion of St. Paul's Apostleship, which the Judaizing Christians denied. The controversy was evidently dying out when Romans was written, for that Epistle is a calm and reasoned treatise, almost more than a letter (see art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 4). The early date of these four Epistles is seen from the consideration that, as Gentile Churches spread and the converts multiplied, it must have been found impossible to force the yoke of the Law on them. The controversy on both heads was settled by St. Paul's evangelistic activity; his Apostleship was seen by its fruits.

(c) Third Group, the Epistles of the first Roman captivity (Eph., Ph., Col., Philem.). No really serious objections have been raised against Philipians and Philemon, for it is hard to take seriously van Manen's arguments in his articles on these Epistles in Encyc. Bibl. And indeed it is impossible that a forger could have conceived such a gem as the latter Epistle; the writer's pleading with Philemon for the runaway slave Onesimus bears genuineness on its face. But the authenticity of these two Epistles has a decided bearing on that of Ephesians and Colossians, for all four hang together, especially Philemon and Colossians, which appear to have been written at the same time. It is objected that the phraseology of this group differs from that of the second; that Gnosticism did not rise till the 2nd cent.; that the Christology of these Epistles is derived from the Johannine writings; and that 'Ephesians is a mere vapid expansion of Colossians.' These objections appear to be based on the idea that a man must be interested in the same questions and controversies all through his life, and must always use the same vocabulary. The reverse is known to be commonly the case. The controversy with Judaism having died out, it is a mark of genuineness, not the opposite, that that question does not form one of the topics discussed in this group. St. Paul at Rome would learn much; and a certain change in vocabulary is natural enough. Yet the literary connexions between this group and the earlier ones are very real. Bishop Lightfoot has shown that the Colossian heresy is a very incipient form of semi-Jewish Gnosticism, such as we should expect in the 1st cent. (Colossians, p. 71 ff.). And the argument from the Christology is a pure begging of the question. Note that the doctrine is exactly the same in Colossians (which treats of the glories of the Head of the Church, while Ephesians describes those of the Church itself) as in Ph 2⁶⁻¹¹.

(d) Fourth Group, the Pastoral Epistles (1 and 2 Tim., Tit.), so called because they are concerned mainly with the duties of Christian ministers. These all hang together, and from coincidences of style and subjects are judged to be certainly by one writer. They are quoted by, or were known to, Polycarp, Justin, Hegesippus (see Salmon, Introd. to NT⁸, p. 398), but were rejected by Marcion. Tatian accepted Titus, but rejected the other two, probably because 1 Ti 4¹⁻², 5¹⁴⁻²² offended his Enekratite ideas. In modern times it has been asserted that these Epistles are not St. Paul's, because of differences of diction (many phrases and words being found in this group which do not occur elsewhere in St. Paul); because the controversies are not the same as in the other Epistles, there being nothing about the Mosaic Law and justification by faith, and Gnosticism being attacked (for the name 'gnosis,' i.e. 'knowledge,' see 1 Ti 6²⁰; cf. Col 2⁸, 1 Co 8¹⁻¹²), a heresy more Jewish in tone than even that which appears in Colossians (Tit 1¹⁴); because the ministry is said to be too fully developed for the lifetime of St. Paul; but especially because it is impossible to reconcile these Epistles with Acts. With the last statement almost all scholars entirely agree, though they do not assent to the deduction made from it. This is the really crucial argument, and may be treated first. It is assumed by most of the objectors to these Epistles, that they must be placed somewhere in the history related in Acts, because that book 'concludes with the end of St. Paul's ministry'; and, as it is impossible to make the journeys referred to in these Epistles fit in with Acts, it is said that the former cannot be genuine. To this it is answered that St. Paul may have been acquitted, and that the journeys mentioned may have taken place after the acquittal; but the objectors reply that the acquittal is unhistorical. The truth is that history (outside these Epistles) does not explicitly tell us whether St. Paul was acquitted or condemned after the two years' imprisonment of Ac 28³⁰; if the acquittal is unhistorical, so also is the condemnation. We may, then, take these Epistles, which have excellent external attestation, and therefore are a priori worthy of credit, as new evidence, and infer from them that St. Paul was released, made journeys to the scenes of his old labours, and was later re-arrested and imprisoned (2 Ti 1¹⁶). Even if these Epistles are not St. Paul's, they are evidence for an early belief that he was acquitted the first time; this is shown by the fact that the journeys described are quite independent of Acts (cf. also 2 Ti 4^{16f.}). Further, there was, quite apart from these Epistles, an early tradition that St. Paul went to Spain (Muratorian Fragment, c. A.D. 180), or to 'the farthest bounds of the West' (Clem. Rom. Cor. 5; this almost certainly means Spain: see Lightfoot's note), according to his previous intention (Rt 15²⁴⁻²⁸). This implies a belief in his acquittal whether or not the journey to Spain actually took place (see below, ii. 12). St. Paul himself fully expected to be acquitted (Ph 1²⁴⁻²⁵, 2²⁴, Philem²⁴). Thus the difficulty that these Epistles cannot be reconciled with Acts entirely vanishes. [For the objection from the presentiment that St. Paul would not re-visit the Ephesians (Ac 20²⁵) see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 9; but even if the early date of Acts be not accepted, it is quite possible that St. Paul never re-visited Ephesus. We should rather gather from 1 Tim., especially from 1³, that he had an interview with Timothy elsewhere, probably at Miletus, as he was passing by on his way north; see Prof. Findlay in Hastings' DB iii. 714^b.]—The other considerations, as to diction and subject matter, have little weight when once we agree that the Epistles, if Pauline, must have been written several years after the others; and it is instructive that in these respects the Third Group makes a half-way house between the Second and the Fourth. We must, moreover, note that there are many indications of genuineness: 2 Timothy has all the marks of authenticity, being full of personal allusions which it would be almost impossible for a forger to invent. It is for this reason generally allowed that 2 Ti 1¹⁸⁻¹⁹, 4⁹⁻²² are really Pauline. But it is grossly improbable that real epistles were used only for patching forgeries and then thrown away. If in personal notices that a forger usually goes wrong; if these are authentic, it is a great argument for the whole writing being authentic (for further details see Salmon, Introd., pp. 397-413). But as all three Epistles hang together, the marks of genuineness in 2 Timothy are a strong argument for the genuineness of the whole group.

We may briefly sum up what has been said on the difference of subject-matter and style in the thirteen Epistles. At the birth of a Gentile Church the controversy with Judaizing Christians was that which was most likely to arise, as we see in the Second Group. Questions were then asked about the Person of Christ and about the Church as a whole, as we see in the Third Group. As the communities grew, their organization occupied much attention, as we see in the Fourth Group. The special interest of the moment colours the diction and style. Sanday-Headlam (Romans, p. liv. ff.) suggest, further, that variations of style are largely due to the nervous temperament of the Apostle, now calm, now fervid; and in a considerable degree also to the employment of different amanuenses. St. Paul did not write his letters himself, but only added postscripts in his own hand. Probably he dictated his Epistles, and they were taken down in shorthand; a difference of scribe would thus mean an appreciable difference of style.

We shall, then, in what follows, without hesitation use the 13 Epistles as genuine. If what has been briefly argued above be not accepted, this article must be taken as describing, at least, the life and teaching of St. Paul as the early Christians believed that he lived and taught.

5. Acts of the Apostles.—For the reasons stated in the article on that book, we may with confidence use Acts as a trustworthy authority for St. Paul's life. But we may here ask what we are to think of St. Paul's speeches in Acts, whether they are a true record of what he said, and whether we may use them to determine his teaching. It is not easy to suppose that they were taken down verbatim as they were spoken; and St. Luke himself was not present at all of them (e.g. Ac 13⁴⁶, 14¹⁶, 17²²). Yet the speeches agree very well with the circumstances in which they were delivered, and the diction and sentiments coincide largely with the Pauline Epistles. Lukan phrases have been found in some of them, which is natural enough; more so in the speech of Ac 22, which was spoken in Aramaic, and therefore is clearly not the Apostle's ipsissima verba, than in the Athenian speech (Ac 17²²) which has no Lukan element. The conclusion may be that the speeches were written down, soon after they were delivered, by a hearer—sometimes the hearer was St. Luke himself—and the notes then taken were afterwards used by the author of Acts.

II. SKETCH OF ST. PAUL'S LIFE.—1. Name.—The future Apostle is first made known to us under the name Saul (Ac 7⁵). Being of the tribe of Benjamin (Ro 11¹, Ph 3⁵), a fact of which he was proud, he doubtless was named directly or indirectly after the king whom that tribe gave to Israel. But while Saul was his Jewish name, he must, as a Roman citizen, have had three Roman names. His praenomen and nomen we do not know, but his cognomen was Paul. After the interview with the proconsul Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (Ac 13⁴⁶), the author of Acts uses no other name than this; from the outset of his mission to the Roman Empire it was fitting that he should be known by his Roman name. We must at once dismiss both the conjecture of Augustine that the Apostle on that occasion assumed the name Paul out of compliment to the proconsul, and also the suggestion that the name was personal to himself, denoting that he was small of stature. The existence of alternative names side by side, a Jewish and a Greek or Roman name, was quite a common thing among Jews of the 1st cent., e.g. John-Mark, Jesus-Justus. But here the case is different; we never read of Saul-Paul.

2. Birthplace and family.—St. Paul was not only a native but also a citizen of Tarsus, possessed of full civil rights in that famous University town, the capital of Cilicia (Ac 9¹¹ 21³⁹ 22³). His family had perhaps been planted there by one of the Seleucid kings (Ramsay). They were probably Pharisees (Ac 23⁶; cf. 2 Ti 1¹³); and Aramaic-speaking (Ph 3⁵, though here the Apostle may be speaking of his teachers). Several indications point to the fact that the family was of some importance, and was fairly rich. It is not against this view that the Apostle himself was poor, and that he worked for his livelihood as a tent-maker, as did many Cilicians (Ac 18³ 20³⁴; cf. 1 Co 9⁴, 1 Th 2⁹, 2 Th 3⁸); for it is very probable that his family cast him off because of his conversion, and especially because of his attitude to the Gentiles; and moreover, it was the custom for all Jewish boys to be taught a trade. The prosperity of the family is seen from the fact that later St. Paul clearly had money at his command. Perhaps a reconciliation had been effected; his sister's son saved his life (Ac 23¹⁶); and the whole story of the imprisonment in Palestine and Rome and of the voyage to Italy proves that he was a prisoner of distinction. This could come only from the possession of some wealth and from family influence.

3. Roman citizenship.—Of this position St. Paul was justly proud. He was not a Roman citizen merely because he had the freedom of Tarsus, for Tarsus was not a Roman Colony; probably his father or grandfather had rendered some service to the State, and had been thus rewarded. In any case St. Paul was freeborn (Ac 22²⁸). He had not, like so many under Claudius, bought the citizenship through the infamous favourites of the Court. He appealed to his privilege to prevent illegal treatment at Philippi and Jerusalem

(Ac 16³⁷ 22²⁵). And more than once in the Epistles he alludes to citizenship, transferring the term from the earthly to the heavenly sphere—an allusion which would come home especially to the Philippians, who were so proud of their city being a Colony, and of their therefore being Roman citizens (Ac 16¹², 21); see Ph 1²⁷ [RVm] 3²⁰, Eph 2¹⁹, and St. Paul's speech in Ac 23¹ where the phrase 'I have lived' is literally 'I have exercised my citizenship.' It was no doubt this citizenship which gave St. Paul such an advantage as the Apostle of the Gentiles, and which inspired him with his great plan of utilizing the civilization of the Roman State to spread the gospel along its lines of communication (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 7, and GALATIANS [EP. TO THE] § 2). It is noteworthy that he seems to have laid much stress on evangelizing Roman Colonies like Corinth, Pisidian Antioch, Lystra, and Philippi.

4. Early life.—St. Paul was educated, no doubt, partly at Tarsus (Ac 26⁴), where he would be influenced by Stoic teachers (see § iv.), but chiefly at Jerusalem under the Pharisee Gamaliel (Ac 22³ 26⁴; cf. 5²⁴); he did not, however, see our Lord (cf. 1 Co 9¹ with 15⁵), though he would be there in Jesus' lifetime on earth. Probably this period of education was over before our Lord's ministry began. He was brought up a strict Pharisee (Ac 23⁶ 26⁵, Gal 1¹⁴, Ph 3⁵), and long after his conversion he retained a certain pride in his Jewish birth and a great affection for his own people (Ro 4¹ 9⁵ 10¹ 11¹, 2 Co 11²²). Though born outside Palestine, he was brought up, not as a Greek-speaking Jew or Hellenist, but as a Hebrew; for this last term denotes a difference of language and manners (Ph 3⁵; see Lightfoot's note). Accordingly we find him speaking Aramaic fluently (Ac 21⁴⁰ 22³).

The result of this education, in spite of Gamaliel's liberality of thought, was to make St. Paul a zealous and bigoted Jew, determined with all the ardour of youth to uphold the traditions of his fathers. We first meet with him as a young man 'consenting unto' Stephen's death, holding the clothes of those who stoned the first martyr (Ac 7⁵⁸ 8¹), and persecuting the Christians in Jerusalem (26¹⁰). Thereafter he secured authority from the high priest to go to Damascus in order to arrest all the disciples, and to bring them bound to Jerusalem (9¹⁴).—[In the following paragraphs the numbers in square brackets denote the dates A.D. as given by Ramsay. Lightfoot's dates are mostly a year or two later; Harnack's earlier. Turner's (in Hastings' DB, art. 'Chronology of NT') nearly agree with Ramsay's, except that he puts the Conversion at least two years later because of a difficulty about Aretas (see art. ARETAS, CHRONOLOGY OF NT), and the Martyrdom about two years earlier].

5. Conversion [33].—The journey to Damascus was the great turning-point of Saul's life (Ac 9³), and is often referred to by him (Ac 22⁴, 26¹², 1 Co 9¹ 15¹, Ph 3⁷ etc.). When approaching Damascus he saw a strong light, and Jesus appearing to him (so explicitly 1 Co 9¹), saying, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' The voice was unintelligible to his companions (Ac 22⁹), though they saw the light (ib.) and heard a sound (9⁷). Saul was blinded by the vision and led into Damascus, where he was instructed and baptized by one Ananias. Immediately he confesses Christ in the synagogues at Damascus (9²⁰), and then retires into Arabia (perhaps the Sinaitic peninsula, see Lightfoot's *Galatians*⁴, p. 87 ff.), doubtless for spiritual preparation (Gal 1¹⁷). He ever recognizes his conversion as being his call to Apostleship, which was neither of human origin nor received by human mediation, i.e. not through the Twelve (Gal 1¹¹, 12, 17; cf. Ro 1¹, 5, 1 Co 1¹ 4¹ 9¹, 15⁹). The Lord Himself designates his work as being among the Gentiles (Ac 9¹⁵; cf. 22¹ 26¹⁷, Ro 11¹³, 15¹⁶, Gal 2⁷, Eph 3⁴, 1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹ AV). The question arises, therefore, What is the meaning of the laying on of hands by the prophets and teachers of Antioch (Ac 13⁴⁴; Saul was one of them, 13¹)? This has been regarded by some as an ordination by the Church, which thus put an outward seal on the inward call to Apostleship (Gore, Lightfoot); by others, as an appointment, not to the Apostleship, but to the definite work which lay immediately before Barnabas and Paul (Ramsay).—Returning from Arabia, Saul comes to Damascus (Gal 1¹⁷) while the deputy (ethnarch) of the Nabatean king Aretas holds the city (2 Co 11³¹), and is persecuted there, but escapes by night, being let down in a basket through the city wall (Ac 9²⁵). He makes his first visit to Jerusalem [35] three years after his conversion—for this is the probable meaning of Gal 1¹⁸—and is presented by Barnabas to Peter and James (ib. and Ac 9²⁷). Here he is told, in a vision in the Temple, to escape because of the opposition of the Jews (Ac 22¹⁹). [unless the vision belongs to the Second visit, as Ramsay maintains, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 61 f.], and goes to Tarsus (9³⁰), preaching in the united province Syria-Cilicia, in which Tarsus was situated (Gal 1²¹). After several years, no doubt of preparation on Saul's part, Barnabas goes to Tarsus to bring him to the Syrian Antioch [43], where the disciples were first called Christians, and they spend a year there (Ac 11²⁶). The Gentiles had already been addressed at Antioch by Cypriots and Cyrenians after the persecution which arose on Stephen's death (11¹⁹). Henceforward this became a great missionary centre. From Antioch Paul made with Barnabas the second visit to Jerusalem, taking alms for those suffering from the famine (11³⁰); and if this is the visit of Gal 2¹ (see art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 3), it originated in a Divine revelation, and Titus, a Gentile, accompanied them [45 or 46]. They returned thence to Antioch (Ac 12²⁵), taking Mark with them [46 or 47].

6. First Missionary Journey, Ac 13⁴–14²⁸ [47 to 49].—Sent forth from Antioch, Paul and Barnabas with Mark sail to Cyprus and preach there; at Salamis, the capital, on the west side of the island, they for the first time address a Roman governor. Henceforward Saul is always in NT called by his Roman name. Opposed by the 'magician' Elymas (or Eutimas), Paul rebuked him, and predicted his blindness; the magus was immediately deprived of sight, and the proconsul 'believed.' This can hardly mean that he actually became a Christian; but, having been under the influence of Elymas, his eyes are now opened, and he listens to the gospel message favourably.—From Cyprus they sail to the mainland of Pamphylia, and reach Perga, where Mark leaves them and returns to Jerusalem. The reason of this defection is not obvious, but it may be that St. Paul now made a plan for the further extension of Christianity among the Gentiles of the interior of Asia Minor, which Mark, whose view had not yet been sufficiently enlarged, disapproved. It is not unlikely that St. Paul was struck down with malaria in the low-lying littoral of Pamphylia, and that this favoured the idea of a journey to the mountainous interior, where he would recover his health. Ramsay takes malaria to be the thorn or stake in the flesh (2 Co 12⁷), and this would agree with the statement that St. Paul first visited Galatia owing to an infirmity of the flesh (Gal 4¹⁹). On the S. Galatian theory (here assumed; see the discussion in art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 2) the Church in Galatia was now founded; the journey included visits to the South Galatian cities of Pisidian Antioch (a Roman Colony), Iconium (where the Apostles were stoned, and whence they fled into the Lycaonian district of Galatia), Lystra (also a Roman Colony, where they were taken for gods, and where the people spoke Lycaonian), and Derbe. Thence they returned, reversing their route, confirming souls and ordaining presbyters. Persecutions in Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra are mentioned in 2 Ti 3¹¹. From the port of Attalia they sailed to Antioch, and spent a long time there. In these journeys it was the custom of St. Paul to preach to the Jews first (Ac 17² etc.), and when they would not hear, to turn to the Gentiles.—At this time perhaps occurred the incident of St. Peter at Antioch (Gal 2¹¹). He at first ate with the Gentiles, but, persuaded by Judaizers who professed to come 'from James,' he drew back; and even Barnabas was influenced by them. But Paul 'resisted' Peter 'to the face,' and his expostulation clearly was successful, as we see from the conduct of the latter at the Council (Ac 15⁷).

7. The Apostolic Council, Ac 15¹–29 [49 or 50].—As soon as Gentiles were admitted into the Church, the question whether they must obey the Mosaic law became urgent. Judaizers having come to Antioch preaching the necessity of circumcision, Paul and Barnabas with others were sent to Jerusalem to confer with the Apostles and elders. This is the third visit to Jerusalem. The Council decided that the Gentiles need not be subject to the Law, but enjoined them to abstain from things sacrificed to idols, from blood, from things strangled, and from fornication, by which marriage within the prohibited degrees is perhaps intended. Paul and Barnabas, with Judas and Silas, were sent to Antioch with the decrees, and the two latter probably then returned to Jerusalem, though there is some doubt about the movements of Silas.

8. Second Missionary Journey, Ac 15³⁸–18²² [50 to 53].—Paul and Barnabas had a dissension, the former refusing and the latter wishing to take Mark with them; they therefore separated, and Paul took Silas (sent for from Jerusalem?). These two went through Syria and Cilicia and (by the Cilician gates) to Derbe and Lystra and delivered the Council's decrees. At Lystra they find Timothy, son of a Greek father and of a Jewish mother named Eunice. He had been carefully brought up by his mother and by his grandmother Lois (2 Ti 1⁵ 3¹⁵). St. Paul, wishing to take him with him, first, for fear of giving offence to the Judaizers (as he was half a Jew), caused him to be circumcised. They then go through the 'Phrygo-Galatic region' of the province Galatia (see art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 2), not being allowed by God to evangelize the province Asia (i.e. the western sea-board of Asia Minor) or to enter Bithynia (the northern sea-board), and come to Troas, where they meet St. Luke. [On the N. Galatian theory they made a very long detour before entering the province Asia, to Galatia proper, founding Churches there and returning almost to the point in the journey which they had left.] At Troas, St. Paul sees in a dream 'a certain Macedonian,' saying 'Come over into Macedonia and help us' (Ac 16⁹; see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 3). This induces him to sail over to that province, and they come to Philippi, a Roman colony, where they lodge with one Lydia of Thyatira, a seller of purple. St. Paul casts out a 'spirit of divination' (ventriloquism?) from 'a certain maid,' and, owing to the opposition of the girl's masters, he and Silas are cast into prison. An earthquake looses their bonds and the jailer is converted. In the morning the magistrates send to release them, and then Paul and Silas assert their Roman citizenship. Leaving Luke behind at Philippi, they pass on to Thessalonica; and this mission seems to be the limit of which the Apostle speaks when he says to the Romans (Ro 15¹⁹) that he had preached from Jerusalem even unto Illyricum [= Dalmatia], the Illyrian frontier being not far off. At Thessalonica they spent a long time (1 Th 1¹⁰ 2¹ 3¹), and had much success; many of the 'chief women' were converted. Paul worked for his livelihood (2 Th 3⁸), but gifts were twice sent to him here from Philippi (Ph 4¹⁸; cf. 2 Co 8¹⁴ 11⁹). The missionary zeal of the Thessalonians is commended in 1 Th 1⁸. The opposition again came from the Jews (cf. 2 Co 11²⁴), who accused St. Paul's host, Jason, of disloyalty to Rome; bail was taken from Jason, and the Apostle was thus injured through his friend. This seems to have been the 'hindrance of Satan' which prevented his return (1 Th 2¹⁴ 1¹⁵, 2 Th 1⁴). They then went to Berea, where they met with much success; but the Thessalonian Jews stirring up trouble there, Paul went on to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy behind, probably to bring news as to the possibility of returning to Macedonia. At Athens the Apostle spent much time, and addressed the Court of the Areopagus in a philosophic style; but not many, save Dionysius the Areopagite and Damaris, were converted. Timothy returned to Athens and was sent back again to Thessalonica; and Silas and Timothy later joined St. Paul at Corinth (1 Th 3¹⁴, Ac 18¹⁸). From Corinth were sent 1 Thessalonians, and, a little later, 2 Thessalonians. At Corinth St. Paul changed his method, and preached the Cross, simply, without regard to philosophy (1 Cor 13²⁻⁴, 2 Co 4³); here he had great success, chiefly in the lower social ranks (1 Co 13²). Here also he met Aquila and Priscilla, who had been expelled from Rome; and they all worked as tentmakers. The Jews being deaf to his persuasions, Paul left the synagogue and went to the house of Titus Justus close by; Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, was converted with all his house, as well as others, among whom was perhaps Sothenes (Crispus' successor in the synagogue? Ac 18⁷, 1 Co 1¹¹). Encouraged by a vision, St. Paul spent eighteen months in Corinth; the Jews opposed him, and brought him before the proconsul Gallio, who, however, dismissed the case. Here we read of the Apostle taking a vow, after the manner of his countrymen, and shaving his head in Cenchree. He then sailed with Priscilla and Aquila, and, leaving them at Ephesus, landed at Caesarea, whence he made his fourth visit to Jerusalem [53], and so passed to the Syrian Antioch. It is probable that from Ephesus Timothy was sent to his home at Lystra, and that he met St. Paul again at Antioch, bringing news that the Galatians were under the influence of Judaizers, who taught that circumcision was, if not essential to salvation, at least essential to perfection (see art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 4). St. Paul in haste wrote Galatians to expostulate, sending Timothy back with it, and intending himself to follow shortly. [On the N. Galatian theory, this Epistle was written later, from Ephesus or from Macedonia.]

9. Third Missionary Journey, Ac 18²³-21¹⁶ [53 to 57].

—St. Paul, after 'some time' at Antioch, went again, probably by the Cilician Gates, to the 'Galatic Region' and the 'Phrygian Region' (see art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 2), and so came to Ephesus by the upper road, not passing along the valley of the Lycus (Ac 19¹; see Col 2¹). [On the N. Galatian theory another long digression to Galatia proper is here necessary.] At Ephesus he found twelve persons who had known only John's baptism. St. Paul caused them to be 'baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus,' and when he 'had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied.' At Ephesus the Apostle spent 24 years and converted many who had practised magic. Hence he proposed to go to Macedonia, Greece, Jerusalem, Rome (Ac 19²¹, Ro 15²³), and Spain (Ro 15²⁸); he sent Timothy to Macedonia, with Erastus as a companion so far (Ac 19²²), and then on to Corinth (1 Co 4¹⁷ 16¹⁹), while he kept Sothenes with him (11). After Timothy's departure (417) he sent off 1 Corinthians, which he wrote after he had heard of divisions at Corinth (1¹⁰), of the success of Apollos (1¹² 3¹⁶ 16¹²), who had gone there from Ephesus (Ac 18²⁷), of a case of incest and abuses in respect to litigation and to the Eucharist (1 Co 5. 6. 11). This letter was in answer to one from Corinth asking for directions on marriage, etc. The Apostle announces his intention of going to Corinth himself by way of Macedonia after Pentecost (18¹⁸), and Lightfoot thinks that he did pay this visit to Corinth from Ephesus (cf. 2 Co 13¹ 'the third time'), but Ramsay puts the visit somewhat later. In 2 Co 1¹⁶ 23 St. Paul says that he had intended to go by way of Corinth to Macedonia, and back to Corinth again, and so to Judaea, but that he had changed his plan. At Ephesus there were many persecutions (2 Co 1⁸; cf. 4⁸ 6⁴), and Onesiphorus was very useful to him there (2 Ti 1¹⁶). The stay at Ephesus was suddenly brought to an end by a riot instigated by Demetrius, a maker of silver shrines of Artemis. St. Paul went to Macedonia by Troas, where he had expected to meet Titus coming from Corinth, though he was disappointed in this. At Troas he preached with success; 'a door was opened' (2 Co 2¹²). From Macedonia he wrote 2 Corinthians urging the forgiveness of the incestuous Corinthian. [Some modification of the above is required if this Epistle, as many think, is an amalgamation of two or more separate ones. Some think that the person referred to in 2 Cor. is not the offender of 1 Co 5 at all.] Titus joined St. Paul in Macedonia, and gave a good account of Corinth (2 Co 7¹⁶), but troubles arose in Macedonia itself (7¹). Titus was sent back to Corinth with two others (8¹ 17¹ 22), taking the letter and announcing St. Paul's own coming (2 Co 13¹). All this time the Apostle was developing his great scheme of a collection for the poor Christians of Judaea, which was responded to so liberally in Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaea (1 Co 16¹, 2 Co 8¹⁻⁷ 9², Ro 15²⁶), and which prompted that journey to Jerusalem which is the last recorded in Acts (Ac 24¹⁷). He claimed the right to live of the gospel himself (1 Co 9⁴); yet he would not usually do so, but instead asked offerings for the 'poor saints.' From Macedonia he went to Greece' (Ac 20²), i.e. to Corinth, for three months, and here wrote Romans [57], which he sent by Phœbe, a deaconess at Cenchree, the port of Corinth (Ro 16¹). At Corinth he heard of a plot against his life; he had intended to sail direct to Syria, and the plot seems to have been to murder him on the ship; he therefore took the land journey by way of Macedonia, but sent on several friends to join him at Troas: Sopater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus (both of Thessalonica), Timothy, Tychicus and Trophimus (both probably of Ephesus), and Gaius of Derbe, who was perhaps his host at Corinth (Ro 16²³, 1 Co 1¹⁴; if so he must have come to Corinth to stay. The Macedonian Gaius of Ac 19²³ was probably a different man). St. Paul spent the Passover at Philippi, and then, with Luke (Ac 20⁶), set sail for Troas. Here, at an all-night service which ends with the Eucharist, occurs the incident of the young man Eutychus, who being asleep falls down from the third storey and is taken up dead; but the Apostle restores him alive to his friends. From Troas the party sail along the west coast of Asia Minor, calling at Miletus. Here St. Paul has a visit from the presbyters of Ephesus, for whom he had sent, and bids them farewell, saying that they would see his face no more (see above i. 4 (d)). At Caesarea (in Palestine) they land, and stay with Philip the evangelist; and here Arabas, taking Paul's girdle and binding his own feet and hands, prophesies that the Jews will do the same to the owner of the girdle, and will deliver him to the Gentiles.

10. Fifth visit to Jerusalem, Ac 21¹⁷-23³⁵ [57].—St. Paul is received at an apparently formal council by James, the Jerusalem presbyters being present; and he tells them of the success of his ministry to the Gentiles. They advise him to conciliate the Christians of Jerusalem, who thought that he persuaded Jews not to keep the Law, and to undertake the Temple charges for four men who were under a vow, and to 'purify' himself with them. This he does, showing, as in many other instances, that he is still a Jew (Ac 18¹⁸ 20¹⁸ 27²). But his presence in the Temple is the occasion of a riot, the Jews believing that he had brought within the precincts Trophimus, the Gentile of Ephesus, whom they had seen with him in the city. He is saved only by the intervention of the Roman soldiers, who take him to the 'Castle.' He is allowed to address the people, on the way, in Aramaic; but when he speaks of his mission to the Gentiles, they are greatly incensed

then went to Berea, where they met with much success; but the Thessalonian Jews stirring up trouble there, Paul went on to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy behind, probably to bring news as to the possibility of returning to Macedonia. From Corinth were sent 1 Thessalonians, and, a little later, 2 Thessalonians. At Corinth St. Paul changed his method, and preached the Cross, simply, without regard to philosophy (1 Co 1²³ 22-4, 2 Co 4³); here he had great success, chiefly in the lower social ranks (1 Co 1²⁶). Here also he met Aquila and Priscilla, who had been expelled from Rome; and they all worked as tentmakers. The Jews being deaf to his persuasions, Paul left the synagogue and went to the house of Titus Justus close by; Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, was converted with all his house, as well as others, among whom was perhaps Sosthenes (Crispus' successor in the synagogue? 9. Third Missionary Journey, Ac 18²³-21¹⁶ [53 to 57].—St. Paul, after 'some time' at Antioch, went again, probably by the Cilician Gates, to the 'Galatic Region' and the 'Phrygian Region' (see art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 2), and so came to Ephesus by the upper road, not passing along the valley of the Lycus (Ac 19¹; see Col 2¹). [On the N. St. Paul caused them to be 'baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus,' and when he 'had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied.' At Ephesus the Apostle spent 2½ years and converted many who had practised magic. Hence he proposed to go to Macedonia, Greece, Jerusalem, Rome (Ac 19²¹, Ro 1¹⁰), and Spain (Ro 15²⁸, 29); he sent Timothy to Macedonia, with Erastus as a companion so far (Ac 19²²), and then on to Corinth (1 Co 4¹⁷ 16¹⁹), while he kept Sosthenes with him (11). After Timothy's departure (417) he sent off 1 Corinthians, which he wrote after he had heard of divisions at Corinth (1¹⁰), of the success of Apollos (1¹² 3⁴, 16¹²), who had gone there from Ephesus (Ac 18²⁷), of a case of incest and abuses in respect to litigation and to the Eucharist (1 Co 5. 6. 11). This letter was in answer to one from Corinth asking for directions on marriage, etc. The Apostle announces his intention of going to Corinth himself by way of Macedonia after Pentecost (16⁵), and Lightfoot thinks that he did pay this visit to Corinth from Ephesus (cf. 2 Co 13¹ 'the third time'), but Ramsay puts the visit somewhat later. All this time the Apostle was developing his great scheme of a collection for the poor Christians of Judaea, which was responded to so liberally in Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia (1 Co 16¹, 2 Co 8¹⁻⁷ 9², Ro 15²⁶), and which prompted that journey to Jerusalem which is the last recorded in Acts (Ac 24¹⁷). He claimed the right to live of the gospel himself (1 Co 9⁶); yet he would not usually do so, but instead asked offerings for the 'poor saints.' 10. Fifth visit to Jerusalem, Ac 21¹⁷-23³⁰ [57].—St. Paul is received at an apparently formal council by James, the Jerusalem presbyters being present; and he tells them of the success of his ministry to the Gentiles. They advise him to conciliate the Christians of Jerusalem, who thought that he persuaded Jews not to keep the Law, and to undertake the Temple charges for four men who were under a vow, and to 'purify' himself with them. This he does, showing, as in many other instances, that he is still a Jew (Ac 18¹⁸ 20⁶, 19 27⁹). But his presence in the Temple is the occasion of a riot, the Jews believing that he had brought within the precincts Trophimus, the Gentile of Ephesus, whom they had seen with him in the city. He is saved only by the intervention of the Roman soldiers, who take him to the 'Castle.' He is allowed to address the people, on the way, in Aramaic; but when he speaks of his mission to the Gentiles, they are greatly incensed and the chief captain (chiliarch), Claudius Lysias, has him brought into the Castle and orders him to be examined by scourging; but Paul asserts his Roman citizenship. Next day he is brought before the Jewish Sanhedrin, of whom some were Pharisees, some Sadducees, and when he affirms his belief in 'the hope and resurrection of the dead,' the former favour him. In the night he is encouraged by a vision of the Lord telling him that he must bear witness in Rome (Ac 23¹¹). A plot of the Jews against him, revealed by his nephew, is the cause of his being sent down guarded to Cæsarea to the governor Felix. The Jews go down there to accuse him, and Felix and his wife Drusilla, a Jewess, hear him often; but he is left a prisoner for two years, and Felix, when he is recalled, does not release him, hoping to please the Jews. He had expected a bribe from Paul (24²⁶). Festus, his successor, is asked by the Jews to send Paul to Jerusalem, there being a secret plot to kill him on the road; but Paul appeals to Cæsar. While he is at Cæsarea, Agrippa and Bernice come down to visit Festus, and Paul narrates to them his conversion (Ac 25¹²⁻²⁶).

11. Roman imprisonment.—From Cæsarea the Apostle is sent, with the two companions allowed to accompany him (Luke and Aristarchus), on a voyage to Italy (59), under the charge of Julius, centurion of the Augustan Band or Cohort. They sail first, after touching at Zidon, under the lee (to the east) of Cyprus, the usual winds in the Levant in summer being westerly, and coast along Asia Minor. St. Paul is treated kindly and as a prisoner of distinction, and his advice is often asked. At Myra they tranship and embark in what is apparently a Government vessel taking corn from Egypt to Italy. Sailing south of Crete they reach Fair Havens, and spend at least some few days there; then, though the season of the year is late, they set sail again, hoping to reach Italy safely. But being caught in a storm, they drift for many days, and finally are shipwrecked on the coast of Malta, where the people receive them kindly. St. Paul heals the father of the 'first man,' Publius, of fever and dysentery. Next spring [60] they sail for Italy by way of Sicily, and land at Puteoli, whence they reach Rome by land. Here Paul is allowed to live in a hired house, guarded by a soldier, and he remains there 'two whole years,' doing evangelistic work [60, 61]. From Rome, while a prisoner (Ph 1⁷⁻¹³, Col 4¹⁸, Eph 3¹, 4^{6, 20}, Philem¹), he wrote Ephesians, probably a circular letter to the Churches of Asia (the 'Epistle from Laodicea' of Col 4¹⁶). At the same time he seems to have sent Colossians and Philemon by Tychicus and Onesimus. The Colossians had not seen Paul (Col 2¹), but, having heard of errors at Colossæ, he writes to exhort them and Archippus (4¹⁷; cf. Philem²), who seems to have been their chief minister. The short letter to Philemon is a touching appeal from 'Paul the aged' (v. 9) to a master to receive back a fugitive slave Onesimus; the master formerly, and now the slave, owed their Christianity to St. Paul. At this time the Apostle has with him Epaphras of Colossæ (who had come to Rome and was a 'fellow prisoner' with Paul, Philem²³), Aristarchus, Mark, Jesus, Justus, Luke, and Demas. About the same date Philippians was written, and sent by Epaphroditus of Philippi (Ph 2²⁵), who had been sick nigh to death, but had recovered; he had been sent by the Philippians with aims to Rome (Ph 4^{10, 18}). St. Paul exhorts his 'true yokefellow' (whom Lightfoot takes to be Epaphroditus, but who is more probably the chief minister of the Philippian Church) to appease a quarrel between two Church workers, Euodia and Syntyche (4²¹); the 'Clement' there mentioned seems to have been a Philippian convert. St. Paul hopes soon to send Timothy to Philippi (2¹⁹), and to be free to come soon to them himself (2⁴; cf. Philem²²).

12. Later life [end of 61 to 67].—This we can in part construct from the Pastoral Epistles; those who reject them will take their own view of the account which follows. We may first ask whether St. Paul went to Spain. As we have seen, he meant to do so (Ro 15^{24, 28}), and early tradition affirmed that he did go (above, 1. 4 (d)). This tradition, however, may have been based only on his recorded intention; and it is a difficulty that no trace is left of a Spanish visit, and that no Church in Spain claims to have been founded by him. Journeys to the East are better attested; he certainly intended to go from Rome eastwards (Ph 2²⁴). We read that he went to Corinth and left Erastus there (2 Ti 4²⁰); that he sailed along the west coast of Asia Minor, leaving Trophimus sick at Miletus (ib.), and Timothy at Ephesus to rule the Church there for a time (1 Ti 1³ etc.); that he called at Troas and left some things there (2 Ti 4¹³); and that he went to Macedonia (1 Ti 1³). But these events need not have happened on the same journey. At Ephesus we read of various heretics—of Hymenæus and Alexander whom Paul 'delivered unto Satan' (1 Ti 1²⁰)—Alexander is perhaps the coppersmith who opposed Paul, probably at Ephesus, not Troas (2 Ti 4¹⁴),—of Hymenæus (perhaps the same as in 1 Tim.) and Philetus, who explained the resurrection of the dead in a figurative sense as an event already past (2 Ti 2¹⁸), and of Phygelus and Hermogenes, who, with 'all that are in Asia' (1¹⁶), deserted the Apostle; but it is uncertain whether the references are to a time before or after the first imprisonment at Rome. Another journey was to Crete, where St. Paul left Titus to rule the Church for a time (Tit 1⁵); thereafter the Apostle went to Nicopolis, on the west coast of Achæa, opposite Italy, where he intended to winter (Tit 3¹). Before reaching Nicopolis he wrote 1 Timothy (probably) and Titus; he asked Titus to come to him whenever another could be sent to take his place (3¹²).

The last scene of the Apostle's life is at Rome. He is now a second time a prisoner (2 Ti 2⁹), conscious that his life is near its end (4⁶). He writes 2 Timothy to his faithful disciple, who is apparently at Ephesus [Prisca and Aquila and the household of Onesiphorus are mentioned as being with Timothy (1¹⁶ 4¹⁹), and he himself is in a position of authority; these considerations point to Ephesus, where he was before]. When St. Paul writes, he is, save for Luke's attendance, alone; Demas has forsaken him; Crescens, Titus, and Tychicus have been sent on missions (Titus to Dalmatia, not to Crete); and Timothy is pressed to bring Mark and to come to Rome with the things left behind at Troas. Tychicus seems to have been sent as his substitute to Ephesus (4⁹⁻¹³). In this letter St. Paul speaks of Onesiphorus having helped him, not only at Ephesus on a former occasion, but when he was a prisoner in Rome, perhaps at the first imprisonment; he seems to have died before 2 Tim. was written (1¹⁶⁻¹⁸). It is disputed whether the 'first defence' (first, not former) of 2 Ti 4¹⁶, when 'all forsook him,' refers to a preliminary examination in the second imprisonment, or, as seems more likely (Zahn), to the first imprisonment; the Apostle speaks of his being delivered out of the mouth of the lion, that through him 'the message might be fully proclaimed, and that all the Gentiles might hear.' This seems to refer to the further travels of the Apostle after his first imprisonment, whereas when writing 2 Tim. he knew that he was near his end.

13. By universal tradition the martyrdom of St. Paul was at Rome [Harnack 64, Turner 64-65, Ramsay and Lightfoot 67]. Clement of Rome (Cor. 5), c. A.D. 95, says that having borne witness before rulers he departed from this world. At the end of the 2nd cent. Tertullian gives details: 'Paul is beheaded . . . At Rome Nero was the first who stained with blood the rising faith. Then does Paul obtain a birth suited to Roman citizenship . . . there' (Scorp. 15, Patr. Lat. ii. 174 f.); 'Rome . . . where Paul wins his crown in a death like John's' (de Præsc. Hæc. 36, Patr. Lat. ii. 59). In the 3rd cent. Origen (Com. in Gen. iii., see Eusebius, HE iii. 1) says that St. Paul suffered martyrdom in Rome under Nero [Nero died A.D. 68]. As there is no conflicting tradition, we may with confidence accept this account. More modern traditions make the death to have taken place at Tre Fontane, 3 miles from Rome, and the burial at S. Paolo fuori le Mura, nearer the city.

14. Appearance.—The following is the description in the Acts of Paul and Thecla (Armen. vers. § 3, Conybeare's Monuments, p. 62), which may go back, in this matter, to the 1st cent.: 'Onesiphorus . . . saw Paul coming along, a man of moderate stature, with curly hair . . . scanty, crooked legs, with blue eyes and large knit brows, long nose; and he was full of the grace and pity of the Lord, sometimes having the appearance of a man, but sometimes looking like an angel.' The 'blue eyes' are peculiar to the Armenian. The other versions say that he was bow-legged, with meeting eyebrows, and bald-headed. This unflattering description does not agree badly with that of St. Paul's detractors in 2 Co 10¹⁰ 11¹¹, who said that though his letters were weighty and strong, his bodily presence was weak, and his speech of no account; he was 'rude in speech.' The appearance of the Apostle would be made worse by the permanent marks of persecution, the 'marks of Jesus,' as most moderns interpret Gal 6¹⁷, which branded Paul as the slave of Christ.

iii. St. Paul's Teaching.—It would be a mistake to look on the Pauline Epistles as constituting a Summa Theologica, a compendium of Christian doctrine. The writer always assumes that his readers have in their possession the Christian tradition. We have no record of the method by which Paul preached the gospel, but he takes it for granted that it is known by those to whom he writes, and he repeats his teaching only when some special circumstances call for repetition. Doctrines like the Godhead of our Lord and of the Holy Spirit, the Atonement, and the Sacraments, are not stated as in a theological manual, but assumed (cf. 2 Th 2¹³ 3³, 1 Co 11²). Even the Epistle to the Romans, addressed to those who had not heard the Pauline presentation of the gospel, and partaking more of the nature of a treatise than do any of the rest, assumes the substratum of Christian dogma; note, for example, the way in which the Atonement is alluded to in Ro 3²⁵ 5¹⁷. It follows that it would be extremely unsafe to build any argument as to St. Paul's teaching upon his silence. The paragraphs which here follow are an attempt to bring together references in the Epistles to some of the more important points of Christian doctrine. But we may first ask whether St. Paul used a creed in his instructions. In 1 Co 15³, he seems to be quoting something of this nature; and a verse from a creed-like hymn is given in 1 Ti 3¹⁶. Yet the earliest known creed (the Apostles') cannot be traced back in any form beyond the second quarter of the 2nd cent., and the existence of anything like a creed in the Apostle's times is therefore a matter of conjecture only.

1. The Fatherhood of God.—Christianity inherited this doctrine from the OT. Yet it was fully revealed to us only by our Lord, for the Jews had hardly got beyond the truth that God was the Father of Israel. The Apostle develops this truth. God is the Father of Jesus (2 Co 1³, Eph 1³ etc.), who is 'the Son of God' (Gal 2²⁰, Ro 1⁴, 2 Co 1¹³, Eph 4¹²; cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰)—His 'own Son' (i.e. partaker of His nature), whom He did not spare (Ro 8³², passages which recall both Mk 1¹¹ and Jn 3¹⁶).—But, further, God is the father of all creatures (Eph 4⁶), from Him 'every fatherhood' (i.e. family) in heaven and earth is named (Eph 3¹⁴); He is 'the Father' (Gal 1¹ etc.), the 'Father of glory' (Eph 1⁷).—In a special sense He is the Father of all Christians, who are His sons by adoption (Ro 8¹⁵, Gal 3²⁶ 4⁵, Eph 1⁵ etc.). St. Paul never confuses the relation of the Father to the Son with that of the Father to mankind, but keeps the distinction of Jn 20¹⁷ ('my Father and your Father').

2. The Fall of Man.—The universality of sin is the most prominent theme in Rom., among both Gentiles (11¹⁸) and Jews (2¹³); all are 'under sin' (3⁹). Sin is due to Adam's fall, and is punished by death; yet each man is responsible (5¹²). 'Sin' does not mean mere error, as it was understood by the heathen, but moral wrong (cf. Ps 51⁴; so frequently in OT). From Adam came a taint which is called the 'law of sin' in the members (Ro 7⁵); it is a moral weakness which makes man inclined to sin. It is noticeable that Genesis says nothing of the penalty and taint as inherited from Adam upon which St. Paul insists; we find it first in Wis 2²¹, and probably in Sir 25²⁴. The Rabbinical teaching varied; some Jewish teachers emphasized the inherited taint and penalty, others the responsibility of each man. For the first cf. 2 Es 4²⁰, 7¹¹ [7¹⁵]; for the second cf. 2 Es 9¹¹ (freedom of choice) and Apocalypse of Baruch 54¹⁵⁻¹⁹; 2 Es 3²⁰ combines both views. These two works are probably of the 1st cent. A.D., and parts of 2 Esdras (but not those quoted) seem to have been added by a Christian hand (see Thackeray, St. Paul and Jewish Thought, ch. ii. and p. 21f.; a most suggestive book).—St. Paul traces the universality of sin to the instigation of Satan, the personal power of evil (1 Co 7⁵ etc.), and of his evil angels (Eph 6¹²).

3. The Incarnation.—The remedy for universal sin is provided by the love of the Father (Ro 8³²) and of the Son (Gal 2²⁰), in the Incarnation. That St. Paul uses the title 'Son of God' in no mere ethical sense is seen by the language in which he describes the pre-existence of our Lord. The Manhood and the Godhead are both spoken of in Ro 1⁴. ('of the seed of David according to the flesh,' 'declared to be the Son of God') and 8³ ('God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh'). The Christ is of the fathers as concerning the flesh, but is over all, God blessed for ever (Ro 9⁵; so EV and Sanday-Headlam, who in an exhaustive note uphold this interpretation; those mentioned in RVm as of 'some modern interpreters' seem to suit neither NT usage nor the context). With these passages cf. Ph 2⁶, with Lightfoot's notes. Christ Jesus, being originally in the form of God, having (that is) the essential attributes of God (Lightfoot), did not think equality with God a thing to be jealously guarded [as a robber guards what is not his], but emptied Himself [of the insignia of majesty] by taking the form of a slave. His position was no uncertain one that it should need to be asserted. It was this fact that made the condescension so great; Christ, being rich, became poor for our sakes (2 Co 8⁹). The pre-existence of our Lord is implied by the fact that He was the Father's instrument in Creation (1 Co 8⁶, Col 1¹⁶; cf. Jn 1³). He 'is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation . . . and he is before all things' (Col 1¹⁵, 17). Lightfoot remarks that the first of these phrases expresses Christ's relation to Deity (cf. Wis 7²⁶, 2 Co 4⁴, He 1³).—He is the manifestation of the unseen Father; while the second denotes His relation to created things,—it implies priority to all creation (for the Arian gloss that it means that Christ was the first creature is absolutely excluded by v. 16¹), and implies also sovereignty over creation, for the firstborn is the ruler of God's family (Ps 89²⁷; so in He 12²³ the 'church of the firstborn' probably means 'heirs of the Kingdom'; cf. also Ro 8²⁹). The Pastoral Epistles also teach the pre-existence of our Lord; the words 'manifested in the flesh' in 1 Ti 3¹⁶ (where 'God' must be omitted from the text) necessitate this; and in Tit 2¹³, according to the most probable interpretation (RV text), Jesus is called 'our great God and Saviour' (see Dean Bernard's note).—It would, however, be misleading to suggest that St. Paul's belief in the Divinity of his Master depends only on the interpretation of a few controverted texts, however great their combined force. The whole language of the Pauline Epistles, the devoted submission of Paul the 'slave' (Ro 1¹ and passim) to Jesus, are inexplicable on any other hypothesis (see also the next paragraph).

4. The Atonement.—'As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive.' 'The last Adam became a life-giving spirit' (1 Co 15²²; cf. Ro 5¹⁴⁻¹⁷). Our Lord is the 'second' or 'last' Adam, thus re-establishing what the first Adam destroyed. It has been thought that 'the second Adam' was a common Rabbinic title for the Messiah, but this seems doubtful. The term 'first Adam' is found, but is used in contradistinction to other men ('Adam' = 'man'), not as opposed to Messiah (Thackeray, op. cit. p. 41). Others have thought that St. Paul got his contrast between Adam and Christ from Philo and the Alexandrian Jewish school. However this may be, St. Paul teaches that our Lord came to be the Second Adam 'from heaven' (1 Co 15⁴⁷), to restore all things, to be the representative man, and to recapitulate or sum up the human species in Himself (cf. Eph 1¹⁰), to show to fallen humanity what God meant man to be.

This restoration was to be by the death of Jesus, by a sacrifice. Christ was set forth by God to be a propitiation, or (as we should perhaps translate) to be propitiatory (Ro 3²⁵; cf. 1 Jn 2¹⁻⁴). The word is used in LXX as a substantive meaning 'the place of propitiation' or 'the mercy seat,' the top of the ark, so called because it was sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifices; but this can hardly be the meaning in Rom., as the metaphor would be confused, Christ being at once the priest, victim, and place of sprinkling; and the second translation is therefore preferable (so Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 87 f.). But to understand the meaning we must notice (a) that here as elsewhere (Ro 5⁸, Eph 1⁷ 2¹, Col 1¹⁴ 20) the blood of our Lord, shed for the forgiveness of sins, is emphasized; and (b) that in Ro 5¹⁰ Jesus' death is said to be a 'reconciliation' or 'atonement.' Man is reconciled to, made 'at one' with, God; his attitude to God is changed (2 Co 5¹⁸). God is not here said to be reconciled to man, because it is man, not God, who must change if there is to be reconciliation, as is said in Col 1²¹ (where see Lightfoot's note). Yet there is another side of the same truth, alluded to in the Anglican Article II. ('to reconcile his Father to us'). The word 'propitiatory' of Ro 3²⁵ can only mean that by Christ's death, God is propitiated, that is, God's just anger is taken away from us. [In 2 Mac 1⁵ 7²⁸ 8³⁰ God is said 'to be reconciled' to man.]

This reconciliation is effected by a vicarious sacrifice. In ordinary life vicarious suffering is common, and is usually involuntary. But Christ freely offered Himself (Gal 2²⁰, 1 Ti 2⁶, Tit 2¹⁴), the sinless for the guilty. He was 'made sin in our behalf' (2 Co 5²¹; cf. 1 Co 5⁷ 15³, Gal 3¹³).

This sacrifice was for all men (2 Co 5¹⁴). And here we notice that St. Paul does not attempt to reconcile the Divine sovereignty with man's choice, God's predestination with human free-will. He sometimes states the former (e.g. Ro 9), sometimes the latter (e.g. Ro 10), looking sometimes at one side of the truth, sometimes at the other. On the one hand, God is the potter with power over the clay (Ro 9²¹), foreordaining and calling before the foundation of the world (Ro 8³⁰, 9²², Eph 1⁴), purposing that all men shall be saved (Ro 11²³, 1 Ti 2⁴ 4¹⁰), sending His Son to the world not only to save mankind generally, as a body, but to save each individual (cf. Gal 2²⁰). On the other hand, man can exercise his free will to thwart God's purpose, as all Israel except a remnant did (Ro 9³⁰ 11¹⁻⁵), and the call does not necessitate salvation (1 Co 9²⁷). The election is therefore to 'privilege,' as it is called; God has chosen certain men to receive privileges in this world, as Jews in the Old Covenant, Christians in the New. Yet there is also an election to life; the 'glory' of Ro 9²² is not of this world only. Here St. Paul leaves the question, and we may do well to avoid theorizing on it, whether in the direction of the Arminian view (named from van Harmen, A.D. 1560-1609), which was that God knows who will and who will not respond to His call, and therefore predestinates the former to life; or of the Calvinist or ultra-Augustinian view, which is that predestination is arbitrary, and that Christ died only for those predestined to life ('particular redemption'). The paradox is insoluble with our present knowledge, and we must patiently wait for its solution in the fuller light of the world to come. It may be remarked that St. Paul, while dwelling on both the goodness and the severity of God (Ro 2⁴ 11²²), never speaks of predestination to condemnation.

By another metaphor the atoning work of our Lord is called by St. Paul a 'ransom' or 'redemption.' We are 'bought with a price' (1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³; cf. Gal 3¹³ 4⁵, Tit 2¹⁴ etc., and 2 P 2¹). In his charge to the presbyters of Ephesus, St. Paul speaks of 'the church of God which he purchased with his own blood' (Ac 20²⁸). Without stopping to discuss the other difficulties of this verse (for we cannot be sure that we have St. Paul's ipsissima verba), we may remark that the metaphor of purchase or ransom must not be pressed too far. There need be no question of the person to whom the price is paid, whether it be God the Father, or Satan, who is supposed by some to have acquired a right to man by the Fall. The force of the metaphor lies, not in the person recompensed, but in the price paid. It is the immensity of the sacrifice that is emphasized, and the figure must not be carried further than this.

5. Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord.—The former event is made by St. Paul the great foundation of his teaching. In 1 Co 15¹⁻¹¹ he explains the gospel which he preached as he had received it, that Christ died, was buried, and was raised on the third day (the 'scriptures' referred to seem to be Is 53⁸, Ps 16⁸); the historical fact of the resurrection was, he says, witnessed by Cephas, 'the twelve,' the 500 brethren [in Galilee?] of whom most still survived, James [not in Gospels or Acts], 'all the apostles' [at the Ascension?], and lastly by himself as 'one born out of due time.' The appearance of Christ at his conversion he took to be as real and as little a hallucination as the appearances before the Ascension. So far from the fact of the appearance to St. Paul and those to the rest being put on a par showing that in St. Paul's view the latter were pure hallucinations, it shows that he was convinced of the reality of both alike (cf. esp. 1 Co 9¹). The criterion of Apostleship was that a man had seen Jesus, not merely dreamt that he had seen Him. In a word, if Christ's resurrection be false, Paul's preaching is vain, our faith is vain (1 Co 15¹⁴; cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰ 4¹⁴, 2 Ti 2⁸ etc.). The historical fact is treated as fundamental in the sermons at Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13³⁰), at Athens (17³), and before Agrippa (26²²); and the salient point of Paul's teaching seized on by Festus was that he affirmed Jesus, who was dead ['had died'], to be alive (25¹⁹). It is this fact that is the great power of the Christian life (Ph 3¹⁰).

The Ascension and Future Return of our Lord are often alluded to by St. Paul (see also 10 below). It is explicitly stated in Eph 4⁸ that Jesus ascended to give 'gifts unto men,' and Ps 68¹⁸ is quoted. Jesus is exalted in glory (Ph 2⁹, 1 Ti 3¹⁶), or, in the symbolic language found also elsewhere in NT, expressing the same fact, is seated on the right hand of God (Ro 8³⁴, Eph 1²⁰, Col 3¹, from Ps 110¹); so the believer is made to sit in heavenly places (Eph 2⁶). Jesus is expected to return 'from heaven' (1 Th 1¹⁰ 4¹⁶, Ph 3²⁰), to judge the world (2 Co 5¹⁰, 2 Ti 4⁸, Ac 17³¹; cf. Jn 5²² 7³⁷).—It is said, however, by Prof. Harnack that the Ascension had no separate place in primitive Christian tradition, and that the Resurrection and Session were thought of as one act. As regards St. Paul, his silence in 1 Co 15⁴⁷, Ro 8³⁴ as to the Ascension is alleged. In the former place reference to the Ascension would have no point, for the Apostle is proving the truth of the Resurrection. In the latter we have the sequence 'died'—'was raised'—'is at the right hand of God'—'maketh intercession.' If we are to take the second and third phrases as denoting one act, why not the first and second? [For a full discussion on this point, see Swete, The Apostles' Creed, p. 64 ff.]

6. The Holy Ghost.—In Ro 8¹⁻²⁷ St. Paul gives a great exposition of the work of the Spirit, which closely approximates to the description of the Paraclete (Helper, Comforter, Advocate) in Jn., though the name itself is not used. The 'Spirit of life' dwells in us (cf. 1 Co 3⁶ 6¹⁹) to quicken us [at the same time we read of this as 'Christ' being 'in us,' Ro 8⁹⁻¹¹], to lead us, and to help us to pray. He makes intercession for us [to the Father]—words in which St. Paul indicates what the technical language of Christianity calls the 'personality' of the Holy Spirit, distinct from the Father. So in Eph 4³⁰ the Holy Ghost can be grieved. He is the 'Spirit of Christ' (Ro 8⁹). In 1 Co 12 the Apostle describes the varying work of the Spirit in man, 'dividing . . . as he will' (v. 11; note the indication of personality). We live by the Spirit (Gal 5²⁵). In 2 Co 3¹⁷ the Spirit is at first sight identified with Christ—the Lord is the Spirit; the gift of the Spirit is the gift of Christ. Here again we recall our Lord's words in Jn., where the coming of the Spirit and the coming of Christ are identified (Jn 14¹⁶⁻²³). So also are reconciled the apparently contradictory sayings, 'I will be with you always' (Mt 28²⁰) and 'I go away . . . I will send him unto you' (Jn 16⁷). It is the work of the Spirit to make Christ's presence real to us. Hence also the Spirit works within us; we are united to Christ by Him, and from the beginning of our Christian life we are all baptized in one Spirit into one body (1 Co 12¹³). The Spirit is also spoken of as being given to us (Gal 3², Tit 3⁶, Ac 19² etc.). Lastly, we notice that the Father, Son, and Spirit are joined together in the Apostolic benediction (2 Co 13¹⁴), but in a striking order, our Lord coming first. Perhaps the Apostle's thought is that it is only by the grace of the Son that we can come to the love of the Father, and that the outpouring of the gifts of the Spirit applies that grace and love to us.

7. Justification by faith.—The Jewish teachers who had preceded St. Paul had taught that man is always laying up a treasure of good and bad deeds (cf. Ro 2¹³); and according as either preponderate at any given time, he is declared righteous or is condemned; while if the good and evil deeds are equal, God gives man the benefit of the doubt; and moreover, a man's good deeds may be supplemented by those of the patriarchs. [An echo of this may be seen in Ro 11²⁸; see Thackeray, op. cit. p. 83f.] It was taught that the whole transaction was a matter of contract, God owing a debt to man for goodness. St. Paul adopts the forensic metaphor of judge and verdict; man is 'justified,' or accounted righteous, by God, though he is not righteous. 'The Christian life,' it has been said, 'is made to have its beginning in a fiction' (Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 36). But this is merely another way of saying that God does not exact the debt to the utmost; He forgives freely (Ro 3²⁴ 8³⁰). Man is given a fresh start, with a clear record. The great difference between St. Paul and the Jewish teachers lies in the place assigned by him to faith (Ro 1¹⁷ 4², Gal 3¹¹), in his denying the merits of works of the Law (Gal 2¹⁶ 3²¹), and in the gift of justification being free. The Jews recognized faith only as one of the works, and with them it was no more than obedience to the Law.

The forgiveness of man is described by St. Paul as a manifestation of the righteousness (or 'a righteousness') of God (2 Co 5²¹, Ro 1¹⁷, Ph 3⁹), which is regarded as being diffused among men, as in the second Isaiah (Is 45²⁴ RVm, 46¹¹ 51⁵ 56¹). But the condition of forgiveness is faith, which for the Christian is a real belief in Christ—that conviction which the Apostle himself attained at his conversion, an active and enthusiastic belief influencing his whole life. Abraham was justified because he believed the promises; the Christian will be justified if he believes the revelation of Jesus Christ (Ro 1¹⁷ 3²² 10⁹ 17 etc.); this is 'the faith' (2 Ti 4⁷ etc.).

In this connexion we may glance at St. Paul's view of the Mosaic Law. He was not Marcionite, rejecting the OT. In his view the Law was useful as a guardian, a tutor, having charge of the world in its childhood (Gal 3²⁴). It is proved, however, to have been subsidiary and transitory, (a) by the fact that the promise was given to Abraham before the Law (Gal 3¹⁷)—and in this place St. Paul uses a Rabbinical argument from the grammatical form of the word 'seed,' which he applies to Christ; and (b) by the fact that it was given not direct from God, as was the promise to Abraham, but by the hands of angel ministers (Gal 3¹⁹; the reference is perhaps to Dt 33, Ps 68¹⁷; cf. Ac 7³⁸), and by a mediator, Moses (cf. Dt 5⁴). The Law affixes a penalty to sin, but does not provide the way to escape from it; thus those who are under the Law are under a curse, which is removed by the gospel (Gal 3¹⁰). In another passage St. Paul draws an allegory from the story of Moses' veil, put on his face that the people might not see the glory passing away from it. For the Lawgiver veiled himself, not because they could not bear to look on his face, but because he knew that the Law was transitory, and wished to hide the fact from the people. This seems to be the Apostle's meaning in 2 Co 3¹⁰ (see Thackeray, op. cit. p. 75).

In teaching free forgiveness St. Paul does not teach lawlessness (Ro 6¹⁵; see 8). But it was perhaps a distorted account of his early teaching that caused St. James to write the famous passage on works which occurs in his Epistle (Ja 2¹⁴⁻²⁶). There is no real contradiction between the two Apostles; as so often in religious controversy, an apparent difference comes from words being used in diverse senses. St. James speaks of an empty faith which does not produce a holy life, that is, which is no real faith at all: while St. Paul speaks of barren works that are a mere mechanical obedience to the Law, as opposed to a faith which necessarily produces active obedience to the commands of the Master.

8. Sanctification and Sacraments.—As has been said, St. Paul dwells on the necessity, not only of forgiveness, but of holiness. The two are inextricably interwoven. We must 'become the righteousness of God' (2 Co 5²¹) and be 'conformed to the image of his Son' (Ro 8²⁹) as the Son is the image of the Father (see above, 3). Sanctification is described as an implanting 'in the Christian of the life of Christ (Gal 2²⁰), for the risen life must begin in a very real sense here below: it is to be perfected hereafter (Col 3¹). By a slightly different figure we are said in Ro 6⁴ (see RV) to be united by growth [with Christ], in respect of, or by, the likeness of (i.e. by partaking in) His death and resurrection' (cf. Ph 3¹⁰), the language closely resembles our Lord's words at Capernaum (Jn 6⁵³⁻⁵⁷), and His parable of the Vine (Jn 15¹⁻⁸). Of this union baptism is at once a symbol and an instrument; we are immersed and submerged, then emerge from the font—the reference is to the custom of baptism by immersion—and so we die, are buried, and rise with Christ to a new life (Ro 6³⁻⁵; cf. Col 2¹², Tit 3⁵); by baptism we are incorporated with Him (Ro 6³; cf. Gal 3²⁷, 1 Co 12¹³ RV, Mt 28¹⁹ RV, Ac 8³⁶ RV, 19⁵ RV). The phrase 'baptized into' or 'unto' denotes either the purpose of baptism (e.g. remission of sins) or the person to whom the baptized is united. [In 1 Co 10² the words are used in an inferior sense, of the obedience of the Israelites to Moses.] It has been objected to this interpretation that our Lord gave the command to baptize (Mt 28¹⁹) in Aramaic, and that the phrase used in that language could only mean 'to baptize under the authority of' (Dean Robin son). But whatever the phrase 'in the name of' might formerly have meant among the Jews, St. Paul's language seems to show that the Apostles understood our Lord's words, even in Aramaic, to convey the new truth that baptism is an incorporation into the Name of Jesus, or of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (Bp. Chase). For a full discussion on both sides see JThSt vi. 481, vii. 186, viii. 161.

Again, of this union with Christ St. Paul makes the Eucharist at once a symbol and an instrument. That Sacrament is not only a union of Christians among themselves ('one bread, one body'), but also a 'participation in' or 'communion of' the body and blood of Christ (1 Co 10¹⁶). It is this feature of the Sacrament that made the Corinthian abuses so heinous, and that makes an unworthy reception by the communicant so serious, 'if he discern not the body' (1 Co 11²³⁻²²).

This union with Christ cannot be effected by man's own unaided power, but requires grace. It is impossible here to describe all the shades of meaning which St. Paul gives to this word. But we may say in brief that it is God's good favour towards us, not only as a Divine attribute, but as actively operating and as freely given to man through the Incarnation (Ro 5², 1 Co 1⁴). Hence it is the 'grace of Jesus Christ' (2 Co 8⁹ 13¹⁴). It is at once God's good favour towards us and the active help or power which God gives to man to enable him to overcome (Eph 4⁷), and is 'sufficient' for him (2 Co 12⁹). Emphasis is laid on the fact that grace is not earned, and it is opposed to a 'debt' (Ro 4⁴) and to meritorious deeds ('works,' Ro 11⁴). The word is especially used in connexion with the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, of the help given both to the evangelizer (1 Co 3¹⁰ etc.) and to the evangelized (2 Co 6¹, Ac 13⁴³ etc.). But in St. Paul the use of it is somewhat more fluid than in Latin theological language, in which 'Divine help' became the crystallized sense.

9. The Catholic Church and Universality of the Gospel.

—The large subject of the Church can here be referred to only very briefly. St. Paul maintains in Rom. and Gal. the universality of the Church, a society for all the world, which need not be entered through Judaism. Christ has broken down the wall between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2¹⁴ 3⁶). His Church is a visible society (Eph 4¹¹); one (1 Co 10¹⁷ 12¹³) because God is one (Eph 4⁶); holy because all Christians are called to be saints (1 Co 1²), and it is 'cleansed by the laver of water with the word' (Eph 5²⁶), though it contains some wicked men (cf. 1 Co 5); catholic, because for every man (Col 1²⁸: there is no 'inner circle' of the initiated), and for all nations and ages, and containing all truth (Gal 3²⁸ etc., 1 Ti 3¹⁵, 2 Ti 2¹⁸; cf. Jn 16¹³: the name itself is not found before Ignatius); and apostolic (Eph 2²⁰). The last thought is the same as that of Jn 20²¹, for Christians are not a self-constituted body, but are 'sent' by God; that is, they are 'apostolic.' St. Paul describes the Church under various metaphors. It is the body of Christ (1 Co 12²⁷, Eph 4¹² 5³⁰, Col 1¹⁸ 2¹⁹) because its members are united to Christ (see 8 above), and Christ is its head (Eph 1²²); the idea is led up to by Ro 12⁵ ('one body in Christ'), 1 Co 12¹² ('the body is one'). Also the Church is the bride of Christ; the title is implied in Eph 5²⁵ (cf. Rev 21²). It is the house of God (1 Ti 3¹⁵), a common metaphor which still gives us the double meaning of 'church' and the phrase 'to be edified' (Ro 15² etc.); the building, foundation, and corner-stone are described in Eph 2²⁰, where 'each several building' of RV means 'each stone that is built into the one building.' The metaphors of 'body' and 'house' are joined in Eph 4¹². In another figure the Church is an olive tree, being regarded as a continuation of the old dispensation, new branches (the Gentiles) having been grafted in, and the old ones (the Jews) broken off, though they too may again be grafted in (Ro 11¹⁷⁻²⁴). See GRAFTING.

In this Church St. Paul describes a regular ministry;

Apostles like himself; apostolic delegates such as Timothy and Titus, whose work, like that of the Apostles, was mainly itinerant; settled or local officers, called bishops (overseers) and deacons (ministers) at Philippi (Ph 1¹) and in the Pastoral Epistles (no deacons are mentioned in Tit.). Presbyters (elders) are also mentioned in the Pastoral Epistles (cf. also Ac 11³⁰ 15²², 16⁴ 21¹⁸ for those at Jerusalem, 14²³ 20¹⁷ for those elsewhere); and the identity of these with 'bishops' in the Apostolic age seems to be shown by a comparison of these pairs of passages: Ac 20¹⁷, 28, 1 Ti 3¹ 5¹, Tit 1⁵ 7, 1 P 5¹, 2, though this inference is denied by some. The appointment is by laying on of hands (1 Ti 5²²; cf. Ac 6⁶). Timothy is said to have been ordained 'with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery' (1 Ti 4¹⁴; probably the body of presbyters is intended), and 'through the laying on' of St. Paul's hands (2 Ti 1⁶). Nothing is said in the Pauline Epistles of the method of choosing ministers (see Ac 6⁶).—In 1 Co 12²⁸ St. Paul seems to enumerate not so much names of officials as various works done by the ministry (Apostles, prophets, teachers, miracles, gifts of healings, helps, governments, tongues); so in Eph 4¹¹ (Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers—the last two denote the same persons). In any case the regular ministry did not exclude the existence side by side with it of a 'charismatic' ministry, gifts of prophecy, tongues, healings, and other miracles being exercised by many outside the official ministry (Ro 12⁶, 1 Co 12-14; see also art. TONGUES [GIFT OF]).

The power of exercising discipline in the Church is recognized by St. Paul in 1 Co 5⁴, 1 Ti 1²⁰, though the exact force of the phrase 'to deliver unto Satan' is uncertain. It may denote either simple excommunication or the miraculous infliction of some punishment; but the former seems to be the more probable explanation.

10. Eschatology.—As St. Paul makes the Resurrection of our Lord the foundation of his teaching, so he insists on the resurrection of the body at the Last Day as a cardinal truth. But in the Epistles he does not always deal with the same side of eschatological doctrine. (a) In the earliest of his extant Epistles (1 Th 4¹³) his language is so deeply coloured by his expectation of the immediate return of our Lord, that he says nothing of the time between death and the Judgment, but thinks only of Jesus coming with His saints (3¹³), at the sound of the trumpet (4¹⁶; cf. also 1 Co 15², 2 Es 6²⁴), to awaken the sleeping dead (cf. 1 Co 15²⁰, 51)—all common Jewish figures; for the phrase 'we that are left' cf. 2 Es 7²⁸ 13²¹ 28. Perhaps the supposed nearness of the Second Advent is reflected in Maran atha, 'The Lord cometh' (1 Co 16²²), but the phrase may mean 'The Lord hath come.' Lest misapprehension of his language should arise, St. Paul adds in 2 Th 2²⁰ the caution that the 'man of sin' must first come, and persecution must arise (so 1 Co 7²⁶ if we translate 'the imminent distress'). The idea of trouble before the End is common in the Jewish apocalypses. The one thing certain is that the Coming will be unexpected (1 Th 5²).—(b) In these earliest Epistles nothing is said of the transformation of the body. But in 1 Co 15⁵⁰ this is insisted on (so Ph 3²¹; cf. Ro 8²³). As the Resurrection of Christ is an assured fact, so that of all men is certain (1 Co 15²²): the resurrection body is at once the same and not the same as the terrestrial body; there is an identity, and yet a change. The resurrection body is a spiritual body, the necessary result of the terrestrial body, just as a particular seed must result in a particular plant, and yet the seed is changed to become the plant (cf. our Lord's similar metaphor in Jn 12²⁴). In the Apocalypse of Baruch (1st cent. A.D.) there is the thought of the transformation, but as taking place after the Judgment; the dead in this book rise as they were, in order that they may be recognized (cf. also 4 Mac 9²² 'as though transformed by fire into immortality, he nobly endured the rackings'). St. Paul says that this transformation is necessary, because in our present state we cannot see God; for this seems to be the meaning of the saying that flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God (1 Co 15⁵⁰, cf. also Ph 3²¹). In this discussion St. Paul does not speak of the resurrection of the wicked; but elsewhere he re-echoes the teaching of Dn 12² that the righteous and the evil rise together for judgment (Ac 24¹⁵, Ro 2^{5a}, 14¹⁰⁻¹², 2 Co 5¹⁰). It is therefore not probable that in 1 Co 15²² a resurrection first of the righteous, and then, after an interval, of the wicked, is intended; the righteous alone are here considered, and they rise at Christ's coming, and 'then' (at Christ's coming) is the end. Those who see in this passage a millennium, and an interval between the rising of the good and of the wicked, are influenced greatly by Rev 20⁴; but the 'thousand years' there seems to be a symbolical phrase for the interval between the first Advent and the last conflict, in which the baptized share in Christ's resurrection (cf. Col 3¹, a paradox of obvious meaning). See Swete's Apocalypse of St. John, p. 260 ff.—(c) In yet another passage, 2 Co 4¹⁶⁻⁵¹⁰, the Apostle looks only at the state of the departed immediately after death. Here the metaphor of sleep is dropped, and the nearness to Christ of the faithful dead is dwelt on; they are 'with Christ,' whereas in 1 Th 4 'we that are left' shall meet the Lord only at the sound of the trumpet at the Last Day, and the 'dead in Christ' will meet Him at the same time. An excessive literalism has suggested to some that St. Paul changed his mind about the resurrection of the body and gave up the belief in it in favour of a belief in the immortality of the soul only, perhaps under the influence of Alexandrian theology (Wis 9¹⁵ is cited as showing that the latter had no doctrine of the resurrection of the body.) But this supposition, which is very unlikely in itself when we consider the short interval between the two Corinthian Epistles, is decisively negated by Ph 3²¹. In 2 Ti 4⁸, written in daily expectation of imminent death, he yet looks beyond the intermediate state to the Day of Judgment, 'that day,' 'the day of the Lord,' when he shall receive the crown of righteousness.

11. Marriage and virginity.—St. Paul writes no treatise on marriage, but he often alludes to it. Both Jews and Gentiles had been accustomed to divorce being easily obtained. But St. Paul says that a Christian woman is to be bound to her husband for life, though a widow may marry again (Ro 7²). Marriage is not to be forbidden (1 Ti 4³; cf. 1 Co 9⁹). In 1 Co 7, according to the usual interpretation, the Corinthians having asked whether among Christians marriage should be discouraged, St. Paul answers that marriage is permissible for all, though the unmarried state is the better one because of the present (or imminent) distress (v. 26); the thought is of the nearness of Christ's coming, and of the persecutions which would precede it. But Ramsay thinks that such a question is not to be expected from either Jews or Gentiles of that time, seeing that the Jews for many ages had looked on marriage as a universal duty, and that the Roman law greatly encouraged it; he supposes, therefore, that the Corinthians had asked whether marriage ought to be made obligatory for Christians, and that St. Paul pleaded for a permissible celibacy.—In Eph 5²² the Apostle emphatically treats marriage as holy, symbolizing the union between Christ and His Church.

In 1 Ti 3^{2, 12}, Tit 1⁶ a bishop (presbyter) or deacon must be 'the husband of one wife.' This need not necessarily imply compulsory marriage for the clergy. It has, however, been variously interpreted as forbidding (a) bigamy—but that was forbidden to all Christians; or (b) digamy, i.e. marrying again after the death of the first wife, as in a later ecclesiastical discipline; or (c) divorce: i.e. the bishop must be one who, in his pre-Christian days, had not divorced his wife and taken another. [The last two explanations are not exclusive.]

iv. PREDECESSORS AND TEACHERS.—In the Apostle of the Gentiles all will recognize one of the most original of thinkers; but originality does not necessarily mean having no predecessors in one's line of thought. It lies rather in new organization and arrangement, in the employment of old terminology in a higher and wider sense, or in the re-construction of old material so as to make a nobler whole. Again, the fact that the Christian Church believes that St. Paul was an inspired Apostle does not preclude the idea of human preparation for his life-work. And he undoubtedly gleaned from many fields.

1. Jewish official teachers.—St. Paul had been a pupil of Gamaliel in Jerusalem (Ac 22³). This Rabbi, whom we may take to be the famous grandson of Hillel (Ac 5^{34b}), was of that liberal school of the Pharisees which encouraged the study of Greek literature. It has been objected by Baur that the statement in Ac 22³ cannot be historical, because Paul before his conversion was such a zealot, so blindly bigoted, so unlike Gamaliel. But pupils do not always follow their masters, and we cannot doubt that in God's providence Gamaliel's moderation had its influence on the Apostle in the end, and eventually contributed much to his well-balanced character.

2. Influence of popular Jewish writings.—The Jewish apocalypses have greatly influenced St. Paul (for examples see § iii.); the Alexandrian writings not so much. But the Book of Wisdom is clearly used in the descriptions of heathen corruption in Ro 1¹⁸⁻²², and of the power of the Creator in Ro 9¹⁰. The influence of contemporary Jewish thought is also seen in St. Paul's method of treating the OT. His running commentaries (Ro 10⁶, Gal 4²², Eph 4⁷), the making of a cento of OT passages to prove a point, thought to be due to the use of a Jewish anthology (Ro 3¹⁰, 2 Co 6¹⁶), his mystical interpretations of OT such as those of 1 Ti 5¹⁸, 1 Co 9²⁴. ('for our sake it was written'; cf. Ro 15³, 2 Ti 3⁸, 2 P 1²⁰), 1 Co 10¹⁶. (the passage of the Red Sea a 'Baptism,' the manna and the water from the rock an 'Eucharist'), Gal 4²¹. (Hagar, note v. 24), are all thoroughly Jewish; and so is the acception by the Apostle, for purposes of illustration, of some legendary stories added by the Jews to the OT, such as the references to the Rock which was said to have followed the Israelites in the wilderness (1 Co 10⁴), the persecution of Isaac by Ishmael (Gal 4²⁹), and Jannes and Jambres (2 Ti 3⁸). For these and some other possible instances of the use of legends see Thackeray, op. cit. pp. 180, 204, 50, 159 ff.

3. Greek philosophy.—This influence, to be expected in a pupil of Gamaliel, is certainly noticeable in St. Paul's speeches and writings. Stoicism especially seems to have left a mark on them. Here we may remark on the undoubted connexion which exists between St. Paul and the Stoic philosopher Seneca (see Lightfoot's essay in his Philippians, p. 270 ff.). Seneca's writings have very numerous coincidences with the Pauline Epistles, with the Gospels, and even with the other books of NT. He and the Apostle were contemporaries. Could either have influenced the other? There are difficulties in the way of supposing that Seneca was influenced by NT. Chronology forbids us to think that he knew the Johannine writings or Hebrews, as he died in Nero's reign; yet he has many coincidences with these books also. Again, Seneca quotes many of the phrases common to him and NT from older writers; these, then, are not due to NT. Further, the coincidences are often verbal rather than real; the sense is often quite dissimilar, the Stoic pantheism and materialism and the absence in that philosophy of any real consciousness of sin making an absolute separation from Christianity. Yet many striking coincidences remain,—more between NT and Seneca than between NT and Epictetus or any other Stoic writer. Thus we are surprised to find that the phrase 'to spend and be spent' (2 Co 12^b) is common to St. Paul and Seneca; and this is only one out of many parallels. The connexion, however, is probably not between the two writers directly; nor yet (as has been suggested) through Seneca's brother Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia, who was the last person likely to have been interested in St. Paul's doctrine (Ac 18¹⁷). But probably the Apostle, educated partly at Tarsus, a great Stoic centre, imbibed in his youth many Stoic phrases which we find repeated in the Hispano-Latin Seneca, who derived his Stoicism from the East. If so, we notice that St. Paul often assigned quite a new and a much higher meaning to these phrases. In the same way St. John drew on Alexandrian Judaism for the word Logos, but assigned to it a higher sense than it ever had before. The influence of Stoic philosophy on St. Paul may be seen in the speech at Athens (where many Stoics were present), containing as it does a quotation from the Stoic Aratus (Ac 17²⁸; also found in the Stoic Cleanthes). An example of a striking word which comes into Christianity from Stoicism is 'conscience.'—We are not here concerned with the coincidences mentioned above between Seneca and the other NT writers; but the explanation in their case is probably similar to that just given.

4. Influence of the Roman Empire.—It has already been remarked (ii. 3) that St. Paul was greatly influenced by his position as a Roman citizen, to which he owed his great plan of evangelization. The same thing may be incidentally seen from the allusions to the law of the Empire in the special form in which it was in force in the particular province to which he was writing. The Greek law was left in possession by the Romans in those provinces where it had formerly been in force. Accordingly in Gal. 3¹⁵ the reference is to the form of testamentary disposition known to the Greek (and to the older but obsolete Roman) law, the irrevocable will. In Gal. 4¹⁵ the adoption of an heir, like the making of a will, is irrevocable, the adopted heir becoming necessarily a son, and the terms 'heir' and 'son' becoming interchangeable. In the existing Roman law wills were revocable and heirs could be disinherited; accordingly, writing to Rome (Ro 8¹⁶), St. Paul puts the truth of which he had written to the Galatians in a different way. Heirship is now deduced from sonship, whereas in Galatians sonship is deduced from heirship; for at Rome a son must be an heir, but an heir need not be a son (cf. He 9¹⁶), which presupposes Roman law and the revocability of a will).—So in Gal. 3²⁴, 1 Co 4¹⁵ the 'pedagogue' or 'tutor' (not 'schoolmaster') is a reference to a Greek institution adopted by the Romans; this person was the guardian of the child, often one of the upper slaves, who took him to school. The guardian of the child's property (Gal 4²) was a different person. On the whole subject see Ramsay, Galatians, pp. 337–393.

5. Christian teachers.—In Gal. St. Paul insists so much on his Apostleship being Divine, not only in its source but in the channel by which it is conveyed (esp. 1¹), and on his not having received anything from the Twelve (2²), that at first sight it seems as if he describes himself as having become a fully instructed Christian in a moment, on his conversion. Yet he must have learned much from Christians both before and after that great change. He was clearly much influenced by Stephen, with whom he had perhaps had arguments (Ac 6⁹; note 'Cilicia,' Paul's province). After his conversion he must have learned the facts of Christianity from Christian teachers such as Ananias at Damascus, and the prophets and teachers (especially Barnabas) at Antioch (Ac 13¹), and no doubt also at Tarsus. Of this instruction there are some traces in the Pauline Epistles; the facts of the Last Supper, though 'received of the Lord' (1 Co 11²³), must have come by a human channel; and so the account of the Resurrection appearances (1 Co 15³). On the other hand, St. Paul ascribes to direct revelation from God his knowledge of the spiritual meaning of the facts (Gal 1¹²); his visions are frequently referred to (Ac 9¹², 16¹⁹, 18⁹, 22³, 23³, 26¹⁹, 1 Co 9¹, 15⁸, 2 Co 12¹², Gal 2², Eph 3³); he was directly 'taught of God.'

In such ways was St. Paul prepared for his work. His education was manifold. Partly the Jew, partly the Greek, partly the Roman citizen, but wholly the Christian, he went forth equipped for his many labours as the Apostle of the Gentiles. A. J. MACLEAN.

PAULUS, SERGIUS.—Proconsul of Cyprus at the time of the visit of Paul and Barnabas in the first missionary journey (Ac 14⁷). The translators of the AV always use the term 'deputy' when speaking of a proconsul. The provinces of the Roman Empire were divided into two classes, governed respectively by 'propraetors' and 'proconsuls.' Strabo describes Cyprus as governed by a propraetor, and hence some have impugned the accuracy of the author of the Acts; but there is ample evidence to show that it was sometimes under one and sometimes under the other. A coin has been discovered in Cyprus bearing the inscription 'in the time of Paulus, proconsul.' This inscription may probably be dated A.D. 55, when its subject would be the proconsul of Acts. Pliny in his Natural History gives Sergius Paulus as his authority for certain facts, and among these are two specially connected with Cyprus. MORLEY STEVENSON.

PAVEMENT.—See GABBATHA.

PAVILION is formed (through Fr. parillon) from Lat. papilio, which meant a 'butterfly,' and also (from the resemblance to a butterfly's outspread wings) a 'tent.' 'Pavillon' is the tr. in AV of sōk in Ps 27⁵, and of sukkah in 2 S 22²¹, 1 K 20¹², 16, Ps 131¹, 31¹⁰ (to which RV adds Job 36²⁵ and Is 4⁶ for AV 'tabernacle'). sukkah is of frequent occurrence, and is often rendered 'booth' or 'tabernacle,' once 'tent' (2 S 11¹¹). Besides these, shaphrur in its single occurrence (Jer 43¹⁰) is tr. 'royal pavilion' (RVm 'glittering pavilion'). RV has also given 'pavilion' in Nu 25⁵, with mg. 'alcove' for AV 'tent.' It is possible that the Heb. qubbah in this passage is a mistake for chuppah, 'nuptial tent.'

PE.—The seventeenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 17th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

PEACE.—From Latin pax, through French.—1. Except in Dn 8²⁴ 11²¹, 24 (where RV corrects to 'security'), the OT 'peace' represents uniformly the Heb. shālôm (Eastern salaam), the fundamental sense of which—always more or less distinctly implied—is welfare (as in Gn 43²⁷, Ps 73³ etc.); of well-being, in the old turbulent times, peace was the prime condition. The word has the following specific religious uses: (1) it is the common formula of courteous well-wishing, employed both at meeting and at parting (see Gn 43²⁷, 1 S 1¹⁷, Ps 122⁷; cf. Mt 10¹²); (2) 'peace' constituted the most conspicuous blessing of the Messianic Kingdom of God (wh. see; cf. Ps 72⁷, Is 24⁹, 54¹⁰, Hag 2², Zec 9¹⁰); and (3) it signified a sound and settled understanding between J^h and His people (Nu 6²⁶, Ps 29¹¹, 85¹⁰, 122⁷, Jer 16⁷ etc.)—hence J^h's 'covenant of peace' is lodged with His priests (Nu 25¹, Mal 2¹). In this last and richest use the word approximates to its subjective NT signification, implying tranquillity of heart, as in Ps 4⁸ 119¹⁶, Is 48¹⁸, 22.

2. The transition from OT to NT usage strikingly illustrates the inwardness of Christianity. Out of some 90 NT instances of 'peace' there are not more than 8 or 9 which do not refer to next-peace. The Greek eirēnē in its proper sense signified peace strictly, as the opposite of conflict; but it took over, first in the LXX and then in the NT, the broader import of shālôm, which is conspicuous in the (Hebraistic) Benedictions (see Mk 5², Lk 7²⁰ 24²⁸, Jn 14²⁷, Ja 2¹⁶ etc.) and in the epistolary Salutations. In the latter formulae, 'peace' comprehends the sum of blessing experienced, as 'grace' the sum of blessing bestowed, from God in Christ. The Messianic peace (1 (2), above) reappears in Lk 17²⁰ 24², Mt 10¹³; and the peace of harmony with God (1 (3)) in Jn 16²³, Ac 10¹², Ro 8¹⁶ 15²³, Ph 4⁷ etc. The uses just named are gathered up, with a deepened sense, into the specific NT doctrine of peace, of which Paul is the exponent, and Ro 5¹ the classical text (cf. v¹⁰, also 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²¹, Eph 2¹³⁻¹⁸, Col 1²⁰; see article on JUSTIFICATION): 'peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ' is the state and the experience of those who have been 'reconciled' to the Father through the sacrifice offered by the Son of His love, whose 'trespasses' are 'forgiven' and in whose heart 'the spirit of adoption' dwells. Reconciled to God, men are reconciled to life and the world; by His cross Christ 'has slain' at a blow 'the enmity' between God and man and between race and race (Eph 2¹⁶). 'Peace on earth' is to flow from 'the peace of Christ' that 'rules in' Christian 'hearts' (Col 3¹⁵). G. G. FINDLAY.

PEACE-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, 12.

PEACOCKS.—1. takkuytm, 1 K 10²², 2 Ch 9²¹. The word may be from the Tamil tokei meaning 'peacock,' but from the fact that the LXX has in 1 K 10²² 'carved stones,' and that in 2 Ch 9²¹ the word is omitted, the tr. is doubtful. The peacock (Pavo cristatus) is a native of India. 2. rendum, AV tr. in Job 39¹³ 'peacock.' See OSTRICH. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PEARL.—References in OT are uncertain. In Job 28¹⁸ qabsh is in AV tr. 'pearls,' but in RV 'crystal,' while penim in same verse is in AV tr. 'rubies,' but in RVm 'pearls.' In Est 1⁶ dar should perhaps be rendered 'pearl' or 'mother-of-pearl.' In NT pearls (Gr. margaritai) are mentioned in Mt 7⁶ 13⁴⁵, 1 Ti 2⁹, Rev 21¹⁰. The last ref. must be to mother-of-pearl. Pearls are a pathological production of the mollusc Avicula margaritifera. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PEDAHEL.—The prince of Naphtali (Nu 34²⁸).

PEDAHZUR.—The father of the prince of the tribe of Manasseh (Nu 1¹⁰ 22⁰ 74⁶, 59 10²²).

PEDALIAH ('J' has redeemed').—1. Father of Joel, ruler of Manasseh, west of the Jordan, in the time of David (1 Ch 27²⁰). 2. 'Of Rumah,' father of Zebudah the mother of Jehoiaquim (2 K 23³⁶). 3. Son of Jeconiah (1 Ch 3¹⁹), in 1 Ch 3¹⁹ called the father of Zerubbabel, who, however, is otherwise represented as the son of Pedaliah's brother Shealtiel. 4. A man of the family of Parosh, who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3²⁰). 5. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the Law to the people (Neh 8¹; 1 Es 9⁴ Phaldeus), perhaps identical with 4. 6. A Levite (Neh 13¹²). 7. A Benjamite (Neh 11⁷). W. F. BOYD.

PEDIAS (1 Es 9²⁴) = Ezr 10³⁶ Bedeah.

PEEP.—To 'peep' (Is 8¹⁹ 10¹⁴) is to 'cheep' as nestlings do. RV mistakenly has 'chirp.'

PEKAH was one of the last kings of Israel. The country was unsettled, and there was great discontent on account of the heavy tribute paid to Assyria. Pekah made himself the organ of the dissatisfaction, and murdered his king Pekahiah (2 K 15²⁵). He needed the help of only fifty soldiers or bravos to accomplish his purpose. Once on the throne he set on foot a movement against the Assyrians in which all the kingdoms of Syria were to unite. When the king of Judah held out against it, Pekah and Rezin invaded that country, as is set forth in the art. AHAZ. The Assyrians were prompt in meeting the coalition, and the issue can hardly have been doubtful, except to those who were blinded by patriotism. The fall of Damascus was followed by the ravaging of the districts of Israel north and east of Samaria, and the transportation of their inhabitants to remote portions of the empire. The capital would no doubt have been besieged had not the party friendly to Assyria got the upper hand and removed Pekah by the usual method of assassination (v.³⁰). The leader in this movement, Hoshea by name, had an understanding with the Assyrian king, and was perhaps from the first a creature of his. Abject submission on his part saved Samaria for the time being. The length of Pekah's reign is given as twenty years, which is difficult to reconcile with other data at our command. The true period cannot have been more than five years. H. P. SMITH.

PEKAHIAH, son of Menahem, was king of Israel for a short time in the troubled period which preceded the fall of Samaria. The record tells us nothing about him except that he displeased Jahweh by walking in the sins of Jeroboam I., and that he was assassinated by Pekah, one of his officers (2 K 15²⁵⁻²⁶). H. P. SMITH.

PEKOD.—Probably the Bab. Pukadu, a people settled in Lower Babylonia, possibly of Aramean race (Ezk 23²⁸, Jer 50²¹). Their seat was near the mouth of the Uknū River. C. H. W. JOHNS.

PELALIAH.—1. A son of Elioenai (1 Ch 3²⁴). 2. A Levite who helped Ezra to expound the Law (Neh 8⁷ [1 Es 9⁴⁸ Phalias]), and sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹⁰).

PELALIAH.—A priest (Neh 11¹³).

PELATIAH.—1. A 'prince of the people' (Ezk 11¹³); he died as the prophet delivered his message (v.¹³). It is difficult to decide whether Pelatiah's death is to be understood as actual or merely symbolical. 2. A grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3²¹). 3. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4¹²). 4. A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10²²).

PELEG.—A descendant of Shem in the fourth generation, according to the table of peoples given in Gn 10. In Lk 3³⁸ he stands a generation further off through the interpolation of Cainan from the LXX. The etymology of the name is uncertain. Its reference may be geographical, or racial, or, as the word means ordinarily 'a water-course,' it may denote a land cut up by streams. W. F. COBB.

PELET.—1. A son of Jahlad (1 Ch 2¹⁷). 2. A Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12¹).

PELETH.—1. See PALLU. 2. A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2²³).

PELETHITES.—See CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES.

PELICAN (qā'ath, prob. from root 'to vomit').—One of the 'unclean' birds (Lv 11¹⁶, Dt 14¹⁷) inhabiting the ruins of Nineveh (Zeph 2¹⁴, where AV has 'cormorant'), and desolate Idumea (Is 34¹¹). 'A pelican in the wilderness' is referred to in Ps 102⁷. If in these two last qā'ath is really 'pelican,' it is a poetical and conventional reference, for this bird's habitat is always near pools of water or the sea; the creature's attitude after a plentiful gorge, when he sits with his head sunk on his breast, is supposed to suggest melancholy. In Palestine two species are known, of which the white pelican (Pelecanus onocrotalus) is plentiful in the more retired parts of the Jordan lakes, especially in the Huleh. It is nearly 6 feet from beak to end of tail, and is remarkable chiefly for its pouch, in which it collects fish for feeding itself and its young. The other species is P. crispus, the Dalmatian pelican. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PELONITE.—A designation applied to two of David's heroes (1 Ch 11²⁷⁻²⁸). For the former see PALTITE. In the second case 'Pelonite' is prob. a scribal error for 'Gilonite.'

PEN.—See WRITING, 6.

PENCIL.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 1; LINE, 6.

PENDANTS.—See AMULETS, ORNAMENTS, § 2.

PENIEL

PENIEL.—See PENUEL.

PENINNAH.—The second wife of Elkanah (1 S 1st).

PENKNIFE.—Mentioned only in Jer 36th. Orientals use a reed pen in writing, and always carry a knife for the purpose of mending it.

PENNY.—See MONEY, §§ 6, 7.

PENSION.—Only AV of 1 Es 4th (AVm 'portions of land,' RV 'lands'). This archaism is first found in the Geneva version, and is used in the original sense of 'payment' (Lat. pensio).

PENTATEUCH.—See HEXATEUCH.

PENTECOST, FEAST OF.—1. In the OT.—The offering of a barley-sheaf during the Feast of Unleavened Bread opened the reaping season, which lasted officially for 49 days, a week of weeks. On the 50th day took place the Feast of Pentecost, also called the Feast of Weeks (Ex 34th, Dt 16th), the Feast of Harvest (Ex 23rd), and the Day of First-fruits (Nu 28th). It thus took place at the end of the reaping season, when all the wheat and barley had been cut and gathered, and marked especially the termination of the wheat harvest (wheat being the last of the cereals to ripen in Palestine). The festival was held at the central sanctuary (Dt 16th), whither the people were expected to repair for the celebration; it cannot, therefore, have existed before the settlement in Canaan.

The proper method by which to compute the date of Pentecost was a matter of controversy. In Lv 23rd the terminus a quo is given as the day after the Sabbath during the Feast of Unleavened Bread. In Christ's time the Jews understood this to mean 16th Nisan, treating the first day of Unleavened Bread as a Sabbath, since it was a day of holy convocation. On this computation Pentecost would fall on 6th Sivan (June). But some theorists maintained that the Sabbath referred to was the ordinary Sabbath during the days of Unleavened Bread, whenever it chanced to fall. The objection to this view was that if 14th or 21st Nisan was a Sabbath, the sheaf-waving would occur outside the Unleavened Bread festival, of which it certainly appears to form a part. Anyhow, whatever be the correct interpretation of the disputed passage in Lev., the Jews usually celebrated the sheaf-waving on 16th Nisan and Pentecost on 6th Sivan.

The feast was probably originally a nature-festival, fixed in later times at a specified date. It always retained its agricultural character in Biblical ages, but some later Rabbinical writers treated it also as a commemoration of the delivery of the Law on Sinai—an event which was supposed to have taken place 50 days after the Exodus (Ex 19th), though this idea is not found in Philo or Josephus; and the fact that the reading of the Law in the Sabbatical year took place at the Feast of Tabernacles and not at Pentecost, points to the late origin of this tradition.

The festival lasted for one day (though the later Jews allowed two days for it, because in the Dispersion it was difficult to determine accurately the Palestinian month); it was a day of holy convocation, and no servile work might be done. Two leavened loaves of wheaten flour were waved before the Lord; two yearling lambs were also waved as a peace-offering; seven lambs, one bullock, and two rams were offered as a burnt-offering, and one kid of the goats as a sin-offering (Lv 23rd-21). In Nu 28th the burnt-offerings are given as two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs. These, perhaps, were supplementary to the offerings prescribed in Lv 23, where possibly only the sacrifices connected with the loaves are specified. Lv 23rd also prescribes freewill offerings for the poor and the stranger, whilst Dt 18th ordains a freewill offering for the sanctuary, and states that the festal joy is to be shared by all classes. It is probable that this latter offering is referred to in Dt 26th, and the form of confession and thanksgiving there dictated was so used at this period.

PEOPLE

2. In the Christian Church Pentecost was the occasion on which the outpouring of the Holy Spirit occurred (Ac 2). The presence of multitudes at Jerusalem shows the generality of the observance which the Jews paid to this feast. It became one of the Church's great festivals, as the anniversary of the spiritual first-fruits procured through Jesus Christ's sacrifice. By the close of the 2nd cent. it was established as an occasion of Christian rejoicing. No fasting or kneeling in prayer was allowed during its duration, and it was especially used as a season for baptisms. Under the old dispensation Pentecost had been distinctly connected with the Feast of Unleavened Bread. So in Christian times its dependence on the Passover sacrifice of Christ, which led to the gift of the Holy Ghost, is unmistakable.

PENUEL (once, Gn 32nd, Peniel).—A place E. of Jordan, and near the Jabbok, at which Jacob wrestled with the angel (Gn 32nd), and said (v. 30) to be called Peniel (or Penuel), i.e. 'Face of God,' because Jacob said, 'I have seen God face to face, and yet my life is preserved.' (The mention of the 'face of God' in 33rd makes it possible that another explanation of the origin of the name is there alluded to.) There was, however, in Phoenicia, a little S. of Tripolis, a headland called Theou prosōpon, 'God's face'; and it is thought by some scholars that 'Penuel' really derived its name from some projecting rock in whose contour a face was seen. Penuel is mentioned also in the history of Gideon, as a place with a strong tower or castle which Gideon destroyed (Jg 8th v. 17); it may be inferred from this passage that Penuel was a little E. of Succoth (v. 8), and also on a higher elevation ('went up,' v. 8). Many years later, Penuel was fortified by Jeroboam (1 K 12th); so that it must have been a place of some strategic importance. The site is not more certain than that of Succoth; see under Succoth some account of the data upon which its settlement depends, and a suggestion for it. Merrill identifies Penuel with Tulū edh-Dhahab ('the hills of gold,' so called from the yellow metalliferous sandstone of which they are composed), two conical hills, about 250 ft. high, round which the Jabbok winds, about 6 miles E. of Deir 'Allā (which Merrill identifies with Succoth), up the valley, with ancient ruins on the top; and Conder identifies it with Jebel Osha, a mountain 3597 ft. high, with a fine view, 8 miles S. of the Jabbok. But to each of these identifications there are grave objections: as regards Merrill's site, it is expressly declared by other travellers that the banks of the Jabbok for many miles above Tulū edh-Dhahab are on both sides so lofty and precipitous as to afford no way for either the Midianites or Gideon to pass along them (see ExpT. xiii. [1902] 457 ft., or more briefly the writer's Genesis p. 300 ft.).

PEOPLE.—This is the translation used in AV for a large number of Hebrew and Greek terms. In some cases ambiguity occurs, as the pl. 'peoples' is not used in AV except in Rev 10th 17th. Thus 'people' is used sometimes of the people of Israel, and often of heathen nations. RV uses 'peoples' freely, and this makes the meaning much clearer in such passages as Ps 67th, Is 55th 60th etc. (see art. NATIONS, also preface to RV).

A special phrase 'the people of the land' occurs frequently in the OT, especially in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, 2 K., and 2 Ch. In most of these cases it means the general body of the people, the common people as opposed to the courtiers or the ruling class. In Gn 23rd 13, 15, Nu 14th the term is applied to non-Israelites. In the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah the 'people of the land' are the half-heathen, half-Jewish population with whom the less scrupulous Jews intermarried, but who were avoided by the stricter party represented by Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezr 10th 11, Neh 10th 31; cf. 9th Neh 9th). The same phrase was used by the Rabbis to describe the common people, who were lax in observing the Mosaic law (Jn 7¹⁹). W. F. BOYD.

PEOR.—1. A mountain E. of the Jordan to which Balak led Balaam (Nu 23²⁵). It looked down upon the desert. The Onomasticon (s.v. 'Fogor') places it 7 miles from Heshbon, above Livias, one of the heights of the Nebo group. Corder suggests for it the peak above 'Ain el-Minyeh, about 5 miles W. of Ma'in. Buhl (GAP) thinks it may be el-Mushakkar, flanked by Wady Hesban and Wady 'Ayūn Māsa. 2. In Nu 25¹⁸ 31¹⁸, Jos 22¹⁷, Peor is the god Baal-Peor. 3. LXX places a Peor (Phagor) in Judah not far from Bethlehem, which is evidently the modern Khirbet Faghūr, to the S. of the town. W. EWING.

PERÆA.—The district called by Josephus 'the Peræa' is referred to in NT as 'beyond Jordan' (Mt 4¹⁵ etc.). When Josephus says that it stretches from Machærus to Pella, and from Philadelphia ('Ammān') to the Jordan, he probably gives political boundaries, excluding Decapolis (BJ iii. iii. 3), since (iv. vii. 3, 6) Gadara is called the capital of the Peræa. The name seems to have covered the ancient 'Land of Gilead,' what is now known as Jebel 'Ajlūn and el-Bekā. It is perhaps the most picturesque and beautiful part of Palestine. Rough mountain heights rise from the midst of wooded slopes, while rich fields stretch between; anon romantic vales break down into mighty gorges, where the sound of running water makes music all the year. The olive and vine flourish, and good harvests reward the husbandman's toil.

The removal of the Jews from the Peræa by Judas (1 Mac 5⁴) left it in Gentile hands. Later, the Jews resumed possession and control. Alexander Jannæus held sway from the Dead Sea to the roots of Hermon. Peræa was given as a tetrarchy to Pheroras, the brother of Herod (Ant. xv. x. 3, etc.), and later to Herod Antipas (xvii. viii. 1). From Peræa, Simon made his ill-starred raid upon Jericho (xvii. x. 6). It was part of the jurisdiction of Felix (BJ ii. xii. 8). Manassch was made governor after the disaster to Costius (ii. xx. 4). Placidus effected its final subjugation to the Romans (iv. vii. 3, 6). It was attached by the Moslems to the province of Damascus. Subsequently it was under Kerak.

The Mishna recognizes the Peræa—the land beyond Jordan—as a province of the land of Israel, ranking with Judæa and Galilee on the west. On the border of the Peræa probably Jesus was baptized. It was the scene of happy and profitable intercourse with His disciples (Mt 19¹ etc.). It furnished the retreat from Jewish enmity, whence He was summoned by the distress at Bethany (Jn 10⁴⁰ etc.). The most horrible story connected with the siege of Jerusalem is that of Mary, a native of the Peræa (BJ vi. iii. 4). In the Peræa to-day the Jew is represented only by the travelling tinsmith and the pedlar. Colonies of Circassians are turning the soil to good account, e.g. at Jerash. At es-Salt the natives pursue a profitable trade in raisins, while in the barryeh, the uncultivated parts, the nomads find good pasture for their flocks.

PERAZIM (Is 28²¹) prob. = Baal-perazim.

PERDITION.—The word is used several times in the NT in the ordinary sense of 'destruction,' with special reference to the destruction of the soul (Ph 1²⁵, 1 Ti 6⁹, He 10³⁹, 2 P 3⁷, Rev 17⁸ 11¹). It is found twice in the phrase sons of perdition—a Heb. expression denoting close connexion between product and producer (cf. 'sons of thunder,' 'sons of light,' etc.). In Jn 17¹² the phrase is applied to Judas Iscariot, while in 2 Th 2¹ it is used of the 'man of sin,' or Antichrist. In the latter context a great deal of discussion has centred round the meaning of the reference (see art. ANTICHRIST). It will suffice here to point out that the phrase in 2 Th 2¹, 'the son of perdition,' combined with certain passages in the Apocalypse

(ch. 13), points to a constant tradition in the Christian Church of the Apostolic Age, which appears, from the passages alluded to, to have conceived not of a foreign potentate alien to the Church, but rather of a false Messiah who should be 'sent to them that are perishing' (namely, the Jews), and was expected to make his appearance at Jerusalem. The phrase 'son of perdition' suggests not so much the power of destruction exerted upon those coming under the sphere of the evil influence, as the effect of wickedness upon the soul of the individual to whom the phrase in each case, is applied.

PERESH.—A 'son' of Machir (1 Ch 7¹⁶).

PEREZ.—Son of Judah and Tamar, and twin-brother of Zarah (Gn 38²⁹; in 1 Es 5⁴ Phares; patronymic Perezites, Nu 26²⁰). His importance consists in his being the ancestor of David through Boaz and Ruth, and then of Jesus Christ. His descendants were in all probability the most numerous among the families of Judah; hence the blessing of the elders on Boaz: 'Let thy house be like the house of Perez' (Ru 4¹²). According to Gn 46¹², Perez had two sons, Hezron and Hamul. From Hezron, according to 1 Ch 2, came Jerahmeel and Ram and Caleb, and through Ram was traced the line of the royal house of David. W. F. COBB.

PEREZITES.—See PEREZ.

PEREZ-UZZA (H).—See UZZA, 3.

PERFECTION.—The various Biblical terms connoting 'perfection' differ in shade of meaning between wholeness, the attaining of an end or ideal, complete adjustment, full equipment in fitness for an appointed task. They are sparingly applied to God; in OT His way, work, knowledge, law are 'perfect' (Ps 18³⁰, Dt 32⁴, Job 37¹⁸, Ps 19⁷); in NT the same term is used of His will, His gifts, His law (Ro 12², Ja 1⁷ 2⁵), while Christ describes the Father in heaven as 'perfect,' and therefore as the source and pattern of moral ideals (Mt 5⁴⁸). The sense in which perfection is attributed to or urged upon men must naturally vary according to the moral conceptions of the time.

1. In OT.—In the sharp moral contrasts which are presented in the successive kings of Judah, right doing and loyalty to Jehovah are expressed in the phrase 'a perfect heart' (e.g. 1 K 8⁶; cf. 1¹⁴ 15³ 5). It is clear from what is contrasted with the 'perfect heart'—idolatry, abominable sin—that the phrase has regard only to general tendencies of religious attitude and moral conduct, and its ethical depth is not perhaps greatly increased by the addition 'with the Lord his God,' for in the case of Amaziah a contrast is drawn between the two phrases; 'he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart' (2 Ch 25²). In a similar sense the term 'perfect' is applied to Noah, Abraham, and Job; its meaning is to be gathered from the synonyms which are linked with it—'righteous and perfect,' 'perfect and upright,' 'fearing God and eschewing evil' (Gn 6⁹ 17¹, Job 1¹ 2²; cf. Pr 2²¹ 11³). It is noteworthy that in a number of passages in RV 'perfect' has displaced AV 'upright,' with greater fidelity of translation but little difference of meaning (e.g. Ps 18²⁵ 26 10¹³ 37¹⁸).

2. In NT.—The idea of moral perfection is carried up to an immeasurably higher level by the saying of Christ—the climax of His contrast between evangelical and Pharisaic righteousness—'Ye therefore shall be (impræteritral future) perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸). This may be regarded as our Lord's re-statement of the OT law, 'Ye shall be holy: for I the Lord your God am holy' (Lv 19², cf. 11⁴⁰), but the immediate context of the two passages is sufficient to indicate the infinite difference between the old law and the new. Infinite, because in place of precepts of ritual purity there is now set up an absolute moral ideal in the perfect love of God.

PERFECTION

Moral conduct may indeed involve observance of prohibitions and positive commands, but the morality does not consist in the observance: it must come first, as the spring of action, and will issue in an obedience very different from that of the current ethical code. It is the disposition that counts: all duty springs from a love to God, working from within outward, seeking to realize itself in free and boundless aspiration after His perfection. Hence the characteristic 'thou shalt not' of the Jewish law, with its possibility of evasion under seeming compliance, gives place to a positive 'thou shalt' of limitless content, because inspired by a limitless ideal (Mt 5¹⁷⁻⁴⁸ 7¹² 12²¹ 23). When the man came to Christ with his eager question about 'eternal life,' though he could claim to have kept all the commandments from his youth, he is bidden, if he would be 'perfect,' strip himself of all worldly possessions and follow Christ; doubtless because only through such sacrifice could he come to discern and attain the moral realities revealed by simple dependence on God (Mt 19²¹; cf. Mk 10²¹⁻²² Lk 18¹⁸⁻²⁰). The similar question of the lawyer is met with the same teaching of love to God as the one source of that 'doing' in which is life Lk 10²⁵).

In the teaching of St. Paul the moral life of the Christian is often dwelt upon, and in some passages is summarized in glowing ideals (e.g. Ro 12, 1 Co 13, Gal 5²², Eph 3¹⁴⁻¹⁹, Ph 4⁸⁻⁹, Col 1²⁻³, 1 Th 5¹⁴⁻²²). Once the ideal is compressed into a phrase which reminds us of Mt 5⁴⁸, 'Be ye imitators of God' (Eph 5¹). There is constant insistence on love as the supreme source and manifestation of the moral life (Ro 12⁹⁻¹⁰, 1 Co 13); it is the bond which binds all other virtues into 'perfection' (Col 3¹⁴); the motive power is to be found in faith in Christ, and in the energies of the indwelling Spirit of God (Ro 8³, 2 Co 5⁷, Gal 5²²⁻²³, Eph 3³⁰).

But though St. Paul often uses the word 'perfect,' he hardly connects it with the attainment of the moral ideal in the sense of Mt 5⁴⁸. He avails himself of a meaning of the Greek term as applied to men, 'full-grown,' 'mature,' and uses it to mark advance from the earlier stage of Christian life and experience, at which, in contrast, he describes men as 'babes.' To his immature Corinthian converts he writes, 'we speak wisdom among the perfect'; complains, 'I could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, as unto babes in Christ'; and bids them 'be not children in mind; howbeit in malice be ye babes, but in mind be perfect' (1 Co 2⁶⁻⁷ 14²⁰). The same metaphor is used by the author of Hebrews (5¹¹⁻⁶), where 'perfect' and 'perfection' connote a Christian manhood which can receive and assimilate advanced Christian teaching. In the late Pauline Epistles the word implies a similar stress on intellectual maturity, possibly with a side glance at the technical meaning of 'fully initiated' into the Greek 'mysteries.' In protest against the Colossian gnosis, arrogated by a few, St. Paul, by unrestricted teaching of the whole gospel to every man, would present every man 'perfect in Christ' (Col 1²⁸ 4¹²). So, too, the attainment of the ideal corporate unity of all Christians is expressed in the phrase 'unto a perfect (i.e. full-grown) man' (Eph 4¹³). It is characteristic of St. Paul's thought that this unity exists (Eph 4¹³⁻¹⁴), yet is to be attained; similarly, without sense of contradiction, he can write of himself as 'perfect' (Ph 3¹⁰), and in the same context as not 'perfected' (3¹²).

The great Christian verifies themselves, and also their implication for the lives of all who believe, are conceived by him as equally real, yet his assertion of them is joined with an appeal for their realization (e.g. Ro 5¹²⁻²¹ 6¹⁻¹¹). The facts are there, whatever contradictions may seem to be given to them by the imperfect lives which, if indeed real, they might be supposed to fashion into more complete accord. It follows that he is able without misgiving to set before his converts so lofty an ideal of moral perfection as that contained in the passages already cited, the gulf between ideal and visible attainment being bridged by his faith in the spiritual forces at work (Ro 7²⁴⁻²⁵, 1 Co 1²⁻³, Eph 3³⁰, Ph 1²¹ 2¹³ 4¹³; cf. 1 P 1⁵). Any doctrine, therefore, of Christian 'perfection' must reckon at once with St. Paul's sense of its reality, and at the same time of the present difference between real and actual.

The idea of perfection appears also in Ja 1⁴, 'that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing' (cf. 3²). In Hebrews special stress is laid upon the 'perfecting' of Christ by His humiliation and suffering, not in moral excellence but in fitness for His work of redeeming man (2¹⁰ 5⁹ 7²⁶); through his sacrifice the 'perfection' unattainable under the old covenant (7¹¹⁻¹⁹ 9⁹) is secured for the believer (10¹⁴; cf. 11¹⁰ 12²³ 13²¹).

The idea of perfection in the sense of complete adjustment and equipment (from a different Gr. root) occurs in 1 Co 11², 2 Co 13¹¹, 2 Ti 3¹⁷.

PERFUMER.—The Oriental liking for odorous substances has always rendered the function of the perfumer an important one. The materials used in Bible times were gums, resins, roots, barks, leaves; and these were variously combined according to the skill and fancy of the perfumer. In Neh 3⁸ we read of a guild of perfumers. 'Perfumers' ought in every instance to be substituted for AV apothecaries as well as for confectionaries of 1 S 8¹³. Cf. art. APOTHECARY.

PERGA.—An inland city of Pamphylia about 12 miles from Attalia on the coast, but possessing a river harbour of its own on the Cestrus 5 miles away. Its walls date from the 3rd century B.C. It was the chief native city of Pamphylia, and never seems to have come much under Greek influence, but it had a coinage of its own from the 2nd cent. B.C. to A.D. 276. 'Artemis of Perga' was the chief object of worship, and she resembled 'Diana of the Ephesians' in her rites and images, being sometimes represented like the Greek Artemis goddess of the chase, but more often by a pillar of stone, the top of which was rounded or roughly carved to represent a head. Her worship was more Asiatic than Greek. Her temple probably possessed the right of sanctuary.

St. Paul passed through Perga twice on his first missionary journey. See PAMPHYLIA. But Christianity did not take root there easily. Perga is not mentioned in early martyrologies. When the Empire became Christian, it was the seat of a metropolitan bishop, but after the blow suffered by the Byzantine Empire at the battle of Manzikert, A.D. 1071, Perga seems to have fallen into the hands of the Turks. In A.D. 1084 we find Attalia made a metropolitan bishopric, and it is the only bishopric in Pamphylia now. The modern name of the site of Perga is Murlana.

A. E. HILLARD.

PERGAMUM, or PERGAMUS, was an ancient city of Mysia, the seat of an independent kingdom from about B.C. 280 to B.C. 133, and the capital of the Roman province of Asia from B.C. 133 until the 2nd cent. A.D. It lay in the Calvus valley about 15 miles from the sea, and its acropolis rose between two tributary streams 3 miles N. of the Calvus. As the capital of a kingdom, Pergamus had acquired a somewhat factitious importance. It stood on no great trade route, and under the Romans it slowly lost all but the official pre-eminence in the province. Its kings had been champions of Greek civilization and arts, and it still remained a centre of conservative culture. But Ephesus was now the centre of trade, and it was at Ephesus that West and East met together, creating a medley of all philosophies and all religions. At Pergamus there were splendid temples of Zeus and Athene, where these gods were worshipped in the ordinary Greek way, but others also of Dionysos and Asklepios.

The only allusion to Pergamus in the NT is in the Apocalypse, where (11¹ 2¹³) it is included among the seven churches of Asia. The message to it speaks of Pergamus as the place 'where Satan's seat is.' While it is possible that this refers to it as the chief seat of heathen worship in general, it is more probable that it refers to the worship of Rome and Augustus, participation in which had become a test of loyalty and therefore a frequent ground of Christian martyrdom. Christians would be brought to Pergamus for trial from any northern part of the province, and the mention of one martyr, Antipas, as having suffered there does not prove that he belonged to Pergamus. The Church at Pergamus is charged with having 'them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed into idols, and to commit fornication'; and also 'them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans.' We must gather from this that a definite section of the church at Pergamus maintained that, inasmuch as heathen ceremonies 'meant nothing' (cf. Co 8⁴ 10¹⁰), they were at liberty to join in idolatrous feasts, and thus to maintain their social position and justify their loyalty in the sight of the law. The allusion in 2¹⁷ to 'a white stone, and in the stone a new name written,' may be an allusion to a practice of keeping secret a new name taken at baptism in a place where it was dangerous to be known as a Christian. From its official and religious character there can be little doubt that Antipas was but one of many martyred at Pergamus.

Pergamus was the seat of a bishopric, but its subsequent history is obscure. It retains its name in the form Bergama. The German Government has been conducting excavations on the site since 1878, and in 1901 a Pergamon Museum was opened in Berlin. The name of Pergamus survives in the word 'parchment,' i.e. Pergamena. It is said that king Eumenes, the founder of the library, invented the use of this preparation of sheep-skin or goat-skin for the purposes of writing.

PERIDA.—A family of 'Solomon's servants,' Neh 7²⁷ —Ezr 2⁶⁶ Peruda, 1 Es 5³³ Pharida.

PERIZZITES.—According to the frequently recurring list of the Deuteronomistic editors, one of the pre-Israelitish nations of Palestine (cf. Ex 3⁸ 17 23²³ 33³ 34¹, Dt 20¹⁷, Jos 3¹⁰ 24¹¹). The Perizzites, however, do not appear anywhere definitely in the history. Because in Gn 15²⁰ and Jos 17¹⁶ they are mentioned with the Rephaim, some have inferred that they were one of the pre-Semitic tribes of Palestine. In the J document the Perizzites are three times mentioned with the Canaanites (Gn 13⁷ 34³⁰, Jg 1⁴). The name 'Perizzite' (in AV and RV of 1 Es 8², 2 Es 1², and AV of Jth 5¹⁸ Pherezite(s)) is in Hebrew almost identical with a word meaning 'dweller in an unvalled village,' hence Moore (on Jg 1⁴) has suggested that they were Canaanite agriculturists, living in unvalled towns, and not a separate tribe. This view is most probable.

PERJURY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 5.

PERSECUTION.—Jesus Christ frequently warned His disciples that persecution would be the lot of all who followed Him (Jn 15¹⁸ 20). So far from being dismayed at this, it should be a cause of rejoicing (Mt 5¹¹ 12). The early Church had not long to wait for the fulfilment of these words. The martyrdom of Stephen was the signal for a fierce outburst of persecution against the Christians of Jerusalem, by which they were scattered in all directions. Saul of Tarsus was the moving spirit in this matter, until, on his road to Damascus to proceed against the Christians there, 'Christ's foe became His soldier.' The conversion of Saul seems to have stayed the persecution. The attempt of Caligula to set up his statue in the Temple at Jerusalem also diverted the attention of the Jews from all else. Hence 'the churches had rest' (Ac 9³¹).

The next persecution was begun by Herod, who put to death the Apostle St. James, and would have done the same to St. Peter had he not been delivered. Herod's motive was probably to gain a cheap popularity, but the persecution was ended by his own sudden and terrible death.

After this the history of persecution becomes more the history of the sufferings of certain individuals, such as St. Paul, though passages in the Epistles show us that 'the spirit of persecution was alive even if the details of what took place are hidden from us (1 Th 2¹⁴, He 10³³ 34, 1 P 2¹⁹⁻²⁰). Finally, in the Revelation of St. John, the seer makes frequent reference to the persecution and martyrdom of the saints as the lot of the Church in all ages.

PERSIA, PERSIANS.—The Persians, when they appeared first in history, were the southern branch of the Iranians who had migrated, in the 10th or 9th cent. b.c., from the tableland of Turkestan westward and southward. They were for long subject to the more numerous and powerful northern branch (see Medes), from whom, however, they were separated by the country of Elam, through their settlement in the district later called Persis, east of the Persian Gulf. Southern Elam they acquired before b.c. 600. Their prince, Cyrus, the second of that name among the ruling family of the Achæmenides, threw off the Median yoke and deposed his sovereign Astyages in b.c. 550. In 545 the kingdom of Lydia fell to him by the capture of Sardis under its king Croesus. In 539 Babylon surrendered to his troops without fighting, after a two weeks' campaign, and became thenceforth one of the Persian capitals. Thus the Babylonian empire was added to the Medo-Persian. Cf. Is 13. 14. 21 (where in v. 6 'Elam' stands for Persia, into which it was incorporated; see above) 41. 44-47, Jer 50. 51.

Thus was founded the greatest W. Asian empire of antiquity, whose power, moreover, was upon the whole consistently employed for the protection of the subject peoples, including in the great satrapy 'beyond the River' the Hebrew community in Palestine which was re-established by the generosity of Cyrus himself (see Ezra and Neh. passim). Of the kings who succeeded Cyrus there are named in OT, Darius Hystaspis (b.c. 521-486), his son Xerxes (486-465, the 'Ahasuerus' of Esther), Artaxerxes I. (465-424). See these names in their alphabetic places. To them is possibly to be added Cambyses, son of Cyrus the Great, made king of Babylon in 538, and thus corresponding to the misnomer 'Darius the Mede' of Dn 6¹⁵ 9¹ 11¹.

PERSON OF CHRIST.—I. CHRISTOLOGY OF THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—In so brief an article as the present no attempt can be made to detail the stages in the self-revelation of Jesus, or to assign each partial disclosure to a fixed period. Nor is it possible to inquire critically how far the picture of Jesus in the Gospels has been coloured by later experiences of the Church. Accepting the substantial authenticity of the narrative, and of the view of Jesus' Person and teaching it embodies, we are led to examine chiefly the various significant titles in which His religious claim was expressed. But we must glance first of all at the human portrait drawn by the Evangelists.

1. Humanity of Jesus.—Everywhere in the Synoptics the true humanity of our Lord is taken seriously. His bodily and mental life are both represented as having undergone a natural development. He is hungry and athirst, capable of the keenest suffering, possessed of a soul and spirit which He yields up to God in death. Joy, sorrow, distress, peace, love, anger—every wholesome human emotion is felt by Him. He prays to God the Father, looking up to heaven habitually in lowly trust, for strength and guidance to do His appointed work. Out of the sinless impulse to use His powers in furthering and defending His own life there rose temptations, not merely at the outset but repeatedly later, which involved Him in a real conflict. He is pictured as sharing in the common secular beliefs of His age and country. Certainly He exhibits at times an extraordinary degree of penetration into the thoughts of men; but to speak of Him as omniscient, whether in regard to the past or the future, is simply to desert our sources (Mk 13³²). He asks questions to elicit information; He feels and expresses surprise; He looks to find fruit upon the fig-tree, and there is none. So far from being manifestations of omnipotence, His miracles are done through faith in the power of God, the gift of which is sought in prayer and acknowledged with thankfulness (Mk 7²⁴, Mt 14¹⁹). Finally, it is impossible not to feel that most theological attempts to vindicate for the Jesus of the Gospels a 'double consciousness' or 'double will'—the one human and limited, the other infinite and Divine—not merely destroy the unity of the impression He makes on us, but are really due to a tendency, devout but mistaken, to cast back upon those earthly years the glory of the risen Lord. This totally ignores the difference in Jesus' status which the uniform teaching of the NT considers to have been made by the Resurrection, while it also obscures the fact—indicative of the vast redeeming sacrifice of God—that the life of Jesus, the Son Incarnate, was a life in the flesh, a distinctly human phenomenon which moved within the normal lines of a human mind and will.

2. Messiah.—The first article in the creed of the Apostles is the Messiahship of the crucified and risen Jesus of Nazareth. Certain scholars have recently denied that our Lord claimed this title for Himself; but we may fairly say that on such terms the Gospel narrative becomes a chaos. The title Messiah ('Christ'), familiar to Jewish religion from Ps 2, denotes in general the anointed Head of the Kingdom of God, the new King of a redeemed people; and Jesus, retaining the outline of the traditional idea, infused into it a new spiritual meaning, which, as applied to Himself, signified that He was not a new Teacher or Lawgiver or even the Founder of a new faith, but the Bearer and Finisher of divinely wrought salvation. Full consciousness of His Messianic function must have come to Him not later than His baptism—the manner of its coming is for us inexplicable—and at that crisis a wonderful bestowal of the Spirit equipped Him with the knowledge and power demanded by this vocation. His self-avowal as Messiah was, however, marked by a singular reserve. It followed from His novel view of the Kingdom of God, as the spiritual reign of a Father over His children (no doubt in eschatological perspective), that His conception of His own Kingship also moved on novel lines. Hence the almost insurmountable difficulty of revealing Himself as the expected Deliverer without fanning into flame such political passions as would have made men deaf to His gospel. It is noticeable, therefore, that at Nazareth He announced Himself not as Messiah, but as a prophet (Lk 4¹⁸).

We are probably right in saying that St. Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16¹⁶) was the earliest point at which the Messianic dignity of Jesus became the explicit subject of conversation between the Master and the Twelve; this may be inferred with certainty from the wording of His question and the joy He evinced at the reply. He greets St. Peter's answer with extraordinary emotion, as seeing in it a proof that the men nearest to Him had gained a clear religious view of the meaning of His life; while He is able to check any secular anticipations they might also form by at once adding the prediction of His death. To the world at large, however, He first declared His Messiahship when arraigned before Caiaphas.

Our Lord's reply to the Baptist's message from prison (Mt 11².) gives us, perhaps, our clearest look at His own conception of the Messianic office. But it is to be observed that He did much more than modify the ancient idea ethically; He superseded it by unheard-of personal claims. 'Jesus was condemned by His heathen judge as a usurper of the throne, by the Jewish tribunal as One who pretended to such a dignity as had never been conceded even to the Messiah' (Dalman). He was all that the prophets had spoken, and much more. But although He put into the title an immensity of meaning which burst its real limits, and in a sense antiquated it, yet the historic name remains to teach that the hopes of men towards God have not been vain, and that it is through a personal Deliverer that God's redemption comes. Furthermore, while the idea of a suffering Messiah may not have been altogether unknown to Rabbinical theology, it was Jesus who first made it current spiritual coin. Brooding meditation on the Suffering Servant of Is 53 may well have revealed Him to Himself. It was in this mode—through the felt need and reality of saving vicarious sorrow—that the conception of Israel's Messiah was so glorified as to pass into that of the Redeemer of the world. But, even apart from this, a straight line can be drawn from the Messianic claim of Jesus to the later Christology of the Apostles. 'With the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah the closest possible connexion was established, for every devout Jew, between Jesus' message and His person, for it is in the Messiah's activity that God Himself comes to His people, and the Messiah who does God's work and sits at His right hand has a right to be worshipped' (Harnack).

3. Son of Man.—This title is used only by Jesus, and applied to Himself alone; the earliest mention of it in the Synoptic narrative being Mk 2¹⁰, 28. It is scarcely probable, as Dalman inclines to think, that Jesus employed it for the first time after St. Peter's confession; yet at least that crisis does mark an incipient understanding of its significance on the disciples' part. But it was only at His trial (Mk 14⁶²) that its meaning dawned on the general mind. Its absence from NT writings other than the Gospels (except Ac 7⁵⁶) is intelligible if we consider that ho huios tou anthrōpou is a phrase which, to any one but a Jew, would require too much explanation for convenience. The virtual disappearance of the title, however, proves conclusively that it was no invention of the primitive Christian Society.

In the Synoptics the name is found on Jesus' lips about 40 times. Various writers have noted that the passages where it occurs naturally divide into two groups, as they refer (a) to Jesus' work on earth, and particularly His passion, or (b) to the final glory of His Parousia. It is observable that the ratio of apocalyptic passages is greater in the closing than in the earlier sections of the narrative.

The ultimate source of the title is not a question of first-rate importance, and anyhow it is insoluble; but we are justified in regarding Dn 7¹³ as at all events its proximate source, since Jesus obviously refers to this passage in His self-avowal before the Sanhedrin. We must also be prepared to allow for the influence of Ps 8 and perhaps Ezk 2¹². Whether in Dn 7¹³ 'one like unto a son of man' denotes the ideal Israel or an idealized person, it is hard to say, but the exegetical probabilities are decidedly in favour of the former explanation. Later Jewish thought, however, read the passage in a Messianic sense; and in the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch (probably a.c. 98-64) the Son of Man is a supernatural person, pre-existent, and (perhaps) identified with the Isaianic Servant of the Lord. Nothing can be more likely than that Jesus was familiar with this circle of ideas; and in practically every case His use of the title is intelligible only if it denotes an individual. Recently the argument has been used that the distinction existing in Greek between 'man' and 'son of man' could not have been expressed in Aramaic, and that we are consequently debarred from supposing that by the expression Jesus meant more than simply 'man' as such; but Dalman, followed by Driver, has put forward convincing reasons for denying this. Hence we may reasonably assume both that Jesus called Himself 'the Son of Man,' and that He did so frequently.

In asking what Jesus meant by this self-designation, we ought to remember that a given expression may have one meaning for the speaker and another for his audience. Still, one or two things are clear. It is quite un-Biblical to interpret the title as equivalent to 'the idea of man' or 'the ideal man'; this conception is Hellenic rather than Jewish, and though it is embodied in the character of the Son of Man as realized in Jesus, it is not strictly present in the name. Again, the term was certainly not meant by Jesus as a dogmatic assertion of His true humanity; for of that no one was in doubt. What we judge to have really happened is this: taking the title freely as given in Dn 7, and possibly influenced by the Similitudes of Enoch or kindred ideas, Jesus began by using it to mean special or representative humanity as appointed to transcendent glory and dominion; but later He defined and enriched this meaning in a singular way by introducing the idea of suffering. On His lips, indeed, the name always had an educative aim. It was, as it were, a suggestive mystery, as much a problem as a disclosure. The title was traditional, yet it awaited final interpretation; and this Jesus gave by stamping on it the impress of Himself. Its educative value lay in this, that while in no sense can it be called a popular or transparent designation of the Messiah—otherwise Jesus' question in Mt 16¹³ is meaningless—it yet hinted Messiahship to those who cared to search deeper. Thus, breaking the bounds of the past, Jesus poured into the name a significance of His own, outstripping all previous Messianic ideals, as, e.g., when He claimed that the Son of Man had power on earth to forgive sins (Mt 9¹). It is a title which denotes the vocation rather than the nature of Him who bears it; and we are led to think that Jesus chose it deliberately in order to veil, for a time, His personal claim to Messiahship.

As used by our Lord, then, the name 'Son of Man' is intrinsically a paradox. It binds Jesus to humanity, yet singles Him out from other men. It predicates of Him alike supramundane glory and earthly humiliation. It unites in itself the contrast of anticipation and reality, of the future and the present. Yet this seeming contradiction, far from being fatal to the internal coherence of the idea, is really constitutive of it. It is just through present suffering and indignity that He who is to be Saviour and Judge passes to His Kingdom. 'The "Son of Man," in the mature mind of Jesus, is the Person who unites a career of utmost service and suffering with a sure prospect of transcendent glory. And herein we touch at once the depth and height of His originality' (Muirhead). He trained the disciples to grasp this novel view of what it meant to be Messiah; and when they at last understood Him, what their minds dwelt on, and held fast, as indicated by the title so interpreted, was not the Divine origin of Jesus; it was rather His Divine calling and the Divine destiny that awaited Him. For them 'Son of Man' pointed to the future more than to the past.

4. Son of God.—There are several occasions in the Synoptic narrative on which this title is addressed to Jesus—e.g. by the possessed (Mk 3¹¹), by unbelieving Jews (Mt 27⁴⁰), by the centurion (Mk 15³⁹), and constructively by Caiaphas (Mt 26⁶³)—where it cannot have anything like its full significance for a Christian mind. It is at most only a synonym of Messiah. Even when at the Baptism a Divine voice hails Him as God's beloved Son, the words denote simply His definitive consecration to the Messianic office, as is shown by the clear echo of Ps 2⁷. In the OT, we should note, the title 'Son of God' is applied to the chosen people, to the theocratic king who rules and represents it, and to the perfect King who is to come. The outer side of this relation to God consisted in the possession of His power and glory; the inner side was the enjoyment of His love as its chosen object.

It was on the inner side of this relation that the mind of Jesus dwelt. In the Synoptic records He does not

Himself as: the full title 'Son of God'; probably because it was too familiar as a designation of the Messiah. But there are indications that the name which He chose to express His own view of His Person is simply 'the Son.' Not only does this form occur in three important passages (Mt 11²⁷, Mk 13³², and possibly Mt 28¹⁹), certain pieces of indirect evidence also bear on the point, such as His veiled reference to His Sonship in the parable of the Vineyard, His question to St. Peter as to the taxing of kings' sons, and His conversation with the scribes about David's Son and David's Lord. Much more significant, however, is His habit of naming God 'my Father' (Mt 7²¹ 10³² 12⁵⁰ etc. and ||), a phrase which, beyond all serious doubt, puts His relation to God in a place distinctly by itself. St. Luke represents the dawning consciousness of this unique Sonship as already present at the age of twelve (24⁹).

The classical passage bearing on this point is Mt 11²⁷: 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' Here we ought to note distinctly the unqualified assertion that the mutual relation existing between Father and Son is a perfect one. Not only is the Father's nature open to Jesus, without that sense of mystery of which prophets and saints have always been conscious, not only is the knowledge which Jesus has of God complete, final, and unattainable by others except as mediated through Him; but in like manner Jesus' nature is open to the Father, and to Him alone. He stands to God in a relation of intimacy such as no other can share, since even those who become the sons of God through Him are sons only in a secondary and derivative sense. God and Jesus belong together in a fashion transcending man's intelligence; their personal life is one; and it is constituted by a reciprocal fellowship in which Fatherhood and Sonship are uniquely perfect. This is not merely a new idea; the new idea is the expression of a new fact.

What has been said is enough to cast some doubt on the correctness of Harnack's finding. 'The consciousness,' he writes, 'which Jesus possessed of being the Son of God is, therefore, nothing but the practical consequence of knowing God as the Father and as His Father. Rightly understood, the name of Son means nothing but the knowledge of God' (What is Christianity? p. 131). But we are not justified in confining the relation of Sonship to the sphere of special knowledge; a unity which is nothing if not personal is not thus to be lowered to the plane of mere cognition. We are aware that there was a time when our knowledge began to be; but Jesus' filial relation to God, so far at least as His own words suggest, had no beginning, none at all events of which He was conscious. In Dalman's words, it seems 'to be naturally bound up with His person; for, in distinction from every one else, just as it is by birth that a son becomes heir, so the prospect of universal rule and the possession of immediate knowledge of God were His.' For Jesus' mind, as we can study it in the Synoptics, the secret and origin of His own Person lay hid in God's creative love. So far, alike in His self-disclosure and in the estimate of disciples, we have no sign of a strict doctrine of incarnation or of two natures united in one person; what we do have is the subduing delineation of One who, in virtue of a career of patient service and of suffering unto death, is the perfect Revealer of God and the destined Ruler of the world. But it is made undeniably plain that His Sonship lifts Him out of the context of sinful humanity, and puts Him in a relation to God which cannot be fully interpreted by any of the general categories of human life. By calling Himself 'Son' He describes what He is for God; but He does so without giving any explanation of it, or explicitly following it backwards or forwards in its eternal relations. Not that these relations are thereby denied, or made of no account in the interpretation of the name. All that the Apostles say of the pre-existing glory of Christ with God, or of creation as mediated through His agency, takes a place quite naturally as part of its implicit content. But at first Jesus used the name to convey simply His perfectly filial human consciousness, as filled, or rather constituted, by personal fellowship and ethical solidarity with God.

This conscious Sonship is for Jesus the supreme reality; and in the light of it He recognized from the first with perfect clearness the work God had given Him to do. It was not that He knew Himself to be Messiah, and rose from this to the certainty that God was His Father; the connexion of the two facts is just the reverse. He is Son of Man, and Head of the Kingdom of God, because of the still deeper consciousness that He is Son of God. The roots of His vocation are in the uniqueness of His Person. Yet in the last resort we cannot separate these two aspects. The loftier in the scale of being a human character stands, the more entirely personality and vocation coincide; and in the case of Jesus Christ the coincidence was absolute.

5. Self-assertion of Jesus.—Apart from specific and, as it were, technical modes of self-designation, the Synoptics picture Jesus as in many ways assuming an attitude to God and men which is scarcely intelligible except upon a positive view of His higher being. A whole series of features point in the direction of the more developed Christology of the Apostles. He who could speak of Himself as meek and lowly of heart exhibits also an unparalleled loftiness and majesty of bearing. His disciples, the crowd at Nazareth, and the possessed are alike conscious of this singular elevation. The personal trust and allegiance which He never scrupled to ask from men, putting even natural affection in the second place, is yielded almost instinctively. Nor does the source of the impression thus produced lie in His miracles; it lies in the feeling of His supreme authority. He spoke uniformly in the tones of One who had the keys of the Kingdom of heaven, and with whom it rested to declare the conditions of entrance. He put aside the ancient ordinances of the Law. He called all the weary to Himself for rest; most amazing of all, He claimed the power to forgive sin, and actually bestowed forgiveness on the sick of the palsy and the dying malefactor. His entire demeanour makes the impression of perfect acquaintance with the mind of God—His thoughts towards men, His hearing of prayer, the grounds of His condemnation and His pardon. With apparently not a single interval of doubt, He knew Himself to be the chosen One of God, by whose presence the powers of evil were already vanquished, who should redeem many by His death, who should rise from the dead and come hereafter with Divine power as the Judge of the world. It gradually became clear to the disciples that no comparison was really possible between Jesus and the great figures of the OT. No prophet had ever called upon men to confess his name; no prophet had declared that the relation of men to him would decide their final destiny; no prophet had ever said: 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father.' But Jesus repeatedly puts Himself forward as the object of saving faith, and gives to those who trust Him the sovereign promise that, as they gather in His name, He will be present in their midst. These are features of the Synoptic portraiture of Jesus which it is impossible to eliminate; and while they do not amount to a doctrine of His Person, they insist on doctrinal interpretation. In view of such things it is futile to say blankly, with Bousset, that Jesus simply places Himself at the side of ordinary humanity, and reserves for Himself only the distinction of a unique vocation. On the contrary, even in the first three Gospels the Person of Jesus has factors of mystery in it which lead the mind towards the Apostolic doctrine of His transcendent relation to God.

✓ 6. Sinlessness of Jesus.—The NT belief in the sinlessness of Jesus, which we may suitably consider at this point, is not really an a priori dogma—though as Lamb of God He was viewed as being necessarily without spot or blemish; it is a conclusion drawn from convincing facts at which we have a clear look in the Synoptics. Nor, on the other hand, is it quite accurate to say that the NT bids us regard the sinlessness of Jesus as something which only a believer can grasp or assent to, and which, from the nature of the case, cannot be established historically. As against this, there is great force in Dr. Forrest's argument (Authority of Christ, p. 22ff.), that even as historians, and irrespectively of any judgment of faith, we are bound to accept the Apostolic interpretation of the facts, since 'the facts concerning Him must have been such as to sanction and necessitate the interpretation.'

The Synoptic Gospels, it is true, contain no express claim on Jesus' part to be sinless; certainly nothing so strong as Jn 8⁴. Yet we find traits in His demeanour which reveal His self-consciousness more plainly than even words could do. He called men to repentance; He condemned the 'righteous' unsparingly; He predicted that He should one day judge the world; He urged confession upon His disciples, and put the Lord's Prayer upon their lips; yet He Himself never uttered the cry of the burdened conscience, never spoke one word of contrition. We do not need to defend Him against the charge of harsh judgment (Mt 12³⁴), or a lack of family affection (v. 48), or an excess of passion (21¹²); these, surely, are intelligible manifestations of fidelity to His Messianic task, and it has been fitly said that their final justification is that such a one as He should have done such things without any subsequent regret. The really decisive fact is that in the mature mind of Jesus there is no trace of old defeats, no memories of weakness overcome, no healed scars. It may be said, indeed, that one may be sinful without being conscious of it, but the familiar distinction is inapposite; for the moral pain of Jesus' answer to Peter's suggestion (Mt 16²²) proves with what infinite sensitiveness He felt the movings of sin in another, so that He could not have been unconscious of its presence in Himself. Besides, in view of His duty to remove a mistaken impression on such a point, His silence, were He aware of the slightest imperfection in His own nature, would have been an added hypocrisy. Finally, on every page of the Evangelists we read demands for perfect obedience, as well as promises of grace and help, which it would have been an enormity for a sinful man to utter. From these facts the only permissible conclusion is that Jesus had no experimental, interior knowledge of moral evil. Nor may His participation in the baptism of John be urged against this; for that was 'a great act of loving communion with our misery,' in which He identified Himself with sinful men, and took all their burdens and responsibilities as His own (cf. Denney, Death of Christ, p. 21). His repudiation of the epithet 'good' (Mk 10¹⁸) has perplexed many, and must certainly not be explained away; but, in the first place, it is surely obvious that Jesus meant very much what the writer to the Hebrews means by the words (5¹): 'He learned obedience by the things that he suffered.' He was being made perfect from the outset to the end; and we see now that to attribute to Him the eternal, changeless perfection of God Himself would be to forget the ethical conditions of incarnation. And, in the second place, should we have thought more highly of one who calmly accepted the facile word of praise? Are not even we pained by careless eulogy?

Many recent writers, in view of the apparently negative character of the term 'sinlessness,' have preferred to predicate of Jesus absolute fidelity to His vocation. And it is true not merely that this conception brings out a fact of the utmost significance, but that several NT passages which are commonly adduced as proofs of our Lord's sinlessness (e.g. 1 P 2²¹, Ph 2⁷, 1 Jn 3⁴) may more suitably be referred to the other category. Yet the idea of sinlessness is not one with which we can dispense. We need some term which will include, not merely Jesus' actual fulfilment of His Divine commission, but the ebb and flow of His inner, spiritual life and the sinless development of the early years. It is true that such a sinless development is incomprehensible to us. To ethical psychology it remains an undecipherable mystery. All we can say is that it is because no one ever so felt His utter dependence upon God, and hence knew how much in God He had to depend upon, that, from first to last, Jesus kept His holiness pure (cf. Du Bose, Gospel in the Gospels, ch. 13). When we think out the idea of sinlessness, however, and consider how adult manhood rises with organic continuity out of childhood and infancy, we can hardly escape the inference that Jesus' sinless life had from the first a different personal content from ours. The theological expression for this would then be, that in His case Divinity was the basis and condition of perfect humanity.

7. Virgin-birth.—In the Gospels of Matthew and Luke the Divine Sonship of Jesus is viewed as being mediated in part by the bestowal of the Spirit at His baptism, in part by the supernatural character of His conception. Weight may justly be laid on the fact that both Evangelists, divergent as their narratives of the conception are in certain points, agree in affirming the special action of the Holy Ghost. On the other hand, no reference to the Virgin-birth is to be found elsewhere in the NT. It is not present in Gal 4⁴ or Ro 1³; and few would say with Westcott that the fact of the miraculous conception, though not stated, is necessarily implied in Jn 1⁴. This silence might, indeed, have led men to ask whether any statement on the subject ought in wisdom to form part of the Creed; and yet again, it would be a mistake to overstrain the argumentum e silentio. The very fact that the eternal Divinity of Christ could thus be held and interpreted without recourse to the idea of virgin-birth proves that that idea did not arise as a psychologically inevitable religious postulate, and may therefore claim to have genuine tradition behind it. The present writer can only say that to him supernatural conception appears a really befitting and credible preface to a life which was crowned by resurrection from the dead. That an abnormal fact in the sphere of nature should answer to the transcendent spiritual element in the Person of Christ is both a Scriptural and a profoundly philosophical thought. Nevertheless, the Christian faith of many will always shrink from the assertion that virgin-birth is a sine qua non of real incarnation, or that, in any ultimate sense, it explains the wonder and glory of Jesus' Person.

II. PRIMITIVE APOSTOLIC DOCTRINE.—As representing this stage of thought, we may take, with some caution, the discourses of St. Peter in Acts, checking our results later by comparison with his First Epistle.

1. St. Peter's discourses in Acts.—The Christology of these discourses is, on the whole, extremely simple. It would have been strange, indeed, had the Apostolic mind come to understand the Person of Christ otherwise than gradually. The words 'Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs' (Ac 2²²), are the earliest Petrine description of Jesus, and the rudimentary nature of the suggested doctrine is characteristic. A parallel to this is the later verse, from the sermon in Cornelius' house: 'God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power: who went about doing good, . . . for God was with him' (10³⁸). The gist of St. Peter's gospel is that this Jesus is the promised Messiah, attested as such by wonderful works, resurrection, and ascension to glory (22³⁴⁻³⁵). Hence the name 'Jesus Christ' now appears: 'Christ,' when it occurs by itself, being an official, not yet a personal title. The ministry of Jesus as teacher is scarcely referred to, except in 10³⁸. But His death, as Divinely ordained and foreknown, and above all His deliverance from death, with the exaltation which followed, are the themes to which the speaker perpetually recurs.

A tendency has been shown, in view of the fact that Jesus is thus described as 'anointed with the Holy Spirit,' as 'the holy one and the just' (3¹⁴), and as a great prophet (3²²), to infer that the primitive Church held a merely humanitarian view of His Person. We have already conceded, or rather asserted, that the doctrine is rudimentary. Specially deserving of note is the eschatological light in which the whole is viewed—Jesus being represented as gone meanwhile into heaven, thus affording the Jews time for repentance, upon which will ensue His return to a restored creation (3¹⁹⁻²¹). All is as yet within the limits of nationalistic Messianism. Yet when we look more closely there are clear indications of another kind. Jesus has been exalted to the right hand of God, and made Lord of all things; He is the giver of the Holy Spirit (2³³); He knows the hearts of all men (1²⁴); He is the Judge of quick and dead (10⁴²). He is set forth quite definitely as the theme of the gospel and the object of faith, from whom repentance and forgiveness come. Prayer is freely offered to Him (1²⁴ 7⁵⁹). Again and again His name, i.e. He Himself as revealed and known, is proclaimed as the only medium of salvation (2³⁸ 3¹⁶ 4¹² 10⁴³). Hence, while no attempt has yet been made to define His Person, the attitude of believers to Him is quite clearly one of faith and worship. We can scarcely overestimate the significance for Jews of this ascription of universal Lordship to One with whom they had eaten and drunk, and of whose death they had been witnesses.

2. The First Epistle of St. Peter.—The interest of this Epistle lies rather in soteriology than in the doctrine of Christ's Person. The sufferings of the Cross are viewed as having been predestined by God and foretold by prophets, and, in connexion with the atonement accomplished thereby, the sinlessness of Jesus as sacrificial victim is insisted on (1 P 1¹⁹). One significant fact indicating the writer's favourite view of the Saviour's Person, is that, whereas the name 'Jesus' is nowhere used by itself, 'Christ' has become a proper name; and it is natural to interpret this change as 'due to the fact that the person of Jesus is contemplated by the Christian exclusively in His specific quality as Mediator of salvation' (Weiss). It is a disputed point whether 1¹¹ in which the Spirit of Christ is said to have been present in the prophets, and 1²⁰ which represents Him as foreknown before the foundation of the world, do or do not imply His real pre-existence. The arguments on either side are given in the commentaries; the present writer can only say briefly that the language of 1¹¹ appears to him to be satisfied if we take it to mean that the Divine Spirit, now so entirely bound up with Christ that it can be called His Spirit, was previously active in the prophets; while the words 'foreknown before the foundation of the world' no more necessarily involve the personal pre-existence of Christ than the words 'He chose us in him before the foundation of the world' (Eph 1⁴) demand a similar conclusion as to believers. Thus foreknown and predicted, then, Christ has been manifested at the end of the times for our sakes. In His incarnate Person 'flesh' and 'spirit' are to be distinguished (3¹⁸); and a careful investigation proves that by 'spirit' is meant the Divine principle in a potency higher than that in which it dwells in man, and possessed, for that reason, of an inherent and indestructible energy of life. In Ac 2²⁴ the ground of Jesus' resurrection is determined by prophecy; here the further step is taken of referring it to the power of life that was in Him through the union of the Spirit which constituted Him Messiah. We need not pause at present on the enigma of the descent to Hades (3¹⁹ 4⁶); is it connected with Eph 4⁹ and 1 Ti 3¹⁰?, the clue to which has been lost; but at all events the writer means it as an illustration of the victorious and unparalleled powers of life that dwell in Christ even prior to His resurrection, as well as of the wonderful redemptive efficacy of His death.

The Christology of 1 Peter is thus seen to be slightly more full and elaborate than that of the early chapters of Acts; but its primitive character cannot be mistaken. Still, there are distinct tokens of the specifically Christian estimate of Jesus' Person. Thus, the Spirit of God is named 'the Spirit of Christ' (1st); and although the title 'Son of God' is not employed, we find in 1st the full-toned phrase 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' with a clear implication of His special Sonship. The statement (3rd) that angels and authorities and powers are subject to Him is a declaration not merely of His exalted state, but of His participation in the Divine power, whose instruments angels are. The doxology in 4th—equivalent to that applied to God in 5th—is most naturally interpreted of Christ; and in 3rd a phrase which in Is 8th refers to Jehovah is used of our Lord expressly.

III. CHRISTOLOGY OF ST. PAUL.—The field of inquiry for the purposes of this article will include not only the four great Epistles of the earlier period (Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., and Gal.), but also the Epistles of the Imprisonment. We shall use them with equal confidence, although now and then it may be necessary to mark a difference of accent in the later Epistles. But if, as appears to be the case, Ro 9th contains a definite affirmation of the Godhead of Christ, we should have to treat with suspicion theories which imply that the Christology of Phil. and Col. is conspicuously higher than what preceded.

Much interest attaches to the question of the genesis of St. Paul's view of Christ. Holsten, following the lead of F. C. Baur, argued for many years that the Apostle's Christology took shape purely as the result of a logical process in his mind. Faced by the death upon the cross, as an event in which he felt the will of God for man's salvation to be revealed, St. Paul yielded to what was really an intellectual compulsion to abandon the Jewish theology which he had been taught, and to substitute for it the conception of Jesus Christ we are familiar with in his writings. Others have held more recently that Saul the Pharisee was already in possession of a complex of ideas as to a superhuman Messiah—conceived as revealer of God and heavenly King—which owed much to mythical elements drawn from Oriental faiths; and that the subjective experiences of his conversion led him simply to identify the Jesus whom he seemed to behold in Divine glory with this antecedent notion of Messiah, and in consequence to assert such things of Him as that He existed before the world and shared in its creation. Hence we may infer the Christ of St. Paul has nothing particular to do with the Jesus of history (Brückner). To make but one criticism, both these related theories manifestly presuppose that St. Paul's vision of Christ on the way to Damascus had no objective reality. But if we find it an incredible supposition that a mere illusory process in the Apostle's fancy should have instantly revolutionized his life, or that he could have persuaded the primitive Christian society to accept, or even tolerate, a view of Christ so engendered, we shall naturally seek for some more solid basis and justification of his beliefs. And this, with the utmost certainty, we find in his actual relations to the glorified Lord, not merely at his conversion, though most memorably then, but also in his personal life as believer and Apostle. 'It is this feature, its being borrowed from his own religious experience, that distinguishes Paul's idea of Christ from a philosophical conception' (Somerville).

The system of St. Paul's thought is entirely Christocentric; not only so, his conception of Christ is entirely soteriological. From the saving efficacy of the death of Christ, as the fundamental certainty, he moves on to an interpretation of the Divine-human personality. He who died for all must stand in a unique relation to mankind. The work and the Person always go together in his mind. His creed in its simplest form is that 'Jesus is Lord' (1 Co 12th, Ro 10th; cf. Ph 2nd); and although starting, like the other writers of the NT, from the belief that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, he at once transcends the current Messianic idea, and grasps the significance of Jesus, not for the Jews only, but for the whole world. Nowhere does he employ the title 'Son of Man,' and for him the 'Kingdom of God' is virtually merged in the Person of Jesus Christ.

1. It may be taken as certain that St. Paul was acquainted with the Evangelical tradition as to Jesus' earthly life. He appeals to the words of the Lord as of supreme authority. Yet no allusion is made to His miracles or to His ways and habits among men. His human birth, His sinlessness, His institution of the Holy Supper, His death by crucifixion and His resurrection on the third day—these and a few more details are reported. The truth is that St. Paul's mind dwelt chiefly on the decisive acts of redemption, and the blessings won thereby; hence it is not surprising that he should say little or nothing as to Jesus' human development. At the same time the real humanity of our Lord is to him an axiom. Jesus was made of a woman, of the seed of David according to the flesh. There is nothing inconsistent with this in the remarkable expression (Ro 8th) that God sent His own Son 'in the likeness of sinful flesh'; which simply means that the sinful flesh of man is the pattern on which Christ's sinless (2 Co 5th) flesh was formed; in Him alone we see the flesh in perfect relation to the spirit. Moreover, human nature, as He wore it on earth, was a form of being intrinsically and unavoidably inadequate to His true essence. Originally He belonged to a higher world, and left it by a voluntary act; indeed, on the whole, it may be said that what St. Paul puts in place of a full-drawn picture of Jesus' earthly activities is the great act of the Incarnation. The fact that He should have lived as man at all is more wonderful than any of His words or deeds.

2. In addition to a body of flesh and blood, the unique constitution of Jesus' Person included spirit, 'the spirit of holiness' (Ro 1st, on which cf. Denney's note in EGT), which completely dominated His nature, and was not merely the power energizing in His life in the flesh, but the active principle of His resurrection from the dead. To this spiritual being St. Paul would probably have referred for an ultimate explanation of what he meant by Christ's pre-existence.

3. The main reason for St. Paul's comparative silence as to Jesus' earthly career is that the Person with whom he was directly in relation, habitually and from the first, was the risen Lord of glory. This is the starting-point of his Christology, and it determines it to the last. The attitude is no doubt common to the NT writers, but it has been accentuated in St. Paul's case by his singular history, and his passionate faculty of faith. All redeeming influences, whether they concern the individual or the world, and bear on sin or death or principalities or powers, flow directly from the risen Christ. This pre-occupation with Christ as glorified is expressed forcibly in 2 Co 5th, 'Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more.' The present majesty of the Lord is something other and better than the earthly life now past. Yet again—the counter-stroke always follows—the Exalted One is also the Crucified, who has in Him for ever and ever the redemptorial efficacy of His death.

We can hardly put the fact too strongly, that for St. Paul's mind it was after the Resurrection that the manifested Being of Christ took on its full greatness. The classical passage on this is Ro 1st: 'appointed (or declared) Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead.' The implication is that Divine power, acting through the medium of the Resurrection, set Christ free from the limitations of life on earth, limitations which had permitted to His Divine Sonship only a reduced and depotentiated expression here. In His exaltation that Sonship is displayed fully. With this we may compare Ph 2nd and Ro 14th the latter being a somewhat remarkable statement. 'For to this end Christ died, and lived again, that he might be Lord of both the dead and the living.' In these and all parallel passages the two ideas are combined: first, that Christ has ascended up to be Lord of the world, assuming this place for the first time at the Resurrection, and still retaining His humanity; secondly, that there was in Him from the beginning chat which fully qualified Him for this transcendent glory.

It is rewarding to pause for a moment upon this concrete, working conception of Jesus Christ as it inspired the Apostle's heroic life. The Redeemer is to him a Divine Being, clad for ever, as on the way to Damascus, in the glorious radiance which is the mark of Deity. He has reached a position from which He can make effectual the reconciling and redemptive work achieved in His passion. He is more than Head of the Church; He is omnipotent in the fullest sense. God has set Him far above all rule and authority and power and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come (Eph 1²¹). Vast as His glory is, He has not yet come to His full triumph; for it is God's purpose yet to sum up all things in Christ, the things in heaven and the things on earth (v. 19). His sway will culminate in His advent at the last. And this royal Lord is not far off, inaccessibly high above believers, but rather within and beside them always, to guide, warn, inspire, comfort with infinite might and love; so that St. Paul could speak of himself as being in Christ, of his life as being not his own, but the life of Christ living in him, and could pray for his converts that Christ might dwell in their hearts by faith (Gal 2²⁰, Eph 3¹⁷). Were our subject the personal religion of the Apostle, much more would have to be said as to his immediate certainty of Christ as alike dwelling in and embracing our spiritual life—the ideas of 'Christ in us' and 'we in him' alternate—but here it must suffice to have noted this profound and ever-present mystical note. The passage about the thorn in the flesh (2 Co 12) shows us the reverential fellowship in which St. Paul lived with the risen Lord, and the natural spontaneity with which he prayed to Him.

What are the Apostle's reasons for giving Christ this Divine place? (a) The first is the relation which He sustains to humanity as Redeemer, and which is indicated by the title 'Second Adam.' As Adam was head, representative, and type of the race that derived from him, so Christ by death and resurrection is Head and Representative of a new, redeemed humanity (Ro 5). For human development has these two stages, the earthly or carnal and the spiritual. Now 'the one element in the conception of Christ that ruled the thoughts of the Apostle was that of Spirituality' (Somerville). The spirit of holiness is the inmost and deepest reality of His own life, and of the life that emanates from Him; He is the organic Head of a new spiritual creation, and, as such, mediates to men the renewing grace of God.

Many scholars, not altogether unnaturally, hold that St. Paul borrowed this turn of thought from the Jewish-Hellenic conception of a pre-existent heavenly Man, the archetypal model of man's creation, and that he accordingly conceived Christ as having existed as Man in heaven prior to His being incarnate. Certainly we can perceive that the Apostle was acquainted with these ideas. Nevertheless, no decisive proof can be given that he allowed them to exercise any particular influence on his view of Christ. At all events, this is true of the parallel he draws between Adam and Christ in Ro 5^{12ff}; and in the passage in which this 'Heavenly Man' theory has its chief support, 1 Co 15⁴⁶⁻⁴⁷, two points may be noted which lessen the probability of Alexandrian descent—first, that the Heavenly Man, for whom Philo's designation is the 'First Man,' is by St. Paul called the 'Second Man'; secondly, that the important concluding phrase 'the second man is from heaven,' is referred by many of the best exegeses to the glorified Lord, the sense being that at His resurrection Christ became the life-giving head of a new race. It is all but incredible that this 'Heavenly Man' idea, which can only be proved to exist in one chapter of one Epistle, really was the fons et origo of the Apostle's Christology; and in any case it is out of keeping with his undoubted ascription of personal Divinity to Jesus. On the other hand, it was eminently natural that Jewish theology should often supply the framework of his argument, or supply him with terms by which to give expression to truths springing directly from his faith in Christ. That faith, we have seen, grasps Jesus Christ as Redeemer of the world, and thereafter proceeds to view Him reflectively as sustaining a unique relation to God and to mankind.

(b) St. Paul's second reason for placing Christ so high is that he believes Him to have been Son of God originally, in a heavenly life prior to incarnation. The incidental fashion in which allusion is made to this fact, as to something familiar to all Christians, is very impressive. As to specific passages, we may not be able to lay very much weight on the expression: 'God sent forth his Son' (Gal 4), for it might conceivably be used of one who came into the world simply with the commission of a prophet. But the underlying idea becomes plainer in 1 Co 10⁴, which affirms that the rock which followed the fathers in the desert, and from which they drank, was Christ; in other words, He is represented as having personally intervened in OT history. And no doubt at all is possible as to 2 Co 8⁹: 'Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, for your sake he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich,' where it is unmistakably asserted not only that His life on earth was less glorious than His life in heaven, but—a yet more sublime idea—that His entrance upon the lower estate of being was a voluntary act. Real pre-existence, i.e. independent and self-conscious life, is even more deliberately affirmed in the great passage Ph 2⁵⁻¹¹. Here it is stated—and the entire appeal hinges on the statement—that before He came as man Christ was in possession of a Divine form of being, and spontaneously renounced it to assume the form of a servant. Without permitting himself to speculate as to the transcendent relations of the pre-existent Christ to God, St. Paul clearly pictures Him as enjoying, in that prior life, the same kind of being as God enjoys. And the ethical motif of the passage is the great conception that while it was open to Christ so to use the infinite powers inherent in His Divine nature as to compel men, without more ado, to worship Him as God, He resolved to reach this high dignity—of Lordship recognized and adored—by the path of humiliation, suffering, and death. But while we are justified in saying that Jesus was constituted Lord by His exaltation, and that this was in some sense the reward of His self-emptying, we must avoid every kind of language which suggests that to St. Paul the ascension of Christ was a deification. To a Jew the idea that a man might come to be God would have been an intolerable blasphemy. 'It is to be noted that the increased glory which St. Paul and all the NT writers regard as pertaining to Christ after His resurrection has only to do with His dignity, His "theocratic position," not with His essential personality. He has simply become in actuality that which He already was substantially' (Kennedy).

4. In view of all this, it is not surprising that the Apostle should ascribe to Christ a part in the creating of the world and an original relation to man. This comes out especially in the Epistles of the Imprisonment, notably in Col 1¹³⁻¹⁸, of which Lightfoot gives the following luminous paraphrase:

'The Son of the Father's love, in whom we have our redemption, is the image of the invisible God, the first-begotten of all creation. For in Him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible; all things have been created through Him and unto Him; and He is before all things, and in Him all things consist. This is He who is the Head of the Body, the Church. In both spheres, the natural and the spiritual, He has the pre-eminence.'

The chief predications which are made here should be noted: (1) Christ is the instrument of creation; (2) He sustains all; (3) all moves on to Him as goal. The words 'in him were all things created' ought to be taken in correlation to these other clauses, 'in him all things consist,' and 'he is the head of the body, the church'; and when we take them so, they assert that Christ was appointed by God Creator of all things qua the Person in whom the world, through the work of reconciliation, now finds its organic centre. His function as Creator is proleptically viewed as conditioned by His subsequent work as Redeemer; but the expression of the thought is rendered well nigh impossible by the mysterious relations of eternity and time. Just as even in his conception of the pre-existent One, St. Paul never loses sight of the crucified and risen Saviour, neither can he think of Christ as Creator and Sustainer of the world except as he mediates the idea to his own mind through the present certainty of Christ the Redeemer. In a word, the Creatorship of Christ is never dwelt upon for its own sake, but always in relation to His Saviourhood. It is strikingly so in a verse which in various ways forms a parallel to the verses just commented on, 1 Co 8⁶: 'To us there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we unto him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him.' Here the ideas of creation and redemption are held and envisaged together, redemption being the experimental idea from which the mind starts, as it also is the exalted Lord who is the subject of predication. It is a noteworthy fact that the risen Christ should thus be bracketed with God the Father in a verse which actually insists on monotheism.

On the other hand, one of the most baffling problems of NT theology is just the fact that St. Paul should combine with these plain assertions of Christ's Divinity a number of statements of a different complexion. No candid exegete will deny that over and over again Christ is somehow given a place inferior to God, His entire redeeming work and position being traced back directly to the Father. We have such expressions as 'God sent forth his Son' (Gal 4), 'He that spared not his own Son' (Ro 8³), 'God hath highly exalted him' (Ph 2⁹); in which either the gift of Christ to the world, or the bestowal of exalter glory on Christ Himself, is declared to be God's act. And is accepted, endured, achieved 'to the glory of God the Father.' Still more explicit is 1 Co 11³ 'The head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God'; and in 1 Co 15²⁸—a passage which strangely touched the imagination of the Greek and Latin Fathers—Christ is portrayed as delivering up the Kingdom to God, and as finally submitting even Himself to a higher, 'that God may be all in all.' These statements, as we have seen, are to be found on the same pages which unambiguously affirm Christ's real Deity. It may be that St. Paul nowhere names Christ 'God,' and that 2 Th 1¹⁰, Tit 2¹³, and Ro 9⁵ must all be otherwise explained; yet a verse like Col 2⁹ 'In Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily,' asserting that in Christ there is given as a unity, or in organic oneness, the whole sum of qualities and attributes which make God to be God, is quite decisive as to the Apostle's real belief. St. Paul does not give us much help, perhaps, in solving this antinomy. Questions as to the origin of Christ's being in God, or the relation of the personal energies of the Son to those of the Father, did not, apparently, come before him. It is possibly a true exegesis which holds that in verses of a subordinationist tendency the subject of predication is Christ viewed as a historic person, the Incarnate Mediator, One who has fulfilled on earth a certain vocation for humanity, and, from the nature of the case, has submitted Himself to God in the fulfilment of it. But there is at least as much help for the intelligence in the view that while a certain subordination of Christ indubitably forms part of NT teaching, we may still think of Him as being one in nature with God. In the light of certain human analogies which are our only guide. Father and son, or ruler and subject, may still be of one nature, although there exist between them relations of higher and lower.

It has been argued that for St. Paul the risen Christ and the Holy Spirit are really one and the same. This is a hasty deduction from the first clause of 2 Co 3¹⁷ 'Now the Lord is the Spirit'; but it is at once refuted by the second clause, —which speaks of 'the Spirit of the Lord,' so making a distinction between the two,—as well as by the threefold blessing of 2 Co 13¹⁴. What the Apostle means by his form of verbal identification is rather the religious certainty that Jesus Christ, in whom God redeems men, and the Spirit, in whom He communicates Himself to men, are so indissolubly bound up in one, act so absolutely for the same end through the same means, that from the standpoint of the practical issue they are seen as merged in each other. They are one as the fountain and the stream are one. 'Christ in you, or the Spirit of Christ in you; these are not different realities; but the one is the method of the other' (Moberly).

5. The Christology of St. Paul, it ought to be said with emphasis, is built firmly on the foundation of the primitive doctrine. After all, his view of Christ, as the incarnate Son of God, was never, so far as our knowledge goes, the subject of denial or controversy in the early Church; if it was an advance, therefore, on the first beliefs, it was such an advance as no one felt to be out of line with what they already held. But of course his conception of the Lord does go beyond the primitive Christology. Instances are his view of Christ in relation to the universe, alike in its creation and in its maintenance; also, perhaps, his permanent conjunction, not to say identification, of the Spirit of God with the principle of life and energy that constitutes the personality of Christ. Further, we must allow for the influence of the intellectual categories of his time, even upon his doctrine of Christ's Person. Ideas borrowed from Jewish apocalyptic come out in certain pictures of the Lord's return; and in the statement that the rock which followed the Israelites in the desert was Christ, we may see a vestige of Alexandrian typology. 'The last Adam' is possibly a Rabbinical conception. But at most these things form part of the setting for his purely Christian thinking; they were a mode in which St. Paul's mind naturally expressed itself; they were essential if the truth he had grasped was to be passed on to his contemporaries; and in this lies their abundant historical justification. It is vastly more important to note that the Apostle's profoundest affirmations regarding the Lord Jesus Christ, so far from having faded into obsolescence, still elude us by their very greatness. They are still beyond us; we can but throw out our minds at an infinite reality; and the believing intelligence will for ever strive in vain adequately to discern and express all that St. Paul saw in Christ when he was moved to say, 'In him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth.'

IV. THE CHRISTOLOGY OF THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.—The writer of this Epistle develops his view of the Person of Christ as an implied presupposition of His priestly vocation. Christ is the Mediator of the new and better covenant (12²⁴ 9¹⁵ 8⁶); and its superiority to the old covenant rests upon the incomparable dignity of the Eternal High Priest.

1. The picture which is drawn of the historical Jesus is full and intimate; indeed, no NT book sets forth the real humanity of our Lord with more moving power. Particular incidents of His life are referred to (He 2¹⁴ 5⁷ 12² 13¹³); and the name 'Jesus' occurs 10 times. He passed through the normal development of human life, and learned by suffering (5⁸). The infirmities and temptations common to man were His also (4¹⁵), a verse which 'means not only that He conquered the temptation, but also that He was moved by no sinful impulses of His own' (Weiss). Elsewhere His sinlessness is affirmed categorically, in its bearing on His redeeming work (7²⁶). The human virtues of Jesus are brought out in a fashion unique in the NT: His fidelity (2¹⁷ 3²), His trust (2¹⁹), His piety (5⁷). By this course of experience He was finally 'made perfect' (5⁹); not that at any time evil really touched Him, but that the potencies of absolute goodness that were in Him were completely evoked by a moral discipline which rendered Him the great High Priest of humanity. Nevertheless, He does not, as man, gain His perfect unity with God's will, but is represented as bringing it with Him into the world (10⁶⁻⁷). Life on earth, although an imperfect medium of His higher nature, is a humiliation demanded by His office or vocation as the Sanctifier of sinners. He assumed flesh, not merely to make Himself apprehensible, but in order to suffer, by tasting death for every man; and to the bitterness and shame of death for Jesus there are pathetic allusions (57-8 13¹²).

2. In spite of all this vivid portraiture of the humanity of Jesus, the writer well-nigh outstrips Paul in the loftiness of his Christology. As with other NT believers, his mind starts from the Exalted One (cf. 9²⁸), whom he conceives habitually as High Priest within the veil, but a Priest who has sat down on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens (8¹); and from this Messianic dignity he argues back to Jesus' original nature. In 1² Christ is announced as the 'Son'; and statements are made regarding the Son which imply that He is more than man (1⁸, where He is plainly addressed as God), eternal both before and after (7²), and transcendently related to God (1³). Thus eternal and Divine, He was made a little lower than the angels (2⁹); and it touches the writer's heart to think that in coming into the world the Son did not stop short of a genuine participation in the flesh and blood we mortals wear (2¹⁴⁻¹⁶). It has been justly pointed out that in Hebrews a certain metaphysical colour has been added to the ethical sense in which the term 'Son' occurs in other Apostolic writings; although we ought to take this distinction of metaphysical and ethical with great caution. Still, a proof of the primitive feeling which underlies the whole is given in the fact that in Hebrews, precisely as in the Synoptics, the Sonship of Christ is looked upon as the basis of His Messiahship, for it is to fulfil the Messianic function of salvation that the Son comes into the world.

3. A very difficult question is whether in this Epistle 'Son' is applied to the pre-incarnate One, or to the incarnate Christ only. The passage chiefly in dispute is 1¹⁴. No one can doubt that the writer's mind starts from Christ the Son, as known in history and in His exaltation, and holds these revealing facts steadily in the foreground of his thought; but does he go further back, and carry this Sonship into the pre-existent state? A. B. Davidson says, 'Son is His characteristic name, describing His essential relation to God, a relation unaffected by change of state'; and A. B. Bruce urges that the interest of magnifying Christ's sacrifice requires His Sonship to be of older date than the life on earth. In favour of this view, despite weighty arguments against it, is the fact that throughout the three stages of His existence Christ is represented as personally identical. It is prima facie as Son that He is said to have acted as agent of God in the creation of the worlds (1²), or to have built the 'house' of the OT dispensation (3¹). But probably the point is one which exegesis by itself cannot decide; and we ought to note that a similar unavoidable ambiguity obtains in what are more or less parallel passages—Col 1⁶ and Jn 1¹⁸.

But, at all events, it is clear that Hebrews teaches the real pre-existence of Christ, whether or not the pre-existent One is designated by the title 'Son.' It was the reproach of Christ that Moses bore (11²⁶); as Lord, He laid the foundation of the earth in the beginning (1¹⁰); He came into the world with the conscious purpose of sacrificing Himself (10⁹). Little is said about the pre-existing state, yet it occupies more space than in any other NT Epistle. But the writer offers no rationale of the Incarnation; there is no passage comparable with Ph 2⁸⁻¹¹; although in one place it is pointed out how close the Son came to men in taking flesh and blood (2¹⁴⁻¹⁶). The supernatural character of His being is insisted on: 'He did not come out of humanity, He came into it.' At the same time, all docetism is excluded; for not only is suffering and death represented as the aim of His entrance upon human life, but the experience of His passion still remains as the ground on which He is resorted to by men as the great High Priest, who has learned sympathy through sufferings (2¹⁸).

It is in His capacity as Son that the priestly work of Christ, in which, dying as a man, He offers Himself in and after death, is accomplished. So again, it is the essential being of the Son that is indicated when, in a striking expression (9¹⁴), it is said that He offered Himself unto God 'through an eternal spirit'; for the words mean that the Spirit which was in Him, and constituted His personal being, was indestructible by death, and enabled Him to pursue His high-priestly vocation in the heavenly sanctuary. Once more, strong emphasis is laid on the activity of Christ the Son for us in heaven, particularly as Intercessor (7²⁵ 9²⁴ 4¹⁴ 13⁸); it is as Son that He sits down at God's right hand, the heir of all things, and Messianic King; as Son that He carries His offering before the face of God for us, and enters the holy place. In a word, the Sonship of Christ is the central thought of Hebrews; it supplies the ground and precondition of His being a perfect Surety of the eternal covenant.

4. A brief comparison with the Christology of St. Paul is not without interest. In both there is a distinct assertion of Christ's pre-temporal being, and His activity in creation; the argument going back from His present exaltation to His original nature. In both Christ reaches His throne, far above the angels, by way of the cross; and the idea is suggested that at the Resurrection or Ascension Christ first attained in status what He had always possessed by nature. In both real Divinity is combined with as distinct subordination; thus in Hebrews not Christ, but God, is Judge, and the Son's place is not on, but on the right hand of, the throne of God (8¹ 12²). On the other hand, certain slight features of difference may be noted. In Hebrews, as contrasted with St. Paul, Christ is definitely represented as having taken flesh and blood with a view to suffering; the earthly Jesus, rather than the pre-existing One or the glorified Lord, is viewed as our example; the exaltation becomes slightly more prominent than the resurrection; the high-priestly activity in heaven fills a large place; the mystical strain of reciprocal unity with Christ is absent; nor is there any suggestion, as in 1 Co 15⁴⁶⁻⁴⁷, of a time yet to be when the reign of Christ shall close, and be merged in some final dispensation.

It is not improbable that the writer of Hebrews had felt the influence of the cultivated Jewish thought of Alexandria, that crucible of all the creeds. But while the system of Philo may have partially supplied him with a vocabulary, what appears to be certain is that this did not dictate his use of it. Thus the term 'Logos' is nowhere employed in the Philonic sense, nor is Christ called 'Logos'; His regular designation rather, we have seen, is 'Son,' as given by the OT and Christian usage. What finally puts out of court the identification of the Son with the Logos of Philo is that the Son participates in a redeeming history, which is unthinkable for the other. Nor is there anything in Philo that could properly be compared with the High Priesthood of Christ.

V. THE APOCALYPSE.—The Christology of the Apocalypse presents a rather perplexing problem to the historical critic. Whatever be the sources that lie behind the book, most scholars now regard it as a characteristic product of intensely Jewish Christianity; and OT and Jewish conceptions of the Messiah are certainly the foundation upon which its view of Christ is built up. Yet, on the other hand, its Christology is 'apparently the most advanced in all the NT' (Bousset), and seems at a few points to pass beyond the limits of Paulinism.

1. Although the book represents the heavenly rather than the earthly life of Christ, yet the personal, historic name 'Jesus' occurs frequently. Our Lord is described as the root and the offspring of David, and as of the tribe of Judah. Primitive Christian thought comes out in the picture of Him as ruling the nations with a rod of iron (Rev 2⁷), or, quite in terms of the Danielic passage, as 'one like unto a son of man' (14¹⁴). He is repeatedly set forth in eschatological language: He is the bright and morning star (22¹⁶), ushering in the day of final triumph. His redeeming work on the cross is compendiously summarized in the profoundly significant title of 'the Lamb,' which may almost be called the writer's favourite designation of Him.

2. Yet all memories of history are lost in the higher view of Christ which centres in His exalted glory. It is not too much to say that the strain of praise to Christ rises from point to point until, in His essential qualities and attributes, He is frankly identified with God. He is the 'Living One,' whose victory over the grave has given Him the keys of death and the underworld (1¹⁸); He can unlock the secrets of human destiny (ch. 5); with eyes that are like a flame of fire He searches the reins and hearts (2^{18, 23}). He is ranked with God, not with finite being, in phrases like 'the beginning of the creation of God' (3¹⁴; cf. Col 1¹⁵), the 'Son of God' (2¹⁸) who names God His Father in some unique sense (2⁷ 3²¹; cf. 1⁹), and 'the Word of God' (1⁹),—this last being introduced with much solemnity. The specifically Divine title 'the First and the Last' (cf. Is 44⁶ and Rev 1⁸) He applies three times directly to Himself (1¹⁷ 2⁸ 22¹³), thereby signaling His own Person as the source and end of all that is. This claim is echoed passionately throughout the book. Notwithstanding the prohibition of 19¹⁰, all creation unites to worship Him, in strains offered elsewhere to God Almighty (1⁴; cf. 7¹²); and 'God and the Lamb' receive united adoration (5¹³ 7¹⁰). One meaning of such phenomena is plain. They are 'the most convincing proof of the impression made by Jesus upon His disciples, one which had been sufficient to revolutionize their most cherished religious belief; for them He had the value of God' (Anderson Scott).

3. Yet even here the subordinationist note which is audible in other Apostolic writings does not fail. Thus the revelation forming the book was given to Jesus Christ by God (1¹); His authority over the nations He has received of His Father (2⁷); and more than once, in the letters to the Churches, the phrase 'my God' is put upon His lips. Similarly, in 3²¹ and 5⁷ there appears the conception—present also in Ph 2⁶⁻¹¹ and Jn 17¹⁻⁵—that our Lord's risen glory is the issue and the reward of His saving word. In reply to the argument that this is incongruous with pre-existent Divinity, Weiss remarks, with great point, that so far from the assertion of His original Divine nature being neutralized by this representation of Jesus' exalted glory as the gift of God, the one is rather the ground and justification of the other.

VI. JOHANNINE CHRISTOLOGY.—1. The view of Christ presented in the Fourth Gospel, it should be noted at the outset, is based firmly upon common NT beliefs. The writer—a Jew and an Apostle—declares it his purpose to prove that Jesus is the Messiah (Jn 20³¹), though no doubt he went far beyond primitive Christian reflexion in perceiving all that Messiahship implies. This interest is everywhere present. Thus in Jn 1⁹ Nathanael hails Jesus as the Christ on the ground of His preterhuman insight; the woman of Samaria is led to the same conclusion; and a similar movement of thought on the part of the multitude is indicated by their question (7³¹): 'When the Christ cometh, will he do more signs than this man?' And the work entrusted to Jesus is specifically Messianic. He comes to raise the dead, to execute judgment, to confer the gift of the Spirit according to the ancient promise, to take to Himself universal Lordship (3¹³ 16¹⁵)—in a word, to exert a delegated but competent authority from above, such as none but the Messiah could assume. Only, the Jewish horizon has disappeared. All that Jesus is as Messiah, He is for the whole world.

2. It is observable, further, that the writer deliberately makes Christology his main theme. The relation of the Father to the Son, thrown up so conspicuously on one occasion in the Synoptics (Mt 11²⁷), now becomes the central interest. The book opens with an assertion of the Godhead of the Son (Prologue), and it closes upon the same note (20³¹). What, in the self-revelation of daily life and act, the Synoptist had shown Christ to be, the Fourth Evangelist explicitly proclaims and demonstrates that He is; or, as we may express it otherwise, while Matthew, Mark, and Luke exhibit Jesus as Messiah, the Gospel of John goes a step further, and discloses the ultimate ground on which Messiahship rests. Christ is Messiah, in the absolute sense of that word, because He is the Eternal Son, the personal, articulate expression of God, in whom the Father is perfectly revealed; and the changing incidents of the narrative are so disposed as to bring out, by a variety of selected scenes, both the content of this revelation and its diverse reception by men.

As to the historical accuracy of the discourses, it ought to be said that there is a growing consent among scholars that Jesus' words have passed through the medium of the writer's mind, and somewhat taken the colour of his mature thinking. As Haupt has expressed it, the teaching of Jesus has bound up with it an authentic commentary, showing that all, and more than all, the truth which St. John and the Church around him had learned by the close of the Apostolic age was really present in the teaching of the historic Jesus. It is thus that we can understand the comparative absence of growth or progress alike in Jesus' self-revelation and in the disciples' apprehension of it; 'to the Evangelist looking back, the evolutionary process was foreshortened' (Sanday). He carries out Jesus' teaching about Himself to its last consequence; he views it sub specie aeternitatis; but he does so with unerring perception, for it is remarkable that when we analyze a Johannine discourse into its simplest elements we invariably come to what is present also in the Synoptics. This being granted, however, it ought to be considered an axiom that the writer's conception of Christ had undergone a long, rich development. Influences which must have acted on it can easily be imagined, such as his daily communion with Christ in prayer, the general teaching of St. Paul, of which he cannot have been ignorant, and the challenge of the wistful religious questionings everywhere current in the Greco-Roman world of his day. Unless experience is something of which God can make no use in conveying truth to man, these forces, playing on the writer's memories of the historic Jesus, must have gone to evoke an ever fuller appreciation of His significance for humanity. Hence we may conclude that the Fourth Gospel is the work of one who, in the late evening of life, was moved to communicate to men the intuition he had reached of the permanent and essential factors in the Person of Christ—His unique relation to God as only-begotten Son, His unique relation to men as Life and Truth; and who, in doing so, has really seized the inmost centre of the self-consciousness of Jesus with greater firmness and profounder truth than even the Synoptic writers.

3. The Johannine picture of Jesus impresses the reader, from the first, by a certain wonderful and harmonious transcendence. Incessu patet deus, we say instinctively; this is in very deed God manifest in the flesh. Such a figure is not of our world; yet, on the other hand, it would be a grave mistake to conceive Him as out of touch with the realities of human life. No misgiving should ever have been felt as to the genuine humanity of the Christ of St. John (cf. Burkitt, The Gospel History, p. 233). Can we forget His weariness at Jacob's well, His tears beside the grave of Lazarus, His joy in the fellowship of the Twelve, the dark troubles of His foreboding soul, His thirst upon the cross? Especially does His real oneness of nature with us come out in His uninterrupted dependence upon God, which is accentuated in the most striking way. The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do (5¹⁹; cf. 7²⁸ 8²⁸ 10³⁷ etc.). Again and again He speaks of Himself as being 'sent' of God, a commissioned ambassador to whom words and works have alike been 'given,' whose knowledge and power are mediated to Him by the Spirit, who seeks the glory of God, and finds His meat and drink in doing a higher will. His human dependence, however, is not a commonplace fact which might have been assumed; it really springs out of the creative ground of His special Sonship, or, in other words, it is the form taken by the Eternal Sonship under the conditions of human life. The life of the Son is wholly rooted in the Father's. Their reciprocal love and knowledge, it is true, are frequently insisted on; yet, although the Son is uniformly dependent on the Father, it would be seriously untrue to St. John to say that the Father is dependent on the Son. The relation leaves a real subordination, a human inferiority, on Jesus' side. Again, this dependence is conceived in genuinely ethical terms; it is mediated by motives, feelings, desires, surrenders, not mechanically necessitated by the properties of a Divine substance, or the stiff categories of an a priori metaphysic. All that Jesus says of Himself is perfectly religious in character; it is meant to express personal relations humanly, and so to enable human faith to grasp the only true God through Jesus Christ whom He has sent. For St. John, then, Jesus is truly and perfectly man; what distinguishes Him from other men is His unique relation to the Father. The idea of a new birth from above, a prelude to union with God indispensable for others, is nowhere applied to Him.

4. Just as in the Synoptics, Jesus is depicted in the Fourth Gospel as striving to free the Twelve from earthly and political ideas of His purpose. And, as a result of His care and teaching, it dawns upon them gradually that the boon He offers is Divine and universal. An early stage of the process is marked by St. Peter's words: 'We have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God' (6⁶⁹); and it is one proof, out of many, of the Evangelist's substantial accuracy, that he does not introduce at this point ideas of the Eternal Sonship of the Logos. But it is as Son that our Lord would have them know Him. He uses the phrase 'my Father' 30 times, on nine occasions so addressing God directly; and at least 17 times He calls Himself 'Son' or 'Son of God.' We can hardly doubt that wherever this term 'Son' occurs in the Johannine literature, its primary reference is to the historical Christ, known in the realm of human fact; and it denotes Him as holding to God a relation of unique intimacy and love. Thus in the great word 1 Jn 4¹⁰ 'God . . . sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins,' the writer is thinking of Jesus of Nazareth, the historic Messiah. St. John, however, loves always to go back to ultimate truths; and his Gospel outstrips the others by the assertion that this relation of Sonship is really anterior to time and history. Jesus has lived previously in a state conditioned by personal relationships (17²⁴); in it (so the present writer, with some hesitation, judges) the pre-incarnate One was already Son, and was by nature possessed of a unique knowledge of God which was somehow capable of reproducing itself in His earthly consciousness (1¹⁸ 3¹³, 32).

The objection has been made that this reduces Jesus' spiritual experience as man to a mere show; yet it is surely possible to believe that Jesus' knowledge of God was experimental, as being mediated by the unmeasured gift of the Holy Spirit, without denying that its ultimate sources are to be found in His eternal being. Room must always be left, no doubt, for the possibility that words ascribed to Jesus regarding His own pre-existence, and spoken in wonderful hours of a more than human self-consciousness, have undergone a certain modification with the lapse of time, in the direction of intensifying the original light and shade. It is scarcely credible that Jesus should have spoken so plainly of His pre-temporal life with God as that His meaning was transparent to ordinary people; this would make the silence of the Synoptics unintelligible. It is altogether more likely that on this subject, as on the subject of His Messiahship,

He exhibited reticence and delay. On the other hand, we are justified in believing that He did utter words, mysterious yet significant, which, as pondered by a mind like St. John's, were clearly seen to involve pre-existence, not of a so-called ideal sort, but real and personal. Even so careful a student as Titius has said, 'I cannot regard it as impossible that the general NT idea of the pre-existence of Christ goes back to sayings of Jesus Himself, and that the Johannine discourses especially are based on really historical material.'

5. The last stage of Jesus' claim to and interpretation of the name 'Son (of God)' is given in His prediction of the glory to which He should rise, and of His future presence in spirit with His followers (especially chapters 13ff.). The primary meaning of Sonship had been a relation to the Father of uniquely close love; it now transpires that, as Son, Jesus is destined to share in the Father's omnipotence and universal sway. In the words (13³), 'Jesus, knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands,' no convincing reason can be offered for limiting 'all things' to the function of revelation and redemption, and barring out omnipotence as such. Besides, the Evangelist is quite familiar with the idea that Jesus is originally Lord and Possessor of men, irrespectively of their faith in Him; He came unto His own, and His own received Him not. Hence in his view the Divine power to which Jesus rises is not unsuited to His nature, or gained by usurpation; it is given Him by God, for only so could He receive anything (3³⁷), and it answers to the glory which He had before the world was. We see this truth breaking fully on the minds of the Twelve after the Resurrection; and the cry of Thomas, 'my Lord and my God' (20²⁸), marks the great discovery. In the risen One the Apostle discerns the Victor over death, the Lord of glory; and realizing in that moment of inexpressible relief how in Christ he had all that Jehovah Himself could be, he grasps Him as having for faith the value, because the reality, of God. Nowhere in the NT is the implication more clear that religious faith in Jesus Christ is really equivalent to faith in His Divinity.

6. These general conclusions are strengthened by an examination of the title Son of Man, as used in the Fourth Gospel. Here also the name is put only on Jesus' lips. Perhaps the accent is shifted slightly from His vocation to His Person; the writer employs the name in accordance with his higher view of our Lord's nature to express His personal uniqueness. As in the Synoptics, the term is undoubtedly Messianic (12³⁴); and while in this Gospel it is not put in direct relation to the Second Coming, yet it is noticeable that the majority of passages in which Jesus speaks of Himself as Son of Man are references to His exaltation (3¹⁴ 8²⁸ 12³⁴), or His glorifying (12³³ 13³¹), it being implied that Divine glory befits and still awaits Him; and this is a link with one side of the Synoptic representation. The other class of Synoptic passages bearing on the work of the Son of Man has also its parallel in Johannine verses, which describe the Son of Man as giving meat which endureth to everlasting life (6²⁷), or attach the possession of life to eating His flesh and drinking His blood, or declare that He must be lifted up on the cross. In point of fact, however, no appreciable distinction can be drawn between what, in the Fourth Gospel, is predicated of the Son of God and of the Son of Man. Both are Messianic names, raised, as it were, to their highest power; one expressing the origin of Jesus' Person in God, the other His human affiliation. Yet, for St. John, the title 'Son of Man' always appears to carry something of the suggestion that for Jesus it is a wonderful thing that He should be man at all. Though in all points perfectly human, heaven is ever open to Him: He is present there perpetually, beholding God with immediate vision (3¹³), and He will yet ascend up where He was before (6⁶²).

7. Other forms of thought in which the higher nature of Jesus is set forth in the Fourth Gospel are rich in theological implication. He is the Vine in which His followers inhere and grow as living branches (15¹⁷); He is the Resurrection and the Life, to believe in whom is to overcome death (11²⁵); He is the Bread of Life which by faith men eat, and live (6²⁷). In all such utterances the distinction between Christology and soteriology has vanished. To sustain a relation of vital, inner unity with, and suffusion of, human souls is manifestly beyond the power of any lower than God Himself; and this is really the basal argument for the Deity of Christ which we can see to be implicit in the NT as a whole.

8. The sum and climax of the matter—and this quite irrespective of the Logos idea, to which we shall come immediately—is that God is personally in Jesus, and Jesus in God (10³⁸). The simplest and deepest words in the Gospel point to this: 'I and the Father are one' (10³⁰; cf. 17¹¹, 21); 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14⁹; cf. 12⁴⁵). By these sayings the mind is led in the direction of a simple modalism, but no theory of it is furnished. The Father given personally in Jesus is the object of saving faith. Jesus is Life and Light in a sense which is absolute (Jn 1⁹, 1 Jn 5¹¹). In Him there is a real advent and inhabitation of God Himself—this faith is certain of and unconditionally asserts; yet what the ontological presuppositions of it may be is a remote and derivative question, and even the Logos idea, which St. John applies at this point, is not fitted, perhaps is not designed, to take us more than a certain distance towards theoretic insight. No explanation, no combination of categories, even an Apostle's, is able to place us where we see the life of God on its inner side. What as believers we are sure of, is that in Jesus the God of heaven and earth is personally apprehensible, actually present in history—enlightening our eyes in all knowledge because first possessing us as our inward life. This is the keynote of the Johannine Christology; the faith out of which the Gospel is written and which it seeks to wake in other minds, is that Jesus and God are one. Attempts to discredit this unity by describing it as no more than a unity of will are simply wide of the mark. Will, the living energy of persons, is the most real thing in the universe; it is the ultimate form of being; and the suggestion that behind the will there may lie a still more real Divine 'substance,' a more authentic region from which, after all, Jesus is excluded, is a figment of obsolete metaphysics. If it is possible to express in human language the essential and inherent Godhead of Jesus Christ, the thing has been done in the relevant statements of this Gospel.

9. Nevertheless, in the Fourth Gospel, as in the NT generally, this unity with God is viewed as being compatible with real subordination. 'My Father is greater than I' (14²⁸). In 10³⁶ Jesus speaks of Himself as One whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world. Yet this is but the relation which belongs to Fatherhood and Sonship as such; for, as Lütgert has expressed it, 'the superordination of God above Jesus does not consist in God's reserving anything to Himself; on the contrary, He conveys Himself wholly to Jesus, making Him monarch of the whole world; what it does consist in is the fact that God is everywhere the Origin, the Giver, the Foundation, while Jesus is the obedient and receptive organ of His purpose.'

10. Turning now to the Prologue, and its characteristic ideas, let us note first of all that the study of it comes properly at this point, after we have concluded our more general survey. As preface, the Prologue stands first, but we may well believe that it was the last to be written. Touching the origin of the term 'Logos,' while we need not assert that St. John took it from Philo, yet it is extremely probable that the influence of Philonic thought went to decide which term out of those supplied by the OT and the Targums (Wisdom, the Spirit, the Word) he should choose. 'The Word' had long been familiar to the Hebrew mind as designating the principle of revelation, and it had received from Greek philosophy a certain cosmic width of significance. The Evangelist, it would seem, took it as singularly fitted to express to men of that time the Divine light and life present in Jesus Christ; but, writing in Asia Minor, he took it without prejudice to the full Christian meaning it was to bear. It is, besides, a term which must have been in some sort familiar to the Church; for it is introduced without comment. In St. John's use of it, too, ethical and soteriological considerations are supreme: 'Logos' receives its colour and atmosphere from the term 'Son,' as denoting the historic Jesus. What the Apostle is setting forth, in short, is not a Greek theologoumenon, but the total impression made by Christ's personality. And when we recall how St. Paul had said that all things were created by Christ and for Him (Col 1¹⁶), it is easy to see how strong were the interior tendencies of faith conducting to this identification of the Jesus of history with the creative Word of God.

In v.¹ three weighty affirmations are made as to the Logos: (a) He existed from the beginning, i.e. eternally; (b) His relation to God was living and personal in character; (c) His place is in the sphere of Godhead. Stevens, with a terminology slightly too developed, but with substantial accuracy, says of the content of this verse: 'the author affirms a distinction, but a community of essence, between the Word and the Father.' It is next asserted that the 'Logos' is the medium alike of creation and of revelation, that He has a universal relation to men (vv. 4-9), that having been in the world from the first, but unrecognized, He is now come personally, and has given to all who receive Him the right to become children of God (vv. 11-12). Commentators invite us to note the solemn fashion in which v.¹⁴ attaches itself and corresponds to v.¹. The Word is indeed the subject of discourse throughout, but He has not been specifically named in the interval; now, however, in v.¹⁴, the announcement of the Incarnation is laid, point for point, alongside of the previous declaration of the absolute being of the Word. The simple phrase, 'the Word became flesh,' appears to signify that He passed into a new phase of being—a phase of human mortality, weakness, dependence—becoming individualized as a man, yet retaining personal continuity with that which He was before.

These four stages, then, are discernible in the movement of thought in the Prologue: (1) The Word in His original, eternal being; (2) the Lord who comes to His own as Life and Light; (3) the only Son of the Father; (4) the full name of the Person before the Evangelist's mind throughout, Jesus Christ. The series is not strictly chronological, but it follows a well-defined gradation of ideas; and from the fashion in which it ends, we can perceive that the term 'Logos' is an ancillary and theoretic one, secondarily interpretative of Jesus as a historic personality, and that, although it stands here as first in the order of thought, it was last in the order of the Evangelist's reflexion. The Prologue, it is clear, has nothing to say as to the mode of Incarnation; but when we connect it, as we ought to do, with the Gospel to which it is prefixed, we can perceive the motive to which Incarnation is due, namely, the Divine purpose of giving eternal life to a perishing world. Unlike St. Paul, however, St. John conceives the advent of the Son, not as a humiliation, but as a means of revelation.

11. In the First Epistle of John the unity of God and Christ is so strongly felt that the two subjects are used almost interchangeably; so, for example, in 5²⁰. Again and again everything is affirmed to depend on the coming of the Son of God in the flesh, as Saviour of the world. At one or two points we seem to be observing the first movements of a dogmatic Christology (2²² 4¹; cf. 2 Jn 7). The writer is chiefly concerned to assert the identity of the saving word of life with Jesus Christ, a docetic idealism having begun very early to dissolve the bond between the two, and to seek some other path to fellowship with God than that which lay through the mediation of Jesus the Messiah.

VII. CONCLUSION.—As we survey the different views of Christ set forth in the NT, the sovereign freedom with which Apostolic believers contemplated Jesus, and told what they saw in writings which have been quite truly described as 'literature, not dogma,' is infinitely impressive. The looked at Jesus each through his own eyes; and to try to force their statements into outward harmony is totally to mistake the genius of Christian faith. On the other hand, all grasped in Christ the reality of a present God of grace, and in this decisive fact lies the deeper, inward unity of NT doctrine. It is tempting to regard the various types of Apostolic Christology as elements in an advancing and organic series. Thus it might be asked whether the Synoptics do not give us the Jesus of history, and St. Paul the living Christ, while St. John fuses both together in an anti-dogmatic way. It is a reasonable question; for, so far as Christology is concerned, St. John does build upon St. Paul, and St. Paul upon the faith of the primitive society. Nevertheless, it is probably truer on the whole to the facts if we think of NT minds as different prisms, through which the one white light of Jesus' Person fell, and was analyzed into different colours.

Two certainties are common to the writers with whom we have been dealing: (1) That the life and consciousness of Jesus were entirely human in form; (2) that this historic life, felt and known as possessed of a redeeming supernatural content, is somehow inseparably one with the eternal life of God Himself. Again, it is implied wherever the matter comes up, that it is one and the same personal subject which passes through the three stages of pre-existence, historical life, and exaltation. Again, we are certain to go wrong unless we note that the NT is guided, in its Christological passages, by what is really a soteriological interest. Dr. Dale's question: What must Christ's relation to men be in order that He should be able to die for them? is entirely faithful to the Apostolic attitude. The Person of the Messiah must be of a quality that answers to His function as Redeemer of the world. 'All the Christology of the NT,' as Kähler has justly said, 'is but the statement of the presuppositions and guarantees of that which believers may have, should have, and actually do have, for fellowship with God, in the Crucified and Exalted One.' The chief problem which the NT bequeathed to dogmatic theology is that of thinking out and construing to intelligence two things which the Apostles simply put side by side—the true Deity of Jesus Christ and His real subordination to the Father. It lies beyond the scope of this article, however, to follow the problem into the Patristic and later ages.

PETER.—SIMON, surnamed Peter, was 'the coryphaeus of the Apostle choir' (Chrysostom). His father was named Jonah or John (Mt 16¹⁷, Jn 1⁴ 21¹⁵⁻¹⁷ RV). He belonged to Bethsaida (Jn 1⁴), probably the fisher-quarter of Capernaum (Bethsaida = 'Fisher-home'). There he dwelt with his wife, his mother-in-law, and his brother Andrew (Mk 1²⁹⁻³¹ = Mt 8¹⁴. ¹⁵ = Lk 4³⁸. ³⁹). He and Andrew were fishermen on the Lake of Galilee (Mt 4¹⁸ = Mk 1¹⁶) in partnership with Zebedee and his sons (Lk 5⁷⁻¹¹, Mt 4²¹).

Simon first met with Jesus at Bethany beyond Jordan (Jn 1¹⁹ RV), the scene of the Baptist's ministry (vv. ²⁶⁻⁴²). He had repaired thither with other Galileans to participate in the mighty revival which was in progress. Jesus was there; and Andrew, who was one of the Baptist's disciples, having been directed by his master to Him as the Messiah, told Simon of his glad discovery, and brought him to Jesus. Jesus 'looked upon him' (RV) with 'those eyes of far perception'; and the look mastered him and won his heart. He was a disciple from that hour. Jesus read his character, seeing what he was and foreseeing what the discipline of grace would make him; and He gave him a surname prophetic of the moral and spiritual strength which would one day be his. 'Thou art Simon the son of John: thou shalt be called Cephas,' Cephas is the Aram. = Gr. Petros, and means 'rock.' He was not yet Peter, but only Simon, impulsive and vacillating; and Jesus gave him the new name ere he had earned it, that it might be an incentive to him, reminding him of his destiny and inciting him to achieve it. In after days, whenever he displayed any weakness, Jesus would pointedly address him by the old name, thus gently warning him that he should not fall from grace (cf. Lk 22³¹, Mk 14²⁷, Jn 21¹⁶⁻¹⁷).

Presently the Lord began His ministry at Capernaum, and among His first acts was the calling of four of the men who had believed in Him to abandon their worldly employments and attach themselves to Him, following Him whithersoever He went (Mt 4¹⁸⁻²² = Mk 1¹⁶⁻²⁰, Lk 5¹⁻¹¹). Thus he began the formation of the Apostol-band. The four were James and John, Simon and Andrew. They were busy with their boats and nets, and He called them to become 'fishers of men.' It was the beginning of the second year of Jesus' ministry ere He had chosen all the Twelve; and then He ordained them to their mission, arranging them in pairs for mutual assistance (Mk 6⁷), and coupling Simon Peter and Andrew (Mt 10⁹).

The distinction of Peter lies less in the qualities of his mind than in those of his heart. He was impulsive, 'ever ardent, ever leaping before his fellows' (Chrysostom), and often speaking unadvisedly and incurring rebuke. This, however, was only the weakness of his strength, and it was the concomitant of a warm and generous affection. If John, says St. Augustine, was the disciple whom Jesus loved, Peter was the disciple who loved Jesus. This quality appeared on several remarkable occasions. (1) In the synagogue of Capernaum, after the feeding of the five thousand at Bethsaida, Jesus delivered His discourse on the Bread of Life, full of hard sayings designed to test the faith of His disciples by shattering their Jewish dream of a worldly Messiah, a temporal King of Israel, a restorer of the ancient monarchy (Jn 6²⁷⁻⁴⁵). Many were offended, and 'went back and walked no more with him.' Even the Twelve were discomfited. 'Would ye also go away?' He asked; and it was Simon Peter, 'the mouth of the Apostles' (Chrysostom), who answered, assuring Him of their loyalty (vv. ⁶⁶⁻⁶⁹). (2) During the season of retirement at Caesarea Philippi in the last year of His ministry, Jesus, anxious to ascertain whether their faith in His Messiahship had stood the strain of disillusionment, whether they still regarded Him as the Messiah, though He was not the sort of Messiah they had expected, put to the Twelve the question: 'Who do ye say that I am?' Again it was Peter who answered promptly and firmly: 'Thou art the Christ,' filling the Lord's heart with exultant rapture, and proving that he had indeed earned his new name Peter, the rock on which Jesus would build His Church, the first stone of that living temple. Presently Jesus told them of His approaching Passion, and again it was Peter who gave expression to the horror of the Twelve: 'Be it far from thee, Lord; this shall never be unto thee.' Even here it was love that spoke. The Sinaitic Palimpsest reads: 'Then Simon Cephas, as though he pitied Him, said to Him, "Be it far from Thee"' (Mt 16¹³⁻²² = Mk 8²⁷⁻³² = Lk 9¹¹⁻²²). (3) A week later Jesus went up to the Mount with Peter, James, and John, and 'was transfigured before them,' communing with Moses and Elijah who 'appeared in glory' (Mt 17¹⁻⁸ = Mk 9²⁻⁸ = Lk 9²⁸⁻³⁶). Though awe-stricken, Peter spoke: 'Lord, it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, I will make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah' (Mt 17^a RV). It was a foolish and inconsiderate speech (Mk 9^a, Lk 9^{ab}), yet it breathed a spirit of tender affection. His idea was: 'Why return to the ungrateful multitude and the malignant rulers? Why go to Jerusalem and die? Stay here always in this holy fellowship.' (4) When Jesus washed the disciples' feet in the Upper Room, it was Peter who protested (Jn 13^{b-12}). He could not bear that the blessed Lord should perform that menial office on him. (5) At the arrest in Gethsemane, it was Peter who, seeing Jesus in the grasp of the soldiers, drew his sword and cut off the ear of Malchus (Jn 18¹⁰⁻¹¹).

The blot on Peter's life-story is his repeated denial of Jesus in the courtyard of the high priest's palace (Jn 18¹²⁻¹⁷; cf. Mt 26⁶⁹⁻⁷⁵ = Mk 14⁶⁶⁻⁷² = Lk 22⁵⁴⁻⁶²). It was a terrible disloyalty, yet not without extenuations. (1) The situation was a trying one. It was dangerous just then to be associated with Jesus, and Peter's excitable and impetuous nature was prone to panic. (2) It was his devotion to Jesus that exposed him to the temptation. He and John were the only two who rallied from the panic in Gethsemane (Mt 26^{56b}) and followed their captive Lord (Jn 18¹⁵; cf. Mt 26⁵⁸ = Mk 14⁵⁴ = Lk 22⁵⁴). (3) If he sinned greatly, he sincerely repented (Mt 26⁷⁵ = Mk 14⁷² = Lk 22⁶²). A look of that dear face sufficed to break his heart (Lk 22⁶¹). (4) He was completely forgiven. On the day of the Resurrection Jesus appeared to him (Lk 24³⁴, 1 Co 15⁵). What happened during this interview is unrecorded, doubtless because it was too sacred to be divulged; but it would certainly be a scene of confession and forgiveness. The Lord had all the while had His faithless disciple in His thoughts, knowing his distress of mind (cf. Mk 16⁷); and He had that solitary interview with him on purpose to reassure him.

At the subsequent appearance by the Lake of Galilee (Jn 21) Peter played a prominent part. On discovering that the stranger on the beach was Jesus, impatient to reach his Master, he sprang overboard and swam ashore (cf. his action in Mt 14²⁸⁻³⁰). And presently Jesus charged him to make good his protestation of love by diligent care of the flock for which He, the Good Shepherd, had died. 'Be it the office of love to feed the Lord's flock, if it was an evidence of fear to deny the Shepherd' (Augustine). Jesus was not upbraiding Peter. On the contrary, He was publishing to the company His forgiveness of the erring Apostle and His confidence in him for the future.

Peter figures conspicuously in the history of the Apostolic Church. He was recognized as the leader. It was on his motion that a successor was appointed to Judas between the Ascension and Pentecost (Ac 1⁵⁻²⁶), his impetuosity appearing in this precipitate action (see MATTHIAS); and it was he who acted as spokesman on the day of Pentecost (2^{14ff.}). He wrought miracles in the name of Jesus (3. 5¹⁵ 9³²⁻⁴²); he fearlessly confessed Jesus, setting the rulers at naught (4¹⁻¹³); as head of the Church, he exposed and punished sin (5¹⁻¹¹ 8¹⁻²⁴); he suffered imprisonment and scourging (5¹⁷⁻⁴² 12¹⁻¹⁹).

The persecution consequent on the martyrdom of Stephen, by scattering the believers, inaugurated a fresh development of Christianity, involving a bitter controversy. The refugees preached wherever they went, and thus arose the question, on what terms the Gentiles should be received into the Church. Must they become Jews and observe the rites of the Mosaic Law? In this controversy Peter acted wisely and generously. Being deputed with John to examine into it, he approved Philip's work among the hated Samaritans, and invoked the Holy Spirit upon his converts, and before returning to Jerusalem made a missionary tour among the villages of Samaria (Ac 8¹⁻²⁵). His Jewish prejudice was thoroughly conquered by his vision at Joppa and the conversion of Cornelius and his company at Caesarea; and, when taken to task by the Judaistic party at Jerusalem for associating with uncircumcised Gentiles, he vindicated his action and gained the approval of the Church (10-11¹⁹).

The controversy became acute when the Judaizers, taking alarm at the missionary activity of Paul and Barnabas, went to Antioch and insisted on the converts there being circumcised. The question was referred to a council of the Church at Jerusalem; and Peter spoke so well on behalf of Christian liberty that it was resolved, on the motion of James, the Lord's brother, that the work of Paul and Barnabas should be approved, and that nothing should be required of the Gentiles beyond abstinence from things sacrificed to idols, blood, things strangled, and fornication (Ac 15¹⁻²⁹; cf. Gal 2¹⁻¹⁰). By and by Peter visited Antioch, and, though adhering to the decision at the outset, he was presently intimidated by certain Judaizers, and, together with Barnabas, separated himself from the Gentiles as unclean, and would not eat with them, incurring an indignant and apparently effective rebuke from Paul (Gal 2¹¹⁻²¹).

There are copious traditions about Peter. Suffice it to mention that he is said to have gone to Rome [which is quite possible] and laboured there for 25 years [utterly impossible], and to have been crucified (cf. Jn 21¹⁸⁻¹⁹) in the last year of Nero's reign (A.D. 68); being at his own request nailed to the cross head downwards, since he deemed himself unworthy to be crucified in the same manner as his Lord. According to the ancient and credible testimony of Papias of Hierapolis, a hearer of St. John at Ephesus, our Second Gospel is based upon information derived from Peter. Mark had been Peter's companion, and heard his teaching and took notes of it. From these he composed his Gospel. He wrote it, Jerome says, at the request of the brethren at Rome when he was there with Peter; and on hearing it Peter approved it and authorized its use by the Church. DAVID SMITH.

PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF.—No Epistle of the NT has caught more of the spirit of Jesus than 1 Peter. Imbued with a strong love for the risen Christ, and a profound conviction of the truth of the gospel as established in the world by the life, death, and resurrection of the Messiah, the author delineates a rich Christian life on the basis of these evangelical facts.

1. Contents.—

I. Thanksgiving and exhortation in view of the Christian salvation, 1²⁻²¹⁰.

(i) The glorious character of the Christian salvation, 1³⁻¹².

- (a) A sure inheritance, vv 3-5. To God our Father is ascribed all praise, because by raising Jesus Christ from the dead He has begotten us into a living hope certain to be soon realized.
- (b) A present joy, notwithstanding manifold trials, vv 8-9. Sufferings refine faith as fire does gold, and even now the unseen Christ is an object of unspeakable joy, and gives a foretaste of full salvation.
- (c) The fulfilment of the promises made to the prophets, and a wonder even to angels, vv 10-12.
- (ii) Exhortation to realize this hope in a holy life as members of a Divine brotherhood, 1¹²⁻²¹⁰.
- (a) The holy and absolutely just Father requires filial obedience, vv 13-17.
- (b) To redeem us from sin the eternal and spotless Messiah was slain, and by His resurrection has awakened us to true faith in God. It is in the Holy God thus revealed that all your faith and hope rest, vv 18-21.
- (c) The family of God, begotten of the imperishable seed of the gospel, must obey the truth with sincere mutual love and grow into maturity. As living stones built into the living but once-rejected Christ, they form a spiritual temple and also a holy priesthood to offer spiritual sacrifices to God. They have become the new Israel, the people of God, 1²²⁻²¹⁰.

the behaviour of the Christian in the world and in the brotherhood, 2¹-3¹². It must be pure and honourable in the midst of the heathen, 2¹¹, 12.

- (a) Though free servants of God, Christians must be loyal to the earthly government, and observe their duties to all men in their several stations, vv. 13-17.
- (b) Slaves must be obedient even to harsh masters, showing their possession of Divine grace and their discipleship to Jesus, by enduring suffering like Him whose unmerited death has brought us salvation, vv. 18-20.
- (c) Wives are to exercise a quiet and gentle spirit, like true mothers in Israel, submitting to their husbands, in the hope that if they are heathen they may be won to the faith by their Christian life. Likewise husbands must honour their wives as equally with themselves heirs of life, 3¹-7.
- (d) The duty of a peaceful and kindly life to strengthen the unity within the brotherhood, vv. 8-12.

III. The uses of suffering, 3¹³-4¹⁹.

- (a) Suffering cannot really harm one who has Christ in his heart; nay, gentle steadfastness under persecution may, like our Master's, win over others to God, 3¹³-17.
- Digression. Quickened in spirit by death, Christ carried the gospel to the godless world that perished in the Flood, through which Noah and his family were saved, a type of the Christian who in his baptism asks God for a good conscience, and is cleansed through the risen Christ now triumphant over all His enemies, vv. 18-22.
- (b) Suffering delivers us from our sinful life. Though your former heathen comrades revile you for abandoning their life of sensuality, you must have done with them and leave them to the just Judge of all, 4¹-6.

Digression. In the short time that remains until the return of the Lord, Christians should live a life of self-control, exercising brotherly love, hospitality, and spiritual gifts, 4⁷-11.

- (c) Your sufferings are not unique, but become a blessing if they are the result of fidelity to your Christian profession, and not of evil conduct. They are a sign that judgment is near, which you may await in a life of well-doing, trusting your faithful Creator, vv. 12-19.

IV. Miscellaneous advice, 5¹-14.

- (a) Counsel to elder of the Church, and to the younger men, 5¹-2.
- (b) Exhortation to resignation, watchfulness, and trust in the midst of the terrible sufferings that are being endured by the brotherhood everywhere, vv. 3-11.
- (c) Personal greetings, vv. 12-14.

2. Readers.—Of the provinces in which the readers lived, Galatia and Asia were evangelized by St. Paul, but nothing is known of the evangelization of the rest, nor does the letter assume that St. Peter had any share in it. At first sight it would appear that the readers were Jewish Christians, as some scholars hold that they were, but the body of the Epistle clearly shows that the prevailing element was Gentile, and the words of 1¹ are to be taken figuratively of the sojourn of the Christian as a resident alien on earth, absent from his heavenly fatherland (2¹¹, 10, 4¹-4). Doubtless, however, very many who had been Jews were found in all the Churches of the large cities. The former life of the leaders, on the average low level of Asia Minor, had been given over to the vices of the flesh; perhaps, indeed, their past conduct was the source from which the criminal charges were brought against them afterwards as Christians (2¹², 4¹⁵, 16). The Churches were suffering severely, though there does not seem to have been an official persecution, or a systematic attempt at extermination, for it is assumed that most will remain until the Parousia (4⁷). So severe was their suffering, that only the strong arm of God could protect them in their temptation (1⁵-7, 4¹², 5⁹). Christians are easily confounded with criminals (2¹², 13, 18, 3¹³, 18, 17, 4¹⁵, 19), slaves suffer at the hands of their masters, wives from their husbands, but their experience was of the same character as that of the Christian brotherhood throughout the world (5⁹). The Churches are 'islands in an ocean of heathenism.'

3. Purpose.—This letter is an encouragement to readers who are in danger of lapsing, through suffering, into the unholiness of life of their neighbours. By recalling the fact of the resurrection of Christ, and by an appeal to the example of His remedial sufferings, the author seeks to awaken their faith and hope in God. They are urged to sustain their moral life in the exercise of a calm and sober confidence in the grace of God soon to be revealed more fully (1¹³, 4⁷, 5⁸-10), and to commend their gospel to the heathen world by their lives of goodness, entrusting themselves in well-doing to a faithful Creator (4¹⁹).

4. Teaching.—(a) Doctrine.—Faith in God as the holy Father and faithful Creator is built upon the solid facts of the gospel.—In particular, the life, death, and resurrection of Christ the eternal Messiah (1¹³-21). The life of Jesus Christ has made an ineffaceable impression upon the author. He was spotless, the perfect pattern for men, but also the Messiah, who as the Servant of the Lord has by His death ransomed a new people and ratified a new covenant (1², 18-20, 22-24). By His resurrection He has been exalted to God's right hand, and will soon return to unveil further glories (1¹³, 3²). The most probable interpretation of 3¹⁸ is that Christ went, during the period between His death and resurrection, to the abode of the dead, and, having preached His gospel to those who had been the wicked antediluvian world, has made it of universal efficacy (cf. Eph 4⁸-19). In this life Christ becomes an object of inexpressible joy to believers on whom the Spirit has been poured forth (1², 8, 12). Peter does not regard the Spirit as the source of Christian virtues, but as the pledge of our future inheritance, as well as of present Divine grace manifested in the ability to endure suffering (4¹⁴). This Spirit was also identified with the pre-existent Messiah, and was the means of His persistence through death (1¹¹, 3¹⁸, 19, 4¹⁴). By the Spirit the brethren are also consecrated in a new covenant to Jehovah, thereby receiving the fulfilment of the promise of the Messianic age (1²). The risen Christ has become the object of the believer's utter love and devotion, and has begotten in him the living hope of an eternal inheritance.

(b) The Christian life.—At baptism the believer has his conscience cleansed through the risen Christ; and the new life springing from the seed of the word of God planted in the heart grows by feeding upon that word. Holiness is its quality, involving obedience to the truth, freedom from fleshly lusts, self-control under suffering, joy in a present salvation, and hope of life in the incorruptible inheritance. Faith is the act whereby the believer, realizing the worth of the unseen world through the revelation of Jesus Christ, puts complete trust in God. With Christ, the living stone, Christians form the new temple in which the brethren are a royal priesthood. They are the true Israel, a brotherhood which is God's home on earth. The Christian is a pilgrim on earth, his life one of love to the brethren and of gentle endurance towards the unbeliever, whom he seeks to win to the gospel, while he stands ready for his Master's coming (1¹³, 5⁸-11).

5. Literary affinities.—(a) The OT.—This Epistle is greatly indebted to the LXX, especially to the Psalms and to Isaiah, whose teaching as to the holiness of God and the redemptive efficacy of the sufferings of the Servant of the Lord is echoed (1 P 1¹⁸-20, Is 52⁵, 53; 1 P 1²⁴, 25, Is 40⁶; 1 P 2⁶, Is 28¹⁶, Ps 118²²; 1 P 2²¹; Is 53; 1 P 3¹⁸, Ps 34¹⁷). Proverbs also is used (1 P 2¹⁷, Pr 24¹; 1 P 4⁸, Pr 10¹²; 1 P 4¹⁸, Pr 11³¹; 1 P 5⁸, Pr 3⁴).

(b) Book of Enoch.—An acquaintance with this pseudepigraphic book may be traced in 1 P 1¹³, 3¹⁵, 20. Cf. Enoch 9¹, 10⁴, 11, 12, 64¹, 2, 69³.

(c) The Gospels.—While the Epistle affords no proof of acquaintance with our Gospels, it contains many suggestions of the life and teachings of Jesus. Peter claims to have been a witness of the sufferings and the glory of Jesus (5¹), which may refer both to the Transfiguration and to the appearances of the risen Christ. Christ is set forth as the example for the sufferer, as though His silent endurance of reviling and the agony of the sinless One had been indelibly impressed on the author's memory; and, as in the Synoptics, Jesus Christ fulfils the prophecy of the Suffering Servant. The great command of Jesus to His disciples to renounce the world, take up the cross and follow Him, seems to re-echo in this Epistle; as Jesus pronounced blessings on those who were persecuted for righteousness' sake, so does Peter (3¹⁴ 4¹⁴), and other words from the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5¹⁰. 11. 12 6²³) seem to speak in 2¹³ 3¹⁸⁻¹⁹ 5⁶. The parable of the Sower may have supplied the figure of 1²³; the lesson of the tribute money may underlie 2¹³. 14; and Christ's utterance of doom on apostate Israel, especially the parable of Mk 12¹⁻¹², probably suggested the thought of 2¹⁻¹⁰. That the Kingdom of God, so common in the teaching of Jesus, is not referred to, may be due to the fact that the term had no worthy association for the readers. They had learned to call God 'Father,' not 'King.'

(d) Acts.—There are similarities with Peter's speeches in Acts, e.g., the witness of the prophets to the Messiah; Jesus Christ as the Suffering Servant whose death was foreknown to God, and was endured for our sins; His exaltation and near return to judge the living and the dead (Ac 2²³. 33 3¹⁸ 5³⁰. 31 10⁴². 43). Cf. also 1 P 3²⁰ with Ac 3¹⁹⁻²¹.

(e) The Pauline Epistles.—A comparison of Romans with this Epistle reveals striking resemblances between them (1 P 1¹⁴, Ro 12¹; 1 P 1¹², Ro 12³; 1 P 2⁹, Ro 12¹; 1 P 2⁸⁻¹⁰, Ro 9²³. 24. 25; 1 P 2¹⁸⁻¹⁷, Ro 13¹. 2. 4. 7; 1 P 3⁹, Ro 12¹⁴; 1 P 4⁷⁻¹¹, Ro 12³. 6), so close, indeed, in 1 P 2⁴ and Ro 9²³, that it is all but certain that one Epistle was known to the writer of the other; and Romans must have been the earlier. The more or less obvious relations of Ephesians with 1 Peter (1 P 1³⁻⁴. 7. 9, Eph 1¹³⁻¹⁴; 1 P 1¹³, Eph 3¹⁰; 1 P 2⁴, Eph 2¹⁸⁻²²; 1 P 2¹⁸, Eph 6¹; 1 P 3¹⁻⁷, Eph 5²⁻³; 1 P 3²², Eph 1²⁰⁻²²) justify the opinion that 'the authors of both letters breathed the same atmosphere' (v. Soden).

(f) Hebrews.—Many close verbal parallels are found between these Epistles, and their leading religious conceptions are similar. Both have the same view of faith, of Jesus Christ as an example, and as the One who introduces the believer to God, of His death as the sacrifice ratifying the new covenant and taking away sin. Similar stress is laid on hope and obedience; the fortunes of old Israel are employed in both to illustrate the demand for faith on the part of new Israel, and a similar use is made of the sufferings of the readers. Cf. 1 P 1⁴, He 11¹; 1 P 1²⁰, He 9²; 1 P 2²¹⁻²², He 12¹⁻²; 1 P 4¹⁴ 5¹, He 11²³ 13¹³; 1 P 4¹¹, He 13²¹; 1 P 5¹⁰, He 13²¹. Though direct literary relationship between the two Epistles cannot be affirmed, the authors may have been close friends, and the readers were perhaps similarly situated.

(g) James.—A comparison of 1 P 1¹, Ja 1¹; 1 P 1¹⁴, Ja 1¹¹; 1 P 1²²⁻²³, Ja 1¹¹⁻²²; 1 P 5¹, Ja 4⁶. 10—proves close relationship, but the priority can be determined only on the basis of the date of James.

6. Authorship.—According to the present greeting, this Epistle was written by the Apostle Peter, and this is supported by very strong tradition. Polycarp is the earliest writer who indubitably quotes the Epistle, though it was probably familiar to Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Papias, and perhaps Ignatius. Basilides seems to have known it, and it was rejected by Marcion on doctrinal grounds. It is first quoted as Peter's by Irenæus and Tertullian, and is frequently used by Clement of Alexandria. Its omission from the Muratorian Fragment is not significant; it is contained in the oldest versions, and Eusebius, in full agreement with what we know of early Christian literature, places it among the books which the Church accepted without hesitation. In the Apostolic Fathers, e.g., it is as well attested as Galatians or Ephesians. Harnack suggests that the opening and closing verses were later additions, and that Polycarp did not regard the letter as Peter's; but this hypothesis is utterly without textual support, and both paragraphs are fitted compactly into the Epistle. The chief objections to the Petrine authorship are—(1) the Epistle is said to be so saturated with Pauline ideas that it could not have been written by the Apostle Peter; (2) the readers are Gentile Christians living within territory evangelized by Paul, in which Peter would have been trespassing on the Gentiles (Gal 2⁹); (3) there is a lack of personal reminiscences of the life of Jesus that would be strange in Peter; (4) the use of good Greek and of the LXX would be remarkable in a Galilean fisherman; (5) the persecution referred to in ch. 4 is said to be historically impossible until after the death of Peter.

In answer to (3) reference may be made to 5 (c). (4) is too conjectural to be serious, for 'there is not the slightest presumption against the use of Greek in writings purporting to emanate from the circle of the first believers. They would write as men who had used the language from boyhood' (J. H. Moulton). Silvanus also may have had a large share in the composition of the Epistle. The difficulty of (5) is removed if, as we have seen to be probable, no official Imperial persecution is involved. Little is known of its beginnings in the provinces, though from Acts we learn that the Jews soon stirred up hostility against the Christians. Rome is called Babylon, the idolatrous oppressor of the true Israel. This might have happened whenever the Christians began to realize the awakening hatred of the wicked city, mistress of an empire ruled by a deified Nero, even before the persecution of 64 A.D. Undoubtedly there is a close relationship between this Epistle and Paul's Epistles, closer in thought than in vocabulary. Probably the approximation is nearest in the treatment of morals, as, e.g., marriage, slavery, obedience to civil rulers; and how much of this was common Christian belief and practice. It is, however, striking that in an Epistle so indebted to the Romans the legalistic controversy is passed by, while a different view of righteousness, a change of emphasis as to the import of Christ's death, and a dissimilar conception of the work of the Spirit are manifest. Nor does the Ephesian idea of the Church appeal to this author. He cannot be called a Paulinist. He has been nurtured on prophetic, rather than on Pharisaic, ideals. Doubtless St. Paul, a broadly educated Jew, a Roman citizen, and a man of massive intellect and penetrating insight, influenced St. Peter. This much may be inferred from Gal 2¹⁶⁻¹⁷. On the other hand, St. Paul did not resent St. Peter's visit to Antioch in Gal 2¹¹. Why should not St. Peter, many years later, have written to Churches some of which at least seem not to have been evangelized by St. Paul? But greatly as St. Peter may have been impressed by St. Paul's masterful construction of Christian thought, his character must have been immeasurably more moulded by Jesus, while his own strong temperament, responsive to the prophetic side of his people's religion, would change little with the years. It is precisely the ground-tone of the Epistle—in harmony with the spirit of OT prophecy and of the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels—that makes its Petrine authorship so reasonable.

7. Date.—The belief that St. Peter died in Rome is supported by a very strong chain of evidence, being deducible from Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Papias; and it is held by Dionysius of Corinth, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria. Unless St. Peter had been definitely associated with Rome, it is difficult to understand how he supplanted St. Paul so soon in the capital as the chief Apostle. Evidently the tradition of a 25 years' episcopate has no historical basis, but St. Peter probably came to Rome after St. Paul, and died perhaps in the Neronian persecution of 64, or possibly later. It is in the highest degree probable that St. Peter wrote this Epistle from Rome before A.D. 64. R. A. FALCONER.

PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF.—This Epistle cannot rank with 1 Peter as a Christian classic; indeed, very many would agree with Jülicher that '2 Peter is not only the latest document of the NT, but also the least deserving of a place in the canon.' Nevertheless, it strikes a pure Christian note in its passion for righteousness.

1. Contents.—

(i.) Greeting and exhortation, 1¹⁻¹¹. The Epistle opens with a salutation from Simon Peter to readers who, through the righteousness of God, have been admitted to the full privileges of the Apostolic faith. His prayer for increased blessing upon them, through the knowledge of God and Jesus our Lord, is based on the fact that by the revelation of His glorious excellence His Divine power has made a godly life possible for us, and has given rich promises of our ultimately sharing His nature, when we have escaped from this present world perishing in its lust (vv. 1-4). They are therefore urged to enrich their character with virtues, because only from such a soil will a full knowledge of Jesus Christ grow; and entrance into His eternal Kingdom depends upon forgiveness of sins, and the zealous effort of the believer to make the gospel call effective by a life of virtue (vv. 4-11).

(ii.) The sure witness to the gospel, vv. 12-21. The Apostle will hold himself in readiness to remind his readers of the truth; and since his death may be sudden, he will endeavour to leave them a trustworthy memorial of his teaching; for, unlike the false teachers, Peter was an eye-witness competent to set forth the power and the return of the Lord, having seen the Transfiguration on the Holy Mount. He also heard the Divine voice that confirmed prophecy, to which they must pay heed, since it was given by the Spirit; but prophecy having such an origin can be interpreted only by the voice of God, not by private opinion.

(iii.) The false teachers, ch. 2. An invasion of false teachers is foretold. These men will subvert the gospel of redemption from sin, and cause apostasy in the Church. But their doom at the hand of a righteous God, is no less certain than that of the angels who sinned, or the antediluvian world, or Sodom and Gomorrah; though now also, as then, the few righteous will escape (vv. 1-4). Sensual, irreverent, brutish, and ignorant of spiritual things, they destroy even the sacred Christian feasts by their revelry, and, like Balaam, seek, for their selfish purposes, to lead their victims into fornication, deluding recently converted believers with a false doctrine of freedom. Had these apostates never known the truth, it would have been better for them (vv. 10-22).

(iv.) Warning against scepticism as to the return of the Lord, ch. 3. He reminds his readers that it was foretold as a sign of the end that mockers would deny that the Lord will return, but that both the prophets and the Lord proclaimed a day of Final Judgment. The memory of the Flood should be a warning to the scoffers (vv. 1-7). God's delay is intended to give opportunity for repentance, and His purposes, though slowly maturing, will be brought to pass without warning; but the Day may be hastened by holy living and godliness. This is the teaching also of Paul, whose gospel of grace some are seeking to distort into licence. Safety lies in watchfulness and in growth in the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ (vv. 4-19).

2. Situation of the readers.—Were it not that 2 P 3¹ seems to refer to 1 Peter, no definite information would be found in this letter as to the locality of the readers. It appears to be an Epistle designed to counteract a particular error affecting a district rather than one Church. It may be inferred that the readers were Gentiles (1¹), and were being misled by distortions of the Pauline doctrine of grace (3¹⁶⁻¹⁹), though the Churches were undisturbed by any echoes of the Jewish-Christian controversy. Indifference to Christian morality, inducing a dulled spiritual sense, has made them liable to apostasy under the influence of false teachers who are about to invade the Churches. Some are already at work among them (2¹³⁻¹⁹). They seem to have taken advantage of the privilege of porphyry to spread their libertinism, and to have turned the sacred love-feasts into bestial carousals, holding out, especially to recent converts, the distorted promise of Christian freedom. They satisfied their own avarice and lust, and scoffed at moral responsibility, teaching, it would appear, that there is no resurrection of the body or judgment to come, by playing upon the deferred Christian hope of the Return of the Lord. Apparently they were all of one type, and so wicked as to be compared with the worst sinners of the OT (2⁴, 5, 6, 15). There is no evidence of any speculative system like those of the 2nd cent. Gnosticism, but there are features in common with the practices of the Nicolaitans of the Churches of Pergamum and Thyatira (Rev 2¹³⁻²⁴), though no mention is made of idolatry. A greater affinity may be traced with the Sadducaic spirit of portions of the Jewish and semi-pagan world, where scepticism as to spiritual realities went hand in hand with practical immorality. The cities of Syria or Samaria would be a not improbable situation for the readers of 2 Peter.

3. Purpose of the Epistle.—It is a mistake to confine the purpose of 2 Peter to the refutation of one error, as, e.g., the denial of the Parousia. It is a loud appeal for godly living and faith in the affirmations of the gospel, Scripture, and the Christian conscience. God's promises of mercy and threatenings of judgment are Yea and Amen. The writer aims to impress on his readers: (1) that saving knowledge of Jesus Christ is granted only to the virtuous heart; (2) that Jesus Christ is a present power for a godly life, and is certain to return for judgment; (3) the hideous character of the false teachers and the self-evident doom of themselves and their victims; (4) that delay in the Return of the Lord must be used for repentance, for that Day will surely come.

4. Literary affinities.—(a) The OT.—Though the direct quotations are few (Ps 90⁴ in 3⁸ and probably Pr 26¹¹ in 2², with reminiscences of Is 34⁴ in 3², and Is 65¹⁷ 66²² in 3¹³), the real indebtedness of 2 Pet. to the OT is very great in the historical examples of ch. 2, and in the view of Creation, the Flood, and the Day of the Lord (3³⁻⁶, 7). The influence of Isaiah is manifest (cf. Is 13⁹⁻¹³ 34⁴ 51⁶ 66¹⁸, with 2 P 3⁷, 10); and the use of Proverbs may perhaps be seen in 2 P 2¹⁷ (Pr 10¹¹ 21⁸ 25¹⁴) and in 2 P 2²⁴ (Pr 12²⁸ 16¹⁷, 21).

(b) Book of Enoch.—It cannot be doubted that Enoch 9¹ 10⁴⁻⁶ 18¹¹⁻²¹ has influenced 2 P 2⁴, 11.

(c) The Gospels.—The most obvious references are in 2 P 1¹⁶⁻¹⁸, which agrees fundamentally, though not precisely, with the Synoptic narratives of the Transfiguration, and in 1¹⁴, which seems to point to the incident in Jn 21¹⁴, 19. The Synoptic eschatology also, along with OT prophecy, has influenced 2 Peter (cf. Mk 13²⁴, 25, 26, 31 || and 2 P 3¹⁰⁻¹²; Mt 19²⁸ 25³¹, Lk 21²⁸⁻²⁹ and 2 P 3¹³, 15). Mt 11²⁷, 29 || and the parable of the Sower (Lk 8¹⁰, 15) throw much light on 2 P 1²⁻⁸; and Mt 12²⁸, 29 43-45 on 2 P 2¹³⁻²¹.

(d) The Pauline Epistles.—Of these there are very few traces, though 2 P 1¹³ may be compared with 2 Co 5¹; 2 P 2¹⁹ with Ro 6¹⁶; 2 P 3¹⁴ with 1 Th 3¹³ 5², and 2 P 3¹⁶ with Ro 2⁴ 9². There are verbal similarities with the Pastoral Epistles, but probably they do not involve anything more than a wide-spread similar atmosphere. According to 3¹⁴, 15, the author seems to know all St. Paul's correspondence, but he shows astonishingly little evidence of its influence.

(e) Jude.—One of these Epistles must have been used by the author of the other, but there is great diversity of opinion as to the priority, the prevailing view at present being apparently in favour of the priority of Jude, though Zahn and Bigg are strong advocates of 2 Peter. The question is really indeterminate, and, apart from the external testimony of the one to the other, has little bearing on the authorship.

(f) 1 Peter.—(1.) Differences. These are many and serious. 1 Peter is written in fluent Hellenistic Greek while the style of 2 Peter is almost pseudo-literary, and its words are often quite uncommon. 1 Peter quotes largely from the LXX, the use of which can hardly be detected in 2 Peter. The Divine names are different, and different conceptions of Christ's work and of the Christian life are emphasized—in 1 Peter Jesus is the Messiah whose sufferings, death, and resurrection are the leading motives for the Christian life; in 2 Peter Christ is 'Saviour,' who brings power for a godly life to all who have knowledge of Him. Hope and joy are the notes of 1 Peter, which was written to readers who are buoyed up in suffering by faith in and love to their risen Lord. In 2 Peter false teaching instead of persecution is a source of danger; knowledge takes the place of hope, and piety that of holiness.

(ii.) Resemblances [cf. (i.)].—These are manifold and striking. Both Epistles are influenced greatly by Isaiah and in some measure by Proverbs and Enoch. Both teach that Jesus Christ is progressively revealed to the believer, the Parousia being the fulfilment of the Transfiguration or the Resurrection (1 P 1¹³ 4¹³ 5¹, 2 P 1¹³ 4¹⁶). Both emphasize the fact of the Parousia and of Divine judgment; Noah and the Flood are used as examples in both. A similar conception of the Holy Spirit, unique in the NT, is found in 1 P 1¹⁰⁻¹² and 2 P 1¹⁸⁻²¹. In both the Christian life is regarded as a growth from seed (1 P 1¹³, 2 P 1⁸ 3¹⁸); obedience to the truth, emphasized in 1 P 1¹² and 2 P 2², brings the favourite virtue of steadfastness (1 P 2⁵ 5¹⁰, 2 P 1¹⁰ 3¹⁷). The law of holy living confers true freedom (1 P 1¹⁵, 2 P 2¹⁰ 3¹⁴). The virtues of 2 P 1⁵⁻⁷ are paralleled in 1 Peter, being those of a gentle, orderly, patient, kindly life of goodness; and in both the Christian life is regarded as a pilgrimage to an eternal inheritance; (1 P 1¹, 4, 2 P 1¹¹, 13, 14).

5. Testimony of later Christian Literature.—Until the 3rd cent. the traces of 2 Peter are very few. It was evidently known to the author of the Apocalypse of Peter (c. 150 A.D.), though this is questioned without sufficient reason by some scholars. The first certain quotation is found in Firmilian of Caesarea in Cappadocia (c. 250); probably it was used by Clement of Alexandria; and Origen knew it, but doubted its genuineness. While Eusebius himself did not accept the Epistle, he placed it, in deference to general opinion, among the 'disputed' books. It is not referred to by the scholars of Antioch, nor is it in the Peshitta, the common version of the Syrian Church. The oldest Latin versions also seem not to have contained it; possibly it was absent from the original of Codex B, but it is found in the Egyptian versions. Jerome, and afterwards Erasmus and Calvin, harboured doubts about its genuineness.

6. Authorship.—It will have been evident that there is much in this Epistle to justify the doubt as to its genuineness which has been entertained by many of the greatest Christian teachers from the early centuries; and recent scholarship has not yet relieved the difficulties in the way of accepting the Petrine authorship. They are (1) the remarkable divergence from the First Epistle, which seems to be too radical to be explained by the employment of different amanuenses; (2) the inferior style of the Epistle, its lack of restraint and its discontinuity, notably in 1¹²⁻²¹ and ch. 2; (3) the absence of an early Christian atmosphere, together with a tone of disappointment because the promise of Christ to return has been long deferred (3¹); (4) the appeal to the three authorities of the primitive Catholic Church—the Prophets, the Lord, and the Apostles (1¹⁹⁻²¹ 3²); (5) the reference to St. Paul's letters as 'Scripture'; (6) the extremely meagre external evidence.

Of these difficulties the gravest are (1) and (6). It is almost impossible to hold that the author of 1 Peter could have described his letter in the words of 2 P 3¹, and have regarded 2 Peter as a sequel to the same readers. It has, however, been suggested that 2 Peter was written earlier than 1 Peter, and that the Epistles were composed by different amanuenses for different readers. But this hypothesis has not met with much favour. The insufficient witness is also serious, and though singly the other difficulties may be removed, their cumulative effect is too much for a letter already heavily burdened. But if the evidence is against direct Petrine authorship, is the book to be summarily banished into the middle of the 2nd cent. as entirely pseudonymous? Probably not. (1) There are no features of the Epistle which necessarily extrude it from the 1st century. Doubts as to the Parousia and similar false teaching were not unknown in the Apostolic age, and some of the most distinctive features of the 2nd cent., such as developed Gnosticism and Chiliasm, are conspicuous by their absence. Also the reference to St. Paul's letters as 'Scripture' is not decisive, for in view of the insistence upon 'written prophecy' and its origin (1¹⁹⁻²¹) it is doubtful whether St. Paul is ranked with the OT prophets. But in any case, by the time of 1 Clement there was a collection of St. Paul's letters which would be read in churches with some Scriptural authority. Finally, there is much to be said for the view that not the OT Scriptures, but other Christian writings, are referred to in 3¹⁶. (2) 2 Peter contains a large distinctively Petrine element. It has already been shown that 1 and 2 Peter have much in common. They present a non-Pauline conception of Christianity, shared by them in common with the Gospel of Mark and the speeches of Peter in Acts. In Mk. and in 2 Peter Jesus Christ is the strong Son of God, whose death ransomed sinners, and whose return to judgment is described in generally similar outlines. In the Epistle stress is laid on repentance, as in the opening of Mk. and in Acts (2 P 3⁹⁻¹⁵), and there is a striking similarity between Ac 3¹⁹⁻²¹ and 2 P 3¹¹, 12. Likewise the Christian life is regarded as the fulfilment of the new law, and the parables in Mk. of the planting and growth of the seed, supply suggestive parallels for both 1 and 2 Peter. Both Epistles, like the speeches in Acts, are Hebrew in spirit, and are influenced by prophetic motives.

Perhaps the solution that will best suit the facts is to assume that a disciple of Peter, who remembered how his master had dealt with an attack of Sadducaic sensuality in some of the Palestinian Churches, being confronted with a recrudescence of similar evil, re-edited his teaching. This will do justice to the moral earnestness and the true Christian note of the Epistle.

PETHAHIAH.—1. The head of the nineteenth priestly course (1 Ch 24¹⁶). 2. A Levite (Ezr 10²², Neh 9⁴); in 1 Es 9²² Patheus. 3. A Judahite officer (Neh 11²⁴).

PETHOR.—Mentioned in Nu 22⁵ and Dt 23⁴ as the home of Balaam, in N. Mesopotamia, when he was called by Balak to curse Israel. With this indication agrees the repeated statement by king Shalmaneser II. of Assyria regarding a certain city which he calls Pitru, that it lay on the river Sāgūr (modern Sāḡūr), near its junction with the Euphrates. Thus Pethor would seem to have lain a little south of Carchemish, on the west of the Euphrates.

PHANUEL.—The mother of Anna (Lk 2³⁶).

PHARAKIM.—A family of Nethinim (1 Es 5³¹).

PHARAOH.—The later Egyptian royal title, Per-o, 'Great House,' adopted into Hebrew. Originally designating the royal establishment in Egypt, it gradually became the appellative title of the king, and from the 22nd Dyn. (c. B.C. 950) onwards was regularly attached to the king's name in popular speech. The Hebrew Pharaoh-necho and Pharaoh-hophra are thus precise renderings of Egyptian. Shishak also was entitled Per-o Sheshonk in Egyptian, but apparently Hebrew had not yet adopted the novel fashion, and so gave his name without Pharaoh (1 K 11⁴⁰ 14²⁶). Tirhakah is not entitled Pharaoh as in Egyptian documents, but is more accurately described as king of Cush (2 K 19⁹).

The following Pharaohs are referred to without their names being specified: 1. Pharaoh of Abram (Gn 12¹⁰⁻²⁰), impossible to identify. The title Pharaoh and the mention of camels appear to be anachronisms in the story. 2. Pharaoh of Joseph (Gn 39 etc.). The proper names in the story, viz. Potiphar, Potiphara, Asenath, Zaphenath-paneah are at once recognizable (when the vocalization is discounted) as typical names (Petepre, Esneit, Zepnetefonkh) of the late period beginning with the 22nd Dyn. (c. B.C. 950), and ending in the reign of Darius (c. B.C. 500). It has been conjectured that the Pharaoh of Joseph was one of the Hyksos kings, but it is not advisable to press for historical identifications in this beautiful legend. 3. and 4. The Pharaohs of the Oppression and the Exodus. The name of Rameses, given to a store-city built by the Hebrews (Ex 1¹¹), points to one of the kings named Rameses in the 19th-20th Dyn. as the Pharaoh of the Oppression. The chief of these was Rameses II. (c. B.C. 1350), after whom several towns were named. He was perhaps the greatest builder in Egyptian history. His son Minpehah might be the Pharaoh of the Exodus: but from the fifth year of Minpehah there is an Egyptian record of the destruction of 'Israel,' who, it would seem, were already in Palestine. At present it is impossible to ascertain the proportion of historical truth contained in the legends of the Exodus. 5. 1 Ch 4¹⁸, 'Bithiah, daughter of Pharaoh': no clue to identity. Bithiah is Heb., and not like an Egypt. name. 6. 1 K 3¹ 9¹⁶ 24 11¹, Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon, must be one of the feeble kings of the end of the 21st Dynasty. 7. 1 K 11¹⁸, the Pharaoh who befriended Hadad the Edomite in the last days of Solomon, and gave him the sister of his queen Tahpenes: not identified. (At this point in the narrative Shishak comes in: he is never called Pharaoh, see above.) 8. Pharaoh, king of Egypt in 2 K 18²⁸, Is 36⁶ etc., perhaps as a general term for the Egyptian king, not pointing to any individual. In the time of Sennacherib and Hezekiah, Tirhakah or some earlier king of the Ethiopian Dynasty would be on the throne. 9. For Jer 37, Ezk 29, see HOPHRA. F. L. GRIFFITH.

PHARATHON.—Named, with Timnath and Tephon, among the cities which Bacchides 'strengthened with high walls, with gates and with bars' (1 Mac 9⁴⁰). Some authorities read with LXX 'Timnath-pharathon,' as indicating one place. Conder suggests Per'on, about 15 miles W. of Nablus. This seems to be too far to the north, as the towns mentioned are all 'in Judæa.' It may possibly be Per'ata, 6 miles S.W. of Nablus, although the same difficulty exists in a modified degree. Cf. PIRATHON. W. EWING.

PHARIDA.—See PERIDA.

PHARISEES.—A study of the four centuries before Christ supplies a striking illustration of the law that the deepest movements of history advance without the men, who in God's plan are their agents, being clearly aware of what is going on. The answer to the question—How came the Pharisees into the place of power and prestige they held in the time of our Lord? involves a clear understanding of the task of Israel after the Exile. It was to found and develop a new type of community. The Hebrew monarchy had been thrown into perpetual bankruptcy. But monarchy was the only form that the political principle could assume in the East. What should be put in its place? In solving this problem the Jews created a community which, while it was half-State, was also half-Church. The working capital of the Jews was the monotheism of the prophets, the self-revelation of God in His character of holy and creative Unity, and, inseparable from this, the belief in the perfectibility and indestructibility of the Chosen Nation (the Messianic idea). Prophecy ceased. Into the place of the prophet came the school-master and the drill-master. They popularized monotheism, making it a national instinct. Necessarily, the popularization of monotheism drew along with it a growing sense of superiority to the heathen and idolatrous nations amongst whom their lot was cast. And by the same necessity the Jews were taught to separate themselves from their heathen neighbours (Ezr 10¹¹). They must not intermarry, lest the nation be dragged down to the heathen level. This was the state of things in the 3rd cent. B.C. (see ESSENEAN), when Hellenism began to threaten Judaism with annihilation. The deepest forces of Judaism sounded the rally. The more zealous Jews drew apart, calling themselves the 'Holy Men' (Chasidim), Puritans, or those self-dedicated to the realization of Ezra's ideal. Then came the great war. The tendencies of Judaism precipitated themselves. The Jewish Puritans became a distinct class called the 'Pharisees,' or men who separated themselves from the heathen, and no less from the heathenizing tendencies and forces in their own nation. They abstained even from table-fellowship with the heathen as being an abominable thing (Gal 2²³). As years went on it became more and more clear that the heart of the nation was with them. And so it comes to pass that in our Lord's time, to use His own words, 'the scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat' (Mt 23²). They, not the priests, are the source of authority.

The history of Pharisaism enables us to understand its spirit and ruling ideas, to do justice to its greatness, while emphasizing its limitations and defects. Into it went the deepest elements among the forces which built the Jewish church and nation. The Pharisees are seen at their best when contrasted with the Zealots (see CANANEAN) on the one side and the Herodians (wh. see) on the other. Unlike the latter, they were deeply in earnest with their ancestral religion. Again and again at critical times they showed the vigour and temper of fearless Puritanism. Unlike the former, they held back from the appeal to force, believing that the God of the nation was in control of history, that in His own good time He would grant the nation its desire; that, meanwhile, the duty of a true Israelite was whole-hearted devotion to the Torah, joined to patient waiting on the Divine will. This nobler side of Pharisaism could find itself in Ps 119. The Pharisees were in a sense Churchmen rather than statesmen. And they emphasized spiritual methods. Their interests lay in the synagogue, in the schooling of children, in missionary extension amongst the heathen. They deserved the power and prestige which we find them holding in our Lord's time. The Master Himself seems to say this when He distinguishes between their rightful authority and the spirit which they often showed in their actions (Mt 23⁴). Hence we are not surprised when we learn that, after the conflicts with Rome (A.D. 66-135), Pharisaism became practically synonymous with Judaism. One great war (the Maccabæan) had defined Pharisaism. Another war, even more terrible, gave it the final victory. The two wars together created the Judaism known to Europeans and Americans. And this, allowing for the inevitable changes which a long and varied experience brings to pass in the most tenacious race, is in substance the Pharisaism of the 2nd century.

A wide historical study discovers moral dignity and greatness in Pharisaism. The Pharisees, as contrasted with the Sadducees (wh. see), represented the democratic tendency. As contrasted with the priesthood, they stood both for the democratic and for the spiritualizing tendency. The priesthood was a close corporation. No man who was unable to trace his descent from a priestly family could exercise any function in the Temple. But the Pharisees and the Scribes opened a great career to all the talents. Furthermore, the priesthood exhausted itself in the ritual of the Temple. But the Pharisees found their main function in teaching and preaching. So Pharisaism cleared the ground for Christianity. And when the reader goes through his NT with this point in mind, and when he notes the striking freedom of the NT from ritualistic and sacerdotal ideas, he should give credit to Pharisaism as one of the historical forces which made these supreme qualities possible.

We have not yet exhausted the claims of the Pharisees on our interest and gratitude. It was they who, for the most part, prepared the ground for Christianity by taking the Messianic idea and working it into the very texture of common consciousness. Pharisaism was inseparable from the popularization of monotheism, and the universal acceptance by the nation of its Divine election and calling. We need only consider our Lord's task to see how much preparatory work the Pharisees did. Contrast the Saviour with Gautama (Buddha), and the greatness of His work is clearly seen. Buddha teaches men the way of peace by thinking away the political and social order of things. But our Lord took the glorified nationalism of His nation as the trunk-stock of His thought, and upon it grafted the Kingdom of God. Now, it was the Pharisees who made 'dealized nationalism, based upon the monotheism of the prophets, the pith and marrow of Judaism. It was they who wrote the great Apocalypses (Daniel and Enoch). It was they who made the belief in immortality and resurrection part of the common consciousness. It was they who trained the national will and purpose up to the level where the Saviour could use it.

But along with this great work went some lamentable defects and limitations. Though they stood for the spiritualizing tendencies which looked towards the existence of a Church, the Pharisees never reached the Church idea. They made an inextricable confusion between the question of the soul and the question of descent from Abraham. They developed the spirit of proud and arrogant orthodoxy, until the monotheism of the prophets became in their hands wholly incompetent to found a society where Jew and Gentile should be one (Gal 3²³, Col 3¹¹). They developed Sabbatarianism until reverence for the Sabbath became a superstition, as our Lord's repeated clash with them goes to show. And in spite of many noble individual exceptions, the deepest tendency of Pharisaism was towards an over-valuation of external things, Levitical correctness and precision (Mt 23²³), that made their spirit strongly antagonistic to the genius of Prophetism. For Prophetism, whether of the Old or of the New Dispensation, threw the whole emphasis on character. And so, when John the Baptist, the first prophet for many centuries, came on the field, he put himself in mortal opposition to the Pharisees, no less than to the Sadducees (Mt 3⁷, Jn 1¹⁰). And our Lord, embodying the moral essence of Prophetism, found His most dangerous opponents, until the end of His ministry, not in the Sadducees or the Essenes or the Zealots, but in the Pharisees.

PHARPAR.—A river of Damascus mentioned with the Abanah (2 K 5¹²) by Naaman as contrasting favourably with the Jordan. Its identification is by no means so certain as that of Abanah with the Barada. The most probable is that suggested by Thomson, namely, the 'Awaj, a river rising east of Hermon. A wady near, but not tributary to, one of its sources is called the Wady Barbar, which may possibly be a reminiscence of the ancient name. The principal obstacle to this identification is the distance of the river from the city; but Naaman was perhaps thinking as much of the fertile plain of Damascus as of the city itself. Other identifications have been with either the river flowing from 'Ain Fijeh, or else one or other of the canals fed by the Barada.

PHASELIS is mentioned 1 Mac 15²³ as a city to which the Romans in B.C. 139 sent letters on behalf of the Jews. It was at the E. extremity of the coast of Lycia, a Dorian colony which apparently always maintained its independence of the rest of Lycia. Its early importance was due to its position in the trade between the Ægean and the Levant. Its alliance with Cilician pirates caused it to be captured by Servilius Isauricus in B.C. 77, and it seems never to have recovered its former importance. It was a bishopric in the Byzantine period.

PHILADELPHIA was a city of Lydia, 28 miles from Sardis, in the valley of the Cogamis, a tributary of the Hermus, and conveniently situated for receiving the trade between the great central plateau of Asia Minor and Smyrna. The district known as Katakekaumene ('Burnt Region'), because of its volcanic character, rises immediately to the N.E. of Philadelphia, and this was a great vine-producing region.

Philadelphia was founded and named by Attalus Philadelphus of Pergamus before B.C. 138. It was liable to serious earthquakes, but remained an important centre of the Roman province of Asia, receiving the name of Neo-Cæsarea from Tiberius, and, later on, the honour of the Neocorate (i.e. the wardenship of the temple for Emperor-worship). There is no record of the beginning of the Church at Philadelphia, but in the Apocalypse it is one of the seven churches to which, as heads of districts, special messages are sent. In its message (Rev 3¹²) it is said to have 'a little strength' (which perhaps refers to its recent origin), and to have set before it 'an open door,' which seems to refer to the opportunities it had of spreading the gospel in the centre of Asia Minor. In 3⁹ 'the synagogue of Satan which say they are Jews and are not' must mean that the Jews of Philadelphia had been lax, and had conceded too much to Gentile ways. But the message contains no reproach against the Christians, although they are bidden to hold fast that which they have, and the promise to him that overcometh is that 'I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, . . . and mine own new name.' Doubtless there is a reference here, as in the message to Pergamus, to the new name taken at baptism, and apparently sometimes kept secret.

Philadelphia was the seat of a bishop, but was not a metropolis until about A.D. 1300, when the importance of Sardis had become less. In the 14th cent., when the Greek Empire retained nothing on the mainland of Asia except a strip of territory opposite Constantinople, Philadelphia still resisted the Ottoman arms, though far from the sea and almost forgotten by the Emperors. In the words of Gibbon (ch. xiv): 'Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins: a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same.' The date of its final capture is uncertain—probably A.D. 1391. Its modern name is Ala-Sheher, and a considerable portion of the population is Christian.

PHILEMON.—Known only as the person addressed by St. Paul on behalf of the runaway slave Onesimus (Philem 1). The closeness of the personal tie between him and the Apostle is expressed in the terms 'beloved and fellow-worker,' and appears in the familiar confidence with which St. Paul presses his appeal. From Col 4⁹ it seems that Onesimus, and therefore Philemon, resided in Colossæ; Archippus, too, who is joined with Philemon in the salutation, is a Colossian (Col 4¹⁷), and there is no reason to doubt the natural supposition that St. Paul's greeting is to husband, wife (Apphia), and son, with the church in Philemon's house. That he was of good position is suggested not only by his possession of slaves, but also by his ministry to the saints and by Paul's hope to lodge with him (Philem 5²). He apparently owed his conversion to St. Paul (v. 19), possibly during the long ministry in Ephesus (Ac 19¹⁰), for the Apostle had not himself visited Colossæ (Col 2¹).

S. W. GREEN.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.—1. Occasion and contents.

—This beautiful private letter, unique in the NT, purports to be from St. Paul (with whose name that of Timothy is joined, as in 1 and 2 Thess., 2 Cor., Philipp., Col.) to Philemon, with Apphia and Archippus, and the church in his house. This plural address appears, quite naturally, in vv. 2 and 2⁸ ('you'); otherwise the letter is to Philemon alone ('thee'). St. Paul is a 'prisoner' (vv. 1, 9, 13),—a first link of connexion between this letter and Philippians (17, 18 etc.), Eph (3¹ 4¹ 6²⁰), and Col. (4³ 16); with Col. there is also close connexion in the fact that Onesimus was a Colossian (Col 4⁹), and in the salutations in both Epistles from Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke. It is almost certain that the letter was sent from Rome (not Cæsarea) to Colossæ, along with the Colossian Epistle, by Tychicus and Onesimus, to be handed to Philemon by the runaway slave, who at St. Paul's instance was returning to the master he had wronged by embezzlement and flight. Onesimus had in some way become known to the Apostle, who had won him to the Christian faith (v. 10). St. Paul regards him as his 'child,' his 'very heart,' a 'brother beloved' (vv. 10, 12, 16), and would fain keep his helpful ministry (vv. 13, 14). But the convert must first put himself right by voluntary surrender: his service belongs to Philemon, and, however desired by St. Paul, can be accepted by him only if his friend's free will (v. 14). So St. Paul sends the slave back, with this letter to secure his forgiveness and the welcome of one Christian brother for another (vv. 16-17). He founds his appeal on what he has heard of Philemon's love 'toward all the saints' (vv. 4-7, 9); yet makes it also a personal request from 'Paul the aged and now a prisoner,' who has claims upon Philemon's service (vv. 9, 14, 17, 20), with just a hint of an authority which he will not press (vv. 8, 19, 21, 'obedience'). A wistful humour appears in the play on the meaning of the name Onesimus; 'I beseech thee for Profitable, who was aforetime unprofitable, but now is profitable . . . Yea, let me have profit of thee' (vv. 11, 20); also when at v. 19 St. Paul himself takes the pen and with playful solemnity (cf., for the solemn formula 'I Paul,' 1 Co 16²¹, 2 Co 10¹, Col 4¹⁸, 2 Th 3¹⁷) gives his bond for the debt, 'I Paul write it with my own hand, I will repay it.' (It is possible, though less probable, that the Greek tense should be rendered 'I have written,' and that the previous verse also, if not the whole letter, is by St. Paul's hand.) Indeed, the mingled earnestness, tact, and charm amply endorse Renan's verdict—'a little masterpiece': the letter exemplifies the Apostle's own precept as to 'speech seasoned with salt' (Col 4⁶), and shows the perfect Christian gentleman.

2. Teaching.—It is significant for the depth and sincerity of St. Paul's religious faith that this private letter in its salutation, thanksgiving, and benediction is as loftily devout as any Epistle to the Churches. Apart from this, the dogmatic interest lies in its illustration of Christianity at work. The relation of master and slave comes into conflict with that of the Christian communion or fellowship: the problem is whether that fellowship will prove 'effective in the knowledge of every good thing which is in you unto Christ,' and the slave be received as a brother. St. Paul does not ask that Onesimus be set free. It may even be doubted whether 'the word emancipation seems to be trembling on his lips' (Lightfoot, Col. v. 321): if it is, it is rather that Onesimus may be permitted to return to continue his ministry to the imprisoned Apostle than that Christianity, as he conceives it, forbids slavery. That institution is not in St. Paul's judgment to be violently ended, though it is to be regulated by the Christian principle of equality and responsibility before God (Eph 6⁵⁻⁹, Col 3²²⁻⁴); to the slave himself his worldly position should be matter of indifference (1 Co 7²¹⁻²⁴). Yet if Philemon should choose to assert his rights, it will mean a fatal breach in Christian 'fellowship' and the rejection of a Christian 'brother.' Thus St. Paul laid down the principle which inevitably worked itself out—though not till the 19th cent.—into the impossibility of slavery within a Christian nation. Christians long and strenuously defended it: Christianity, and not least this letter, destroyed it.

3. Authenticity.—The external testimony is full and consistent, although so short and personal a letter might easily lack recognition. It is contained in the Syriac and Old Latin Versions, and named in the Muratorian Fragment. Marcion accepted it (Tert. adv. Marc. v. 21). Origen quotes from it three times, in each case as St. Paul's. Eusebius includes it among the undisputed books. On internal grounds it may fairly be claimed that the letter speaks for its own genuineness. Some modern critics (since F. C. Baur) have questioned its authenticity, mainly because they reject Colossians, with which this letter is so closely connected. As Renan writes: 'If the epistle is apocryphal, the private letter is apocryphal also; now, few pages have so clear an accent of truth. Paul alone, it would seem, could have written this little masterpiece' (St. Paul, p. xi.). But it must suffice here to affirm as the all but universal judgment, that 'Philemon belongs to the least doubtful part of the Apostle's work' (Jülicher, Introd. to NT, p. 127).

4. Date and place of writing.—The argument for Rome as against Cæsarea (Meyer, etc.) seems decisive. Opinion is greatly divided as to the order of the Epistles of the Captivity, i.e. whether Philippians or the group Eph.-Col.-Philem. is the earlier (see Lightfoot, Philip. pp. 33-46). In either case the limit of date for Philem. lies between c. A.D. 60-62, and the later date is suggested by vv. 21, 22 (see COLOSSIANS and PHILIPPIANS).

S. W. GREEN.

PHILETUS.—Mentioned in St. Paul's Epistle to Timothy (2 Ti 2¹⁷) as an example of one of those who were doing harm by their false teaching on the subject of the resurrection of the body. For them the resurrection was past. It was a spiritual resurrection from sin to holiness, and there was no future resurrection of the body, no life to come. St. Paul says their teaching will eat away the true doctrine as a canker or gangrene eat away the flesh. Cf. HYMENÆUS.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

PHILIP (Apocr.).—1. Father of Alexander the Great (1 Mac 1¹ 6³). 2. A friend or foster-brother (2 Mac 9²⁹) of Antiochus Epiphanes, who received the charge (previously given to Lysias) of bringing up the young Antiochus Eupator (1 Mac 6¹⁴). On the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Lysias took upon himself to proclaim young Eupator king (b.c. 164). The jealousy over this matter led to open hostilities between Lysias and Philip. Philip was overcome by Lysias at Antioch and put to death. He is by many regarded as identical with—3. A Phrygian who (in B.C. 168), when left in charge of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes, was remarkable for the cruelty of his government (2 Mac 5²² 6¹¹). Little more is known of him unless the details of his life be filled up by assuming his identity with the former Philip. 4. A king of Macedonia (B.C. 220–179) overthrown by the Romans (1 Mac 8⁵). T. A. Moxon.

PHILIP (NT).—1. The Apostle (Mt 10²—Mk 3¹⁸—Lk 6¹⁴); one of the disciples whom Jesus won at Bethany beyond Jordan in the morning of His ministry (Jn 12²⁸⁻³¹). He was a fellow-townsmen of Andrew and Peter (v. 4), and seems to have had a special friendship with the former (Jn 6⁸ 12²¹ 22). He was of a timid and retiring disposition. He did not, like Andrew and John, approach Jesus, but waited till Jesus accosted him and invited him to join His company. Andrew and John found Jesus (v. 4); Jesus found Philip (v. 4). This characteristic gives some countenance to the tradition that the disciple who would fain have declined the Lord's call that he might 'go and bury his father' (Lk 9⁵⁹ 60—Mt 8²¹ 22), was none other than Philip. Though somewhat slow of heart and dull in spiritual understanding (cf. Jn 14⁸ 9), he had his aptitudes. He had a turn for practical affairs, and, just as Judas was treasurer to the Apostolic company, so Philip was purveyor, attending to the commissariat (Bengel on Jn 6⁵). If Andrew was the first missionary of the Kingdom of heaven, bringing his brother Simon to Jesus (Jn 1⁴⁰⁻⁴²), Philip was the second, bringing his friend Nathanael (vv. 45, 46). It is said that after the departure of Jesus he laboured in Asia Minor and was buried at Hierapolis.

2. The Evangelist.—It was soon found necessary in the Apostolic Church that there should be a division of labour; and that the Twelve might give themselves without distraction to prayer and the ministry of the word, seven of the brethren were set apart for the management of the business matters of the Church (Ac 6¹⁻⁶). Philip was one of these. He seems to have been a Hellenist, i.e. a Greek-speaking Jew; at all events he was a man of liberal sympathies, and he greatly helped in the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles. He was in fact the forerunner of St. Paul. During the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen, he preached in Samaria (Ac 8¹⁻⁴). He was instrumental in the conversion of the chamberlain of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, thus introducing Christianity into that historic heathen country (8²⁶⁻³⁹). On parting from the chamberlain he went to Azotus (Ashdod), and travelled along the sea-board, preaching from city to city, till he reached Caesarea (v. 40). There he settled, and there he was still residing with his four unmarried daughters, who were prophetesses, when Paul visited Caesarea on his last journey to Jerusalem. The two men were like-minded, and it is no wonder that Paul abode with him during his stay at Caesarea (21⁸ 9).

3. Herod Philip.—See HEROD. DAVID SMITH.

PHILIPPI was a city situated E. of Mt. Pangæus, on the E. border of Macedonia, about 10 miles from the coast. It was originally (under the name of Crenides) a settlement of Thasians, who mined the gold of Mt. Pangæus; but one of the early acts of Philip of Macedon was to assure himself of revenue by selling these mines and strongly fortifying the city, to which he gave his own name. The mines are said to have yielded him 1000 talents a year. Philippi passed with the rest of Macedonia to the Romans in B.C. 168. Until B.C. 146 Macedonia was divided into four regions, with separate governments, and so divided that a member of one could not marry or hold property in another. But in 146 it received the more regular organization of a province. The great Eastern road of the Roman Empire, the Via Egnatia, after crossing the Strymon at Amphipolis, kept N. of Mt. Pangæus to Philippi and then turned S.E. to Neapolis, which was the port of Philippi. Philippi stood on the steep side of a hill, and immediately S. of it lay a large marshy lake.

The Church at Philippi was founded by St. Paul on his second missionary journey. With Silas, Timothy, and Luke he landed at Neapolis, and proceeded to Philippi, which St. Luke describes as 'a city of Macedonia, the first of the district, a Roman colony.' Philippi was not the capital city of either of the regions into which Macedonia had been divided in 168, but the most natural explanation of the phrase 'first of the district' is that the province had at this time a division for official purposes of which we do not know. Other explanations are that it means 'the first city we arrived at' (which the Greek could scarcely mean), or that Philippi claimed a pre-eminence in much the same way that Pergamus, Smyrna, Ephesus all claimed to be the 'first city' of Asia. It had become a Roman colony after the battle of Philippi, B.C. 42, when Octavian and Antony, having vanquished Brutus and Cassius, settled a number of their veterans there. Another body of veterans was settled there after Actium, B.C. 31. As a colony its constitution was modelled on the ancient one of Rome, and its two chief magistrates had not only lictors (EV serjeants), but also a jurisdiction independent of that of the governor of the province. It was the first essentially Roman town in which St. Paul preached. There was no synagogue, but on the Sabbath, says St. Luke, 'we went forth without the gate by a river-side where we supposed there was a place of prayer.' At this place, therefore, St. Paul found a number of women assembled, Jewesses or proselytes, one of whom named Lydia (wh. see), a merchant in purple from Thyatira, was immediately converted and baptized. For the subsequent incidents see PYTHON, MAGISTRATE, etc.

It is probable that the Church at Philippi was left in charge of St. Luke, for at this point in the narrative of the Acts the first person is dropped until St. Paul passes through Macedonia on his return from the third missionary journey (20⁶). The Church flourished, and always remained on terms of peculiar affection with St. Paul, being allowed to minister to his needs more than once. See art. PHILIPPIANS [EPISTLE TO], which was probably written during his first imprisonment at Rome. From 1 Ti 1³ we assume at least one later visit of the Apostle to Philippi.

Before A.D. 117 Ignatius passed through Philippi on his journey from Antioch to his martyrdom in Rome. He was welcomed by the Church, and they wrote a letter of consolation to the Church of Antioch and another to Polycarp of Smyrna, asking for copies of any letters that Ignatius had written in Asia. Polycarp wrote his Epistle to the Philippians in answer. In the 4th and 5th centuries we read of the bishop of Philippi as present at Councils, but apart from this the Church passes out of history. A. E. HILLARD.

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO.—1. The Church of Philippi.—St. Paul visited Philippi on his second missionary journey, and founded there his first Church in Europe. The names in Ph 4¹¹, probably those of early converts, lead us to infer that the Gentile element continued strong from the days when the Church began in the households of Lydia and the jailor (Ac 16¹²⁻⁴⁰). It is only by the exercise of much imagination that the character of the city—a Roman colony enjoying the jus italicum, and therefore with a sense of its own importance—can be discerned in the letter, though probably the fact that St. Paul was a Roman citizen, and the virtual apology with which he was sent away by the prætors, may have had some effect on the subsequent treatment of the Christians. As one of the Churches of Macedonia referred to in 2 Co 8²³, it was doubtless in deep poverty, but is held forth along with them as a model of liberality. St. Paul seems to have treated the Philippians in an exceptional way, by accepting from them support which he ordinarily refused (2 Co 11¹⁶, Ph 4¹⁵). He must have visited Philippi at least three times (Ac 16⁴⁰

2 Co 2¹⁴, Ac 20⁶), and he always found his own love reciprocated by the Church, and experienced a unique joy in their fellowship with him for the furtherance of the gospel (Ph 1²⁻⁸). The Apostle's ascendancy in the Church was never questioned, as in Corinth. There were, it is true, rivalries in the congregation, especially, it would seem, among some of the active women of the Church, and St. Paul does not hesitate to use the most powerful of Christian motives to give force and direction to the shaft that he aims at discord (2¹⁻¹¹). But, unlike the Churches of Galatia, Philippi had not been disturbed by a severe attack from the Judaists, though the Apostle sees threatening indications of their approach (3², 18¹). The Church was organized with bishops and deacons, from whom St. Paul seems to have received the people's gift (1¹), which they sent by Epaphroditus, probably with a letter. In no part of his missionary field, so far as we know, did he find such a pure Christian life. They were 'lights in the world' (2¹⁵, 16), and the Apostle's 'joy and crown' (4¹).

2. Situation of St. Paul.—The Apostle is a prisoner (17¹², 14, 17). It appears that his imprisonment had become more rigorous since the Philippians received their first word concerning him; and it must have been of some duration, because there had been several communications between them (22³⁰, 41⁹). They are distressed by the fear that the gospel will suffer through his strict confinement and possible martyrdom. But this imprisonment, instead of hindering the gospel, has really led to a more eager preaching of Christ by the Christians of the city of Rome. The motive of this increased activity was sometimes an unworthy emulation of the Apostle, and there must have been those in the Church who refused to acknowledge his leadership, being aroused by the success with which 'his bonds became manifest throughout all the Prætorium and to all the rest' (1¹³⁻¹⁵). He has come to be recognized as no mere disturber of the peace (Ac 24²⁵), but as a preacher of a religion different from that of the Jews, and one which had already reached Cæsar's household (Ph 4²²). His defence has been partly made, and he is full of hope of a speedy acquittal (12¹⁹), though the possibility of martyrdom hangs like a cloud in his sky, bright to his own view, but casting a shadow upon his readers' joy (11⁹⁻¹⁰).

It has been assumed, in accordance with the overwhelming opinion of scholars, that St. Paul was at the time imprisoned in Rome; but some say in Cæsarea. The chief reasons for the Roman imprisonment are—(1) that the wide-spread activity on behalf of the gospel by friends and enemies of the Apostle involves a larger Church than seems to have been in Cæsarea; and (2) his own conviction that his acquittal is near. With this view the indications of 1¹³ and 4²² most naturally agree. 'Prætorium' might, indeed, mean Herod's palace, which was used as the headquarters of the Roman governor in Cæsarea, but the words 'in the whole Prætorium' seem to point to the bodyguard of the Emperor, though Mommsen supposes that the conditions are best realized if the words imply that St. Paul was handed over to the judicial prefects of the Prætorian guard, who presided over the supreme Imperial court in Rome. No sufficient proof has been adduced that the word was used for the Emperor's palace in Rome, or for the barracks of the guard. Also 'Cæsar's household' (4²²) probably means the attendants of the Emperor in Rome, including those of high rank and slaves.

Assuming that the letter was written from a Roman prison, what is its relationship to Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon—the other letters of the captivity? Some hold that these were written from Cæsarea while Philippians was sent from Rome, but most assign all these Captivity Epistles to Rome. There is, however, no unanimity as to whether Philippians preceded or followed the others. Some of the most distinguished English and American scholars put Philippians earliest, for the reason that in style and language it is very much akin to Romans, while Ephesians and Colossians are more like the Pastorals, and their atmosphere is quite different from that of Romans and Philippians. There is much force in this, though Ephesians also presents strong similarity to Romans. But the situation of the Asian Churches, invaded as they were by a new type of error, might have called forth new themes in a formal Epistle like Ephesians, while Philippians is a friendly letter to an old Church whose life was apparently now for the first time being threatened by the Judaists, with their gospel of legal righteousness. Nor would the year or so which on this supposition elapsed between Phil. and Eph. account for the difference between them. The question of priority may not admit of final decision, but in Philippians St. Paul's imprisonment seems to be nearer its end than in the other letters. Hort, who is in favour of the priority of Philippians, holds that the request to Philemon to prepare a lodging is not to be taken in a 'crude literal sense,' and that in the contemporary Colossians there is no expectation of a speedy release. Also in Philippians St. Paul has no friends upon whom he can depend, except Timothy (cf. Col 4⁷, with Ph 2²⁰, 21). An additional reason of less weight in favour of placing Philippians last is, that a somewhat long duration of St. Paul's imprisonment is involved by the communications of the Philippians and their anxiety at the change in the rigour of his captivity.

In regard to the date of Philippians, a further difficulty emerges because of the uncertainty of the Pauline chronology, but since A.D. 61 is the most probable year for the Apostle's arrival in Rome, this letter may, though not without hesitation, be assigned to A.D. 63. In this letter St. Paul refreshes his lonely spirit by perfect freedom of fellowship with his favourite Church. Rome was not so homogeneous, nor did it acknowledge his gospel so whole-heartedly as the Churches of his own creation; thither would come Christians of every shade of opinion—Judaists, Hellenists, Petrinists, and sympathizers with St. Paul. It is doubtful whether the Church of Rome was ever of a thoroughly Pauline type; for, notwithstanding the change effected by the Neronian persecution, that Church could not have soon become so decidedly Petrine had it originally been strongly imbued with the Pauline Gospel. This letter shows us a very active and varied missionary effort in the capital—partly by St. Paul among the Prætorians and in the Imperial household, partly by his friends, and to some extent by others who probably preached to the Jews and their proselytes.

3. Contents of the Epistle.—

(i.) Greeting, 1¹⁻². Paul and Timothy salute the saints of Philippi, together with their bishops and deacons.

(ii.) Introduction, vv. 3-11. St. Paul is constantly moved to thanksgiving for their generous fellowship with him in the furtherance of the gospel from the beginning, and they are all ever on his heart where Christ dwells. His prayer for them is that their love may abound in knowledge and insight as to what befits the Christian life, that so they may live sincere and blameless lives until Christ comes.

(iii.) The present condition of St. Paul, vv. 12-28. His imprisonment has, contrary to expectation, led to the spread of the gospel, partly by his being chained to the Prætorian guard, partly through a new courage among his friends, and partly through envious rivalry. He, however, rejoices because he is assured that in answer to their prayers the Spirit of Christ will enable him to glorify his Lord whatever be the issue of his imprisonment; he does not know what to desire, though he believes that he will be acquitted and will work for their Christian welfare.

(iv.) Exhortations to the Philippians to walk worthily of the gospel, 12¹⁻²¹. No hostility must deter them from maintaining the gospel in a spirit of unity, for ability to suffer for Christ is a sign of Divine grace to them and of ruin to their enemies. An appeal is also made to them, by all that they have experienced of Christian love, to complete his joy by living in fellowship, and to exhibit that unselfish mind which prompted Christ to come to earth and die for them. Wherefore He is now exalted to be worshipped by every creature

By reverent obedience let them work with God and effect His will of good towards them, so that at the last day the Apostle and his beloved Philippians may rejoice in what the gospel has done for them.

(v.) The promise to send Timothy, and the commendation of Epaphroditus to the Philippians (21^v-30).

(vi.) Christian progress through the knowledge of Jesus Christ, 31-41. To sum up his letter, the Apostle would say, 'Rejoice in the Lord.' But, as though suddenly reminded of a danger, he returns, even at the risk of wearying them, to a warning against the Judaists—dogs, evil workers, mutilators of the flesh. He who believes in Christ alone as a sufficient Saviour is the true Israelite. St. Paul, who had enjoyed every Hebrew privilege, knows of how small value they were for attaining true righteousness, and now he boasts only in Christ. For personal knowledge of Him he will gladly lose all else, in order that he may get the righteousness which is from God by faith, and in close union with Him may realize the meaning of His sufferings, death, and resurrection. Christian perfection is still in the distance, but all who have been laid hold of by Christ must respond by striving eagerly for perfect fellowship with Him. The mature Christian must keep on in the path of progress, and not be misled by teaching which will end in an earthly goal and the rejection of the cross. St. Paul and his followers are to be their example, for their Commonwealth and its ideals are above, whence Christ will soon come to transfigure them into His likeness. Wherefore let this Church, which will be his crown at that day, stand fast in the Lord.

(vii.) Conclusion, 42-19.

(a) Exhortations to individuals to unity (vv. 1, 2). Possibly 'yoke-fellow' (v. 2) refers to Epaphroditus, or more probably it should be translated 'Synzygus', a proper name. (b) St. Paul their example for Christian joy and conduct (vv. 4-9). (c) Thanks for their gifts and for their many past favours. Contented as he is with whatever God sends, he might have done without them, but they will add interest to the account of the Philippians, and he gives them a receipt in full which God will acknowledge (vv. 10-19).

(viii.) Doxology and final greetings (vv. 20-25).

4. Purpose and Characteristics.—Epaphroditus had fallen sick at Rome before his work of love for St. Paul was done, and the news, having reached Philippi, cast the Church into anxiety; Epaphroditus in his turn having heard of their alarm has grown home-sick. St. Paul uses the occasion of his return to set their mind at rest about his own imprisonment for the gospel, and to deal with some affairs about which they had informed him. The letter is so thoroughly personal that it has no plan or any single aim. He thanks the Philippians for their gift, crowning many acts of generosity towards him, and yet, lest they should feel that he was too dependent upon them, he reminds them that it is their spirit that he values most. Again he warns them against a Judaistic gospel, and is urgent in seeking to compose personal jealousies of two of the women workers. His gospel is the only one, and it is the gospel of love. His union with Christ fills him with love and contentment, and thrills the lonely prisoner with joy, which may be called the note of the Epistle, and he hopes by this letter to impart some of this spirit to the Philippians also. Should the view that St. Paul was not acquitted be correct, this letter might be called 'his last testament to his beloved Church'; but there is good reason to believe that his hope of release was fulfilled.

Philippians is an excellent example of the Pauline method of sustaining Christian life by doctrinal truth which is the outcome of personal experience. Human thought has made few nobler flights into the mystery of redemption than Ph 2^v-11, but it is used to exalt the homely duty of sacrifice in the ministry of fellowship. Like 2 Co 8^v, the dynamic of the truth lies not in an intellectual interpretation of the mystery of Christ's personality, for little is told further than that He was in His nature essentially Divine, and enjoyed the prerogatives of Divinity; but it lies in the fact that St. Paul had learned from his own intercourse with the risen Christ His extraordinary power and grace as the eternal, Divine Son of God. Everything earthly becomes worthless in comparison with the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, his Lord. The contrast between His earthly life of suffering and death and the eternal glorious existence involved in the vision of the risen Lord, has become the religious motive of supreme efficacy. Similarly in 3^v-11, 20, 21 the doctrine is deduced from experience, and is to be wrought into character. The emphasis on the practice of virtue, especially in 4^v-12, is said to reflect the finest contemporary teaching of the pagan world, but the form is pervaded with the purest Christian spirit.

5. Authenticity and Integrity.—The objections urged against this Epistle by Baur and his followers are not seriously regarded to-day, and have been abandoned by all but a few extremists who start from certain pre-suppositions as to primitive Christianity, and are offended by the tone of 3^v 4^v, as well as by the abrupt transition in 31-2. The recurrence of the motives, ideas, and language of the great Pauline Epistles, and the external evidence of its use from the early sub-Apostolic age, make it unnecessary to consider the objections in detail. More plausibility attaches to the theory that the Epistle, as we now have it, consists of two letters, which are joined at 31, the last two chapters being probably earlier and addressed to different readers. In support of this, appeal is made to Polycarp's letter to the Philippians (III. 2), where the words 'who also wrote you letters' are held to prove that they had not then been united. But in itself this supposition is baseless; and Polycarp, who knew apparently only our letter, may either have heard of others which St. Paul wrote to the Philippians or have employed the term loosely; or perhaps he was referring to a collection of St. Paul's Epistles used widely for edification by all the Churches. The abruptness in 31-2, however, is explained by the fact that St. Paul is expressing himself freely in an intimate letter to his friends, and perhaps it was partly due to something in their letter to him which he suddenly remembered.

PHILISTIA.—See next art. and PALESTINE.

PHILISTINES.—The inhabitants of the Maritime Plain of Palestine (cf. art. PALESTINE, 1) from the period of the Judges onward to the 6th cent. or later. They are said to have come from Caphtor (Am 9^v, Jer 47^v, Dt 2^v), which is with much probability identified with Crete. At all events they came from over the sea.

Rameses III. of the XXth Egyptian dynasty encountered a piratical sea-faring people on the borders of Syria, whom he called Purussati (= Pulistia or 'Philistines'). They afterwards made incursions on the northern coast of Egypt as well as on the coast of Palestine. In the latter country they gained a permanent foothold, owing to its disorganized condition. When Wenamon made his expedition to Lebanon for a king of the XXIst dynasty (c. 1100), a Philistine kingdom existed at Dor. (For these facts cf. Breasted, Ancient Records, iv. 274 ff., and History of Egypt, p. 513.)

The Philistines first make their appearance in Biblical history late in the period of the Judges, when Samson, of the tribe of Dan, is said to have waged his curious single-handed combats with them (Jg 13-16). These conflicts were the natural result of the impact of the Philistines upon Israel's western border. The reference to the Philistines in Jg 3^v is a later insertion (cf. ISRAEL, §1. 11). During the time of Eli these invaders were trying to make their way into the central ridge of Palestine, and in one of the battles captured the ark of Jahweh, which a pestilence (probably bubonic plague) induced them to return (1 S 4-6).

When Saul became king the Philistines tried to break his power, but were defeated through the bravery of Jonathan (1 S 13. 14). Saul did not permanently check their progress, however, as by the end of his reign the whole of the rich plain of Jezreel was in their possession, including the city of Bethshean at its eastern end (1 S 31^v). David early in his reign inflicted upon them a severe defeat (2 S 5^{me}), afterwards reducing them to vassalage (2 S 8^v). Down to this time Philistine power was concentrated in the hands of the rulers of the five cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath. The rulers of these cities are called by a peculiar title, which is translated 'lords of the Philistines' (wh. see).

After the reign of David, probably at the division of the kingdom, the Philistines regained their independence, for we find the kings of Israel in the 9th cent. trying to wrest from them Gibbethon, a town on the border of the Maritime Plain (1 K 15:27 16:9). Late in the same century the Assyrian king Adad-nirari III. took tribute of Philistine kings (KIB i. 190), and began the long series of Assyrian interferences in Philistine affairs. Amos (1:9) denounces Philistine monarchies as among the independent kingdoms of his time.

The position of the Philistines exposed them to every approach of the Assyrians and Egyptians, and during the last third of the 8th cent. and the whole of the 7th their history is a series of conquests, conspiracies, and rebellions. It is possible to follow these with much fulness in the Assyrian inscriptions, but full details cannot be given here. Tiglath-pileser III. received tribute from Philistines (KIB ii. 20). They became Sargon's vassals the year that Samaria fell, B.C. 722 (KIB ii. 54), but ten years later a rebellion was led by Ashdod (Is 20; KIB ii. 64 ff.). At the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib another effort was made to shake off the Assyrian yoke. In this Hezekiah of Judah took part by imprisoning Padi, the Philistine king of Ekron, who remained faithful to Sennacherib. The allies thus brought together were defeated at Eltekeh (KIB ii. 92 ff.), and the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib was the result (2 K 18. 19). Esarhaddon (KIB ii. 148), and Ashurbanipal (KIB ii. 240) marched across the Philistine territory and held it in subjection. With the decline of Assyria the Philistines began to suffer from the rise of Egypt under the XXVIth dynasty. Psammetichus I. took Ashdod after a siege of 29 years (Herod. ii. 157). Necho II., a contemporary of Josiah of Judah, captured Gaza (Herod. ii. 159). It is probable that the Philistines suffered at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, but no record of his doings among them has been preserved. The Assyrians call the Philistine rulers 'kings.' The older title, 'lords of the Philistines,' has disappeared.

When Cambyses made his expedition into Egypt (B.C. 525), Gaza opposed him (Polyb. xvi. 40). The Sidonian king Eshmunazar claims that Dor and Joppa were added to the dominions of Sidon. Gaza in 332 held out against Alexander the Great, and his siege of it is famous (Diod. Sic. xvii. xlviii. 7). The Ptolemys and Seleucids often fought over Philistine territory. It finally passed under Roman rule, and its cities had then an important history.

The Philistines cease to be mentioned by this name after the time of the Assyrians. Some infer from the fact that Herodotus (iii. 5) speaks of the Arabians as being in possession of the coast in the time of Cambyses, that the Philistines had even then been supplanted. It is probable that in the ebb and flow of the nations over this land they were gradually absorbed and lost their identity.

Probably the Philistines adopted in the main the religion and civilization of the Canaanites. Their chief god, Dagon (1 S 5:10), was a Semitic deity. He appears in the el-Amarna letters and also in Babylonia (cf. Barton, Semit. Or. 229 ff.). There was also at Ashkelon a temple of Ashtart (Herod. i. 105). If their religion was Semitic, so also were probably the other features of their civilization. If they brought other customs from beyond the sea, they are not described in our scanty records.

PHILOLOGUS.—A Christian greeted in Ro 16:14.

PHILOSOPHY.—This word occurs in EV only in Col 2, where it refers to an unsound and pernicious form of teaching. 'Philosophy' proper falls outside the scope of the present work. Some points of contact between it and the Bible will be found in such articles as Gnosticism, Logos, Ecclesiastes, Wisdom; cf. also Epicureans, Stoics.

PHINEES.—1. —Phinehas, 1 (1 Es 5:8²³, 2 Es 1:1²). 2. —Phinehas, 2 (2 Es 1:2¹). 3. —Phinehas, 3 (1 Es 8:8¹).

PHINEHAS.—1. The son of Eleazar, who was the third son of Aaron. Both his name and that of his mother Putiel are perhaps of Egyptian origin. The only certain occurrence of the name in a pre-exilic writing is in Jos 24:33; a hill (Gibeath Pinhas) in Ephraim was named after him, where his father and (LXX) he himself was buried. In P and the Chronicler he rises into great prominence. He succeeded Eleazar as chief priest (Ex 6:2, 1 Ch 6:4⁵⁰, Ezr 7:1, 1 Es 8:2, 2 Es 1:2), and was the superintendent of the Korahite Levites (1 Ch 9:20). The succession of the priesthood in his line was assured to him when he showed his zeal at Shittim in Moab, when Israel 'joined themselves unto Baal-peor.' An Israelite brought into the camp a woman from the Midianites who had beguiled the people into foreign worship. Phinehas slew the man and the woman (Nu 25). This is referred to in Ps 106:30^r, Sir 45:23-25, 1 Mac 2:26⁵⁴. As priest he accompanied the expedition to punish the Midianites (Nu 10:31^r). He was the spokesman of the western tribes concerning the altar which the eastern tribes had erected (Jos 22:15, 20-27 See Ed.). The war between Benjamin and the other tribes occurred in his high priesthood (Jg 20:38). After the Exile a clan of priests, 'the sons of Phinehas,' claimed descent from him (Ezr 8:2 [1 Es 5:8²³, 2 Es 1:2¹ Phinees]). 2. The younger son of Eli (1 S 1:2 [2 Es 1:2¹ Phinees]). See HOPHNI and PHINEHAS. 3. Ezr 8:23 father of a priest named Eleazar; = 1 Es 8:8¹ Phinees. A. H. M'NEILE.

PHINOE (1 Es 5:1¹)—Paseah, Ezr 2:6¹, Neh 7:5¹.

PHILEGON.—The name of a Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16:14.

PHOEBE.—The bearer of the Epistle to the Romans (Ro 16:1). She was a 'deaconess' of the church at Cenchreae. See DEACONESS.

PHENICIA, PHENICIANS.—Phœnicia was the strip of coast land between Lebanon and the hills of Galilee and the Mediterranean Sea. Its northern and southern limits are indefinite, being differently defined by different ancient geographers.

The Semitic name of the country was 'Canaan' (Kinachchi and Kinachna in the el-Amarna tablets, and Chna on Phœnician coins; cf. CANAANITES). The name Phœnicia comes from a Gr. root signifying 'blood-red,' and was probably given on account of the colour of the soil. It was once thought to be derived from the Egyptian Fenkh, but that is now conceded to have been a designation of Asiatics in general (cf. W. Max Müller, Asien und Europa, 208 ff.).

The extent of the country may be roughly determined by its chief cities—Arvad or Arados, on the island now called Ruad, eighty miles north of Sidon, Simyra, Arka, Gebal or Byblos, Birtuta on the site of the modern Beyrout, Sidon, Sarepta, Tyre, Achzib, and Acco. The latter, the modern Acre, not far north of Mt. Carmel, was the most southerly of these cities.

The Phœnicians are proved by their language and religion to have belonged to the Semitic race. Herodotus (i. 1 and vii. 89) records a tradition that they came from the Red Sea. Scholars now suppose that this refers really to the Persian Gulf, and that the Canaanites, of whom the Phœnicians were a part, came from North Arabia by way of the shore of the Persian Gulf and the Euphrates valley. This migration was probably a part of that movement of races which about B.C. 1700 gave Babylon the Kassite dynasty and Egypt its Hyksos kings (cf. Paton, Early Hist. of Syria and Pal. ch. v.). Perhaps the Canaanites were the last wave of Amorites (wh. see). Their chief cities may have been built by a previous race. Herodotus (ii. 44) records a tradition which, if true, would carry the founding of the temple at Tyre back to B.C. 2730.

The civilization of the Phœnicians was a city civilization, and each city had its petty king. The history is therefore the record of a number of petty dynasties, often jealous of one another, and never powerful enough to resist a strong invader from without. Hemmed in between the mountains and the sea, they alone of the early Semites developed navigation, and became the merchantmen and the carriers of the ancient world. Their ships and shipping were important as early as B.C. 1400 (cf. KIB v. 150^a, 152^a). Herodotus tells (iv. 42) how Necho of Egypt, a contemporary of Jeremiah, employed Phœnicians to circumnavigate Africa, while Strabo (xvi. ii. 23) again testifies to their excellence in seamanship. According to Homer, they had intercourse with Greeks in the time of the Trojan war (Il. vi. 290). Traces of their influence are found in Greece (cf. Barton, Semit. Or. 315 ff.), and their maritime skill led them later to found colonies, especially in Sicily, Carthage, and Cyprus.

For some reason Sidon so excelled the other cities in the eyes of Israelites and Greeks, that in the OT and Homer the Phœnicians are frequently called 'Sidonians,' even when, as in the case of Ahab's marriage, Tyrians are really referred to (cf. Jg. 10^a, 12, 18⁷; 1 K. 5^a 11⁵, 33 16^a, 2 K 23^a; Hom. Il. vi. 290, Od. iv. 618, xv. 118). The reason for this is obscure.

Phœnicia first appears in written history in the record of the Asiatic campaigns of Thothmes III. of Egypt. In his earlier campaigns that king conquered the region between the Lebanon ranges. In his 7th expedition (B.C. 1471) he came out to the coast and conquered Arvad, the most northerly of the important Phœnician cities (cf. Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt, ii. 196). There are reasons for supposing that Tyre had previously been added to his empire (Breasted Hist. of Egypt, 298). Probably the same is true of the rest of Phœnicia, for in the el-Amarna letters all the Phœnician cities were included in the Egyptian empire of Amenophis III. and Amenophis IV. These letters show that under Amenophis IV. Rib-Adda was vassal king of Gebal, Ammunira of Biruta, Zimrida of Sidon, and Abinikli of Tyre. These kings were in constant feud with one another, with the people of Arvad, and with the Amorites beyond the Lebanon. They are constantly accusing one another (cf. Nos. 33 ff., 128-130, and 147-156). Under the XIXth dynasty Phœnicia was again invaded. Seti I. held Acco and Tyre (Breasted, Records, iii. 47), while Rameses II. pushed northward to Biruta (ib. iii. 123). In the reign of his successor Merenptah the cities from the Lebanon to Ashkelon revolted. Phœnicia was probably included in the revolt, for in the poem written to celebrate the re-subjugation of these lands, we read: 'Plundered is Canaan with every evil' (Breasted, Records, iii. 264, Hist. 470). In the XXth dynasty Rameses III. (B.C. 1198-1167) still held the country from Arvad and southward (Breasted, Records, iv. 34, 37). It is probably because of this long Egyptian vassalage that Gn 10¹⁵ traces the descent of Sidon from Ham. By the end of the dynasty Phœnicia was again free, for in the fifth year of Rameses XII. (B.C. 1113) a certain Wenamon was despatched to Phœnicia for cedar from the Lebanon forests; and Dor, Tyre, and Gebal, the towns at which he touched, were not only independent but had small respect for a representative of Pharaoh (Breasted, ib. iv. 274 ff.). The king of Gebal was at this time Zakar-Bel. Probably the dynasty of Tyre traced to Josephus (c. Apion. i. 18) was founded at the time of this emancipation from Egypt, and the era to which he refers (Ant. viii. iii. 1) then began.

A century later than the time of Wenamon, Hiram king of Tyre was an ally of David, and furnished cedar to build him a place (2 S 5¹¹). Later he was the ally of Solomon, and aided him in the construction of the Temple (1 K 5¹ 7¹² 9¹¹, 12). In the following century king Ahab of Israel married Jezebel, daughter of Eth baal, king of Tyre. Thus Phœnician influence found its way into Israel.

Shortly before the time of Ahab, the Assyrian king Ashur-nasir-pal (B.C. 884-860) had made a raid to the Mediterranean coast and exacted tribute from Tyre, Sidon, and Gebal (KIB i. 109). His successor, Shalmaneser II., records tribute from the same cities in his 21st year (KIB i. 143). Later he took it also from Arvad (ib. 173). Adad-nirari (B.C. 812-783) counted Tyre and Sidon among his subjects (ib. 191). In the interval of Assyrian weakness which followed, Phœnicia became once more independent, and when the powerful Tiglath-pileser III. (B.C. 745-727) again invaded the West, Tyre joined a coalition against him, but in the end Tyre and Gebal and Arvad paid tribute (KIB ii. 21, 23, 31). Sidon is not mentioned. Probably it was subject to Tyre. Tyre at this period ruled over a part of Cyprus. Menander relates (Jos. Ant. ix. xiv. 2) that Shalmaneser IV. (727-722) overran Phœnicia and unsuccessfully besieged Tyre for five years. Perhaps the issue of the siege came in the reign of Sargon, for the statue of that king in Cyprus shows that this dependency of Tyre was ruled by him. Sennacherib (705-681) records the submission of Sidon, Sarepta, Achzib, and Acco (KIB ii. 91). Tyre he did not disturb. Esarhaddon had to reduce Sidon by a siege, and changed its name to 'Esarhaddonburg' (Kar-Assurakhiddina), but he failed to reduce Tyre (KIB ii. 125 ff., 149; Rogers, Hist. Bab. and Assyri. ii. 226 ff.). Ashurbanipal (668-626) claims to have reduced Tyre and Arvad. At any rate he made an alliance with the king of Tyre (KIB ii. 169, 171). Before the end of his reign, however, Phœnicia was again independent, Assyria having become weak. We next hear that king Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon (604-562) unsuccessfully besieged Tyre for many years (Ezk. 26^a, 29¹⁷).

In the Persian period (how Phœnicia became subject to Persia our sources do not tell) Sidon again became the leading city, Tyre taking a second place. An inscription of Yahaw-melech, king of Gebal, probably belongs to this period (CIS i. 1).

Sidon furnished the best ships for the fleet of Xerxes, Tyre the next best (Diod. Sic. xvi. xlv.; Herod. vi. 44, 96, 98, viii. 67). Straton (Abd-Ashtar?) of Sidon in the next century effected Greek civilization (Ælian, Var. Hist. vii. 2; Athenæus, 531). About 350 his successor Tennes (Tabnith?) joined in an unsuccessful revolt against Persia, and Sidon was again besieged (Diod. Sic. xvi. xlii.).

After the battle of Issus (B.C. 333), all the Phœnician cities except Tyre opened their gates to Alexander the Great. Tyre resisted and again stood a siege of seven months (Diod. Sic. xvii. xli. ff.). During the next century, under the Ptolemys, a native dynasty flourished at Sidon, from which a number of inscriptions survive (cf. G. A. Cooke, North Sem. Inscr. 26 ff.; JAOS xliii. 156 ff.). The kings were Eshmunazar I., Tabnith, Bod-Ashtart, and Eshmunazar II. Bod-Ashtart built a temple near Sidon, which has recently been excavated.

In the wars of the later Ptolemys and Seleucids the Phœnicians played an important part. Phœnicia belonged to the Seleucids after B.C. 197. In B.C. 65 it passed under Roman rule. The reference in Mk 7²⁶ to a woman who was a 'Syrophœnician' by race shows that the Evangelist recognized that the old stock survived. In B.C. 14 Augustus made Biruta a Roman colony. Claudius (A.D. 41-54) made Acco, then called Ptolemais (cf. Ac. 21⁷), a Roman colony. Septimius Severus (A.D. 193-211) performed a similar service for Tyre, and Elagabalus (218-222) for Sidon. Gradually the old race was merged with various conquerors.

In civilization the Phœnicians were for the most part borrowers from Babylonia and Egypt. What they borrowed they carried in their trading voyages all about the Mediterranean, and thus diffused culture and the arts of life. Perhaps they were pioneers in the art of seamanship, but of this we cannot be sure; they may have borrowed this from Crete or the Mycenaeans. That they invented the alphabet and diffused it in their voyages, so that it was adopted by the Greeks and Romans, is generally conceded, but whether they obtained it by adapting Egyptian hieroglyphs, or Babylonian cuneiform characters, or from some other ancient form of writing, is still in dispute. In religion they closely resembled the other Semites (cf. W. R. Smith, RS; and Barton, Semit. Origins). Baal and Ash-tart were the principal divinities, and much prominence was given to sexual rites (cf. Lucian, de Syria Dea, § 6). Human sacrifice persisted long among them in spite of their contact with the highly civilized Greeks (cf. EBi iii. col. 3189, 3190).

The best account that we have of the nature and extent of Phœnician traffic is contained in Ezekiel's description (chs. 27, 28) of the trade of Tyre, which, as we have seen, had been the leading Phœnician city for a century or more before his time.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

PHOENIX was a good harbour on the S. coast of Crete. It has been identified almost certainly with Loutro, which is said to be the only harbour W. of Fair Havens where a ship of such size as that by which St. Paul travelled (it was a cargo ship, but had crew and passengers on board numbering altogether 276) could find shelter. Strabo speaks of Phoenix as being on an isthmus (i.e. a narrow part of the island), and apparently as being in the territory of Lappa, which was not far from Loutro. Other authorities speak of it as if it were near Aradena, which is only a mile from Loutro. The identification would therefore be certain but for St. Luke's description of the harbour of Phoenix as looking 'towards the S.W. and the N.W.' (Ac 27¹³), whereas the harbour of Loutro looks towards the East. Hence some identified Phoenix with a harbour a little farther W., of which we have no evidence that it could accommodate so large a ship. It is perhaps more probable that St. Luke makes a mistake in his description of a harbour which he never reached. The RV understands the Greek to mean 'in the direction in which the S.W. and N.W. winds blow,' and therefore translates 'looking N.E. and S.E.' This may have been a sailor's way of expressing it, but we have no authority for it.

PHOROS (1 Es 5⁹ 8³⁰ 9²⁶) = Parosh (wh. sec.).

PHRURAI.—In Ad. Est 11¹ the Book of Esther is called 'the epistle of Phrurai' (i.e. 'Purim' [wh. sec]).

PHRYGIA.—The Phrygians were an Aryan race who seem to have had their first home in Thrace, and to have crossed into Asia through the same southward movement of tribes that brought the Hellenes into Greece. In Asia they occupied at one time the greater part of the country W. of the Halys, probably displacing a Semitic race from whom they may have learned the worship of Cybele. We must regard Homer's Trojans as part of the Phrygian race, and the Trojan War as a contest between them and Greek settlers from Thessaly. In more historical times the name Phrygia applies to an inland region varying in extent at different times, but bounded at its widest by the Sangarius on the N., the Halys on the E., the Taurus range on the S. It thus covered the W. part of the great plateau of Asia Minor and the upper valleys of the rivers Mæander and Hermus. It was a region fruitful in oil and wine, exporting also wool, gold, marble, and salt.

When the Romans inherited the kingdom of Pergamus in B.C. 133, a part of Phrygia was included in the province of Asia, but the southern portion towards Pamphylia was not included. This portion was in the hands of the dependent king of Galatia when Augustus constituted Galatia a province in B.C. 25, and was therefore included in the new province which extended from Lycia on the S.W. almost to the mouth of the Halys on the N.E. Hence this portion of Phrygia, with its cities of Antioch and Iconium, came to be known as Phrygia Galatica.

This country was included by St. Paul in the work of his first missionary journey (Ac 13⁴–14²⁴). From Perga he and Barnabas made their way N. along the difficult mountain road to Antioch, here called 'Pisidian Antioch' (see PISIDIA). On his second missionary journey St. Paul (now accompanied by Silas) began with the churches of Cilicia and then passed through Derbe and Lystra, where he took Timothy into his company. The narrative then proceeds (Ac 16⁶): 'And they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia [Gr. 'the Phrygian and Galatian region'], having been forbidden [AV 'and were forbidden'] of the Holy Ghost to speak the word in Asia; and when they were come over against Mysia they assayed to go into Bithynia; and the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not; and passing by Mysia they came down to Troas.' The natural interpretation of this is that from Lystra they traversed Phrygia Galatica, from Antioch took the road leading N. to Dorylaion, where they would be near Bithynia, and from there were directed W. to Troas. Attempts have been made, however, to find here an evangelization of Galatia proper with its towns of Pessinus and Ancyra. But against this we must set (1) the form of the Greek phrase 'the Phrygian and Galatian region'; (2) the strange silence of St. Luke about a work that must have taken a considerable time; (3) the geographical consideration that the travellers could not have crossed the desert of the Axylon straight from S. to N. and must in any case have used the road to Dorylaion. See, further, artt. GALATIA and GALATIANS [Ep. To] for this and the further question whether the Epistle to the Galatians can have been written to the churches of Phrygia Galatica. If it was, we have an interesting glimpse of how in the churches first founded by St. Paul his authority was very soon (perhaps A.D. 50) assailed by Judaizers, who disputed his Apostolic credentials and declared his doctrine to be an imperfect form of Christianity, neglecting its Jewish basis.

The third missionary journey likewise began with 'the region of Galatia and Phrygia' (Ac 18²³), or 'the Galatian region and Phrygia.' Here the reference is probably to the same churches, but the order of words is doubtless meant to include the churches of Lycaonia first—these were in the province of Galatia, but were not in Phrygia. The order is in any case strongly against the inclusion of Galatia proper. The journey was continued 'through the upper country to Ephesus,' i.e. along the direct route which passed through the higher country from Metropolis to Ephesus, instead of the high road which followed the valley of the Lycus.

PHYGELUS.—Mentioned in company with Hermogenes in St. Paul's last Epistle, as those in Asia who, among others, had turned away from the Apostle (2 Ti 1¹⁵). See HERMOGENES. MORLEY STEVENSON.

PHYLACTERIES, FRONTLETS.—1. Among the charges brought by our Lord against the Pharisees of His day we read: 'but all their works they do for to be seen of men: for they make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments' (Mt 23⁵; for 'borders' see FRINGES). This is the only Biblical reference to one of the most characteristic institutions of the Judaism of the first century as of the twentieth. The word 'phylactery' (Gr. phylactērion) literally signifies a 'safe-guard,' as safe-guarding the wearer against the attacks of hurtful spirits and other malign influences such as the evil eye—in other words, an amulet. By the Jews then as now, however, the phylacteries were termed tephillin, the plural of the ordinary word for 'prayer.'

2. For information regarding the phylacteries of our Lord's day we are dependent on the somewhat later allusions in the Mishna, with which the modern Jewish usage agrees in all essential points. Then, as now, they consisted of two small square cases or capsules of leather, 'two finger-breadths' according to the Talmud, say $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch, in the side, one of which was worn on the forehead, the other on the left upper arm. The leather had to be prepared from the skin of a ritually 'clean' animal, and was coloured a deep black.

The case for the forehead, which was termed the 'head-tephillah,' was distinguished from the 'arm-' or 'hand-tephillah' by its being shaped so as to give four small but distinct compartments, while its fellow consisted of a single compartment. In each of the four compartments of the former was placed a narrow strip of parchment, also from the skin of a 'clean' animal, having carefully written on it one of the Pentateuch passages which were regarded as the Scripture warrant for the institution of the phylacteries (see § 4). These were Ex 13¹⁻¹⁰ 13¹¹⁻¹⁶, Dt 6⁴⁻⁹ 11¹³⁻²¹. The companion capsule, on the other hand, contained the same four passages written on a single strip of parchment. Each case was then closed by folding back the lower half of the square of stout leather from which it projected, space being left at the fold for the passing of a long strap, blackened on the upper side, by which each phylactery was kept in position when properly 'laid.' The strap of the head-phylactery was tied behind the head into a knot having the shape of the Hebrew letter daleth. On the two sides of the capsule were impressed the letter shin, on one side with the usual three prongs, on the other with four prongs. The corresponding loop of the phylactery for the arm was supposed to form the letter yod, the three letters together giving the sacred name Shaddai, 'Almighty.'

3. From the Mishna we learn further that women, slaves, and minors were exempted from the obligation of wearing, or in technical phrase 'laying,' the tephillin, a duty still incumbent on all male Israelites, from the age of thirteen years and a day, during the recital of morning prayer, on all days save Sabbaths and festivals. These, being themselves 'signs,' rendered the phylacteries unnecessary for this purpose (Ex 13⁹; cf. § 4 below). It is probable, however, that in our Lord's time, as was the case later, the more zealous spirits among the Pharisees wore their phylacteries during the whole day.

In putting on the phylacteries that of the hand is 'laid' first, to the accompaniment of a prescribed prayer, and must lie on the inner side of the left arm, which must be bare, a little above the elbow, so that the case with the Scripture passages may rest upon the heart (Dt 11¹⁸). The strap is then drawn tight and wound round the arm and the middle finger of the left hand a prescribed number of times. (For details see Hastings' DB iii. 870.) The head-phylactery is next laid, its position being the middle of the forehead, 'between the eyes' (Ex 13⁹ etc., see next §), with the knot above described at the back of the head, and the two ends of the strap brought forward to hang down over the breast in front. The phylacteries are taken off in the reverse order. When not in use, they are kept in a bag, which is often made of superior material richly ornamented (see Illustr. in Jewish Encyc. s.v. Phylacteries).

4. The Scripture warrant for this peculiar institution of Judaism is found in the four passages, Ex 13⁹⁻¹⁰, Dt 6⁸ 11¹⁸. Of these Dt 6⁸ may be quoted as the most explicit: 'And thou shalt bind them'—i.e. 'these words which I command thee this day,' v. 4—'for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes.' These words and their parallels in the other passages, it is maintained by Jewish and some Christian scholars, are intended by their authors to be taken literally. This contention has been examined in detail in the corresponding article in Hastings' DB (iii. 870-72). The result is a verdict in favour of the figurative interpretation of all the passages, including that just cited. A good deal turns on the sense of the word rendered 'frontlets' (diaphorai). This rendering (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'bands,' 'frontlet-bands') cannot be maintained in face of the evidence for the rendering 'jewel' or 'amulet,' the meaning which the word has in the Heb. text of Sir 36² (= AV 33²), as read by Smend in his edition of the text and commentary (both 1906): 'the law is for the wise man an amulet, a band (or knot) upon the hand.' In Mishna, also, Shabbath, vi. 1, 5, tepheth signifies an ornament in a lady's head-dress.

We conclude, then, that the Pentateuch writers really intended by these metaphors to impress upon God's people that His word was to be to them a treasure more precious than any jewel. The figures were derived from the prevailing custom of wearing jewels on the forehead and on the wrists both as ornaments and as amulets (see AMULETS, ORNAMENTS). On the other hand, if the literal interpretation is followed, we should have to recognize another of the numerous instances in the Hebrew legislation, in which a deeply rooted and ineradicable practice of heathen origin and superstitious associations was adopted and given a religious signification, precisely as was done with the kindred sign of the tassels on the corners of the mantle (see FRINGES, end).

5. The date at which this literal interpretation was first given effect to and the wearing of the phylacteries introduced cannot be determined with certainty. The fact that the institution is unknown to the Samaritans shows that it must have arisen after the date of the Samaritan schism. The passage of Jesus Sirach above quoted (written c. B.C. 180-170) seems to imply that the figurative interpretation still held the field. On the other hand, the writer of the famous 'Letter of Aristeas' (scarcely later than A.C. 90) distinctly mentions (§ 159) the binding of 'the sign upon the hand' (see Thackeray's tr. in JQR xv. 368 f.). We may, therefore, with some confidence assign the introduction of the phylacteries to the period of the domination of the Pharisees in the reign of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135-105).

Even in the first century of our era it is very doubtful if the practice extended beyond the Pharisees and their adherents, who showed their zeal for religion by the size of the cases and the breadth of the straps by which they were fastened. Certainly the mass of the Jewish people at this date, 'who knew not the law' (Jn 7⁴⁹), paid no heed to such literalism; neither, we may be sure, did Jesus or His disciples.

In popular estimation, as is shown by the very name 'phylacteries' (§ 1), and by references in Targum and Talmud, the phylacteries were regarded as powerful amulets. In the Middle Ages they seem to have fallen from the absurdly exaggerated esteem in which they were held in Talmudic times. This was no doubt due to the fact that some of the most influential Jewish exegetes still frankly maintained the figurative interpretation of the cardinal passages of the Pentateuch. In more modern times, however, the practice of 'laying the tephillin' has revived, and is now universal in orthodox Jewish circles.

PHYLARCH (2 Mac 8²).—A military title for either a cavalry officer or a commander of auxiliary forces.

PHYSICIAN.—See MEDICINE, p. 597b.

PI-BESETH.—Ezk 30⁷: Bubastis, one of the greatest cities in Lower Egypt: Egypt. Pubasti, 'House of Ubasti'; it was especially the residence of the 22nd Dyn., which was founded by Shishak. The goddess Ubasti was usually figured with a lion's head, but she was of a mild character, and her sacred animal in late times was the cat. The ruins of the city are now called Tell Basta, lying near Zagazig, in the E. of the Delta.

The temple described by Herodotus was excavated by Naville, yielding monuments of every period from the 4th Dynasty to the 30th. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

PIECE.—Piece is used in AV for (1) a measure equal to a firkin (1 Es 8²⁰ 'an hundred pieces of wine'); (2) an instrument of war (1 Mac 6⁶¹ 'pieces to cast darts, and slings').

PIGEON.—See DOVE.

PI-HAHIROTH (Ex 14², Nu 33⁷).—Mentioned in connexion with the camping of the Israelites. It was 'between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon' (Ex 14⁹). This definition does not enable us to fix its site, for these other places are themselves unknown. In Nu 33⁸ the name is simply Hahiroth.

PILATE.—Pontius Pilatus, a Roman of no known family, succeeded Valerius Gratus as procurator of Judaea in A.D. 26. He possibly owed his appointment to Sejanus, and his administration, as described from the Jewish standpoint, shows either that he shared the anti-Jewish feelings of Sejanus or that he failed to understand the temper of the people with whom he had to deal. His first offence was not allowing the soldiers to remove the images from their standards on entering Jerusalem. These images were worshipped by the soldiers, and were therefore symbols of idolatry. A deputation of Jews waited on Pilate for five days, and refused to desist though threatened with instant death. He was compelled to give way, but subsequently set up in the palace of Herod tablets dedicated to the Emperor, which was taken as an attempt to introduce the Caesar-worship already flourishing in the rest of the Empire. Only an order from Tiberius compelled him to yield a second time. He gave further offence by a more justifiable action. The need of water in the city was much felt at the time of festivals, and Pilate proceeded to construct a new aqueduct at the expense of the Temple treasure. The Sanhedrin might have ordered such a work, but as Pilate's act it caused a riot which was not quelled without bloodshed. To these incidents we must add the massacre of some Galileans at the very altar of sacrifice, referred to in Lk 13¹, but not otherwise explained. The end of Pilate's rule was brought about by a disturbance in Samaria. Tradition said that the vessels of the Tabernacle had been buried on Mt. Gerizim, and a band of armed men escorted thither an impostor who promised to reveal them. Pilate sent troops to the spot, who, after a massacre, dispersed the multitude. Complaint was made to Vitellius, the legatus of Syria, who seems at this time to have had authority over the governor of Judaea. Pilate was ordered to justify himself at Rome (A.D. 36), but before he arrived there Tiberius had died (March, A.D. 37), and he was not re-appointed (Joseph, Ant. xviii. iii. 1-iv. 2). Eusebius states that he committed suicide. The 'Acts of Pilate' and his letters to the Emperor are late forgeries.

Pilate would therefore be to us only one of a series of unsuccessful procurators, but for the fact that his years of office covered the period of Christ's ministry. From the accounts of our Lord's trial we learn more of him than from any other source.

Except at the times of the great feasts the governors usually stayed at Caesarea; but Pilate was probably present with reinforcements to repress any disorder during the Passover, and had his headquarters in the fortress known as the Tower of Antonia, which adjoined the Temple on the N. side. The prætorium formed part of this fortress (but see PRÆTORIUM), and on this occasion, while the prisoner was led inside, the accusers remained below the steps which led into the hall, lest they should be rendered unclean for the feast by entering a building defiled by heaven. Pilate examined Jesus inside the hall, and came outside each time he wished to speak to the accusers. Jesus had been brought to him to be condemned to death, this penalty being out of the power of the Sanhedrin; and at first they expected Pilate to pass sentence on their simple statement that he was 'a malefactor' (Jn 18³⁰⁻³²). Pilate was too Roman for this—penalties in their power they might inflict, but if he was to add his authority he required a reason. Therefore (avoiding the charge of blasphemy) they accused Jesus of 'forbidding tribute' and calling himself 'Christ, a king' (Lk 23²). Pilate returned inside, and by questions assured himself that the prisoner claimed only what he would have called a 'philosophical kingship'—an idea familiar to him, if only from the Stoics. Hardly believing that truth was attainable (as he showed by the scornful answer, 'What is truth?'), he was yet prepared, like many Romans of his day, to patronize one who thought he had attained to it (Jn 18³³⁻³⁸). From this time onwards we must regard the trial as a series of attempts on Pilate's part to release Jesus without too great offence to the Jews. (1) Hearing that He came from Galilee, he sends Him to Herod Antipas, who was at Jerusalem for the feast. If Herod 'claimed jurisdiction' over the prisoner he might have released Him, but he had no more power to condemn a man to death in Jerusalem than the Jews had. The courtesy reconciled Herod and Pilate, their former enmity being due to the fact that Herod sent private reports to Rome and was regarded as the Emperor's spy. But when Herod failed to get either reply or miracle from Jesus, he sent Him back to Pilate (Lk 23⁶⁻¹²). (2) It was a custom (whether Jewish or Roman in origin) to release a prisoner in honour of the Passover. Pilate proposed to release Jesus, but, persuaded by the priests, the multitude clamoured for Barabbas (Mt 27¹⁵⁻²¹, Mk 15⁶⁻¹¹, Lk 23¹³⁻¹⁹, Jn 18³⁹⁻⁴⁰). (3) After solemnly washing his hands, as if absolving himself of responsibility for condemning an innocent man (Mt 27²⁴⁻²⁵), Pilate hoped to satisfy the rancour of the accusers by scourging the prisoner. 'I will chastise him and release him' (Lk 23¹⁶⁻²²). But when Jesus came forth from the scourging, the Jews for the first time brought forward the cry that He 'made himself the Son of God' (Jn 19⁷). To such as Pilate, Greek mythology would make it not incredible that 'the son of a god' should be on earth, and in the decadence of their own religion the Romans were lending a ready ear to the mysterious religions of the East. Moreover, Pilate's superstitious fear had already been aroused by the report of his wife's dream (Mt 27¹⁹). Again, therefore, he questioned Jesus. But at length the Jews prevailed with the cry, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend' (Jn 19¹²). The threat that the province would accuse him at Rome for treason overcame Pilate's scruples. An accusation for 'treason' might mean death under Tiberius. Pilate gave way, caused his throne or tribunal to be brought on to the tessellated space in front of the prætorium (called 'Gabbatha' in Aramaic), and there pronounced final judgment. But in the taunting words, 'Behold your king!' and 'Shall I crucify your king?' as well as in the inscription on the cross, which he refused to alter in spite of protest, he wreaked upon the Jews such revenge as lay in his power.

In this unjust complaisance we have an illustration of one danger in the strict supervision which Augustus and Tiberius maintained over provincial government. In the main it was a great benefit, but it enabled the provincials to intimidate a weak governor. The weak points in Pilate's character stand out strongly. He seems to have been a sceptic in principle, but not free from superstition, in this resembling perhaps most of the upper class among the Romans in his day. He had probably not taken the trouble to understand the fierce passions of the people whom he was sent to govern, and when worsted by them in early encounters, the scorn which Romans felt for Jews became in him something like hatred, and a strong desire to be avenged on their leaders at all costs save one, namely, disgrace at Rome.

For before all things he seems to have considered his own position.

But it is very unlikely that Tiberius, who was jealous for good provincial government, would have allowed Pilate to remain procurator for ten years if his administration had been as bad as our knowledge of him would imply. It is easy to under-estimate the difficulties of his post. The province of Judaea included not only Judaea proper, but Samaria and Idumaea; and in addition to its normal population there was at the time of great feasts, particularly the Passover, an influx of Jews from other provinces, which made the temporary population of Jerusalem sometimes between two and three millions. And this population was animated, as no other race was, by a religious fervour capable of passing on occasion into political excesses difficult to cope with, since in the eyes of a large minority submission to foreign rule was religious apostasy. But the province ranked only as a 'minor Imperial province'; its governor was a procurator, not a legatus or praefectus, and to control the difficult elements in the population he had only 3000 troops, quartered usually at Caesarea, besides small detachments used to garrison Jerusalem and Sebaste. The governor usually went up to Jerusalem for the Passover time, but he must have felt that in face of a sudden national movement he would be powerless; and it is no small testimony to Roman powers of administration that for 60 years the series of procurators in Judaea managed to postpone more serious conflicts. The fault would seem to rest with the central authority, which did not realize that in administering the small province of Judaea it had to deal not with the province alone, but with all the millions of Jews scattered throughout the Empire, profoundly earnest in religious convictions, regarding Judaea as the holy centre of all they held dearest, and maintaining direct communication with the Sanhedrin, to which the Romans themselves had allowed a certain authority over all Jews throughout the Empire. Hence, mistaking the nature of the work, they sent as procurators second-rate men, who were often (like Pilate) nominees of Imperial favourites, and who were probably looking forward to their promotion from the moment that they landed in Caesarea. Had Judaea been definitely attached to the province of Syria, it would at any rate have been governed by men with a wider outlook.

PILHA.—A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10²⁴).

PILLAR.—1. With two or three unimportant exceptions, 'pillar' in OT is the rendering of two very distinct Heb. terms, 'ammūd and mazzēbāh. The former denotes in most cases—for a conspicuous exception see JACHIN AND BOAZ—a pillar or column supporting the roof or other part of a building (Jg 16²¹, 1 K 7²¹), also the pillars from which the hangings of the Tabernacle were suspended (Ex 26²² and oft.). From this sense the transition is easy to a column of smoke (Jg 20⁹), and to the 'pillar of cloud' and the 'pillar of fire' of the Exodus and the Wanderings (Ex 13²¹ etc.). The further transition to the figurative use of the term 'pillar,' which alone prevails in NT (Gal 2⁹, 1 Ti 3¹⁵, Rev 3¹² 10¹), may be seen in Job 9⁶ 26¹¹—passages reflecting an antique cosmogony in which the pillars of earth and heaven were actual supports.

2. It is with the second of the two terms above cited, the mazzēbāh, that this article has mainly to deal. Derived from a root common to the Semitic family, mazzēbāh denotes something 'set up' on end, in particular an upright stone, whether it be a megalithic monument, such as the stones known to contemporary archaeology as menhirs or 'standing stones,' or a less imposing funerary stele. Three varieties of mazzēbāhs may be distinguished in OT.

(a) For reasons that will appear at a later stage, our survey may start from the stone erected over a grave or elsewhere as a memorial of the dead. The mazzēbāh set up by Jacob upon the grave of Rachel (Gn 35²⁰) was of this kind. This was the prevailing application of the term among the Phoenicians (see Cooke, Text-book of N. Sem. Inscriptions, 60). To this category may also be reckoned the memorial pillar which Absalom erected for himself in his own lifetime (2 S 18¹⁸).

(b) In a second group may be placed the stones set up to commemorate, or, in Biblical phrase, 'for a witness' of, some important incident (Gn 31⁴⁴, Jos 24²⁷)—in particular the appearance or manifestation of a Divine being (a theophany) at a given spot. Such, in the present form of the story—for the probable original form, see § 4 below—was the stone which Jacob set up and anointed at Bethel (Gn 28¹⁸ 22; cf. 31¹³ 35¹⁴). Other examples of mazzēbāhs, interpreted by the Heb. historians as commemorative monuments, are the stone Ebenezer of 1 S 7¹², and the cromlech (gilgal) set up by Joshua after the crossing of the Jordan 'for a memorial unto the children of Israel' (Jos 4⁷).

(c) The third and most important class of mazzēbāhs comprises the pillar-stones which stood beside the altar at every Canaanite sanctuary (see HIGH PLACE). For this class AV has the misleading term 'image' (except Dt 12³), for which RV has substituted 'pillar,' with 'obelisk' in the margin. That the local sanctuaries, in most cases taken over from the Canaanites, at which the Hebrews worshipped J^w were provided with such pillar-stones, is evident both from the references in Hos 3⁴ 10¹⁴, and from the repeated condemnation of them in the successive law codes (Ex 34¹³ 23²⁴, Dt 7⁵ 12³ etc.), and by the Deuteronomic historians (1 K 14²³, 2 K 18¹⁸ 23¹⁴ [for Judah] 17¹⁰ [Israel]).

A special variety of pillar associated with idolatrous worship emerges in the later writings, the chammānīm or sun-pillars (AV 'images,' RV 'sun-images'). They were probably connected with sun-worship (Lagrange, Études sur les relig. sémit. 2 314 f.).

3. The OT evidence for the mazzēbāhs as an indispensable part of the furnishing of a Canaanite high place has been confirmed in a remarkable degree by the excavations of recent years, in the course of which pillar-stones of diverse shapes and sizes have been brought to light. Even to summarize the archaeological evidence would extend this article beyond due limits (see Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente [1907], 102–115; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 2 [1907], 321 ff.; Kittel, Studien zur heb. Arch. [1908], 126 ff.). It must suffice to refer briefly to the magnificent series of mazzēbāhs which formed part of the high place at Gezer (for full details see PEFSt, 1903, 23 ff., and Macalister, Bible Siddights, etc., 54 ff.). Originally ten in number, eight of them are still standing in situ. 'They are unheven blocks, simply set on end and supported at the base by smaller stones . . . and range in height from 10 ft. 6 in. to 5 ft. 5 in.' The smaller dimensions are those of the second stone of the series, which is supposed to have been the original beth-el (see next §) of the high place. The fact that this stone, alone of the group, has its top smooth and polished, as if by long-continued anointing on the part of the worshippers, is greatly in favour of this view. Several of the larger stones are provided with cavities, either at the top or in one side. This provision, which is also characteristic of the mazzēbāhs found at Taanach and Megiddo, must evidently, as will presently appear, have some relation to the ritual of the worship of these ancient sanctuaries.

4. It now remains to deal with a question which may be thus formulated, What significance did the Canaanites and the Hebrews after them, attach to these mazzēbāhs, and what place did they hold in the ancient cult.

This question can hardly be approached without a reference to the still unsolved problem of the religious significance of 'standing stones' all the world over. This world-wide phenomenon 'must rest on some cause which was operative in all primitive religions' (W. R. Smith, *RS*² 209). It will probably be found, on consideration of all the conditions to be satisfied, that the desire to appease the spirit of the dead lies at the beginning, while the conception of the pillar-stone as a representation of the deity, beside the altar dedicated to his worship, comes at the end of a long process of evolution. On this view, a stone, over or beside the grave of the dead, afforded, to the primitive mind, a convenient abode for the departed spirit, when it chose to return to receive the homage and offerings of the living. The blood of the sacrifice was poured over the stone, and thus brought into contact with the indwelling spirit (cf. the cup-marks on the cap-stones of the dolmens on the east of the Jordan and elsewhere). With this desire to do honour to the dead, the idea of keeping alive his memory by a conspicuous or upright stone was sooner or later associated. When and where higher ideas of the spirit world prevailed, the mazzēbāh became a memorial stone and nothing more, as in group (a) above.

The belief that a stone might become the abode of any numen marked a distinct step in advance. In Gn 28 it is admitted that we have a later adaptation of a Canaanite temple myth, which explained the origin of the sanctuary at Bethel, and especially the sanctity attaching to the original beth-el, i.e., the abode of an el or numen (v. 22), round which the sanctuary grew up. In the original form of the story the anointing of the stone was an offering to the indwelling numen. The second of the Gezer mazzēbāhs shows an exact counterpart to this. The cavities in the other recently discovered mazzēbāhs, above mentioned, were no doubt originally intended to receive similar offerings of blood, wine, or oil (cf. Gn 35⁴).

When this fetish worship had been outgrown, the mazzēbāh became merely a symbol or representation of the deity, who had his home elsewhere. The conical pillar standing in the court of the temple of Astarte, as represented on the coins of Byblus, is an illustration of this higher conception. We may be sure that the worshippers of J^r regarded the Canaanite mazzēbāhs in this light from the first. But the danger of contamination was great (see HIGH PLACE, § 6), and the condemnation of the mazzēbāhs is a recurring feature of all the law codes (reff. above).

5. Another unsolved problem may be mentioned in conclusion. What is the relation of the mazzēbāh to the altar? Shall we say, with the distinguished author of the *Religion of the Semites*² (p. 204), that 'the altar is a differentiated form of the primitive rude stone pillar, the nash or massebah'; or, with the latest investigator, that 'the massebah is nothing else than the artificial substitute for the sacrificial stone' (Kittell, op. cit. 129, 134)? If the views expressed in the previous section are correct, the second alternative offers the more probable solution. The pillar will then be a differentiated form of the most ancient altar (ALTAR, §§ 1. 2), the cause of the differentiation, as we have seen, being the desire to commemorate, as well as to appease, the dead.

PILLAR, PLAIN OF THE.—In Jg 9⁶ we read that the men of Shechem made Abimelech king 'by the plain' (AV; RV 'oak,' RVm 'terebinth') of the pillar. The correct translation is undoubtedly 'the terebinth of the pillar,' the meaning being the sanctuary of Shechem. The 'pillar' refers to the sacred stone, originally a fetish, which was often found in holy places along with the sacred tree (see preced. article).

W. F. BOYD.

PILLOW.—The 'pillow' of Mk 4³ (AV) is the cushion (so RV) used by rowers. See also BOLSTER and HOUSE, 8.

PILTAL.—A priestly house (Neh 12¹⁷).

PINE TREE.—1. ʔls-shemen, Neh 8¹⁵, see OIL TREE. 2. tīdhār, Is 41¹⁹ [RVm 'plane'] 60¹². From similarity to the Syr. daddār ('elm'), the tīdhār has been supposed to be the elm, but quite as probably may have been a kind of pine; of these the two common varieties known in Syria are the Aleppo or maritime (Pinus halepensis), and the stone (P. pinea) with its umbrella-like top.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PINNACLE.—This word has been adopted by our EV from the Vulgate of Mt 4⁸ (pinnaculum) to indicate the spot within the Temple enclosure from which the devil tempted our Lord to cast Himself down. The precise nature and location of 'the pinnacle of the temple' (Mt. l.c., Lk 4⁹ [both RV]), however, are nowhere indicated. The context and the use of the word usually employed for the whole complex of buildings as opposed to that which denotes the Temple proper (see plan in art. TEMPLE, § 12) rather favour the view that the 'pinnacle' is to be sought in the neighbourhood of the S.E. corner, where the royal 'porch' met that of Solomon. Here, as Josephus informs us—and the excavations corroborate his testimony—a spectator looking down into the valley of the Kidron 'would turn giddy, while his sight could not reach down so such an abyss' (Ant. xv. xi. 5). Many authorities, on the contrary, favour some part of the roof of the Temple building itself.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PINON.—An Edomite 'duke' (Gn 36⁴, 1 Ch 1⁴), prob. same name as Punon of Nu 33⁴².

PIPE.—See MUSIC, etc., § 4 (2) (a).

PIRAM.—The king of Jarmuth, defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon and afterwards put to death (Jos 10⁴⁸).

PIRATHON, PIRATHONITE.—Pirathon 'in the land of Ephraim' was the home of Abdon 'the Pirathonite' (Jg 12¹⁸, 19), and of Benaiah, one of David's heroes (2 S 23³⁰ etc.). It can hardly have been identical with Parathon (wh. see), but it is probably represented by either Fer'on or Fer'ata.

W. EWING.

PISGAH.—A mountain in the region of Moab, with a commanding view over both the desert (Nu 21¹⁰) and Western Palestine. Hither the Israelites journeyed from Bamoth, and there took place the extraordinary episode of Balaam, who on the top of Pisgah built seven altars (Nu 23¹⁴). Its principal distinction, however, is its being the scene of Moses' vision of the Promised Land (Dt 32⁷ 34¹) and of his death. It fell into the territory of Reuben (Jos 13²⁰ [AV Ashdodh-pisgah, as in 12³ and Dt 3¹⁷; RV in all three 'slopes (mg. 'springs') or Pisgah']).

An alternative name for Pisgah is Nebo (wh. see), referred to in Dt 32⁴⁹ as the scene of the death of Moses. The latter name is preserved by Jebel Nebā, a range whose summit reaches a height of 2643 feet and commands a view of a large part of Western Palestine. It is 5 miles S.W. of Heshbon, and runs westward from the Moabite plateau.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

PISHON.—See EDEN [GARDEN OF].

PISIDIA.—The name applied to a district about 120 miles long and 50 miles broad, immediately N. of the plains of Pamphylia. It is entirely occupied by the numerous ranges into which the Taurus here breaks, with the deep intersecting valleys. The name was not applied to a definite political division, and nothing is known of the race inhabiting Pisidia. Until the time of Augustus they were wild mountaineers and brigands. Augustus began their reduction about B.C. 25 by establishing a chain of Roman posts which included on the N. side Antioch and Lystra, reconstituted as colonies. The name 'Pisidian Antioch' (Ac 13⁴) would seem to record this fact, since Antioch was never included in Pisidia. The civilization of the district seems to have been effected by about A.D. 74. Until then it was dealt with as part of the province of Galatia, but at that date Vespasian attached a considerable portion of it to Pamphylia, in which province no great military force was maintained.

Paul and Barnabas traversed the district twice in the first missionary journey (Ac 13¹² 14²⁰). It was probably still a dangerous locality, and it is plausibly conjectured that St. Paul refers to it when he speaks of 'perils of robbers' (2 Co 11²⁸). The route which they followed is uncertain, but the most likely theory is that of Prof. Ramsay (see Church in the Roman Empire, ch. ii. 2), that they went through Adada, the ruins of which bear the name Kara Baylo (i.e. Paulo). The dedication of the church to St. Paul may have been due to some surviving tradition of his passing by that way, but we are not informed that he preached at all in Pisidia. There is no evidence that Christianity made any progress in Pisidia before the time of Constantine. From the time of Diocletian we find the name Pisidia applied differently, namely, to a Roman province including Phrygia Galatica, Lycaonia, and the part of Phrygia round Apamea. A. E. HILLARD.

PISPAH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁹).

PIT.—Of the dozen Heb. words, besides two Gr. words in NT, rendered 'pit' in EV, the following are the most important.

1. The term bôr is responsible for nearly half of all the OT occurrences. It is the usual word for the cistern with which almost every house in the towns was supplied (see CISTERN). Disused cisterns in town and country are the 'pits' mentioned in Gn 37²⁰ (that into which Joseph was cast [cf. art. PRISON]), 1 S 13⁶ (RVm 'cisterns' etc.). In some passages, indeed, the context shows that 'cistern,' not 'pit,' is the proper rendering, as in Lv 11³², Ex 21³¹, with reference to an uncovered and unprotected cistern; cf. Lk 14⁵, RV 'well' for AV 'pit.' The systematic exploration of Palestine has brought to light many series of underground caves which were used at various periods as dwelling-places (cf. 1 S 13⁶); hence by a natural figure, 'pit' became a synonym of Sheol, the under world (Is 14⁹, Ps 28¹, Pr 1¹², and oft.; cf. Rev 9¹¹, and SHEOL).

2. A second word rendered 'pit' (shachath) seems to have denoted originally a pit in which, after concealing the mouth by a covering of twigs and earth, hunters trapped their game (Ezk 19⁴). Like the preceding, it is frequently used in a figurative sense of the under world; so five times in Job 33 (RV).

3. A hunter's pit, denoted by pachath, also supplied the figure of Is 24¹⁷, and its parallels Jer 48⁴¹, and La 3⁷ RV—note the association with 'snare.' Such a pit served as a place of concealment (2 S 17⁹) and of burial (18¹⁷).

4. In Mk 12¹ RV rightly recognizes 'a pit for the winepress,' where the reference is to what the Mishna calls 'a cement-vat,' i.e. a pit dug in the soil for a wine-vat (cf. Mt 25¹, where the same expression 'digged' is used), as contrasted with the usual rock-hewn vats (see WINE AND STRONG DRINK, § 2).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PITCH.—See BITUMEN.

PITCHER.—The earthenware jar (cf. La 4² 'earthen pitchers') in which in all ages the women and maidens of Palestine have drawn and carried the water from the village well (Gn 24¹²). In wealthy households this task was performed by a slave or other menial (Mk 14¹³, Lk 22⁹). For illustrations of water-jars found in ancient cisterns, see Macallister, Bible Sidelights, etc., fig. 22, and the works cited under HOUSE, § 9.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PITHOM.—One of the 'treasure cities' built by the Israelites in Egypt (Ex 1¹¹ etc.). It is the Egyptian Petöm ('House of Etöm'), the site of which is now marked by Tell el-Maskhuta in the Wady Tumilat. The researches of Naville and Petrie indicate that the city dates as far back as the 12th Dyn., and was occupied down to very late times. It was capital of the 8th nome of Lower Egypt, and in it was worshipped a form of the sun-god under the name of Etöm.

PITHON.—A grandson of Merib-baal (1 Ch 8³⁸ 9¹¹).

PITY.—This word is entirely synonymous with compassion both in OT and NT, except, perhaps, in 1 P 3⁸, where 'sympathetic' would better express the meaning of the original word (see RVm). Pity was regarded by OT writers as holding an essential place in the relations of God and His people (see Ps 78³⁸ 86¹⁵ 103¹³ 111⁴ 112⁴ 145⁸, Is 63⁹; cf. Ja 5¹¹). One of the ways in which this Divine feeling became active on their behalf reveals an incipient belief in the dealings of Jehovah with nations other than Israel; for He is often represented as infusing compassion for His chosen into the hearts of their enemies (cf. 1 K 8³⁰, 2 Ch 30⁹, Ps 108⁶, Ezr 9⁹, Neh 1¹, Jer 42⁹). An objective manifestation of the feeling of pity in the heart of God was recognized in the preservation of His people from destruction (La 3²¹), and in the numerous instances which were regarded as the interventions of mercy on their behalf (cf. Ex 15¹³, Nu 14¹⁹, Dt 13¹⁷ 30⁴, 2 K 13²⁴, 2 Ch 36¹⁰). The direct result of this belief was that Israelites were expected to display a similar disposition towards their brethren (cf. Mic 6⁸, Is 1¹⁷, Jer 21¹², Pr 19¹⁷). They were not required, however, to look beyond the limits of their own race (Dt 7¹⁶, Zec 7⁹) except in the case of individual aliens who might at any time be living within their borders (see Ex 22²¹ 23⁹, Dt 10¹⁸, etc.).

In the parable of the Unmerciful Servant, Jesus inculcates the exercise of pity in men's dealings with each other, and teaches the sacredness of its character by emphasizing its identity with God's compassion for sinners (Mt 18³³; cf. Lk 6³⁶, Mt 5⁷ 9¹³). The teaching of Jesus, moreover, broadened its conception in the human mind by insisting that henceforth it could never be confined to the members of the Jewish nation (cf. the parable of the Good Samaritan, Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁷). At the same time His own attitude to the thronging multitudes surrounding Him was characterized by profound pity for their weaknesses (Mt 15²⁸—Mk 8²; cf. Mt 9³⁶ 14¹⁴). Under His guidance, too, Divine pity for the world was transmuted into that Eternal Love which resulted in the Incarnation (Jn 3¹⁶). Side by side with this development, and in exact correspondence with it, Jesus evolves out of human pity for frailty the more fundamental, because it is the more living, quality of love, which He insists will be active even in the face of enmity (Mt 5⁴⁴, Lk 6²⁷).

PLAGUE.—See MEDICINE, p. 598b.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT.—There are not many references in the Bible to the plagues outside the Book of Exodus. They are epitomized in Ps 78⁴⁴⁻⁵¹ and 105²⁸⁻³⁴. In Ro 9¹⁴⁻²⁴ God's treatment of Pharaoh is dwelt upon, to show His absolute right to do what He will with the creatures of His own handiwork. And in Rev 8, 9, 16 much of the imagery in the visions of the trumpets and the bowls is based upon the plagues—hail and fire (8⁷ 16¹⁷), water becoming blood, and the death of the creatures that were in it (8¹⁰, 16¹⁷), darkness (8¹² 16¹⁰), locusts (9¹⁻¹¹), boils (16³), frogs (16¹³).

The narratives of the plagues demand study from three points of view: (1) their literary history; (2) the relation of the several plagues to natural phenomena; (3) their religious significance.

If the sources have here been rightly separated, it becomes probable that the original account of JE contained eight and not ten plagues. The 3rd and 4th are insect pests, the former kinntm, kinndm, i.e. gnats or mosquitoes (P), the latter arobh, i.e. swarms of flies (J). These may with probability be considered duplicates. And similarly the 5th and 6th, murrain (J) and boils (P). If this is so, all the eight were originally contained in J's narrative; E has elements in the 1st, 7th, 8th, and 9th, and in the 9th E's narrative has largely displaced that of J.

2. Relation to natural phenomena.—The hostility which used to exist between religion and natural science is rapidly passing away, as it is becoming more clearly recognized that science is concerned solely with the observation of physical sequences, while religion embraces science as the greater includes the less. Nothing can lie outside the activity of a God who is both a transcendent Person and an immanent sustaining Power in the universe. And therefore to point out a connexion between some of the 'miracles' of Scripture and 'natural phenomena' does not eliminate from them the Divine element; it rather transfigures an unreasoning 'faith in the impossible' into a faith which recognizes the 'finger of God' in everything. Thus the following discussion of the plagues may claim to be entirely constructive; it seeks to destroy nothing, but aims at showing it to be probable that the providence of God worked in Egypt by means of a series of natural phenomena, upon which the religious instinct of the Hebrew writers unerringly seized as signs of God's favour to their forefathers, and of punishment to their oppressors. This religious conviction led in process of time to accretions and amplifications; as the stories were handed down, they acquired more and more of what is popularly called the miraculous. The earliest stage at which they emerge into writing is in J; in the remains of E the wonders have increased, while in P they are greatly multiplied.

1st Plague.—According to J, this consisted in the smiting of the river by J^a, and the consequent death of the fish, causing the necessity of obtaining water by digging in the neighbourhood of the river. Nothing is here said of blood, but that is introduced in the next stage of development. In E the marvel is performed not directly by J^a in the ordinary course of nature, but through Moses' wonder-working staff, and the river is turned to blood. Two suggestions have been made as to the natural phenomena which might give rise to the story. When the Nile rises in June, its waters become discoloured from fragments of vegetable matter, which gradually turn to a dull red colour as the river rises to its height in August. This is confirmed by many travellers, who also speak of offensive odours emitted at the later stage. Others refer the reddening of the water to enormous quantities of minute organisms. Whatever may have been the actual cause, J comes the nearest to the natural fact; a fetid exhalation killed the fish, or in Hebrew language J^a smote the river. And the ease with which the belief could arise that the water was turned to blood is illustrated in 2 K 3²². In P's final amplification, every drop of water in Egypt was turned to blood.

2nd Plague.—From whatever cause the river became fetid, a mass of organic matter and of animal life would be collected. And these conditions would be suitable to the rapid multiplication of frogs. In J, J^a foretells that He will Himself smite Egypt with frogs; in the ordinary course of nature 'the river shall swarm with frogs.' In P, Aaron (as usual) is bidden by Moses to bring the plague by stretching out his staff. Plagues of frogs were not unknown in ancient times; and Haggard tells of a plague in the upper Nile valley in modern times (Under Crescent and Star, p. 279). Frogs are most plentiful in Egypt in September.

3rd and 4th Plagues.—The mass of dead frogs collected in heaps (8¹⁴) would lead to the breeding of innumerable insects. In J, J^a Himself sends 'swarms of flies'; in P, through the stretching out of Aaron's staff, 'all the dust of Egypt became mosquitoes' (E^v lice (wh. see)). The 'mosquitoes' cannot have been, according to any natural sequence, distinct from the 'swarms'; P particularizes the general statement of J. Stinging gnats of various kinds are common in Egypt about October. The insects come to maturity after the waters of the Nile inundation have receded, and the pools in which the larvæ have lived have dried up. Note that in Ps 105³¹ the 'swarm' and the 'mosquitoes' are coupled in one sentence; and Ps 78⁴⁵ omits the 'mosquitoes' altogether.

5th and 6th Plagues.—The decomposing bodies of the frogs would produce pestilential effects; and bacteriological research shows that some insects, especially mosquitoes, are a serious factor in the spread of disease. Thus the murrain (J) is amply accounted for. In the preceding narrative J relates that Goshen enjoyed complete immunity from the insects. It is not impossible that the direction of the wind or other natural causes, under God's guidance, prevented them from reaching the Israelite territory. And if the insects, which spread disease, did not enter Goshen, the statement that the murrain did not touch the cattle of the Israelites is also explained. P, on the other hand, departs from natural causes. Moses and Aaron flung soot into the air, which became boils on man and beast. Cattle plagues, causing enormous mortality, are reported in Egypt. One such in A.D. 1842 killed 40,000 oxen.

7th Plague.—Thus far the series of plagues have followed one another in a natural sequence. But at this point a new series begins with a destructive thunderstorm, accompanied by hail. Such storms are rare in Egypt, but are not without example. Those which have been reported in modern times have occurred about January; and that is the point of time defined in 9²¹, 'the barley was in the ear, and the flax was in bud, but the wheat and the vetch . . . were not grown up.' Thus the cattle plague had lasted about two months and a half (Nov. to the middle of Jan.) when the storm came; and the first five plagues (reckoning 3, 4 and 5, 6 as duplicates) occupied a period of about five months.

8th Plague.—The atmospheric conditions which resulted in the storm also led to other plagues. A strong east wind (the sirocco) was sent by J^a, and brought a dense mass of locusts (J). In E, Moses brought them by lifting his staff. The lightness and fragility of the locusts render them helpless before a wind (cf. Ps 109^{26b}). And when the wind shifted to the west, they were completely swept away into the Red Sea (J); cf. Jl 2³⁰.

9th Plague.—Only a fragment of J's narrative has been preserved, which relates the effect of the 'darkness' upon Pharaoh. E, as before, says that it was due to the lifting of the staff by Moses. But it is not impossible that it was a further consequence of the west wind. Dr. A. Macalister (art. 'Plagues of Egypt' in Hastings' DB iii.) writes: 'The condition of darkness referred to is strikingly like that brought about by the severer form of the electrical wind hamsin. This is a S. or S.W. wind that is so named because it is liable to blow during the 25 days before and the 25 days after the vernal equinox (hamsin = 50). It is often not so much a storm or violent wind as an oppressive hot blast charged with so much sand and fine dust that the air is darkened. It causes a blackness equal to the worst of London fogs, while the air is so hot and full of dust that respiration is impeded. . . . Denon says that it sometimes travels as a narrow stream, so that one part of the land is light while the rest is dark.' And he adds that three days is not an uncommon duration for the hamsin.

10th Plague.—Malignant epidemics have at all times been the scourge of Bible lands; and it is worthy of note that many authorities state that pestilence is often worst at the time of the hamsin wind. In the Hebrew narratives, however, all thought of a 'natural' occurrence has passed away. Only the firstborn are smitten, as a just retribution for Pharaoh's attempt to destroy the firstborn of the Israelites.

3. Religious value.—This is manifold. Considered from the point of view of natural phenomena, the narratives teach the all-important truth that God's providential care of men is not confined to 'miracles' in the commonly accepted sense of the term, else were God's providential actions unknown to-day. The lifting of Moses' staff to bring the plagues, and his successive entreaties for their removal, teach that prayer is not out of place or unavailing in cases where natural laws can be co-ordinated and guided by God to bring about the wished-for result. And from whatever point of view the plagues are regarded, the same great facts shine through the narratives—that J is supreme in power over the world which He made; that He has an absolute right, if He so wills, to punish Pharaoh in order to show forth in him His power; that He does so, however, only because Pharaoh is impenitent, and consequently 'fitted for destruction,' for J is a God who hates sin; that if a man hardens his heart, the result will be as inevitable as results in the natural world—so inevitable that it may truly be said that J hardens his heart; that the sin of Pharaoh, and so of any other man, may entail sufferings upon many innocent men and animals; and finally, that J is mindful of His own, and delivers them from the 'noisome pestilence,' 'the pestilence that walketh in darkness,' and 'the destruction that wasteth at noonday,' so that 'no plague can come nigh their dwelling' (Ps 91).

PLAIN.—This word is given by the AV as the equivalent of 8 different terms, 7 Heb. and 1 Greek; but is retained by the RV in the case of 4 only, all Hebrew.

(1) biq'ah is translated in the RV by 'plain' in Gn 11², Neh 6³, Is 40⁴, Ezk 32², 33⁸, Dn 3¹; but elsewhere by 'valley.' It generally designates a broad vale between hills; among the localities to which it was applied the most notable are the pass between Lebanon and Hermon ('the valley of Lebanon,' Jos 11¹⁷ 12⁷), and the plain of Esdraelon ('the valley of Megiddo,' 2 Ch 35²², Zec 12⁴).

(2) mitshor is usually translated by 'plain' or 'plain country,' sometimes accompanied by the mg. 'table land' (Dt 3¹⁰, Jos 13⁹, 1 K 20²² etc.); but in the poetical and prophetic books by 'even place' (Ps 26¹²) or 'straight' (Is 40⁴). Its primary sense is level land; and the word, with the article, was specifically used of the high plateau on the E. of the Dead Sea.

(3) 'arabāh is ordinarily rendered in the AV by 'plain' ('plains') and 'desert' (or 'wilderness'), but in Jos 18¹⁸ it is transliterated 'Arabah.' The RV also sometimes translates by 'plain(s)' and 'desert' (Jos 4¹², Is 33⁹ etc.), but retains the Heb. expression wherever it denotes the deep valley running N. and S. of the Dead Sea. The distinctive sense of the word is that of a bare, sterile plain, or (if between hills) an unfertile floor.

(4) kikkār, unlike the preceding, characterizes not the surface of the locality to which it is applied, but its shape. It is used specifically of the lower part of the bed of the Jordan, where it flows into the Dead Sea, and possibly also of the depression S. of the same sea; and should be rendered by 'circle' rather than by 'plain' (as in RVm in Gn 13¹⁰). Cf. next article. In Neh 3²² 12³⁸ it seems to refer to a district around Jerusalem, and is translated in RVm by 'circuit.'

(5) Of the other Heb. words sometimes rendered in the AV by 'plain,' one (shephēlah) is uniformly translated in the RV by 'lowland,' and designates a group of 'low hills' on the E. of the Maritime Plain, which are separated from the hills of Judea and Ephraim by a series of valleys (Dt 1⁷, Jos 10⁴⁰ etc.). Of the remaining two, one ('ābēl) is transliterated in the RV (Jg 11²), and the other ('ēlōn) is rendered by 'oak' (mg. 'terebinth') (Gn 12⁶ 13¹⁸ etc.).

(6) The only passage where the word 'plain' is employed in the NT occurs in St. Luke's account (6¹⁷) of one of our Lord's discourses, which, acc. to St. Matthew, was delivered on a mountain (Mt 5¹); the RV substitutes 'a level place.' G. W. WADE.

PLAIN, CITIES OF THE.—These were five in number, namely, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zebolin, and Bela (or Zoar), situated in the plain ('circle') of Jordan. Their inhabitants being guilty of great wickedness, the first four of the above-named five were overthrown by fire. Lot, the nephew of Abraham, who had made his home in Sodom, was warned by the Lord to withdraw from the city before it was destroyed; and he accordingly escaped to Zoar, which, at his entreaty, was spared the fate of its neighbours (Gn 18. 19).

The situation of the five cities has been variously placed at the N. and the S. end of the Dead Sea. The Biblical statements are generally in favour of the former site, which is supported by the facts: (1) that the circle of the Jordan, which is also called the circle of the valley of Jericho (Dt 34⁹), is appropriate only to the broad basin of the Jordan, near its mouth; (2) that it was visible from near Bethel (Gn 13¹⁰); (3) that the cities were N. of Hazazon-tamar (usually identified with En-gedi), since this place was passed by Amraphel when he marched from Kadesh against the king of Sodom and his allies (Gn 14⁷ 8). On the other hand, (1) it is implied in Ezk 16⁶ that Sodom was on the right (i.e. south) of Jerusalem, whereas if it were at the N. end of the Dead Sea it would be almost due E.; (2) Zoar, which must have been near the other cities (Gn 19²⁰), is placed by Josephus in Arabia (BJ iv. viii. 4), and by Eusebius at the opposite end of the Dead Sea to Jericho; (3) the name Sodom is generally identified with Jebel Usdum, a cliff of rock-salt near the S.W. corner of the Dead Sea; (4) Hazazon-tamar may be, not En-gedi, but the Tamar of Ezk 47¹⁹, which has been identified with a locality 20 m. W.S.W. of the lake, and therefore on the road between Kadesh and Sodom if the latter were at its S. end. If this view is right, the site of the cities is probably the marshy flat es-Sekha, E. of Jebel Usdum. But the statement that the plain (or circle) of Jordan was near Jericho seems incompatible with a situation S. of the Dead Sea; and if the name Sodom survives in Jebel Usdum, that of Gomorrah seems to linger in that of Tubk Amriyeh, a place at the N.W. corner of the lake; so that, though the evidence is conflicting, the preponderant weight appears to support a N. site. (For the other view see Driver's art. 'Zoar' in Hastings' DB).

The nature of the catastrophe which destroyed the cities can only be conjectured. It may perhaps be suggested that the bitumen which abounds in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea was ignited by lightning, and that this caused an extensive conflagration in which the cities perished.

PLAISTER, PLASTER.—1. See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 4. HOUSE, § 4.

2. The 'plaster' (Is 38²¹; Amer. RV etc., 'plaster') which Isaiah prescribed for Hezekiah's boil was a fig-poultice, according to the text of 2 K 20⁷, but the parallel passage above cited reads literally, 'let them take a cake of figs and rub it upon the boil.'

PLANE.—Is 44¹³ only; see ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 1. For 'plane tree' see CHESTNUT TREE, PINE TREE.

PLEAD.—In AV 'plead' always means to 'argue for or against a cause' as in a court of justice, never to 'pray' or 'beseech.' The substantive 'pleading' is used in the same sense in Job 13⁶ 'Hearken to the pleadings of my lips.'

PLEDGE.—The taking of a pledge for the re-payment of a loan was sanctioned by the Law, but a humanitarian provision was introduced to the effect that, when this pledge consisted of the large square outer garment or cloak called símlah, it must be returned before nightfall, since this garment often formed the only covering of the poor at night (Ex 22²⁶; Dt 24¹²; cf. Am 2⁸, Job 22²⁴, Ezk 18⁷, 12, 16, 33¹⁶). It was forbidden also to take the mill or the upper millstone as a pledge (Dt 24⁶). In Is 36⁸ the reference is to a pledge to be forfeited if a wager is lost (cf. RVm). In 1 S 17¹⁸ 'take their pledge' probably means 'bring back a token of their welfare' (Driver).

PLEIADES.—See STARS.

PLEROMA.—The transliteration of a Gr. word which is generally rendered 'fulness' in the NT. plerōma is derived from the verb plērōon, which means either (a) 'to fill,' or (b) 'to fill up,' hence 'to fulfil.' The corresponding meanings of the noun are (a) 'fulness,' (b) 'fulfilment.'

1. pleroma = 'that which fills.'—The word has this meaning in the LXX version of Ps 24¹ (cf. LXX Ezk 5², Dn 10²) quoted in 1 Co 10²⁸ 'The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof'; also in Mk 6¹⁸ (cf. 8²⁰), where the fragments of the loaves are described as amounting to 'the fillings of twelve baskets.'

2. pleroma = 'that which fills up.'—The word has this meaning in Mk 2²¹ (cf. Mt 9¹⁶) which refers to the effect of sewing a piece of undressed cloth on a worn garment: 'That which should fill it up (to plērōma) taketh from it, the new from the old, and a worse rent is made.' Lightfoot says the patch 'must be called' the plerōma 'not because it fills the hole, but because it is itself fulness or full measure as regards the defect.' His paraphrase is 'the completeness takes away from the garment, the new completeness of the old garment' (Com. on Col., Note on 'The meaning of plērōma'). The obscurity of this statement is removed by the active interpretation: the supplementary 'unfulfilled' patch takes away from the original garment. The new piece used to fill up the rent 'tears itself away by contraction when wetted, taking a part of the old garment along with it' (Bruce, EGT I. 153).

To this section belong: (a) Ro 13⁸, which contrasts partial fulfilment of the Law, secured by obedience to this or that commandment, with love's complete filling up of the measure of neighbourly duty. (b) Ro 11¹⁷, which contrasts the enriching of the Gentiles through Israel's loss with what Dr. Armitage Robinson (Com. on Eph.) happily describes as 'wealth in store for them in the great Return, when all Israel shall be saved—

'when God hath made the pile complete!' (c) Ro 11¹², in which the coming in of 'the fulness of the Gentiles' refers to the completing of their whole number. The same idea is expressed in the phrase 'the fulness of the seasons' (Eph 1¹⁰ RVm; cf. 'the fulness of the time,' Gal 4⁴).

3. pleroma = 'that which is filled,' or 'that which is filled up.'—In its passive use plērōma means 'plenitude,' whether fulness is contrasted with incompleteness or with emptiness. As the plenipotentiary of Christ, St. Paul (Ro 15²⁹) is confident that he will come to Rome 'in the fulness of the blessing of Christ.'

Six important passages remain; they may be classified according as 'the plenitude Divine' is said to be (a) in Christ, (b) imparted by Christ to His Church, (c) imparted to believers.

(a) In Col 2⁹ St. Paul declares that in Christ 'dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.' The assertion 'negatives the Alexandrian "philosophy" with its cloud of mediating angel-powers and spiritual emanations' (Findlay, Pulpit Com., in loc.). The defining phrase 'of the Godhead' is not found in Col 1¹⁹, which bases the pre-eminence of Christ on the indwelling in Him of 'all the fulness.' Instead of making this expression identical in meaning with the more definite statement in 2⁹, it is better with Meyer (Com., in loc.) to expound pleroma as referring to 'the whole treasure of Divine grace' with which the Son of God was endowed. A suggestive parallel to these Pauline sayings is furnished by Ju 1¹⁶, 'of his fulness we all received, and grace for grace.' The fulness is ours, if we are Christ's. 'In him,' says St. Paul (Col 2¹⁰), 'ye are made full.'

(b) In Eph 1²³ it is probable that St. Paul describes the Church as 'the fulness of him that filleth all in all.' The main thought is what Christ is to the Church; He is its Head and in Him it is complete. Dr. Armitage Robinson (op. cit.) regards the Church as 'the fulfilment of the Christ who, all in all, is being fulfilled.' According to this interpretation the main thought is what the Church is to Christ. Moreover, the adverbial phrase 'all in all' seems inadequate to express the meaning of the emphatic assertion: He filleth 'the all with all things.' The objection to the active rendering of the verb (plērōmenon), which is middle or passive, does not apply to Dr. Salmond's exposition of the reflexive middle: it conveys 'the idea of filling the totality of things for Himself' (EGT iii. 281).

(c) To individual believers as well as to His Church Christ imparts the plenitude of His grace. Eph 4¹³ gives the measure of the stature of the 'full grown' Christian; it is nothing less than the fulness which belongs to Christ, by which is meant 'the full possession on our side of that which Christ has to impart—the embodiment in us, the members, of the graces and qualities which are in Him the Head' (Salmond, EGT iii. 333). An earlier passage in this Epistle (3¹⁹) teaches that this exalted ideal may be attained. When, as the result of the Holy Spirit's inward strengthening, Christ dwells within the heart, and His knowledge-surpassing love is known, the only limit to spiritual excellence is 'to be filled unto all the fulness of God.' J. G. TASKER.

PLOUGH.—See AGRICULTURE, § 1.

PLUMBLINE, PLUMMET.—The latter is a diminutive of 'plumb,' from Lat. plumbum, 'lead,' and denotes the combined cord and weight, by suspending which against a wall it can be seen whether or not the latter is perpendicular. On the strength of Zec 4¹⁰ (lit. 'the stone, the tin, not 'lead'; cf. AVm) it has been inferred that the Hebrew masons used a plumb-bob of lead, but the text of this passage is undoubtedly corrupt (Wellh., Marti, Nowack). The Hebrew plummet (2 K 21¹³ Is 28¹⁷) more probably consisted of a stone (Is 34¹ AV, but RV 'plummet') suspended by a cord, the 'plumblin' of Am 7¹¹. Cf. ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 3.

POETRY.—1. The presence of poetry in the Bible is natural and fitting. As it is the form of composition which is easiest to memorize, whether in the earlier stages of a literature, or later in the expression of common religious experience, it is natural that poetry should be preserved, and should be the preserver of Hebrew thought. As the form of literature which is concrete in its pictures, it is to be expected that the Hebrew people, to whom abstract thought and terminology are almost unknown, would employ it very freely. As the literature of emotion and imagination, it is naturally used to express religious emotion and religious ideals. It does not suffice, however, to state the fitness of poetry to satisfy in a measure the purposes for which the Bible was written. Does it actually contain poetry? The answer is to be found only by examination of its contents, and only an affirmative answer is possible. Though the Psalms have not been written in poetical form for two thousand years, yet their poetry cannot be obscured. Scholars may differ as to the forms and laws of Hebrew poetry, yet they do not venture to say that none is to be found in the Bible.

The presence of poetry must be recognized if one would gain any adequate knowledge of the Scriptures. Otherwise correct interpretation is impossible. From failure in this respect in the past, our theology has suffered, the warfare between the Bible and science has been intensified if not caused, and Christians have lost immeasurably the comfort and spiritual help available from this kind of literature. Poetry must be interpreted as poetry. To apply to it the same principles of exegesis as are applied to prose is highly absurd; for in attempting to mark the differences between prose and poetry we must go below the form of language, and note that there is a distinctly poetic mode of thought and range of ideas. The facts of experience are so grouped and wrought upon by the imagination as to become a new creation. The singer is not bound to time or place; he speaks in figure without knowing that it is a figure; he speaks in hyperbole because he does not have the sense of proportion. The poetry of the thought affects also the vocabulary of the singer; it modifies his word meanings, and affects his grammar. It alters his literary style, and there arises a distinct study, that of literature as poetry—a study in which the attempt is made to discover how poetical forms express the poetical thought of the writer.

2. In treating the poetry of the Bible we are concerned chiefly with the OT. The NT has a few poetical sections (see HYMN), but these are confessedly Hebrew in character, and do not call for independent treatment here. As compared with the OT, the NT contains very little poetry, for the obvious reason that Christianity, early and late, has largely found the Hebrew Psalter sufficient for its devotional purposes.

3. What are the characteristics of Hebrew poetry? They must be found from an inductive study of recognized poetical sections of the OT. A certain part of the Scriptures is clearly poetry; a certain other part is clearly prose. Between the two there is a great amount of literature, especially in the prophetic books, about which there is a difference of opinion. It is called poetry or prose according to the scholar's definitions and his zeal in making emendations. There are prose poems, products of real poetical imagination, and artistic in form, but lacking in poetic rhythm. These doubtful passages should be left out of account until the essential principles of the poetry of the Hebrew people are determined, and then the test can be reasonably applied to them. Such has not always been the mode of procedure on the part of scholars. Sometimes their aim seems to have been to discover new examples, whether by direct study or by inexact methods. One cannot look very deeply into the subject without discovering the most extreme differences of opinion among scholars. There is abundant reason for this state of things. The very reasons which make the presence of poetry in the Bible natural and fitting, operate to make its definition difficult. The more natural the poetic expression of thought and feeling, the freer it will be from conventional regulation, and the less sharp will be the difference between the prose and the poetical literature of a people. And again, in Hebrew so many facts are lost upon which we are wont to place dependence in such a study, that until we get new light from without, any scheme of Hebrew metre must be merely a working hypothesis, and no complete system can be expected. There is not a commanding tradition of the pronunciation of the language, whether we think of vowels, syllables, or accent. We have no knowledge of Hebrew music of a character that would aid in determining the rhythm of the poems that were sung to its accompaniment. Even the consonantal text is corrupt, in many places confessedly so; and there is almost no place so certain that a new scholar does not feel himself free to arise and emend it, and so win his spurs. Under these circumstances wide differences of opinion are to be expected, and their existence must be endured patiently. If there is any ridicule justifiable, it should be expended, with extreme caution, upon those who, ignoring these many points of uncertainty which necessarily limit the value of their inductions, formulate an elaborate and microscopically minute system of metre, and then turn confidently round and use the system to emend the text so as to bring it to its original condition. Rhythmical considerations may to a certain extent enter into literary and textual criticism, but unsupported they cannot be convincing.

The OT is not quite destitute of evidence that the Hebrews themselves were conscious of a difference between their prose and their poetry. They had special names for 'proverb' and 'song'; they provided the Psalms with headings, some of which must have been musical directions; they made alphabetical poems, the several lines or stanzas of which begin with the letters of the alphabet in regular order. These lines and stanzas are of equal length and similar rhythm. Some of the poems inserted in the prose books are written and printed line by line, as Ex 15, Dt 32, Jg 5, 2 S 22; and for the three poetical books of the canon the Massoretes of later times provided a special system of pointing, thereby recognizing a distinction that must have had its basis in tradition, although the special pointing was not to preserve the poetic value.

Passing over, with the brief allusion already made, the peculiarities of thought, of vocabulary, and of grammar which poetry reveals, the features that one expects to find in OT poetry concern the line, and the stanza or strophe. (1) The line is so constructed that when it is read aloud it sounds agreeable to the ear by virtue of a distinct rhythm; this rhythm is repeated with little or no variation from line to line; the end of the line coincides with a break in the sense. The line is properly regarded as the unit of poetical expression. It is commonly of a length to be uttered with a single breath, and, if sung, a brief strain of music suffices to accompany it. The fundamental importance of the line makes it desirable to determine, if possible, what are the rules for its length, and what is the nature of the measurement that secures the rhythmical effect so universally recognizable. The history of the search for a satisfactory system of metre cannot be given here. Classical models, with quantity as a basis, were long ago abandoned; one group of scholars discard the Massoretic accents, and attempt an explanation on the basis of Syriac metre, counting syllables, and accenting alternate ones; but the predominant theories are accentual.

POETRY

Of these some have reckoned only the rises (accented syllables), and others count the falls also, permitting only a certain number of them to intervene between rises. This number is made to depend on the metrical value of the syllables, which, according to some scholars, is determined by the number of moræ, or time units, which they contain.

It should be remembered that we are dealing with an early form of an ancient literature, and that this literature is an Oriental one. This creates a very strong presumption against an elaborate and minute system of metre. The Hebrew language was indeed dominated by tradition, which made it difficult to alter established practice; but in case the tradition was one of freedom on the part of the writer to construct his poem as he chose, it naturally operated to keep him free from the complicated rules which spring up in the later periods of the life of a language.

Until the contrary is shown on other grounds, it must be assumed that the Hebrew accent system, differing traditionally from Arabic and Syriac, differed from them actually; and as the traditional grammatical forms depend largely upon the accent, the natural inference is that it is an important feature of the language. If so, it may be supposed that it is important also in poetry. The view that seems best to suit the facts as they exist, that makes the smallest demands in the way of departure from ordinary prose style, and that yields at the same time results reasonably satisfying to the poetic feeling, is this: the line was composed of a definite number of accents, or, as ordinarily each word had one accent, of a definite number of words. This view does not fit all the lines of every poem; but the possibility of exceptions at the will of the writer is a part of the theory. Moreover, the percentage of exceptions is very likely not greater than that of probable corruptions in the text. It is not to be counted as an exception when, in order to secure the regular number of accents, two short words must be pronounced as one, as is so often done for other reasons with the insertion of a maqeph ('), or when a word exceptionally long and heavy must be pronounced with two accents for the same purpose. (2) The next higher unit is the group of lines taken together. The name strophe might be applied to all such groups, but it is usually reserved for the larger groups. The smallest group—the couplet or distich—exhibits the most characteristic feature of the poetry of the language, namely Parallelism, a name given by Lowth in 1753. The lines are so related to each other that there is a correspondence of parts, both in form and in sense. It is not confined exclusively to poetry, for it is nothing but the development of the idea of balance and euphony of parts which is found in elevated prose style, especially such as is uttered orally. The mind more easily grasps the thought of a second clause, if fashioned like an earlier one. It is less occupied with the form, for that is already familiar. It is also, and doubtless for that very reason, more agreeable to the ear. What is desirable in prose, and often used there, becomes the rule in poetry, as one may easily understand when one considers the necessity of a uniform line for the sake of easy utterance with musical accompaniment. It is by its persistence and uniformity that parallelism certifies to the poetical nature of a passage. This parallelism is of the utmost importance in determining the meaning of a verse. While its adoption as a poetical form has a logical basis, once let it become the rule for such composition, and it cannot fail to operate to modify the thought as well as the form. What would otherwise appear to be a careful choice of synonyms, for example, perhaps to secure climactic effect, may be simply the operation of this principle. So the unusual position of a word in a clause may be traceable to this rather than to a desire to secure special emphasis. Several distinct forms of parallelism have been observed.

POETRY

(a) Synonymous parallelism.—The thought of the two lines is synonymous, and so are the several terms by which the thought is expressed.

How shall I curse whom God hath not cursed?
And how shall I defy whom Jahweh hath not defied?
—(Nu 23^a).

(b) Antithetic parallelism.—The second line expresses the same real truth as the first, but it does it antithetically. The form is truly parallel, and one member of the lines is synonymous, the other two contrasted. This is especially common in proverbs.

A wise son maketh a glad father,
But a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.—(Pr 10^a).

(c) Stair-like or ascending rhythm.—The thought of the first line is repeated in part, or, if entirely, more briefly, so that the second line can add a further item of thought, thus rising above the parallel line.

Till thy people pass over, Jahweh,
Till thy people pass over, which thou hast purchased.—(Ex 15^a).

(d) Synthetic parallelism.—The thought of the second line is entirely different or supplementary, none of the first being repeated. The distich remains in parallelism, for the two lines correspond in form.

Answer not a fool according to his folly,
Lest thou also be like unto him.—(Pr 26^a).

Other varieties are often singled out for discussion, and it will not be supposed that a typical form is always to be discovered. The variations and combinations are very numerous, and the study of them is full of interest and novelty.

The two-line group, or distich, has been considered above, as the simplest in which parallelism can be observed. It is also by far the commonest. Three lines grouped in a similar way are not uncommon. In this case the first and second may be synonymous, and the third synthetic to them; or other combinations may be found. Moreover, distiches may be arranged in pairs, with the same parallelism as between single lines of the distich. It often occurs that several lines are grouped together so regularly that a stanza or strophe is recognizable. It may be marked off by a line repeated as a refrain, or by a special initial letter, in alphabetical poems; but such indications are not of common occurrence. Absolute regularity in length is not often found, and scholars often attempt to secure it by assuming the loss or insertion of a couplet or two. There is also no specific principle distinct from the parallelism above mentioned, to form the basis of a strophical division. It seems likely, then, that strophes are not to be regarded as an essential feature of Hebrew poetry, like the stanzas of a hymn that is to be sung; but that the grouping is entirely optional and ordinarily logical—a literary feature. Rhyme and assonance are known in the language, but are not used persistently throughout a poem, and cannot be anticipated or reduced to rule when present.

3. By far the greater part of the OT poetry is of course religious and ethical, as the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job (see art.). Outside of these books, however, is an interesting and by no means small amount of poetry which the Bible student may profitably study for its literary and historical value.

In family and social life, poetry evidently had a large place. Marriage occasions furnished the very best opportunity for the composition of songs, and for their execution to the accompaniment of music. Such are the songs in the Book of Canticles. The wedding song evidently furnished the model of the passage Is 54^a. Lamentation for the dead is also an evidence. The finest example is that of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1^{7a}). A part of a lament by him over Abner is found in 2 S 3³¹. The tenderness and fitness of these utterances are very different from the stereotyped dirges of which there is notice in Jer 9¹⁰ ('). The character of these may be seen from the Book of Lamentations where the poet laments over the city as over a person. The first four of the five poems of this book are alphabetical, a strong mark of artificiality, which is further emphasized by the choice of a peculiar rhythm, known as the elegiac rhythm. There is a long line, commonly broken by a cæsure. The first half contains three beats or rises, the ordinary length of the Hebrew line. The second half has but two. In ordinary rhythm it would have three, and would form a second line in parallelism with the first. The same rhythm is detected in a few passages of similar import in the prophets. There are allusions, too numerous to cite, to the use of songs at feasts of various kinds, and at the drunken revels against which the prophets protest. Nu 21¹⁷ is claimed to be an example of the songs often sung to celebrate the discovery of a spring or the successful digging of a well. The religious use of poetry is scarcely to be distinguished from its national use. For when Jahweh could be addressed as the God of the hosts of Israel, poems composed to incite or reward bravery could not fail to make use of religious as well as of patriotic emotions to secure their end. See, for example, Jg 5.

POLE (SACRED).—See ASHERAH, 3. 4.

POLL.—'By the poll' (Nu 3⁴⁷) is 'by the head,' Cf. Shaks. Hamlet, iv. v. 196, 'All flaxen was his poll.' The idea in the Hebrew word is 'roundness,' and so to 'poll' the head is to give it the appearance of roundness by cutting off the hair. Cf. More, Utopia, ed. Arber, p. 49, 'Their heades be not polled or shauen, but rounded u lytle about the eares.'

POLLUX.—See DIOSCURI.

POLYGAMY.—See FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

POMEGRANATE (rimmōn, Arab. rummān).—Tree and fruit (Ex 28³³, 39²⁴⁻²⁶, Nu 13²² 20⁵, Dt 8⁸, 1 S 14², 1 K 7¹⁸, 20. 42, 2 K 25¹⁷, 2 Ch 3¹⁶ 4¹³, Ca 4³, 13 6⁷ 7¹² 8², Jer 52²¹, Jl 1¹², Hag 2¹⁹). The pomegranate (Punica granatum) is one of the familiar fruit trees of the OT; it is usually a shrub, but may attain the height of a tree (1 S 14²); it was much admired for its beauty (Ca 4³ 6¹¹), and its flower was copied in ornamentation (Ex 28³³, 1 K 7¹⁴). Its dark green leaves and brilliant scarlet blossom make it a peculiarly attractive object, especially when growing in orchards (Ca 4¹³), mixed with trees of other shades of green; its buds develop with the tender grapes (Ca 7¹²), and the round, reddish fruit, with its brilliant crimson, juicy seeds, ripens at the time of the vintage. The fruit is a favourite food, and the bark a valued astringent medicine.

PONTUS.—In the earliest times of which we have any knowledge, this name, meaning 'sea' in Greek, was used by Greeks to indicate vaguely country bordering on or near the Black Sea. From its importance for the corn supply of Greece, the Black Sea and the land around it came to be known as 'the sea' par excellence. As time went on the term gradually became confined to the country to the south of the Black Sea. It was not till about B.C. 302 that a kingdom was here formed. In that year, consequent upon the troubles due to the early death of Alexander the Great, a certain Mithradates was able to carve out for himself a kingdom beyond the river Halys in N.E. Asia Minor, and about B.C. 281 he assumed the title of king. It is not possible to define the exact extent of the territory ruled by this king and his descendants, but it is certain that it included part of the country previously called Cappadocia, some of the mountain tribes near the Black Sea coasts, and part of Paphlagonia; and also certain that its extent varied from time to time. The Mithradatic dynasty lasted till B.C. 63. In the preceding year the kingdom ceased to exist, and part of it was incorporated in the Roman Empire under the name Pontus, and this district henceforth constituted one-half of the combined province Bithynia-Pontus, which was put under one governor. The remaining portions of the old kingdom were distributed in other ways. The civil wars helped Pharnaces, a son of the last Mithradates, to acquire the whole of his father's kingdom, but his brief reign ended in defeat by Julius Caesar (B.C. 47). The narrowed kingdom of Pontus was re-constituted by Mark Antony in B.C. 39, and given in B.C. 36 to Polemon, who founded a dynasty, which ruled over this kingdom till A.D. 63. The daughter of this Polemon, Queen Tryphana, is mentioned in the apocryphal book, The Acts of Paul and Thecla, as having been present at a great Imperial festival at Pisidian Antioch in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, whose blood-relation she was. This statement is no doubt founded on fact. These Acts relate that she protected the Christian maiden Thecla, and was converted, through her instrumentality, to Christianity. As tradition connects Bartholomew also with the Polemonian dynasty, it is probable that there were some Christians among them. In A.D. 63 the kingdom of Pontus had been brought to a sufficiently high pitch of civilization to be admitted into the Roman Empire; the western part was made a region of the province Galatia, and the eastern was added to Cappadocia. The dispossessed Polemon was given a Cilician kingdom, and it was as king of part of Cilicia that he (later than A.D. 63) married Berenice.

In the 1st cent. A.D., therefore, the name Pontus had various significations, and a strict nomenclature was available for their distinction. The province was Pontus, Polemon's kingdom was Pontus Polemoniæus (incorporated into province Galatia A.D. 63), the part of Mithradates' old kingdom incorporated in the province Galatia (B.C. 3-2) was Pontus Galaticus, and the regions that lay E. of Pontus Polemoniæus, between the Black Sea and Armenia, were known as Pontus Cappadociæus. (Into the difficult question of the institution of this fourth district we cannot enter here.) From about A.D. 78 to 106 P. Galaticus and P. Polemoniæus were included in the combined provinces Galatia and Cappadocia, and after A.D. 106 they constituted permanent parts of the province Cappadocia. In 1 P 1¹ Pontus means clearly the Roman province. There is little doubt that the adjective Pontikos, applied to Aquila in Ac 18², means that, though a Jew, he was a native of the Roman province, and it is interesting in connexion with this to mention that an inscription has recently been found referring to one Aquila at Sinope, one of the principal cities of the Roman province Pontus. The only remaining NT reference to Pontus (Ac 2⁹) cannot be so easily explained. It must be left uncertain whether the name Pontus there is used strictly of the province, or more loosely of the kingdom, or of the kingdom and the province together.

Christianity was not brought to Pontus by St. Paul, if we can trust the silence of Acts, and it is best to do so. From 1 Peter it is clear that about the year 80, the probable date of the Epistle, there were Christians in that country, and these converts from paganism to Christianity probably came there from the Asian coasts or from Rome. There is a well-known and valuable testimony to the prevalence of Christianity in the province, belonging to the period A.D. 111-113. At that time the younger Pliny was governor of the province Bithynia-Pontus, and addressed inquiries to the Emperor Trajan on the manner in which Christians ought to be treated by the administration. He reports that many men and women of all ages and of every rank in town and country were Christians, and that some had abandoned the faith 20 or 25 years before. After Pliny's time Pontus continued to be a stronghold of Christianity. From here came the famous Marcion (born about 120 at Sinope), and of this province Aquila, a translator of the OT into Greek, was a native.

POOL, POND

POOL, POND.—'āgam, a collection of standing water, is distinguished from miqweh, a place into which water flows, or is led (Ex 7¹⁹). The former may denote the water left in the hollows when the inundation of the Nile subsides, and the latter, reservoirs (cf. Gn 1¹⁰, Lv 11³). AV tr. 'āgam 'pond,' in Ex 7¹⁹ 8³; RV uniformly 'pool' (Is 14² etc.). birkehah (2 S 2¹³ 4¹² etc.) is = Arab. birkeh, an artificial pond or tank. It is applied to great reservoirs constructed to furnish water for cities, or for irrigation, like that at Gibeon (2 S 2¹³), those at Hebron (2 S 4¹²), and at Jerusalem (2 K 18¹⁷), etc.; and also to large basins, such as lend freshness to the courts of the houses in Damascus. The usual LXX equivalent is kolumbēthra, the word used in NT for the pools of Bethesda and Siloam (Jn 5² 9⁷). In Is 19¹⁰ read with RV 'all they that work for hire shall be grieved in soul.' See also HEBRON. W. EWING.

POOR.—See POVERTY.

POPULAR (libneh [root meaning 'white'], Gn 30²⁷, RVm 'storax'; Hos 4¹³. The Heb. is very similar to Arab. lubna meaning 'storax,' which is the LXX tr. in Gn 30²⁷; on the other hand, in Hos 4¹³ the LXX has leukē ['white'], i.e. the 'poplar').—The poplar may easily have furnished Jacob with white rods. There are two kinds of poplar in Syria, Populus alba and P. euphratica; they both flourish round Damascus, where their trunks are much used in making supports for the mud roofs. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PORATHA.—The fourth son of Haman (Est 9⁸).

PORCH.—This word is a doublet of 'portico' (from Lat. porticus), both originally denoting a covered entrance to a building. When the front of this entrance is supported on pillars, the porch becomes a portico. porticus, like the Gr. stoa, was extended to signify a roofed colonnade running round a public building such as a temple, or enclosing an open space, like the cloisters of a mediæval monastery. The most famous of these 'porches'—a sense in which the word is now obsolete—were the 'painted porch'—the Porch par excellence—at Athens, and Solomon's porch at Jerusalem (see below).

In the OT a porch is named chiefly in connexion with the Temple (see below), or with the palace (wh. see) of Solomon. The pillars of the temple of Dagon at Gaza which Samson pulled down, or rather said from their stone bases, were probably two of those supporting the portico, as ingeniously explained by Macalister, Bible Sidights, etc., ch. vii. (see HOUSE, § 5). The word rendered 'porch' in Jg 3²² is of quite uncertain meaning and even of doubtful authenticity.

In the NT, in connexion with the trial of Jesus, mention is made of a 'porch' or, as RVm, 'forecourt' (Mk 14⁶¹), as distinguished from the 'court' (v. 66 RV) of the high priest's palace, for which Mt 26⁷¹ (EV 'porch') has a word elsewhere rendered 'gate.' In both cases the covered gateway leading from the street to the court is probably meant.

Solomon's porch (Jn 10²³, Ac 3¹¹ 5¹²) was a covered colonnade or cloister running along the east side of the Temple enclosure (see TEMPLE, § 1 (d)), where the triple colonnade of Herod's temple—the 'Royal Porch' of Josephus—is also discussed. For details see Egypt, Nov. 1908, p. 68). A similar colonnade enclosed the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5²). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PORCUPINE.—See BITTERN.

PORPOISE.—Ex 25⁴, Ezk 16¹⁰ RVm. See BADGERS' SKINS.

PORT.—The 'port' of Neh 2¹³ is a 'gate,' the same Heb. word being translated 'gate' in the same verse. Cf. Pr-Bk. version of Ps 94 'Within the ports of the daughter of Sion.'

PORTER in EV has always the sense of 'doorkeeper' (see HOUSE, § 6) or 'gatekeeper' (see FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, § 5, end). In Jn 10⁴ the porter is the man left in charge of a sheepfold by the shepherd or shepherds whose sheep are there housed for the night. In private houses the doorkeeper might be a woman (2 S 4⁶ as restored from LXX, Ac 12¹³). In OT, however, porters are most frequently named in the Books of Chron., Ezr., and Neh. In connexion with the Temple (1 Ch 9¹⁷, onwards), where they had charge of the various gates (see TEMPLE, § 6, PRIESTS AND LEVITES, § iii. 1.2). The same word is rendered doorkeepers in AV 1 Ch 15²¹, and in several other places in RV (15¹⁸ etc.). It is to be regretted that this term was not substituted throughout. In Ps 84¹⁰ the original is different, and should probably be rendered: 'I had rather be [standing or lying] at the threshold in the house of my God.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

POSIDONIUS.—An envoy sent by Nicanor to Judas (2 Mac 14¹⁹).

POSSESSION.—1. Meaning of the term.—The central idea in the word is the coercive seizing of the spirit of a man by another spirit, viewed as superhuman, with the result that the man's will is no longer free but is controlled, often against his wish, by this indwelling person or power. In Scripture the idea is associated with both phases of moral character; and a man may be possessed by Christ or the Holy Spirit, or by a or the devil. Later usage has confined the word mainly, though not exclusively, to possession by an evil spirit. Of the better possession there are several kinds of instances in both Testaments. It is sometimes represented, according to the more material psychology of early times, as the seizure of a man by an external power, though the internal occupation is implied, and the control is none the less complete (1 S 10¹⁰, Is 61¹; cf. the frequent 'the hand of the Lord was upon' him, 1 K 18⁴⁶; so of an evil spirit, 1 S 18¹⁰). The inspiration of the prophets is in some places described as effected by a supernatural agency occupying the seat of personality within the prophet, and controlling or moving him (1 K 17⁹, 1 P 1¹¹, 2 P 1²¹, 2 Es 14²²). In personal religion not only is the transference of authority within to the indwelling Christ spoken of (Jn 17²³, Gal 2²⁰), but the Holy Spirit also may seize and possess a man (Ac 2⁴, Lk 1¹⁵, Ro 8⁹, Eph 5¹⁸), and should rule in him (Eph 4²⁰). But this involves a welcome and glad submission to the sway of a spirit within, though personal wishes may be thwarted or crossed (Ac 16⁷). Demoniacal possession, on the other hand, is characterized by the reluctance of the sufferer, who is often conscious of the hateful tyranny under which he is held and against which his will rebels in vain.

2. Features of demoniacal possession.—In such possession two features may generally be traced. It is allied with and yet distinct from physical disease, and there is almost always something abnormal with respect to the psychological development or defect of the sufferer. It is given as the explanation in cases of dumbness (Mt 9³², Lk 11¹⁴), of deafness and dumbness (Mk 9¹⁸), of dumbness and blindness (Mt 12²²), of curvature of the spine (Lk 13¹¹), and of epilepsy (Mk 1²⁶). Elsewhere such complaints are referred to as merely disease, and no suggestion is made that they were caused or complicated by the action of an evil spirit (Mt 15²⁰, Mk 7²², Lk 18²⁶). Sometimes possession and disease are even distinguished by different enumeration (Mt 10⁸, Mk 1²², Lk 6¹⁷ 7²¹ 13²²); and once at least epileptics (or lunatics) and palsied occupy a different category from demoniacs (Mt 4²⁴). The right conclusion seems to be that the same disease was in some cases ascribed to ordinary causes and in others to possession, the distinguishing feature being possibly intractability due to the violence of permanence of the symptoms. Evidence that the disorder was at the same time of a psychical or nervous character is plentiful. According to Arab belief, something abnormal in the appearance, such as a strange look in the eyes or an unusual catching in the throat, was an invariable symptom, and both are indications of nervous excitement or alarm. The will was paralyzed (Mk 9¹⁸), and the sufferer was under the influence of illusions (Jn 7⁷⁰). He identified himself with the demons, and was averse to deliverance (Mk 1³⁴ 57). In such cases Jesus does not follow His usual course of exciting faith before He heals, but acts as though the sufferer were not in a fit state to believe or to trust, and must be dealt with forcibly first of all. Some confident and majestic word is spoken, of which the authority is immediately recognized; and only then, when the proper balance of the mind has been restored, is an attempt made to communicate religious blessing.

3. Our Lord's belief.—Two opinions have been held as to whether Christ actually shared the current views of His day as to demoniacal possession. That He seemed to do so is attested on almost every page of the Synoptics. (a) According to one opinion, this was nothing more than a seeming, and His attitude towards the phenomena must be explained as a gracious accommodation to the views of the age. In addition to the serious objection that such a theory introduces an unwelcome element of unreality into Christ's teaching, and implies a lack of candour on His part, the arguments in its favour are singularly ineffective. To assert that Christ never entangled His teaching with contemporary ideas is to prejudice the very question at issue. That He adopted different methods from those followed by professional exorcists, whose success He expressly attests (Mt 12²⁷), is exactly what His difference in person from them would cause to be expected, but does not necessarily involve a difference in theory. To humour a patient by falling in with his hallucination is not a correct description of Christ's procedure; for in many of the instances the treatment is peremptory and stern (cf. Mk 9²⁸, where the sufferer was not consulted, and any humouring followed the cure; so elsewhere), and the evil spirits are represented after expulsion as actual and still capable of mischief (Mk 5¹³). Christ's own language is itself significant. He makes the current belief the basis of argument (Lk 11^{14a}), attributes the power to cast out devils to the disciples of the Pharisees, and implicitly asserts it for Himself (Mk 12²⁷, Lk 11^{14c}), and recognizes the power as resident in others (Mk 9^{38f}, Mt 7²²), without a single intimation that He was speaking in metaphor, and that His hearers were blundering in assuming that He meant what He said.

(b) The real explanation is to be found in quite another direction. His humanity was true and complete, the humanity of the age into which He was born; and of His Divine attributes He 'emptied himself' (Ph 2⁷, 2 Co 8³ 13^c), except to the extent to which His perfect human nature might be the organ of their manifestation (Bruce, Humiliation of Christ, 136 ff.; Otley, Doct. of Incarnation, 610 ff.). In virtue of this voluntary self-limitation, His humanity was not lifted clear of the intellectual atmosphere of His time; but He shared the conceptions and views of the people amongst whom He became incarnate, though His sinlessness and the welcomed guidance of the Holy Spirit aided His human intelligence, removing some of the worst hindrances to correct thinking, but not making Him in any sense a prodigy in advance of His age in regard to human knowledge. Accordingly, He avoids the extreme and exaggerated demonology into which an unduly extended animistic interpretation of the universe was leading His contemporaries, but does not reject or question the interpretation itself. At a later date there was a disposition to ascribe all diseases to possession, to multiply evil spirits beyond calculation, and to invest them with functions and activities of the most grotesque kind. Christ's attitude was altogether different, though He consistently talks and acts upon the assumption that evil spirits were no creatures of the fancy, and that possession was a real phenomenon.

That such an assumption was wrong it is outside the province of the real sciences to assert or to deny; and there are some considerations that make the conclusion at least probable, that personal spirits of evil exist, and cause by their activity some woeful sufferings amongst men. Metaphysics postulates transcendent personal power as the original cause of material phenomena, and is sustained in so doing by all that a man knows concerning the roots of his own moral procedure. Immanent in man and outside, there is generally recognized a great spiritual existence, affecting human life in a thousand invisible ways; and the belief in One Supreme Spirit removes most of the difficulties from the belief in others, subordinate yet superhuman. In the asylums and hospitals, moreover, are cases of mental or nervous disease, not entirely explicable by physical law, but looking exceedingly like what cases of possession may be supposed to be; just as in social and civil life men are sometimes met with whose viciousness defies any other interpretation than that an, or the, evil spirit has secured the mastery over them. Psychological research, too, points to a large spiritual population of the world, and all the naturalistic explanations so far suggested have failed to solve the mystery. The conclusion seems probable that demoniacal possession was accepted by Christ as an actual fact, with modifications of the views of His contemporaries in the direction of economy in the bringing in of superhuman agencies, and of their due distinction from processes of physical law.

Possession may further be classed as one of the fundamental and universal beliefs of mankind, with a solid element of truth in it, though running at times of excitement into extravagance. Homer held that a wasting sickness was caused by a demon, and the Greek dramatists generally attribute madness and quasi-religious frenzy to demonic or Divine possession. The Egyptians located a demon in each of the thirty-six members of the body; their presence was the cause of disease, which was healed by their expulsion. Seven evil spirits are grouped in Babylonian mythology (Mt 12²⁸, Mk 16⁸, Lk 8² 11²), and these with their subordinate genii kept men in continual fear, and were thought able to occupy the body and produce any kind of sickness. In almost every civilization, ancient as those of the East or rude as those of Central Africa, a similar conception has prevailed; and the prevalence points to a certain rudimentary truth that need not be renounced along with the elaborations by which in the course of ages the actual fact has been overlaid.

R. W. MOSE.

POST.—'Post' is used in 2 Ch 30⁶, Est 8¹⁴, Job 9²⁵, Jer 51²¹ for 'a bearer of despatches,' 'a runner.' These runners were chosen from the king's bodyguard, and were noted for their swiftness, whence Job's simile (9²⁵), 'My days are swifter than a post.'

POST, DOORPOST.—See HOUSE, § 6.

POT.—See HOUSE, § 9.

POTIPHAR.—Gn 39, a high Egyptian official in the story of Joseph. The name is perhaps a deformation of Potiphara (wh. see) or an unsuccessful attempt to form an Egyptian name on the same lines. Potiphar seems to be entitled 'chief cook' (EV 'captain of the guard'), and likewise saris, 'eunuch' of Pharaoh. But the former title 'cook' may be only a mark of high rank; persons described as royal tasters in the New Kingdom were leaders of expeditions, investigators of criminal cases, judges in the most important trials, etc.; as yet, too, there is little indication that eunuchs were employed in Egypt even at a later period: so this also was but an honorific official title; the Hebrew word saris is actually found attached to the names of Persian officers in Egypt. Joseph was sold to Potiphar, on whose wife's accusation he was cast into the king's prison (in Potiphar's own house), to which Pharaoh afterwards committed his chief butler and chief baker. The office thus held by Potiphar cannot yet be precisely identified in Egyptian documents. In the passage Gn 41⁴ and the repeated description of Joseph's wife, the forms of the names and the title of the priest are much more precisely Egyptian. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

POTIPHERA.—Gn 41⁴⁶, 46⁴⁰. The consonants in the Hebrew are an almost exact transcript of the Egypt. Peteprē, 'Given by the Sun-god,' a late name found from the 22nd Dyn. onwards; only the letter w (represented by Eng. o) is puzzling. Potiphera, father of Joseph's wife Asenath (wh. see), was priest of On, i.e. probably high priest of Rē, the Sun-god, in On. He would thus be the head of the most learned sacerdotal college in the country, and of high rank. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

POTSHERD.—See POTTERY.

POTTAGE.—See FOOD, 3.

POTTER, POTTERY.—The artificer (yōtsēr) is first named in 2 S 17¹⁸. This implies the use of pottery at an earlier period. The ancient Egyptians were familiar with its manufacture (Wilk. Anc. Egypt. ii, 190 ff.), and Israel could not be entirely ignorant of it. During their nomad life, however, such brittle material would be little serviceable, and its use would be reduced to a minimum—skins, vessels of wood, metal, etc., being preferred. Skins for water, wine, etc., have been in use at all times, down to the present day (Gn 21¹⁴, Jg 4¹⁹, 1 S 16²⁰ etc.); but we also find the earthenware pitcher, or jar (kad), similarly employed (Gn 24¹⁴, Jg 7¹⁰, 1 K 17¹³ [EV 'barrel'] etc.). Only after settlement in Palestine was the art developed to any extent by Israelites. In the later writings the potter is frequently referred to (Ps 2⁹, Is 29¹⁶, Jer 18² etc.).

The potter first kneaded the clay with his feet (Is 41²⁵), then shaped the vessel on the wheel (Jer 18²). This consisted of two wooden disks attached to a perpendicular axle, the larger being below the work-table. This the potter turned with his foot. The vessel was then fired in an oven (Sir 38²⁶). In later times the art of glazing was also understood, oxide of lead ('silver dross'), obtained in refining silver, being used for the purpose (Pr 23², Sir 38³⁰). In Jeremiah's day the potters seem to have had a stance by the 'gate of potters' (Jer 18¹, 19¹, RV 'gate Harsith'), probably in the neighbourhood of the clay pits, where they offered their wares for sale.

The thought of the potter moulding his clay at will is implicit in many passages where yōtsēr, 'to form,' is the verb used (Gn 2⁷, Ps 33¹⁵ 95⁵ etc.), and is made explicit in such passages as Is 29¹⁶ 45⁹, Ro 9²¹ etc.

The reading el ha'yōtsēr (Syr.), 'into the treasury,' is preferred in Zec 11¹⁵ by many scholars and RVm to MT el hayyōtsēr, 'unto the potter.' The passage is one of great difficulty.

What is known of the potter's art in Palestine is due mainly to the work of the Palestine Exploration Fund, and especially to that carried out by Flinders Petrie, Bliss, and Macalister, at Tell el-Hesi—possibly the ancient Lachish—and elsewhere, from 1890 onwards. The result of their investigations, and discussions by other scholars, are found in the PEFSF; Petrie's Tell el-Hesi; Bliss's Mound of Many Cities; Excavations in Palestine, by Bliss, Macalister, and Wunsch, etc.

Petrie distinguishes three periods of ancient pottery. 1. Amorite, pre-historic, where the shape and markings of the vessels seem to show that they were moulded on the old leathern vessels. 2. Phœnician, rough and porous in character, often with painted ornamentation, of which possibly metal vessels furnished the models. This may be dated from B.C. 1400 to 1000. 3. Jewish, in which Amorite and Phœnician styles are blended; this apparently belongs to the time of the later monarchy. On many jar handles are legends stamped in characters resembling those of the Siloam inscription. Along with the Jewish, Greek types of pottery are found, chiefly ribbed bowls, and large amphoræ with loop handles. The red and black figured ware was also imported (Bliss, in Hastings' DB iv. 27).

Where pottery of the Seleucid age, with Greek names stamped on the handles, or Roman pottery, 'ribbed amphoræ,' and tiles stamped with the stamp of the tenth legion,' or Arab glazed ware, is found, sites may be dated with approximate accuracy. But for these and older times, data furnished by remains of pottery must be used with caution. Thus certain jars found at a great depth below the surface at Jerusalem, undoubtedly belonging to a comparatively early time, closely resemble some of those in use at the present day (Nowack, Heb. Arch. i. 265ff.). W. EWING.

POVERTY.—1. In the OT.—The character and degree of the poverty prevalent in a community will naturally vary with the stages of social development through which it successively passes. Poverty is more acutely felt, and its extremes are more marked, where city-life and commerce have grown up than where the conditions of life are purely nomadic or agricultural.

The causes of poverty referred to in the OT (apart from those due to individual folly) are specially (a) bad seasons, involving failure of crops, loss of cattle, etc. (cf. 2 K 8¹⁻⁷, Neh 5³); (b) raids and invasions; (c) land-grabbing (cf. Is 5⁸); (d) over-taxation and forced labour (cf. Jer 22³¹); (e) extortionate usury, the opportunity for which was provided by the necessity for meeting high taxation and the losses arising from bad harvests (cf. Neh 5⁴⁻⁵).

In the earlier period, when the tribal system with its complex of clans and families flourished, poverty was not acutely felt. Losses, of course, there were, arising from bad seasons, invasion, and pestilence; we hear, too, of rich men oppressing the poor (cf. Nathan's parable, 2 S 12⁴); but there was little permanent poverty. Matters were maintained in a state of equilibrium so long as the land-system, under which all free Israelitish families possessed a patrimony, remained in working order. It is significant that in the earlier legislation of JE (cf. esp. the Ten Commandments, Ex 20¹⁻¹⁷, and the 'Book of the Covenant,' Ex 20²²⁻²³) the few references that do occur (e.g. Ex 22²⁶ 23⁶) do not suggest that poverty was very wide-spread or acutely felt. During the period of the later monarchy, however, commerce, city-life, and luxury grew apace, and the greed and heartless oppression of the rich, the corruption and perversion of justice, which this state of things brought in its train, were constantly denounced by the great writing prophets, esp. in the 8th cent. (cf. e.g., Is 1², Am 4¹ 6¹, Mic 2²).

The Deuteronomiclegislation (7th cent.) bears eloquent testimony to the prevalence of poverty under the later monarchy (cf. Dt 10¹⁷⁻¹⁹ 14²⁸⁻²⁹ 15. 23¹⁹. 20 24¹⁰⁻²¹ 26¹²⁻¹⁶), and in one famous sentence predicts its permanence ('the poor shall never cease out of the land,' 15¹¹).

The classes of poor more particularly mentioned are widows, orphans, and the 'sojourners,' or resident strangers, who possessed no landed rights (gerim). The Levites also are specially referred to in Deut. as an impoverished class (cf. 12¹⁸. 19 18),—a result of the centralization of worship in the one sanctuary at Jerusalem. All classes of the poor are the objects of special solicitude and consideration in the Mosaic legislation, particularly in the Priestly Code (cf. e.g. Lv 5⁷. 11 19¹⁵ etc.).

For a long time after the Exile and Return the Palestinian community remained in a state of miserable poverty. It was a purely agricultural society, and suffered much from contracted boundaries and agricultural depression. The 'day of small things' spoken of by the prophet Zechariah (4¹⁰) was prolonged. A terrible picture of devastation (produced by a locust plague) is given by the prophet Joel (ch. 1), and matters were aggravated during the last years of Persian rule (down to 332), and by the conflict between the Seleucids and Ptolemys for the possession of Palestine which aged for considerably more than a century (322-198). It is significant that in the Psalms the term 'poor' or 'lowly' has become synonymous with 'pious.' During the earlier part of the post-exilic period the wealthy Jewish families for the most part remained behind in Babylon. In the later period, after the conquests of Alexander the Great (from 322), prosperous communities of Jews grew up in such centres as Antioch and Alexandria (the Greek 'Dispersion'). Slowly and gradually the Palestinian community grew in importance; for a time under the Maccabees there was a politically independent Jewish State. A certain amount of material prosperity ensued. Jerusalem, as being a centre of pilgrimage, received large revenues from the Jewish pilgrims who thronged to it: a Temple-tax swelled the revenues of the priesthood. The aristocratic priestly families were very wealthy. But the bulk of the priesthood still remained comparatively poor. The Jewish community of Palestine was still mainly agricultural, but more prosperous under settled government (the Herods and the Romans); while Galilee became a hive of industry, and sustained a large industrial population (an artisan class).

In dealing with poverty the Jewish legislation displays a very humane spirit. Usury is forbidden: the poor are to have the produce of the land in Sabbatical years; and in Deut. tithes are allotted to be given them (14²⁸ etc.); they are to have the right to glean (24^{18, 21}), and in the Priestly Code there is the unrealized ideal of the Jubilee Year (Lv 25, cf. Dt 15¹²⁻¹⁵). All these provisions were supplemented by alms-giving, which in later Judaism became one of the most important parts of religious duty (see ALMS, ALMSGIVING).

2. In the NT.—In the NT period conditions were not essentially altered. The exactions of tax-collectors seem to have been acutely felt (notice esp. the collocation 'publicans and sinners'), but alms-giving was strongly inculcated as a religious duty, the early Christians following in this respect the example set by the synagogue (cf. Ro 12¹³; and St. Paul's collection for 'the poor saints at Jerusalem,' Ro 15²⁶, Gal 2¹⁰). The early generations of Christians were drawn mostly from the poorer classes (slaves or freedmen), but the immediate disciples of our Lord belonged rather to what we should call the lower middle class—sturdy Galilean fishermen, owning their own boats, or tax-collectors. It should be noted that in the Gospels (e.g. in the Beatitudes) the term 'poor' sometimes possesses a religious connotation, as in the Psalms.

POWER.—In general the word means ability for doing something, and includes the idea of adequate strength, might, skill, resources, energy, and efficiency, either material, mental, or spiritual, to effect intended results. Strictly speaking, there is no real power or authority in the universe but that which is ultimately of God (Ps 62¹, Jn 19¹¹, Ro 13¹). But this Almighty One has originated innumerable subordinate powers, and some of these are possessed of ability to perform acts contrary to the will and commandments of the Creator. And so we may speak of the power of God, or of man, or of angel, or of demon, or of powers inherent in things inanimate. Inasmuch as in the highest and absolute sense 'power belongeth unto God,' it is fitting to ascribe unto Him such doxologies as appear in 1 Ch 29¹¹, Mt 6¹³. In Mt 26⁶⁴ the word 'power' is employed for God Himself, and it is accordingly very natural that it should be often used to denote the various forms of God's activity, especially in His works of creation and redemption. Christ is thus the power of God both in His Person and in His gospel of salvation (1 Co 1^{18, 24}, Ro 1¹⁶). The power of the Holy Spirit is also another mode of the Divine activity. By similar usage Simon the sorcerer was called 'the power of God which is called Great' (Ac 8¹⁰), i.e. a supposed incarnation of the power of God. The plural powers is used in a variety of meanings. (1) In Mt 7²², Lk 10¹³, Ac 2²² 8¹⁴, 'powers,' or 'mighty works,' along with 'signs and wonders,' are to be understood as miracles, and were concrete manifestations of supernatural power. (2) 'The powers of the heavens' (Mt 24²⁹, Mk 13²⁵) are understood by some as the forces inherent in the sun, moon, stars, and other phenomena of the heavens, by virtue of which they 'rule over the day and over the night' (Gn 1¹⁸); by others these heavenly powers are understood to be the starry hosts themselves conceived as the armies of the heavens. (3) Both good and evil angels are designated by the term, 'principalities and powers' in such passages as Eph 1²¹ 3¹⁰ 6¹², Col 1¹⁶ 2^{10, 15}, 1 P 3². The context of each passage must show whether the reference is to angels or demons. In Eph 2² Satan is called 'the prince of the power of the air,' and these powers are further defined in 6¹² as 'world-rulers of this darkness, the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places.' These are thought of as so many ranks of evil spirits who are ever at war with God's hosts, and seek to usurp the heavenly regions. (4) In Ro 13¹ civil magistrates are called 'the higher powers' because of their superior rank, authority, and influence as officers ordained of God for the administration of justice among men (cf. Lk 12¹¹, Tit 3¹). (5) 'The powers of the age to come' (He 6⁵) are best understood of all supernatural gifts and spiritual forces which belong to the age or dispensation of the New Covenant, of which Jesus is the Mediator (cf. He 9¹⁴). They include the 'greater works' (Jn 14¹²) which Jesus assured His disciples they should do after His going unto the Father and sending them the Spirit of truth. See AUTHORITY, KINGDOM OF GOD. M. S. TERRY.

POWER OF THE KEYS.—In ecclesiastical history the phrase is associated primarily with the so-called 'Privilege of Peter,' upon which the dogma of papal supremacy has been built, but also with the delegated authority of an official priesthood to pronounce sentence of the absolution or the retention of sins.

1. The fundamental passage is Mt 16¹⁸. When St. Peter at Caesarea Philippi had made his great confession of Jesus as the Christ, Jesus blessed him and announced that upon this rock He would build His Church. Then He added, 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.' That this double promise, like the one in the preceding verse, was made to St. Peter personally can hardly be doubted. The question is as to what it means. Evidently Jesus is carrying out the figure He has already used of a building founded upon a rock—the rock, viz., of believing confession, of which the Apostle was the splendid type; and He now declares that as the reward of a confession which stamped him as the first true Christian, the bottom stone of the great edifice that was about to rise, he should have the privilege of wielding the keys of that Church of Christ which was to be realized in the Kingdom of heaven. There are some who think that by this gift of the keys St. Peter was appointed to the position of a steward in charge of his Lord's treasures, entrusted with the duty of feeding the household (Lk 12⁴², cf. Mt 13²⁹). But from the use of the word 'key' by Jesus Himself in Lk 11¹², and from the analogy of Is 22²², Rev 3⁷, it is probable that the keys are those not of the storehouse but of the mansion itself, and that the gift of them points to the privilege of admitting others into the Kingdom. The promise was fulfilled, accordingly, on the day of Pentecost, when St. Peter opened the doors of the Christian Church to the Jewish world (Ac 2⁴¹); and again at Caesarea, when he, first of the Apostles, opened that same door to the Gentiles (Ac 10²⁴⁻²⁸ 15⁷). But, as the two incidents show, there was nothing arbitrary, official, or mysterious about St. Peter's exercise of the power of the keys on these occasions. It was his believing confession of Christ that had gained him the privilege, and both in Jerusalem and at Caesarea it was by a renewed confession of Christ, accompanied by a testimony to the truth regarding Him as that had been made known in the experience of faith (Ac 2:27-28 10:38-43), that he opened the doors of the Kingdom alike to Jews and to Gentiles.

With regard to the second part of the verse, 'Whosoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven,' some scholars have regarded it as merely explaining what is meant by the keys of the Kingdom, while others hold that it confers a privilege. The latter view is the more probable. And as we know that in the Rabbinic language of the time, to 'bind' and to 'loose' were the regular terms for forbidding and permitting, these words confer upon the Apostle a power of legislation in the Christian Church—a power which we see him exercising by and by, along with the other Apostles and the elders, at the Jerusalem Conference (Ac 15:1-11 22-29).

But now comes the question, Was this twofold promise, which was given to St. Peter personally, given him in any exclusive sense? As regards the second part of it, clearly not; for on a later occasion in this same Gospel we find Jesus bestowing precisely the same privilege on His disciples generally (18:18; cf. v. 1 and also vv. 19, 20). Moreover, the later NT history shows that St. Peter had no supreme position as a legislator in the Church (see Ac 15:13, 19, Gal 2:10). And if the power of binding and loosing was not given to him exclusively, the presumption is that the same thing holds of the parallel power of the keys. As a matter of fact, we find it to be so. Though St. Peter had the privilege of first opening the doors of the Kingdom to both Jews and Gentiles, the same privilege was soon exercised by others (Ac 8:14 11:19 13:3). By and by Peter falls into the background, and we find Paul and Barnabas rehearsing to the Church how God through their preaching had 'opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles' (14:27). But this does not mean that the privilege was withdrawn from St. Peter; it means only that it was extended to others on their fulfilment of those same conditions of faith and testimony on which Peter had first received it.

2. In Mt 18:18 there appears to be no reference whatever to the remission and retention of sins. As in 16:19, 'whatsoever' not 'whomsoever' is the word employed, and here as there the binding and loosing must be taken to refer to the enactment of ordinances for regulating the affairs of the Church, not to the discharge of such a purely spiritual function as the forgiveness of sins. In any case, the promise is made not to the Apostles, much less to an official priesthood deriving authority from them by an Apostolic succession, but to 'the Church' (v. 17).

3. In Jn 20:23 we find the assurance definitely given of a power to remit or retain sins. But the gift is bestowed upon the whole company present (cf. Lk 24:33) as representing the Christian society generally. That society, through its possession of the Holy Spirit (v. 22), is thus empowered to declare the forgiveness or the retention of sins (cf. 1 Jn 2:20, Gal 6:1; and see F. W. Robertson, Serm., 2nd ser. xl.). J. C. LAMBERT.

PRÆTOR.—See MAGISTRATE, PROVINCE.

PRÆTORIAN GUARD.—See next art. and GUARD.

PRÆTORIUM (Gr. praitōrion) occurs only once in AV (Mk 15:16). Elsewhere it is represented by 'common hall' (Mt 27:27, RV 'palace'), 'judgment hall' (Jn 18:28, 23 19:4, Ac 23:35; RV in all 'palace') and 'palace' (Ph 1:14, RV 'prætorian guard'). The word at first denoted the headquarters in the Roman camp, a space within which stood the general's tent, the camp altar, the aquædile, and the tribunus; then the military council meeting there. Each prætor, on completing his year of office, went as governor to a province, and his official residence was called 'prætorium'; then any house distinguished by size and magnificence, esp. the Emperor's residence outside Rome. In the Gospels, prætorium perhaps (but see PILATE, p. 729) stands for the palace of Herod the Great, occupied by Pontius Pilate—a splendid building, probably in the western part of the city. In Ph 1:12 it is probably the barracks of the prætorians, the Imperial bodyguard. Originally the Cohors Prætoria was a company attached to the commander-in-chief in the field. Augustus retained the name, but raised the number to ten cohorts of 1000 each, quartering only 3 cohorts in the city at a time. Tiberius brought them all to Rome, and placed them in a fortified camp, at the northern extremity of the Viminal. Under Vitellius their number was raised to 16,000. W. EWING.

PRAISE is the recognition and acknowledgment of merit. Two parties are involved: the one possessing at least supposed merit, the other being a person who acknowledges the merit.

Men may praise men. Forms of praise may be used without genuine feelings of praise, and extravagant praise may be rendered intentionally, because of the advantage that will be gained thereby. This is downright hypocrisy, and the whole burden of the moral teaching of the Bible, and especially of Christ, is against hypocrisy. Again, the estimate of values may be so completely false that praise may be felt and expressed genuinely in cases where it is undeserved. And Jesus' whole influence is directed towards the proper appreciation of values so that only the good shall appear to us good.

In its common Biblical use, however, praise has God for its object. This restriction does not involve an essential difference either in the praise or in the sense of moral values. The difference lies rather in the greater praiseworthiness of God. Praise of God is of course called forth only as He reveals Himself to men, only as men recognize His activity and His power in the event or condition which appears to them adequate to call out praise. Men praise God in proportion as they are religious, and so have conscious relations with God. The praiseworthiness of a god is involved in the very definition of a god. If men postulate a god at all, it is as a being worthy to be praised. Every thought and act by which men come into relation with God is a thought and an act of praise. Petition is justifiable only if behind it is the belief that God is worthy of such approach. If the act is confession of sin, the same is true, for confession is not made to a being who does not hold a place of honour and praise. If some active service is rendered to God, this subjugation of ourselves to Him can be explained only by the conviction that God is in every way entitled to service.

Moreover, as in the case of praise of men, there is a very clear distinction to be drawn between genuine and hypocritical ascription of praise to God. The temptation to the latter is extreme, because of the immense gain presumably to be secured by praise; but the hypocrisy and the sin of it are equally great. Indeed, the seriousness of the offence is evident when one reflects that he who praises God knows full well the praiseworthiness of God, so that if he praises while the genuine feeling is lacking and the sincere act of praise is unperformed, only moral perversity can account for the hypocrisy.

In order to genuineness, praise must be spontaneous. It may be commanded by another human being, and the praise commanded may be rendered, but the real impelling cause is the recognized merit of God. God may demand praise from His creatures in commands transmitted to them through prophets and Apostles, but if man praises Him from the heart, it is because of the imperative inseparable from the very being and nature of God.

We are prepared, then, to find that in the Bible praise to God is universal on the part of all who acknowledge Him. It is the very atmosphere of both dispensations. It is futile to attempt to collate the passages that involve it, for its expression is not measured by special terms or confined to special occasions. The author of Gn 1, like every reader of the chapter, finds the work of creation an occasion for praising God. The chapter is a call to praise, though the word be not mentioned. We have but to turn to the Psalms (e.g. Ps 104) to find formal expression of the praise that the world inspires.

The legal requirements of the Law likewise depend for their authority with men upon the recognition of the merit of the Law-giver. 'Ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy,' has no force except for him who acknowledges holiness in God who commands; and obedience is the creature's tribute of praise to the holy God.

The whole history of Israel, as Israel's historians picture it, has in it the constant element of praise to Israel's God: we turn to the Psalms (e.g. Ps 102) or to other songs (e.g. Ex 15), and find the praise of the heart rising to formal expression.

In the NT, praise of Christ and of God in Christ is the universal note. It is the song of those who are healed of their sicknesses, or forgiven their sins; of Apostles who mediate on the gospel message and salvation through Christ; of those who rehearse the glories of the New Jerusalem as seen in apocalyptic vision.

We are also prepared by this universality to find that praise cannot form a topic for independent treatment. There is no technical terminology to be examined in the hope that the etymology of the terms used will throw light upon the subject, for in this case etymologies may lead us away from the current meaning of the common words employed. The history of praise in the OT and the NT is the history of worship, temple, synagogue, sacrifice, festivals. The literature of praise is the literature of religion, whether as the product of national consciousness or of personal religious experience.

It will suffice to mention one or two points of interest which the student may well bear in mind as he studies the Bible and consults the articles on related subjects.

The Heb. word oftenest used for praise is hallel, perhaps an onomatopoeic Semitic root meaning 'cry aloud.' An interesting feature is the use of the imperative in ascriptions of praise. Taken literally, these imperatives are commands to praise; but they are to be taken as real ascriptions of praise, with the added thought that praise from one person suggests praise from all. Cf. the doxology 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow,' which consists solely of four imperative sentences.

The imperative of the Hebrew verb, followed by the Divine name, gives us Hallelujah, i.e. 'Praise ye Jah.' The word is used at the beginning and end of Psalms, apparently with liturgical value. Cf. also the Hallel Psalms (113-118, 136). The noun from the same root appears as the title of Ps 145. See HALLEL.

The form which praise took as an element of worship in Israel varied with the general character of worship. It was called forth by the acts of Jahweh upon which the Israelites were especially wont to dwell in different periods. For personal and family favours they praised Him in early times with forms of their own choosing. When the national consciousness was aroused, they praised Him for His leading of the nation, in forms suitable to this service. As worship came more and more to conform to that elaborated for, and practised in, the royal sanctuary—the Temple at Jerusalem—the forms of praise could not fail to share the elaboration and to become gradually more uniform. To what extent these modifications took place is to be studied in the history of OT religion.

Praise was certainly a part of the varied service rendered by the Levites in the Temple ritual of later Judaism, and an examination of that ritual will show how far praise was given over to them, and how much was retained by the congregation. The Psalms are certainly adapted to antiphonal rendering. Did the people respond to the priests, or were there two choirs? [This word occurs in EV only in RVm of Neh 12^a.] The element of praise in the synagogue worship is an interesting and disputed question. Cf. also ADORATION, HYMN.

O. H. GATES.

PRAYER.—Prayer in the Bible is the uplifting of the heart to God with whatever motive. It includes supplication, whether in view of material or of spiritual needs; intercession, for individuals or communities; confession of sin—but also assertion of righteousness; adoration; colloquy with God; vows; thanksgiving; blessing; imprecation. The results are chiefly objective and external. But the apparent failure of prayer may be more instructive than its outward success. (Apart from Christ's prayer in Gethsemane [Mk 14³⁰], ||, take St. Paul's for the removal of his affliction [2 Co 12⁹].) Failure makes way for a boon greater than the one denied. Such cases would support the view that prayer is reflex in its action, specially potent in a subjective, inward, spiritual sense. Intercessory prayer must on the lowest view be of great altruistic value; while a recognition of God's personality makes natural the belief that He may control events in answer to prayer made according to His will.

1. Terminology.—

(i.) In OT.—(1) The most usual noun (tephillah) and the verb (primarily of intercession) connected with it are possibly derived from a root meaning 'to cut.' If so, this might hark back to days when devotees lacerated their flesh in worship (cf. 1 K 18²⁸). Another word (used only of prayer to God) is from a root of similar meaning. Some conjecture that the Jewish tephillin (phylacteries) originated as substitutes for such marks of laceration. tephillah may, however, indicate merely 'intervention.'

(2) Several words mean 'to call.' To 'call on the Name' is to worship (e.g. Gn 4²⁶). Others mean to call for the redress of wrongs (e.g. Jg 3⁹), or for help in trouble (e.g. Ps 72²). One noun is a 'ringing outcry' (e.g. Ps 17¹).

(3) It is natural to find words meaning 'seek' (e.g. Am 5⁶); a different word in Hos 5⁶ 'to seek God's face'; 'ask' (e.g. Ps 105²). To all such words, and generally, the correlative is 'hear' or 'answer.'

(4) Some expressions are anthropomorphic:—'to encounter,' 'fall upon' in order to supplicate or intercede (e.g. Jer 7¹⁶); 'to make the face of God pleasant,' i.e. to appease (e.g. Ex 32¹¹), thus equivalent to a more general word, 'to crave favour' (e.g. Dt 3²⁶).

(5) Other terms regard the suppliant's state of mind:—prayer is 'an outpouring of soul' (e.g. Ps 62⁵); or 'a meditation' (e.g. Job 15² RVm); or 'complaint' (e.g. Ps 142²); or the original connotation may be physical,—'to bow down' (Ezr 8¹⁰, cf. Eph 3¹⁴), 'to whisper' (Is 26¹⁶ RVm).

(ii.) In NT.—(1) The classical Gr. word (proseuchomai) is largely used. Unlike most OT words, this is used for prayer to God only. A related word (euchomai) is by itself little more than 'wish' (e.g. Ro 9¹²), and needs supplementing to mean 'prayer' (e.g. 2 Co 13⁷). The corresponding noun (euche) usually means 'vow' (e.g. Ac 18¹⁸); but 'prayer' in Ja 5¹³.

(2) 'To call on the Name' or invoke in prayer (e.g. Ac 9¹⁴).

(3) The words for 'seek' (e.g. Ps 62⁵) may be used of requests or inquiries made to man (e.g. Ac 8²⁴), and do not of themselves connote worship. One word denotes the request of the will (e.g. Mt 6³), another the request of need (e.g. Ac 8²²), another the form of the request (e.g. Jn 17⁹, cf. RVm).

(4) The OT 'encounter' has NT equivalent used of intercession (e.g. Ro 8²⁷).

(5) Prayer is a 'struggle' (e.g. Ro 15²⁸). One picturesque word (hikeleia), found only in He 5⁷, suggests the olive branches held forth by suppliants.

2. Place, time, and circumstance.—(1.) PLACE.—

While no restriction is suggested at any period (cf. e.g. Gn 24¹³, 14, Jon 2¹, Ps 42⁸, 61¹, Dn 6¹⁰, Lk 6¹³, Ac 16¹⁸⁻²¹), and is disclaimed by Christ in view of true worship (Jn 4²¹⁻²³), yet naturally specific worship-centres were regarded as appropriate: thus in early times Shiloh, where the ark rested (1 S 1¹⁰), Mizpah (1 S 7⁵, 1 Mac 3⁴⁰), Gibeon (1 K 3⁴⁷). But, later, the Temple was the place where (Is 37¹⁴, 56⁷) or (in absence) 'toward' which prayer was offered (1 K 8²⁹ etc., Ps 28², Dn 6¹⁰, 1 Es 4¹¹). Synagogues afforded, in later times, local prayer-centres. Where there was no synagogue, a spot outside the town was chosen, near some stream, for hand-washing before prayer (Ac 16¹³⁻¹⁴). In the NT we find Apostles going to the Temple (Ac 3¹); and St. Paul attended the synagogue on his mission journeys (Ac 17¹⁷). Distinctively Christian worship was held in ordinary buildings (Ac 11¹⁴, 14¹², 17¹², Col 4¹⁴)—a practice made natural by Jewish arrangements for private prayer (Dn 6¹⁰, Jth 8¹⁰, Mt 6⁶, Ac 10³⁰) or for Passover celebration (Mt 26¹³). Ostentatious praying at street corners is discouraged by Christ (Mt 6⁶).

(ii.) TIME.—It became a custom to pray thrice daily, i.e. at the 3rd, 6th, and 9th hours (cf. Ps 55¹⁷ [may mean 'all day long'], Dn 6¹⁰, Ac 3¹⁰, cf. 2¹⁵, cf. 1). For instances of 'grace before meat,' cf. 1 S 9¹³, Mt 15³⁶, Ac 27⁹, and the Paschal meal.

(iii.) CIRCUMSTANCE.—(1) Attitude: (a) standing (e.g. Gn 18²², 1 S 1¹⁰, Neh 9⁶, Mk 11²¹, Lk 18¹¹, 12 [the usual Jewish mode, not followed by early Christian Church save on Sundays and the days between Easter and Whitsun]); (b) kneeling (Ps 95⁶, Is 45², 1 K 8⁵⁴, Ezr 9⁵, Dn 6¹⁰, Lk 22⁴¹, Ac 7⁶⁰, 20³⁶, 21⁵, Eph 3¹⁴); (c) prostrate, face to ground (Ex 34⁸, Neh 8⁶, 1 Es 8⁹, Jth 9⁴, 2 Mac 13¹², Mt 26³⁹); face between knees (1 K 18⁴¹, cf. 7 Ps 35¹⁰); (d) sitting (7 S 7¹⁰); (e) hands uplifted (Ps 28², 63¹, 134¹, La 2¹⁰, 3⁴, 2 Mac 3³⁰, 1 Ti 2⁸) or extended [symbol of reception from God?] (Ex 9²⁰, 1 K 8²², Is 1¹⁸, Ezr 9⁵, Ps 77² [cf. AV]).

(2) Forms of prayer: (a) formulae (Dt 21⁷, 26¹⁸⁻¹⁹); (b) the Lord's Prayer; (c) allusion to the Baptist's (Lk 11¹); (d) Christ's repeated prayer (Mt 26⁴¹); (e) allusion to 'vain repetitions' or 'battology' (Mt 6⁷, cf. Sir 7¹⁴).

(3) Incense. The OT word sometimes means merely the smoke from a sacrifice. Real incense was (certainly in later OT period) in use at sacrificial ceremonies, with which prayer was probably always associated (cf. Gn 12⁸). Incense typifies prayer (Ps 141²; cf. Jer 11¹², Mal 1¹¹, Lk 1¹⁰, Rev 5⁸, 8³, 9⁴).

(4) Fasting. Being appropriate for times of solitude and sorrow, fasting naturally became associated with prayer (Ps 35¹²), especially after the Exile (Neh 1⁴, Dn 9³; cf. Lk 2²⁷), and was continued in the Christian Church (Ac 13², 14²³, Mt 9¹⁸). The following AV allusions to fasting coupled with prayer are absent from RV (but see RVm):—Mt 17²¹, Mk 9²⁹, Ac 10³⁰, 1 Co 7⁵.

3. Prayer in the OT.—(i.) PATRIARCHAL PERIOD.—Prayer is (1) colloquy with God (e.g. Gn 15¹, 22⁷, 28¹²); (2) intercession (e.g. Gn 17¹⁸, 18²²); (3) personal supplication (e.g. Gn 15², 32¹, 43¹⁴); (4) asseveration (e.g. Gn 14²²); (5) vow (e.g. Gn 28²⁰; see art. Vows).

(ii.) THE LAW (i.e. as codified and expanded in later times).—The reticence as to prayer might suggest that it is voluntary and not patient of legislation; but in OT it is less a general duty (cf. NT) than a prophetic privilege (especially re intercession); cf. Gn 20⁷ and below, §§ iii.-vi. Note, however, the formulae for thanksgiving (Dt 26¹⁻¹¹), assertion of obedience (vv. 11-14, cf. NT), supplication (v. 14), expiation (21⁷, 8¹).

(iii.) MOSES TO JUDGES.—(1) Moses pre-eminently a man of prayer and an intercessor (e.g. Ex 8¹, 30, 32¹¹⁻¹², 22, cf. Jer 15¹); colloquy with God (Ex 3. 4, 5², 6¹, 10, 12, 23-25, Dt 32³⁰), appeal in crises (Ex 5²², Nu 11¹¹), prophetic blessing (Dt 33¹⁻¹¹); (2) Joshua's prayer after defeat (Jos 7⁷⁻⁹), and in battle (10¹); (3) Gideon's colloquy (Jg 6¹¹⁻²⁴); (4) Israelites' frequent cry for help (Jg 3⁸, 15⁶ etc.).

(iv.) KINGDOM PERIOD.—(1) Samuel, like Moses, an intercessor (1 S 7⁹, 9, 9⁸, 10, 21, 12¹⁹, 15¹¹); colloquy (1 S 16¹⁻⁴, cf. 3¹⁰, 11); (2) David: apart from the Psalms, with which his connexion is dubious, the following prayers may be noted, especially the last:—for guidance (1 S 23², 30⁸ [consulting ephod]), on behalf of child (2 S 12¹⁶), prayer of asseveration (1 S 24¹²⁻¹⁵, 25²² [a threat]), confession (2 S 24¹⁷), adoration, etc. (2 S 7¹⁸⁻²⁹); (3) Solomon's prayer for wisdom (1 K 3⁹); note the elaborate intercession attributed to him at dedication of Temple, 1 K 8²²⁻⁵⁴, where (cf. v. 33) sacrifice is not mentioned! The Temple is a house of prayer; (4) Elijah's intercession (1 K 18³⁶, 37), colloquy (19¹¹), prayer before miracle (1 K 17²⁰, 21), so also Elisha (2 K 4³³, 6¹⁷); (5) Heczekiah prays in national crisis (2 K 19¹⁶) and in illness (20²); note his assertion of righteousness. For this period see also § v.

(v.) THE PROPHETS.—Intercession in attitude, action, word, characterizes the prophets (much more than the priests, but cf. Jl 2¹⁷), whether the earlier prophets (§ iv. above) or those whose writings are extant. The reason lay in the prophet's Divine call, his vision of the Divine will (so a 'seer'), and his forthtelling of the Divine message. Hence comes prayerful expectancy (e.g. Jer 42¹), in the spirit of Hab 2¹; and intercession to avert disaster (e.g. Am 7², 3 and 5, 8, Is 63¹⁻¹⁷, and vividly Jer 14, 15 [where observe the colloquy of persistent intercession notwithstanding Divine discouragement]), combined with prayer in view of personal difficulty (e.g. Jer 20¹⁻¹²).

(vi.) EXILE AND RETURN.—In this period prayer looms large, owing to the cessation of sacrificial worship and the realization of chastisement. Accordingly confession and a humble sense of dependence are prominent. The following passages should be studied: Is 63^{7-64¹²}, Ezr 9⁵⁻¹⁵, Neh 1⁴⁻¹¹, 9⁵⁻³⁸ (cf. retrospective Psalms, e.g. 106), Dn 9⁴⁻¹⁹. Further, note the personal prayer-habit of Jewish leaders (Dn 6, Ezr 8¹⁻²²). Nehemiah's prayer is often ejaculatory (Neh 2⁴, 4¹), and sometimes betrays self-complicity (5¹⁹, 13¹⁴, 22).

(vii.) PSALMS, PROVERBS, JOB.—The Book of 'Praises' might be appropriately called also the Book of 'Prayers.' (Five only are so described in title: 17, 86, 90, 102, 142, but cf. 72²⁰, Hab 3¹.) (1) Throughout the Psalms, prayer—whether of the poet as an individual or as representing the nation—is especially an outpouring—artless and impulsive—of varied experiences, needs, desires. Hence typical psalms exhibit transitions of thought and alternation of mood (e.g. 6⁷⁻¹⁰, 42, 69²⁰, 77, 77¹⁻¹¹, 109²²⁻³⁰). (2) The blessing sought is oftener material or external, like rescue from trouble or chastisement. Not seldom, however, there is a more spiritual aim: in Ps 51 pardon is sought for its own sake, not to avert punishment, and Ps 119 is notable for repeated requests for inward enlightenment and quickening. The trend of the whole collection is indicated by its ready and natural adaptation to NT ideals of prayer. In estimating psalms which express vindictive and imprecatory sentiments, we should note that they breathe the abhorrence of evil, and are not the utterance of private malice. Even on the lowest view they would illustrate the human element in the Scriptures, and the progressive nature of revelation, throwing into vivid relief the Gospel temper and teaching. The propriety of their regular use in public worship need not be discussed here.

Proverbs. Note the suggestive allusion to the character of a suppliant (15¹, 22²⁸; cf. Ps 145¹⁸, 19, Jth 8⁴, Sir 35¹⁸, Ja 5¹⁰), and Agur's prayer (30¹⁻⁷).

Job. In this dramatic poem Job's objections to his friends' criticisms often take the form of daring expostulation directly addressed to God (e.g. especially ch. 10). As a 'cry in the dark' the book re-echoes prayers like Ps 88; but the conflict of doubt culminates in the colloquy between God and Job, in which the latter expresses the reverent submission of faith (42¹⁻⁶).

4. Prayer in the Apocrypha.—The Apoc. books—of fiction, fable, history, with apocalyptic and sapiential writings—are of very unequal value, but contain many prayers. The ideas are on the whole admirable, some times reaching a distinctively NT level; the thought in 2 Mac 12⁴ as to prayer in relation to the dead is noteworthy (cf. below, 2 Es. and Bar.). As the books are little read, it may be well to take them in order, giving fairly full reference to relevant passages.

1 Esdas. Zerubbabel's thanksgiving (4⁴³⁻⁴⁹); prayer for journey, with confession (8⁷⁻¹⁰).

2 Esdas. Confession and historical retrospect (3¹⁻³⁶), colloquy with Uriel (4-14, where note the allusion to various OT intercessors, all useless at judgment-day, 7¹⁰², 112 [not in AV]).

Tobit. Prevailing prayer of Tobit and Sarah (3¹⁻¹⁶); Tobias urged to pray (4¹⁹)—prays in nuptial room (8¹⁻⁴); thanksgiving of Raguel (8¹⁴⁻¹⁷), Tobit (11¹⁴, 15, 17, 13).

Judith. Except where general supplication is made (4⁹⁻¹³⁻¹⁵, 6¹⁸, 10, 7²⁹), or where Judith's intercession is sought (8²¹), prayer in this romance is of a very unworthy kind: prayer for the success of a trick (ch. 9); prayer and the plans of Holofernes (11¹⁷, 16); prayer before slaying him (13⁴, 4).

Ad. Esther. Prayers of Mordecai (13⁸⁻¹⁰) and Esther (14¹²⁻¹³) in national peril.

Wisdom. Chs. 9-19 are in prayer-form. Note the picturesque illustration of manna and the morning prayer (16²⁷, 28).

Sirach. In this book prayer reaches heights: value of prayer (21¹), true prayer heard of God (35¹²⁻¹⁷), prayer in sickness (38⁹, 14, cf. Ja 5¹⁴⁻¹⁶), for deliverance from sin (23¹⁻⁴), prayer and alms (7¹⁹), 'battology' (7¹⁴, cf. Mt 6⁷), prayer and revenge (28¹⁻⁴, cf. Mt 6¹⁴, 18²¹, 22), national prayer against foe (36¹⁻¹⁷), thanksgiving, led by Simon (50²¹⁻²⁴), author's closing prayer (51¹⁻¹²).

Baruch. Jews of Babylon ask those of Jerusalem to pray for welfare of Nebuchadnezzar (1¹¹; cf. Ezr 6¹⁰, Jer 29⁷, 1 Ti 2²); prayer and confession of captive Israelites (1¹⁴⁻³⁴, where note prayer by the dead, 3⁴, but see RVm).

Song of the Three. Prayer and confession of Azarias before the Benedicite (vv. 1-2; cf. Ezr 9, Dn 9).

Susanna. Her prevailing prayer (vv. 42-44).

Bd. Brief prayer by Habakkuk (v. 2), Daniel (v. 20), king of Babylon (v. 41).

Prayer of Manasses. For pardon.

Maccabees. The two books are quite distinct, 1 Mac. being much the more reliable as history. Prayer is very prominent throughout the whole Maccabæan struggle,—before, during, and after battles (1 Mac 3⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸, 4¹⁰, 20, 30-32, 40, 46, 7²⁸⁻³⁰, 41, 43, 9⁴⁶, 11⁷, 2 Mac 12⁴⁻²⁹, 3²², 10¹⁶, 28, 38, 11⁶, 12¹⁸, 28, 43, 13¹⁰⁻¹², 14, 14¹⁸, 24-26, 15²²⁻²⁴, 26, 27). Note specially in 2 Mac. the allusion to the efficacy of prayer, etc., of the living for the dead (12⁴⁴, 46; cf. baptism for dead, 1 Co 15²⁹, and [?] 2 Ti 1¹⁰), and prayer of the dead for the living (15¹²⁻¹⁴; cf. angelic intercession, Zec 1²).

5. PRAYER IN THE NT.—I. EXAMPLE AND TEACHING OF JESUS CHRIST.—The special character of the Fourth Gospel should be remembered. Of the Synoptics, Lk. is specially instructive as to prayer (cf. Acts also). For Lord's Prayer, see separate article.

(i.) CHRIST'S EXAMPLE.—(a) Prays at great moments in His life: baptism (Lk 3²¹), election of Apostles (Lk 6¹²⁻¹³), miracles (Lk 9¹⁸; cf. Jn 6²⁸, Mk 7²⁴ [implied] 9²⁸, Jn 9³⁰⁻³³ [implied] 11⁴¹, 42), transfiguration (Lk 9²⁸); Gethsemane (Lk 22⁴⁰⁻⁴⁴), crucifixion (Mt 27⁴⁶, Lk 23⁴⁶); (b) intercedes for disciples (Jn 17), Peter (Lk 22³²), soldiers (Lk 23³⁴); for His intercession in glory, see below, § II. (ii.) (1).

(ii.) CHRIST'S TEACHING.—The range of prayer is chiefly (cf. OT) for spiritual blessing (cf. Lord's Prayer, and esp. Mt 6²³), but not exclusively so ('daily bread' in Lord's Prayer and Mt 24²⁰). The conditions and requisites of prayer are numerous.—(a) Earnestness [cf. urgent supplication in OT, esp. Psalms] (Lk 11¹³⁻¹⁵, where note juxtaposition with Lord's Prayer, 18¹⁻⁵); and His attitude to the Syrophenician seems to teach urgency of petition (Mk 7²⁷). (b) Humility (Lk 18-4, the juxtaposition with preceding parable is suggestive, and cf. OT assertion of righteousness; e.g. in Dt. and Neh. [see above, 3 (vi.)], Lk 17¹⁰); ambition rebuked (Mt 20²⁰⁻²³). (c) A forgiving spirit: as in Sir. (see above, § 4). (d) Privacy recommended; see above, § 2 (i.) end, and cf. Christ's own example of solitary prayer (Lk 6¹²). (e) Without 'battology'; see above, § 2 (iii.) (2), where the ref. show that the repetition discouraged is that of mere mechanical prayer (cf. heathen incantations) or of pretence (Mk 12⁴⁰). (f) With faith. Mk 11²² contains just such hyperbole as would appeal to an Eastern mind and enforce the value of prayer; while the seeming paradox of v. 24 must be taken along with this and understood in the light of Christ's general teaching. The need of faith is further illustrated by Christ's attitude to those seeking aid (e.g. Mt 8¹⁰, 9²⁸, Mk 5³⁴, 9²⁸, Lk 8⁴⁸). (g) Agreement when two or three join in prayer (Mt 18¹⁹, 20). (h) In His name (Jn 14¹³, 15¹⁶, 16²³, 24, 25). This specially Johannine feature suggests frame of mind rather than form of speech (cf. Mt 18²⁰, 20, 10²² etc.; on the other hand, cf. Ac 3⁶, 10). For the Christology it supports, see below, § II. (ii.) 1.

II. CUSTOMS AND IDEAS IN APOSTOLIC TIMES.—Evidence is afforded by Acts (where the prominence given to prayer is natural if Lk. wrote it, see above, § 1.), and by Epp., whose writers had inherited the best traditions of Jewish piety and had also assimilated their Master's teaching (which, however, they may not in every point have grasped fully). A glimpse of prayer-triumphs would be afforded by such passages as Ac 3¹⁶, 4²¹, 9⁴⁰, 10⁴, 12⁵, 12, 16²⁵, 28¹. One or two detailed points have already come up for notice (see above § 2 (i. li. iii. 1, 4), 5 (i. li. (h)), but it may be well now to collect, from Acts to the Apocalypse, some passages showing the practice and teaching as to prayer in the Apostolic Church.

(i.) Prayer is found in connexion with:—(1) Laying on of hands: (a) in healing (Ac 28⁸, cf. 9¹⁷ (see below (3))); (b) after baptism (Ac 8¹⁴⁻¹⁷, cf. 19⁶); (c) on appointment to office (Ac 6⁶, 13), with which also prayerful lot-casting is associated (Ac 1²⁴, 26, cf. Pr 16³³). (2) Public worship (1 Ti 2). (a) Both sexes participate (cf. 1 Ti 2⁸, 1 Co 11⁴, 5); (b) prayer and gift of tongues (1 Co 14¹⁴, 15, where it is suggested that the head as well as the heart is concerned with prayer); (c) 'state-prayers' in the Apostolic Church (1 Ti 2¹; cf. § 4 'Baruch'). (3) Sickness (Ja 5¹³⁻¹⁶, where notice conjunction of prayer and outward means [for union cf. Mk 6¹³] with confession; physical and spiritual healing are associated, and both with prayer; see above, § 4 'Sirach').

(ii.) (1) A distinctive idea in NT prayer is the work of the Holy Spirit. He aids us in prayer (Ro 8¹⁴⁻¹⁶, Eph 6¹⁸, Jude²⁰), interceding for us (Ro 8²⁶). Christ also intercedes (Ro 8²⁴, He 7²⁵; cf. § 5 I. (i.) (b)). Ct. presentation of prayer to God in Rev 5⁸. By Christ we enjoy free access to God (Gal 4⁷, Eph 2¹⁸, 3¹², He 4¹⁴, 10¹⁹⁻²²; see above, § 5 I. (ii.) (h)); prayer offered to Christ direct (Ac 7⁵⁹, 40, 9¹⁴ (?), 1 Co 13² (?)). (2) Prayer needs faith (Ja 1⁸, 1 Ti 2⁸, RVm, He 10²²), must have right aims (Ja 4²), and be backed by conduct (1 Jn 3²², cf. above, § 3 (vii.) 'Proverbs'). Such prayer succeeds (Ja 5¹⁶⁻¹⁸, 1 Jn 3²², 5¹⁴, 15). Prayer for temporal gifts is not very conspicuous in NT, but see Ro 1¹⁰, 2 Co 12⁹, Ph 4⁶. (3) Exhortations to prayer (Ro 12¹², Col 4², 1 Th 5¹⁶, 1 P 4⁷, Jude²⁰). (4) Reminiscences of OT occur in prayer as colloquy (Ac 9¹³⁻¹⁴, 22¹⁷⁻²¹; cf. § 3), as struggle (Ro 15³⁰, Col 2¹, 4¹²; cf. Gn 32⁶), as cry for vengeance (Rev 6¹⁰, 10, cf. 1 Ti 2¹). (5) Intercession, which in OT is specially characteristic of the prophetic office, is here a general duty, and is very prominent: Apostles for converts (Ro 10¹, 15², 2 Co 13⁷, Eph 1¹⁶, 3¹⁴, Ph 1⁴, Col 1⁹, 2 Th 1¹¹, 2 Th 1¹¹, Philm⁴, 3 Jn²); converts for Apostles (Ac 12⁵, Ro 15³⁰, 2 Co 11⁹, Col 4², 2 Th 3¹, Philm⁴); for one another (Ja 5¹⁶,

1 Jn 5¹⁶ [within limits]. (6) Thanksgiving abounds (Ro 1⁸, 1 Co 1⁴, 2 Co 2¹⁴ 8¹⁶, Ph 1³, Col 1³, 1 Th 1² 2¹², 2 Th 1³ 2¹³, 1 Ti 1¹², 2 Ti 1⁹). (7) Note also the salutation and blessing at the beginning and close of Epistles. The NT closes with a threefold prayer for Christ's coming (Rev 22¹⁷⁻²⁰).

PRAYER OF MANASSES.—See APOCRYPHA, § 11.

PREACHING.—In the OT 'preaching' is referred to explicitly in the case of Jonah's preaching in Nineveh (Jon 3¹). The word here used means strictly 'proclamation,' and corresponds to the NT word used with reference to our Lord 'proclaiming' (as a herald) the advent of the Kingdom of God (e.g. Mt 4¹⁷), which, in its initial stages, was closely associated with the preaching of John the Baptist (cf. Mt 3¹⁻³). Christian preaching is often described in the NT as a declaration of 'glad tidings' ('evangel,' 'gospel'). Strictly, the 'proclamation' ought to be distinguished from the 'teaching' that followed on it. But in its more extended application 'preaching' covers all instruction in religious matters of a homiletical character, and especially such as is associated with public worship.

The prophetic preaching hardly falls within this category. The prophets undoubtedly as a rule spoke their discourses (before writing them down). But these allocutions were special in character, and formed no regular part of the public worship.

The preaching of John the Baptist and of Jesus was largely prophetic in character—the gospel may be described as a 'revival of the spirit of prophecy'—but nevertheless it possessed some affinities with the synagogue preaching, which had become an institution of worship, though in many respects in marked contrast with and independent of it (our Lord constantly addressed the multitudes in the open air).

Preaching as a regular part of the service of public worship was a comparatively late development. Its real beginning can be traced back to the custom inaugurated by Ezra of reading a part of the 'Law' or 'Torah' at the Sabbath-day assemblages of the people, and on other holy days. On these occasions the lesson from the Law was read in the original Hebrew, and explained in the form of a paraphrase in the Aramaic vernacular by a methurgeman (dragoman) or interpreter. Such translations were called Targums. It was from this practice that preaching in the synagogue was developed—probably as early as the 4th cent. B.C. (cf. Ac 15²¹). Thus originally the sermon was essentially an exposition (of a legal kind) of some part of Scripture. Two famous teachers of the Law of the 1st cent. B.C. are styled darshanim ('preachers,' Pes. 70b), though they were primarily expounders of the Law on its strictly legalistic side. But in process of time the sermon assumed to a large extent a purely edifying character; it utilized the tale, parable, allegory, in enforcing the lessons of morality and religion, and developed truly homiletical features, without, however, losing its Scriptural colouring.

By NT times preaching had evidently become an integral part of the ordinary synagogue service, and in this way it became one of the chief instruments in the propagation of the 'new teaching.' Our Lord constantly 'taught in the synagogues' (cf. Mt 4²³, Mk 1²¹ 6², Jn 6⁵⁹ 18²⁰). St. Luke (4¹⁶.) has preserved a compressed account of one such sermon, while in Acts (13¹⁴⁻⁴¹) a fuller report of an exhortation by the great missionary Apostle, delivered in a synagogue, is set forth.

Our Lord's teaching, and that of the Apostles which He inspired, were marked by a freshness, a spontaneity and power which filled their hearers, accustomed as they were to the more set and laborious exhortations of the scribes, with the utmost surprise. But original as they were in substance, these addresses were still Semitic in form, and we must guard against importing our Western ideas of rhetoric into what were essentially Eastern homilies. The differences between the two are fundamental. While the Western develops a main and principal thought or theme through its logical subdivisions, and usually in a more or less abstract way, the Eastern adds point to point, theme to theme, often in striking antithesis, and strives to employ concrete illustrations and embodiments either figurative or parabolic of the thought. The 'Sermon on the Mount' (though its form in the First Gospel is doubtless an extended one) is an excellent illustration of Eastern method in some of these respects. The following example of an old Rabbinic address, based on the words 'He hath clothed me with garments of salvation,' which come from the chapter in Isaiah (61) from which Jesus took His text in His address in the synagogue at Nazareth, will illustrate the character of contemporary Jewish sermons:

'Seven garments the Holy One—blessed be He—has put on, and will put on from the time the world was created until the hour when He will punish the whole of wicked Edom (= the Roman Empire). When He created the world, He clothed Himself in honour and majesty, as it is said (Is 60¹): "Thou art clothed in honour and majesty." Whenever He forgave Israel's sins He clothed Himself in white; for we read (Dn 7⁹): "His garment was white as snow." When He punishes the people of the world, He puts on the garment of vengeance, as it is said (Is 59¹⁷): "He put on garments of vengeance for clothing, and was clad with zeal as a cloak." The sixth garment He will put on when the Messiah comes; then He will clothe Himself in a garment of righteousness, for it is said: "And he puts on righteousness as a breastplate, and an helmet of salvation upon his head." The seventh garment He will put on when He punishes Edom; then He will clothe Himself in Adam—i.e. red; for it is said (Is 63³): "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel?" But the garment which He will put upon the Messiah, this will shine far, from one end of the earth to the other; for it is said (Is 61¹⁰): "As a bridegroom decketh himself with a garland." And the Israelites will partake of His light, and will speak:

'Blessed is the hour when the Messiah shall come!
Blessed the womb out of which He shall come!
Blessed His contemporaries who are eye-witnesses!
Blessed the eye that is honoured with a sight of Him!
For the opening of His lips is blessing and peace;
His speech is a moving of the spirits;
The thoughts of His heart are confidence and cheerfulness;
The speech of His tongue is pardon and forgiveness;
His prayer is the sweet incense of offerings;
His petitions are holiness and purity.
Oh, how blessed is Israel for whom such has been prepared!
For it is said (Ps 31⁹): "How great is thy goodness which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee!"

Several specimens of the Apostolic preaching are given in the Acts (cf. chs. 2, 7, 8 etc.). To the Jews the Apostles preached the Messiahship of Jesus, basing their appeal mainly on two arguments, viz. (1) the resurrection, and (2) OT prophecy. On this depended the forgiveness of sins, and salvation through Christ. These reports, abbreviated as they obviously are, reveal their essential genuineness by their undeveloped theology (e.g. of the Atonement).

Preaching long continued free and spontaneous among the Christian societies, being exercised in the assembly by private members who possessed the gift of prophecy (cf. e.g. 1 Co 14¹), though, of course, the Apostles, while they were alive, would naturally assume, and be accorded, the chief place in this, as in other respects.

PRECIOUS STONES.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

PREDESTINATION.—The English word 'predestinate' in the AV is, in the few cases in which it occurs (Ro 8²⁹, Eph 1⁵ 1¹¹), exchanged in the RV for 'fore-ordain,' a return to the usage of the older Versions. The Gr. word (proorizo) conveys the simple idea of defining or determining beforehand (thus, in addition to above, in Ac 4²⁸, 1 Co 2⁷). The change in rendering brings the word into closer relation with a number of others expressing the same, or related, meanings, as 'foreknow' (in pregnant sense, Ac 2²³, Ro 8²⁹ 11², 1 P 1² 20), 'determine' (Ac 17²⁶), 'appoint' (1 P 2⁹), 'purpose' (Eph 1⁹), in the case of believers, 'choose' or 'elect' (Eph 1⁴ etc.). In the OT the idea is expressed by the various words denoting to purpose, determine, choose (e.g. Is 14²⁴⁻²⁷ 46¹⁰⁻¹¹), with the abundance of phrases extolling the sovereignty and immutability of God's counsel in all the spheres of His operation (see below; so in NT). The best clue to the Scripture conception will be found in tracing it as it appears in these different spheres of the Divine action.

1. In its most general aspect, foreordination is co-extensive with the sphere of God's universal providence, is, in fact, but another name for the eternal plan, design, purpose, counsel of God, which executes itself in providence. The election of believers, to which 'predestination' is sometimes narrowed, is but a specific case of the 'purpose' of Him 'who worketh all things after the counsel of his will' (Eph 1¹¹). It is in this wider regard, accordingly, that foreordination must be studied first. It cannot be reasonably doubted that all Scripture—OT and NT—represents God as exercising in and over the world a providence that is absolutely universal. Nothing, great or small—operations of nature or actions of men—is left outside its scope. This does not happen blindly, but in accordance with a plan or purpose, equally all-embracing, which has existed from eternity. As Plato says in his Parmenides that nothing, not even the meanest object, is unpenetrated by the idea, so even the minutest details, and seemingly most casual happenings, of life (the numbering of hairs, the fall of a sparrow, Mt 10²⁹⁻³⁰) are included in the Divine providence. Free agency is not annulled; on the contrary, human freedom and responsibility are everywhere insisted on. But even free volitions, otherwise mere possibilities, are taken up in their place into this plan of God, and are made subservient to the accomplishment of His purposes. The Bible does not trouble itself with solving difficulties as to the relation of the Divine purpose to human freedom, but, in accordance with its fundamental doctrine of God as the free personal Creator of the world and absolutely sovereign Ruler in the realms both of matter and of mind, working through all causes, and directing everything to the wisest and holiest ends, it unhesitatingly sees His 'hand' and His 'counsel' in whatever is permitted to happen, good or bad (Ac 2²³). It need not be said that there is nothing arbitrary or unjust in this 'counsel' of God; it can be conceived of only as the eternal expression of His wisdom, righteousness, and love.

Texts are almost superfluous in the case of a doctrine pervading the whole of Scripture,—history, prophecy, psalm, epistle,—but an instance or two may be given. The history is a continual demonstration of a Divine teleology (e.g. Gn 45⁸ 50²⁰). God's counsel stands, and cannot be defeated (Ps 33¹ 46¹⁰⁻¹¹); all that God wills He does (Ps 115¹ 135⁶, Dn 4³⁷); it is because God purposed it, that it comes to pass (Is 14²⁴⁻²⁷ 37²⁶); God is the disposer of all events (2 S 17¹¹⁻¹², Job 1²¹, Pr 16³³); man may devise his way, but it is the Lord who directs his steps (16⁹); even the hearts of men are under His control (21¹); God sends to man good and evil alike (Am 3⁶, Is 45⁷). It has already been pointed out that the same doctrine is implied in the NT (e.g. Ac 4²⁸ 15¹⁸ 28 [story of Paul's shipwreck], Eph 1¹¹, Rev 4¹¹ etc.).

2. A universal, all-pervading purpose of God in creation, providence, and human life, is thus everywhere assumed. The end of God's purpose, as regards humanity, may be thought of as the establishing of a moral and spiritual kingdom, or Kingdom of God, in which God's will should be done on earth, as it is done in heaven (cf. Mt 6¹⁰). But this end, now that sin has entered, can be attained only through a redemption. The centre of God's purpose in our world, therefore,— that which gives its meaning and direction to the whole Biblical history, and constitutes almost its sole concern,—is the fact of redemption through Jesus Christ, and the salvation of men by Him. To this everything preceding—the call of Abraham, the Covenant with Israel, the discipline and growing revelation of Law and Prophets—leads up (on predestination here, cf. Gn 18¹⁸ 19, Lv 20²⁶ 26, Is 43¹⁻⁷ etc.); with this begins (or, more strictly, continues) the ingathering of a people to God from all nations and races of mankind, who, in their completeness, constitute the true Church of God, redeemed from among men (Eph 5²⁵⁻²⁷, 1 P 2⁹⁻¹⁰, Rev 1⁶ 14¹⁻⁵ etc.). The peculiar interest of the doctrine of foreordination, accordingly, in the NT, concentrates itself in the calling and salvation of those described as the 'chosen' or 'elect' of God to this great destiny (Eph 1⁴ etc.). The doctrine of foreordination (predestination) here coalesces practically with that of election (wh. see). Yet certain distinctions arise from a difference in the point of view from which the subject is contemplated.

Election, in the NT, as seen in the article referred to, relates to the eternal choice of the individual to salvation. As little as any other fact or event in life is the salvation of the believer regarded as lying outside the purpose or pre-determination of God; rather, an eternal thought of love on God's part is seen coming to light in the saved one being brought into the Kingdom (2 Th 2¹³⁻¹⁵). There is the yet deeper reason for seeing in the believer's calling and salvation the manifestation of a Divine purpose, that, as lost in sin, he is totally incapable of effecting this saving change in himself. He owes his renewal, his quickening from spiritual death, to the gratuitous mercy of God (Eph 2¹⁻⁸; see REGENERATION). Every soul born into the Kingdom is conscious in its deepest moments that it is only of God's grace it is there, and is ready to ascribe the whole glory of its salvation to God (Rev 7¹⁰), and to trace back that salvation to its fountainhead in the everlasting counsel of God. Thus regarded, 'election' and 'foreordination' to salvation seem to have much the same meaning. Yet in usage a certain distinction is made. It may perhaps be stated thus, that 'election' denotes the Divine choice simply, while 'foreordain' has generally (in sense of 'predestinate') a reference to the end which the foreordination has in view. Thus, in Eph 1⁴⁻⁵ 'Even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world . . . having foreordained us unto adoption as sons' (where 'having foreordained,' as Meyer rightly says, is not to be taken as prior to, but as coincident in point of time with, 'he chose'); and in v.¹¹ 'having been foreordained,' i.e. to be 'made a heritage,' and this 'to the end that we should be unto the praise of his glory' (v.¹²). In Ro 8²⁹, again, where 'foreknew'—which seems to take the place of 'chose' (it can hardly be foreknowledge of the faith which is the result of the later 'calling')—comes before 'foreordained,' the latter has the end defined: 'to be conformed to the image of his Son.' Those 'foreknown' are afterwards described as God's 'elect' (v.³⁰). This striking passage further shows how, in foreordaining the end, God likewise foreordains all the steps that lead to it ('foreknew'—'foreordained'—'called'—'justified'—'glorified'). In 1 P 1¹, on the other hand, 'foreknowledge' is distinguished from election—still, however, in sense of pre-designation.

3. God's foreordination, or predestination, whether in its providential, historical, or personal saving aspects, is ever represented as a great mystery, the depths of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of which (for this is the character of its mystery) man can never hope to fathom (Ro 11³³⁻³⁴). When the Apostle, in Ro 9, is dealing with objectors, he does not attempt a rationale of that which he admits to lie beyond his ken, but falls back on the unchallengeable sovereignty of God in acting as He wills (vv.¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 19-22). The answer would be a poor one, were it not as absolutely assumed throughout that God's is a will in which there can be no taint of unrighteousness, and that there is nothing in His action which does not admit of vindication to a perfect wisdom and goodness. If God shows His mercy on whom He wills, His right to do so cannot be assailed; if He hardens—not arbitrarily, but through the fixed operation of ethical laws—and glorifies His wrath in the destruction of the hardened, it is not without sufficient cause, and only after much long-suffering (v.²²). As little does the Apostle attempt to show the compatibility of the Divine foreordination with human freedom, but habitually assumes that the one is not, and cannot be, in violation of the other. The material with which the potter works (v.²¹) is not, in this case, after all, mere inanimate clay, but beings who can 'reply against God' (v.²⁰), and are the objects of His long-suffering endurance (v.²²). Sovereignty is seen in this, that even those who refuse to be moulded to higher uses do not escape the hands of God, but are made to subserve His glory, even if it be in their destruction. Doubtless even here a purpose of God is to be recognized. Godet, who is not a rigid predestinarian, says of the instance in v.¹⁷—

'God might have caused Pharaoh to be born in a cabin, where his proud obstinacy would have been displayed with no less self-will, but without any historical consequence; on the other hand, he might have placed on the throne of Egypt at that time a weak, easy-going man, who would have yielded at the first shock. What would have happened? Pharaoh in his obscure position would not have been less arrogant and perverse, but Israel would have gone forth from Egypt without éclat' (on Ro 9¹⁷, 18).

Only in this sense, of those wilfully hardened and persistently obdurate, is it permissible to speak—if the language should be employed at all—of a decree of reprobation. Scripture itself, with all its emphasis on foreordination, never speaks of a foreordination to death, or of a reprobation of human beings apart from their own sins. See REPROBATE. Its foreordination is reserved for life, blessing, sonship, inheritance.

PRE-EXISTENCE OF SOULS.—

'Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar.'

—Wordsworth, Intimations of Immortality

The idea expressed in these lines has been prominent in many religions—cultured and crude alike. That it had Jewish adherents is clear from (a) Wis 8¹⁰⁻²⁰, written by some Jewish thinker influenced (as, e.g., Philo, a believer in the same doctrine, was conspicuously) by Platonist study; (b) the reference of Josephus to Essene doctrines; (c) the Talmud. That traces occur in the OT is doubtful. The idea can be more easily read into, than gathered out of, such passages as Job 1¹ (cf. Sir 40¹), Ec 12⁷, Ps 139¹⁵. Cf. also Rev 4¹¹. But something very like it occurs in Job 9². Had the man been born blind because of his own sin? In His reply Christ finds no fault with the question as such. The objection that such an idea would be unfamiliar to the disciples is weakened by considerations as to the advanced thought of the Fourth Gospel; moreover, the Book of Wisdom (see above) is clearly re-echoed in NT. Some think that the question rose from Jewish ideas as to pre-natal consciousness. See Gn 25²² (strife), Lk 14⁴⁴ (joy). Non liquet must be the verdict. The subject re-appears in Origen's speculative teaching and, indirectly, in related controversies.

PREPARATION (Gr. paraskeuē).—A term applied by the Jews to the day preceding the Sabbath, or any of the sacred festivals, especially the Passover.

PRESBYTER (Gr. presbyteros, 'elder').—The word occurs only once in EV, viz. as a RV marginal alternative for 'elders' in Ac 20¹⁷; the Gr. presbyteros, which is of frequent occurrence, being otherwise invariably rendered 'elder.' In this case the Revisers doubtless put 'presbyters' in the margin because the passage furnishes one of the leading proofs for the identity of the presbyter or elder with the bishop or overseer (cf. v.¹⁷ with v.²⁸). For treatment of the subject of the presbyter, see art. BISHOP. J. C. LAMBERT.

PRESBYTERY (Gr. presbyterion).—In EV of NT the word occurs only in 1 Ti 4¹⁴, where it denotes the body of Christian presbyters or elders (no doubt those belonging to the church at Lystra; cf. Ac 16⁴) who laid their hands upon Timothy before he set out on his labours as St. Paul's missionary companion. In the Gr. text, however, the word presbyterion is found in two other passages, viz. Lk 22⁶⁶ (AV 'elders,' RV 'assembly of the elders') and Ac 22⁵ (AV and RV 'estate of the elders'), as an expression for the body of Jewish elders who with the 'chief priests' and the scribes composed the Sanhedrin. This twofold use of the word (like the corresponding twofold use of 'elder') affords a strong confirmation of the view, which is otherwise most probable, that the presbytery of the Christian Church finds its roots in the eldership of the Jewish ecclesia.

The presbytery was at first a purely local body (cf. the Letters of Ignatius, passim), corresponding not to the modern presbytery of the Presbyterian Churches, which is a district court composed of ministers and elders drawn from a number of separate congregations, but to the kirk-session or body of elders by which in those churches a single congregation is ruled. Originally the presbytery had no fixed president. The presbyters or elders, otherwise known as bishops (see art. BISHOP), whom we meet in the NT seem officially to have all stood upon the same footing. But early in the post-Apostolic age one of the congregational presbyter-bishops rose, by what was probably a process of natural evolution (cf. 1 Ti 5¹⁷, 'Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially those who labour in the word and in teaching'), to a position of predominance, and was now known as the 'bishop' par excellence, in distinction from the other presbyters (cf. in the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches the precedence of the minister over the elders and deacons respectively, although, properly speaking, a 'minister' is simply a diakonos or deacon). The bishop as we meet him in the Letters of Ignatius (e.g. Ephes. 4) is a congregational bishop, the president of a body of congregational presbyters. The monarchical bishop is a later creation.

What was involved in the laying on of the hands of the presbytery in the case of Timothy it is impossible to say with certainty. Probably it was an act corresponding to ordination to office (see LAYING ON OF HANDS), St. Paul himself being associated with the presbytery in the matter (cf. 2 Ti 1⁶). On the other hand, it may have been no more than a commendation of Timothy to the grace of God for strength and guidance in his new work as a missionary, analogous thus to the action of the prophets and teachers of Antioch in the case of Barnabas and Saul (Ac 13¹⁻³). The laying on of St. Paul's hands (2 Ti 1⁶) may really have been a separate incident, comparable again to the laying on of the hands of Ananias on himself (Ac 9¹⁷)—not an official act but a gracious benediction (cf. Lindsay, Church and Ministry, p. 143n.). St. Paul without doubt received a consecrating grace from the hands both of Ananias and of those prophets and teachers of the Church at Antioch, but he claimed to be an Apostle 'not from men, neither through man, but through Jesus Christ and God the Father who raised him from the dead' (Gal 1¹).

J. C. LAMBERT.

PRESS, PRESSFAT.—The former occurs in the OT for the usual 'winepress' in Pr 3¹⁰ (RV 'fats'; in modern English, 'vats'), Is 16¹⁰, where alone it is retained in RV, and JI 3rd RV 'winepress.' Also Hag 2nd AV, along with the only instance of 'pressfat' (RV 'winefat'), as the rendering of a rare word, which RV wrongly tr. 'vessels.' The passage in question should run: 'When one came to the winepress (expecting) to draw off fifty (measures [probably 'baths' are intended]) from the wine-trough, there were but twenty.' For the ancient winepresses, see WINE AND STRONG DRINK, § 2.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PREVENT.—To 'prevent' in the Eng. of AV is to 'be before,' 'anticipate,' 'forestall,' as Ps 119¹⁷ 'I prevented the dawning of the morning and cried' (Amer. Revision has 'anticipated' here, but the Eng. Revisers retain 'prevented'). Sometimes it is to forestall for one's good, as Ps 59¹⁰ 'The God of my mercy shall prevent me'; and sometimes for one's hurt, as Ps 18⁵ 'The snares of death prevented me'; but the mod. idea of merely 'hindering' never occurs in AV.

PRIESTS AND LEVITES.—The method here adopted as on the whole the most satisfactory is first to give some account of the highly organized hierarchical system of the Second Temple, as we know it from the Priestly Code, and, taking this as a standard, next to trace its history up to this point, and, lastly, follow its subsequent developments.

I. THE HIERARCHY OF THE SECOND TEMPLE.—The chief authority for the religious institutions of the early period of the Second Temple is the document known as the Priestly Code (P), which was composed probably shortly after, or partly during, the Exile, and reached very nearly its present form in the time of Nehemiah. It comprised the whole of Leviticus and the ritual portions of Numbers, all the regulations connected with the Tabernacle in Exodus, together with certain narrative portions especially connected with religious institutions—the Sabbath, circumcision, and the like—and statistical statements throughout the Hexateuch. According to P, the Jewish hierarchy was threefold, including high priest, priest, and Levite, distinguished by different functions and different privileges.

A. The high priest.—1. His consecration.—The high priest, who is the eldest son of his predecessor in the office, is consecrated by an elaborate ritual consisting of washing, solemn vesting in his robes, anointing by pouring oil on the head, and several sacrificial rites, among them the sprinkling with blood and the anointing with oil of different parts of the body. The sacrificial ceremonies lasted for seven days (Ex 29, Lv 8).

2. The distinctive vestments of the high priest. In addition to those worn by all priests (B. 2), were the robe of blue, which was woven without seam, had a hole for the head, and was said to have reached down to the knees; the ephod of curiously wrought embroidered work; the breastplate, also of embroidered work, which was attached to the ephod, and contained originally the Urim and Thummim (II. B. 4); the turban with the crown or plate engraved 'Holy to Jahweh' (Ex 28³⁶).

3. The special duties of the high priest included the offering of a daily meal-offering (Lv 6¹³⁻²⁰, where the words 'in the day when he is anointed' are probably a later interpolation). He had also to perform the ceremonial sprinklings in the case of sin-offerings for the whole people (Lv 4¹³⁻²¹). But by far the most important ceremonies were those connected with the great Day of Atonement, on which day alone he, and he alone, attired merely in the linen garb of the priest, entered the 'Holy of Holies' and sprinkled the mercy-seat with the blood of a bullock as a sin-offering for himself, and that of a goat as a sin-offering for the people (Lv 16).

B. Priests.—1. Their consecration.—The priests who belonged to the family of Aaron were consecrated by special ceremonies like those of the high priest, but less elaborate (Ex 29, Lv 8). These did not, however, include, in later times at any rate, anointing, the high priest being called by way of distinction 'the anointed priest' (Lv 4 passim, cf. Ps 133³). At most the anointing of priests meant sprinkling the different parts of the body with the holy oil as well as with the blood (Ex 29³¹, Lv 8³⁰).

2. All priests were required to wear, during their ministrations only, special vestments. These were 'linen' breeches, coats of checker-work, girdles and head-tires (Ex 28⁴² 29⁸, Lv 8¹³).

3. The work of the priests consisted in (a) offering up all sacrifices. This included especially collecting the blood and sprinkling the altar with it; washing the inwards and legs, making the fire, placing the pieces of the burnt-offering upon it and burning them, doing the same to the 'memorials' of other offerings, and the removal of ashes. They did not, except usually in the case of public sacrifices, themselves kill the victim (Lv 1-6).—(b) They were required to give decisions, after examination, about suspected leprosy, plague, and moulding garments and houses, and to perform the required rites (Lv 13. 14).—(c) It was also their duty to blow the trumpets, whether as the alarm of war or at the new moon, especially that of the 7th month, and at the set feasts (Nu 10¹⁰, Lv 23²⁴; cf. Ps 81³) and on the Day of Atonement of the Jubilee year (Lv 25⁹). The words used in different passages suggest the probability that the instruments employed were originally horns, for which silver trumpets were afterwards substituted.

4. The priests were supported (a) partly by the tithe of the tithe which they received from the Levites (Nu 18²⁶); (b) partly by the first-fruits and firstlings, including the redemption money for men and unclean beasts (Nu 18¹²⁻¹⁸, Lv 7³⁰⁻³⁴); (c) partly by sacrificial dues of various kinds. The latter included (1) practically the whole of private meal-offerings, whether flour or cakes, sin-offerings and guilt-offerings (Nu 18⁹, Lv 5¹⁰ 10¹⁸⁻²⁰). These were regarded as 'most holy,' and might be eaten only by the priest and his sons as a sacrificial act in the Temple precincts (Lv 6¹⁸, 7⁶, Nu 18¹⁰). (2) Of peace-offerings the breast and the thigh, which might be eaten by any of the priest's family, the sacrificial act consisting in their first being 'waved' or 'heaved' respectively (Nu 18¹¹, Lv 7³⁰⁻³⁴). (3) The skin of the burnt-offerings (Lv 7⁸). (4) The shewbread and several special offerings, as that of the leper, etc. (Lv 24⁵, Mk 2²⁶, Lv 14 etc.). The language suggests that these dues were in some cases fresh enactments (see esp. Lv 10¹⁸⁻²⁰, Nu 18¹⁰). The tendency to increase the dues of the priests was the natural consequence of the increase of work arising out of the continually greater complication of religious ceremonies.

C. Levites.—1. Dedication.—The Levites were also dedicated to their work by special ceremonies. They were sprinkled with water, their bodies shaved, and their clothes washed. Then they were solemnly presented to God, the high priest laying his hands on them, and were required to present two bullocks, one as a burnt-offering, the other as a sin-offering (Nu 8⁵⁻²²). The ceremonies signified the solemn offering up of the Levites to God as a wave-offering (vv. 12-14b). This is said to have been as a substitute for the first-born of the Israelites, who by right belonged to God (Nu 3⁹⁻¹³).

2. The age at which they entered upon their office varied at different times between 30, 25, and 20 (Nu 4³ 8²⁴, 1 Ch 23³, 24²⁷). Probably it was twice reduced because of the increasing difficulty in procuring Levites to do the work.

3. Work.—The Levites were said to have been given as a gift (nēthāntm) to Aaron and his sons. In other words, they were to be regarded as the servants of the priests. This included especially the work of fetching and carrying, as they were believed to have carried the Tabernacle and its furniture in the Wilderness. Beyond this belonged to them the work of 'keeping the charge,' i.e. protecting and keeping clean the vessels and the furniture. In short, they were required to do everything connected with the service which was not by law required of the priests themselves (Nu 18²⁻⁷ 35-39).

4. The Levites were supported from the tithe, which was in the first instance paid to them (Nu 18²¹⁻²⁴).

D. Levitical and priestly cities.—According to Nu 35¹⁻⁸, there were assigned to the Levites in different parts of Palestine 48 cities with suburbs and surrounding pasture land to about 500 yards distance. In the description of the division of the land under Joshua, 13 of these, in the territories of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, are given to the priests (Jos 21; see also 1 Ch 6⁵⁴⁻⁶¹, where, however, the text is very corrupt). No trace of any such arrangement is to be found in Ezekiel's ideal sanctuary, according to which the priests and Levites have their possessions in the 'oblation' or sacred ground, which included the sanctuary (48⁹⁻¹⁴). This provision of cities and land in P appears to be in direct contradiction to the oft-repeated statement that the Levites had no portion in the land because Jahweh was their portion (Dt 10⁹, Nu 18²⁰ 26² etc.)—a statement explained as meaning in practice that they were to depend for their support upon their tithes and priestly dues, which were all regarded as offerings to Jahweh (Dt 18², Nu 18²⁻²², Lv 27²⁰).

This assignment of priestly cities must therefore be regarded as a sort of historical theory, which grew partly out of some sort of provision, in land and houses in and about Jerusalem, having been actually made in the period of the Second Temple for the priests and other officers (Neh 11^{2, 3}, 1 Ch 9²), partly because the cities so assigned in P were many of them ancient sanctuaries, where priests and Levites would have been located in early times. At some of the larger sanctuaries there may have been several priests, as, according to an early tradition, there were at Nob (1 S 21). Though too great a reliance should not be placed on the editorial note in Jer 1¹, it is quite possible that several of the priests of Jerusalem may have lived together at Anathoth, which was only 24 miles from Jerusalem, and the home of Abiathar (1 K 2²⁶), and so given rise to the tradition that it was a priestly city.

E. Genealogical theory of the hierarchy.—P's theory of the origin of the hierarchy was as follows: The Levites were one of the 12 tribes of Israel, descended from Levi, one of Jacob's sons. They were set apart by Jahweh for Himself in lieu of the firstborn of the Israelites, when He slew the firstborn of the Egyptians (Nu 3¹² 8¹⁷⁻¹⁸). All the 'sons' of Aaron—a descendant of Levi (Ex 6¹⁴⁻²⁰)—were priests (Lv 1⁵ etc.). The high priesthood descended in one line by primogeniture. Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's eldest sons, having perished, it passed to Eleazar, the next in age (Nu 20²²⁻²⁹, Ex 6²³). That Eleazar's son Phinehas succeeded him is perhaps implied in Nu 25¹⁰, and certainly is so in Jg 20²³—in a document closely allied in its present form to P. The rest of the male descendants of Levi were Levites, divided into the three great families of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. The family of Kohath, as being that to which both Aaron and Moses belonged, had the most honourable work. They had charge of the sacred furniture and vessels—the ark, altars, candlestick, and table, while the other families divided between them the charge of the different parts of the building (Nu 3³¹⁻³⁹).

II. OT EVIDENCE FOR THE EVOLUTION OF THE HIERARCHY.—There is reason to believe that the hierarchical system of P was not handed down in its completeness from primitive times, but was of gradual growth.

A. The Book of the Covenant.—1. Status of the local priests.—The earliest document bearing at all fully on the subject is the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex 21-23), to which we should add Ex 20 and 24. The priests of the several sanctuaries, of which many are contemplated (20^{24b}), are called Elohim (RV 'God,' AV usually 'the judges'), probably in the sense that they were God's representatives, and that their decision, often probably determined by the sacred lot, was regarded as the expression of God's will. We may compare Ps 82¹ said, 'Ye are gods'—a reference undoubtedly to this passage, made to show how unworthy the judges of a later time were of their sacred office.

2. Their work, etc.—These local priests were required to superintend the ancient primitive ceremony connected with the retention of a slave after 6 years' service (Ex 21¹), decide suits, impose fines and the like (21²² 22³). To 'revile' them was a crime (22²⁸), where the order of phrases suggests that they were of more consequence than the 'rulers'. No mention is made of any distinctive dress, even where one might certainly have expected it (cf. 20²⁶ with 28², from which we may gather that the linen breeches were the addition of a later, probably post-exilic, date). Nor is anything said of their being an hereditary guild. But silence on this latter point does not prove that they were not. In laws what is customary is often taken for granted.

B. The First Book of Samuel.—1. Temple of Shiloh.—With the Book of the Covenant we may compare 1 Samuel, which points in many ways to the state of society and religion assumed by the former. Here we find several local sanctuaries. One of the most important of them, at the time when the book opens, is the 'temple' of Shiloh.

The words 'tent of meeting' in 2² are a very late insertion not found even in LXX. It depends upon a later tradition that the Tabernacle was set up in Shiloh (Jos 18, 19¹¹ [P]).

In this temple was the ark, and the infant Samuel slept inside the sanctuary to protect it (1 S 3³). The priest Eli seems to have had a large influence and to have exercised a jurisdiction over at least the whole tribe of Ephraim. In 2²³—in a document probably at earliest only a little before Josiah's reign—he is spoken of in a way which implies that he held a unique position among the tribes of Israel. The further statement in 4¹³, that he judged Israel 40 years is a still later editorial insertion connecting 1 Samuel with Judges (see Jg 15²⁰ 16³¹ etc.).

2. Position of Samuel.—When Shiloh had been destroyed by the Philistines, Samuel came to be a still more powerful priest, being, according to 1 S 7¹⁶ 17, connected, both as priest and ruler, with several local sanctuaries—Bethel, Gilgal, Mizpah, and Ramah. But even these were comprised within a very small circle. It is curious that, according to 9⁶—part of one of the earliest sources of the book,—Saul did not appear, at the time of searching for his father's asses, to have even heard of Samuel's existence. It is also significant that in 2²³ Eli uses Elohim as in the Book of the Covenant, showing that, in his time at any rate, there were other priests exercising jurisdiction at their several sanctuaries.

3. Absence of regular religious organization.—1 Samuel points to great liberty of action on the part of the priests, or, at least, of Samuel himself. His movements do not seem to imply any regularly organized sacrificial system. Except for new moons and yearly feasts of perhaps more than one kind (1 S 13 20⁶ 26²), to which we should probably add sabbaths (cf. 2 K 4²³), there seem to have been no regular feast days. The priest appoints and invites whom he chooses to the sacrificial meal (1 S 9²³ 24), and on one occasion takes with him the animal for sacrifice (16²⁴).

4. Dress of the primitive priests.—In 1 S 21¹⁹ the two parts of the dress of Samuel, the ephod and the robe, are, in name at any rate, what afterwards belonged to the peculiar dress of the high priest (Ex 28⁶⁻¹² 21-30). But the robe is also the common name for the upper garment, and is used of that worn by Jonathan and Saul (1 S 18⁴ 24¹). Of the use of the ephod by the priests of this date there is abundant evidence. It was essentially the priestly garment of primitive times, and is especially connected with ascertaining the will of God by means of the sacred lots, Urim and Thummim, which was the peculiar province, and one of the most important functions, of the priest (1 S 14¹⁸ 22¹⁸ 23³ 30⁷). The Urim is expressly mentioned in 28⁶ and the Urim and Thummim were both originally in the text of 14¹¹.⁴², as a comparison with the LXX and Vulgate shows.

5. The priests' means of support.—According to 1 S 2—from a relatively old document—the priests had no fixed dues; but the passage seems to suggest that then, or at least in the writer's day, what had been voluntary gifts were passing into customary claims which were liable to abuse. The chief ground of complaint was the wrong committed not so much against the sacrificer as against God, to whom was due the fat of the inwards, which should first be burnt (21⁶).

6. A colony of priests.—In addition to the priests of the local sanctuaries, we find in 1 S 21. 22 an account of a settlement of priests at Nob under Ahimelech, all of whom except Abiathar his son were put to death by Doeg at Saul's command. This settlement may have originated in the troubles brought about by the Philistines.

7. Priests not regarded as Levitical.—There is nothing in the Books of Samuel which affords a sufficient reason for connecting the priesthood of this period directly with a tribe of Levi, the mention of the 'Levites' in 1 S 6¹⁸ and 2 S 15²⁴ being clearly a very late interpolation which assumes the liturgical arrangements of P. Had these been in vogue at the time, we should certainly have found some reference to them in 2 S 6 such as we find abundantly in the parallel in 1 Ch 15, where v. 3 suggests that the death of Uzzah was a punishment for other than Levites having carried the ark.

C. Jg 17-21 (a document which, though revised by a priestly writer, belongs to rather the earlier part of the monarchy and speaks of a still earlier condition of things) confirms in many ways the Books of Samuel. It speaks of different sanctuaries—Mizpah (20¹) and Bethel (20¹⁸, 20²⁶), besides Shiloh, which is a place of comparatively small importance, yet marked, as in 1 Sam., by a yearly religious festival of a somewhat secular character (cf. 21¹³⁻²¹ with 1 S 13. 12-16. 21). The 'Levite' who is priest to Micah is actually of the tribe of Judah (17¹). There is mention of an ephod and a suit of apparel for the priest; but it is uncertain whether the ephod refers to the priest's dress or, as apparently in 8²⁷, to some kind of image.

D. 1 and 2 Kings (original documents) up to Josiah's reform.—There were two circumstances which tended to diminish the prestige of the local priests.—1. The establishment of the monarchy, by which many, if not all, of the secular functions of the priests had passed into the hands of the king or his deputies. Of these one of the most important was the practice of Jurisdiction (see esp. 2 S 12. 14¹⁻²⁰ 15²⁻⁴, 1 K 3⁹. 14-16; cf. also Dt 16¹⁸). It is also true that, sooner or later, the idea of the king as God's earthly representative was substituted for that of the priest.

2. Of even greater importance was the building of the great Temple at Jerusalem by Solomon. From the very first it made for the centralization of worship, though not of course intended originally to be the one single lawful sanctuary which it afterwards became. The local sanctuaries ('high places') were still tolerated (1 K 15¹⁴ 22⁴ etc.), but would tend more and more to sink into insignificance beside this splendid building. This was especially the case in the Southern Kingdom. In the North the local sanctuary worship had more vitality, but it was largely maintained and also debased for political reasons (1 K 12²⁸⁻²⁹). The calves of Jeroboam were probably Canaanitish, though he probably meant them as symbols, not rivals, of Jahweh. The cult of the 'high places' seems gradually to have relapsed into familiar and popular types of Semitic worship; and in the books of the early prophets Amos and Hosea it is not always easy to distinguish between heathenism and a heathenish worship of Jahweh.

With the decline of the local sanctuary the status of the priest gradually declined, till it reached the low level implied in Jg 17-19, and in Deuteronomy.

E. Deuteronomy.—1. Levites.—In Dt. (first published in all probability in Josiah's reign) we find the terms 'priests' and 'Levites' rather curiously used. The latter occurs frequently, but when used alone it is always as of a class deserving of pity. The Levite is frequently ranged with the slave, the widow, and the fatherless (Dt 12¹⁸. 18 16¹¹. 14). The descriptive phrase 'that is within thy gates' means in the towns generally as distinct from Jerusalem, as we see from 12¹⁸ 16¹⁴, where the local sanctuaries are contrasted with the one permissible sanctuary. The Levites were certainly the priests of these local sanctuaries. The poverty of the Levites is also testified by Jg 17-19, in which we find more than one case of Levites wandering about in search of a living.

2. Effect of abolishing local sanctuaries.—Dt 18¹⁻⁸ suggests that Levites might desire to go up to Jerusalem and perform priestly functions and receive support, and orders that they should be allowed to do both, and be treated in these respects on an equality with the priests at Jerusalem. When we realize that the ideal of Dt. was the one only sanctuary, it becomes evident that the case contemplated was one which would naturally arise when the local sanctuaries were abolished, as in fact they were by Josiah.

3. The priests the Levites.—On the other hand, the priests of Jerusalem are generally called distinctively, it would seem, 'the priests the Levites'; occasionally 'priests' only, when the context makes it clear that the priests of Jerusalem are meant, as in 18¹ 19¹⁷.

4. The dues of these priests, including the Levites who joined them, were the shoulder, the two cheeks, and the maw, and the first-fruits of field and garden produce. They did not include, as in P, the thigh or the firstlings. The tithes were not given by right to the priests or Levites, but the latter shared in the family feast at the one sanctuary, at which they were solemnly eaten as a sacrificial act. The same was the case with the firstlings, vows, and freewill offerings (18¹⁻⁸ 12¹⁷⁻¹⁹). One sees in these arrangements very clearly the system which was elaborated in P, and a development from what is implied in 1 S 2.
